The testator then directed the bank to stand possessed of the net rents, profits and income which should from time to time accrue from the said property and certain other property upon trust to pay the same to his wife, Emily James, during her life and after her death upon trust to pay the same in equal shares to, or for the benefit of, a large class of nephews and nieces. After making other dispositions, not material to be stated, the testator gave and bequeathed all the residue of his estate, including his furniture and household and personal effects, to his wife absolutely. The question which I have to determine is whether, on the true construction of the will, No. 12, St. Thomas Square, and the land at Redbrook and the moneys to the credit of the testator at the bank, or the testator's residuary estate, is the primary fund for the payment of the testator's funeral and testamentary expenses, including estate duty on his personal estate, and debts and administration expenses. Either fund is sufficient to bear the whole of the burden of the payments in question.

D Counsel for one member of that class of nephews and nieces has argued that the burden of these payments should fall primarily on residue. I have not felt it necessary to trouble counsel for the widow, but that does not mean that the case is not one of some complication and difficulty. The oft-cited s. 34 (3) of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, is the foundation of the question which I have to decide. That sub-section provides:

E Where the estate of a deceased person is solvent his real and personal estate shall, subject to rules of court and the provisions hereinafter contained as to charges on property of the deceased, and to the provisions, if any, contained in his will, be applicable towards the discharge of the funeral, testamentary and administration expenses, debts and liabilities payable thereout in the order mentioned in sched. I, pt. II, to this Act.

F Schedule I, pt. II, to the Act is as follows:

Order of application of assets where the estate is solvent. 1. Property of the deceased undisposed of by will, subject to the retention thereof of a fund sufficient to meet any pecuniary legacies. 2. Property of the deceased not specifically devised or bequeathed but included (either by a specific or general description) in a residuary gift, subject to the retention out of such property of a fund sufficient to meet any pecuniary legacies, so far as not provided for as aforesaid. 3. Property of the deceased specifically appropriated or devised or bequeathed (either by a specific or general description) for the payment of debts. 4. Property of the deceased charged with, or devised or bequeathed (either by a specific or general description) subject to a charge for the payment of debts . . . 8. The following provisions shall also apply (a) The order of application may be varied by the will of the deceased; (b) This part of this schedule does not affect the liability of land to answer the death duty imposed thereon in exoneration of other assets.

H Before I turn to the authorities, I will express my view on the construction of this will. As I have indicated, the testator gave and devised and bequeathed particular property upon trust to sell and, after payment of debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, to invest the proceeds and stand possessed of the income upon trust for his widow for life and after her death to hold the capital upon trust for the benefit of a class of nephews and nieces. In my opinion, the testator, when he directed the bank to sell and after payment of just debts to invest, was directing the bank to pay the debts. They could not carry out his direction to invest after payment without paying them. Therefore, I should hold that the testator had specifically appropriated or devised or bequeathed property for the payment of debts, within the meaning of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, sched. I, pt. II, para. 3. Secondly, I should hold that the direction to pay debts out of a particular fund necessarily involved an intention to exonerate some other fund which the testator disposed of in some other part of his will—in other words, necessarily involved an intention to exonerate the residue of his estate which he devised and bequeathed to his wife absolutely. A

Am I right in reaching those conclusions? This depends on a difficult line of authorities. In Re Kempthorne (1), MAUGHAM, J., made these observations in reference to sched. I, pt. II, paras. 3 and 4 ([1930] 1 Ch. 268 at p. 278):

Now in both of those cases it is to be noticed that the legislature is assuming that the testator by his will has specifically appropriated in one case, or devised or bequeathed in the other, property for the payment of debts; or that he has charged with payment of debts specific property, or some property, under a general description, or devised or bequeathed property subject to a charge for payment of debts, and I cannot help concluding that those two paragraphs mean that the fact that the testator has done one of those things is not per se to constitute, to use the words of s. 34 (3), a provision in the will which operates to alter the order of application which is specified in part II of the schedule. B

Counsel for the nephew has referred to that paragraph, which, as I shall show in a moment, has since been applied in another case, and he has submitted that those words apply to the present case, but, in my judgment, they do not, because in that paragraph the words "per se" are of vital importance and in this case there is to be found, not only a devise or bequest of particular property for the payment of debts, but also an intention to exonerate another category of property disposed of by this will, namely, residue, and I think a review of subsequent cases will show that this ground of distinction is valid. C

In Re Atkinson (2) the testator bequeathed all his personal estate to his trustees upon trust for sale and conversion and upon trust that they should out of the moneys produced by such sale and conversion and of any ready money pay his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and the legacies bequeathed by any codicil and should stand possessed of the residue of the moneys in trust as to one-third part thereof for one beneficiary, as to one other third part for another beneficiary, and as to the remaining one-third part for another beneficiary. The testator had also disposed of some real estate specifically and that disposition failed. The question was whether the primary fund was undisposed-of realty or the residue of personalty. CLAUSON, J., said ([1930] 1 Ch. 47, at pp. 50, 51): D

It has been contended on behalf of the residuary legatees that, by force of the new Act [i.e., the Act of 1925], the debts were made primarily payable out of the undisposed-of real estate. On the other hand, it was contended on behalf of those who would take the undisposed-of property that, before the provisions of part II can be applied, regard must first be had to the provisions, if any, contained in the will. The question then is whether there is to be found in the will any provision which has the effect of altering the statutory order of application and putting some other assets of the deceased in front of the undisposed-of real estate. In Re Lamb (3) there was no such provision to be found in the will; and in Re Petty (4) a mixed fund was created for payment of debts, etc., and there was there no undisposed-of moiety of the balance of residue until the debts had been paid. Here the will contains a clear direction to the trustees to convert the personal estate and out of the moneys produced by such conversion to pay his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts: until that provision is worked out there is no necessity to have recourse to sched. I, pt. II, to the Act. E

In Re Littlewood (5) MAUGHAM, J., had to deal with a will in which Hannah Littlewood . . . gave and bequeathed "all my farm stock, implements and tenant right, but charged with the payment of all my just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and also with the payment thereof of the legacies mentioned in the will of my late husband William Littlewood, and an additional legacy of £50 which I bequeath to my stepdaughter Eleanor Booth, unto and equally between my stepson George Littlewood and my son Fred Littlewood" and the will contained also a gift of the testatrix's residuary estate to Frederick Littlewood absolutely. MAUGHAM, J., said ([1930] 1 Ch. 443, at pp. 445, 446): F

H

But if a testator chooses to charge debts by his will on certain specific items of personal estate, and then gives his residue to some person other than the legatee of the specific property, there can be no doubt, on the construction of his will, that he intends the specific property to be primarily applied in payment of the debts, to the exoneration of the person to whom the residue is given: Re Smith (6). Accordingly, in my view, the testatrix in this case intended to give to George Littlewood and Frederick Littlewood her farm stock, implements, and tenant right, after payment thereof of all just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses and the legacies therein mentioned and therein bequeathed: and to the residuary legatee Frederick Littlewood she intended to give the whole of the rest of the real estate, discharged from the payment of debts and legacies, provided that the specific gift of farm stock, implements, and tenant right was of sufficient value to discharge the liabilities.

It appears to me that the language there used by MAUGHAM, J., is extremely appropriate to the present case. It is interesting to note that he considered the words "after payment" as equivalent to a direction to pay. MAUGHAM, J., continued (ibid., at p. 446):

I have now to consider the effect of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, sched. I, pt. II, having regard to the authorities and also to the provisions of s. 34 (3) of the Act, and sched. I, pt. II, para. 8, which provides that "the order of application may be varied by the will of the deceased." In Re Kempthorne (1) I endeavoured to explain the difficulty which I felt in giving effect to some of the provisions of that part of that schedule . . .

I have no doubt that those words are a reference to the passage which I read earlier in my judgment. MAUGHAM, J., continued:

. . . and I understand that the Court of Appeal, who differed from me on one point in that case, also felt some difficulty in explaining the precise effect of those provisions. I think, however, that I am justified in taking the view that, prima facie, the paragraphs of the schedule are to have effect subject to the provisions of the will of the deceased, in cases where there is a reasonably clear indication of the intention of the deceased; and a fortiori, I think, is that the case where the will was executed before the coming into force of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925.

In my opinion, that passage shows two things. It shows that the proposition which MAUGHAM, J., is there enunciating is not limited to wills which were executed before the coming into force of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925. It also shows that the passage which I have read from a judgment of his own occasioned him no difficulty when he came to decide Re Littlewood (5) and I feel little doubt that that was because the words "per se" are emphatic. In Re Littlewood (5) the judge found (and, if I may say so, very naturally found) that there was not only a direction to pay debts out of the particular fund, but a clear intention to exonerate another fund which was disposed of by the testatrix.

This analysis of that passage, in my judgment, supplies the clue to Re Gordon (7), which is a decision of BENNETT, J. In that case ([1940] Ch. 769):

A testatrix by her will gave certain specific legacies and a legacy of £50 in trust thereof to pay debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and to pay any balance remaining to a society. There was no residuary gift: Held, that there was an intestacy as to the residue and there being no direction in the will to vary the statutory order of application of assets, the debts, funeral and testamentary expenses of the testatrix were primarily payable out of property undisposed of. Ruling of MAUGHAM, J., in Re Kempthorne (1) applied.

In my judgment, the underlying ground of the decision in Re Gordon (7) was that there was no residuary gift. If a testator directs a particular fund to bear debts and makes no other disposition, it is, of course, impossible to hold that he intends to exonerate some other fund. That, I think, is why BENNETT, J., said at an early point in his judgment ([1940] Ch. 769, at pp. 772, 773):

It is said, and I think truly, that there has been no case which decides what the interpretation of the statutory provisions is, and what their effect is where a testator has made such a will as has to be considered in the present case.

The real distinction between Re Littlewood (5) (which was cited to the judge but was not referred to by him in his judgment) and Re Gordon (7) is that in Re Littlewood (5) there was a residuary gift and in Re Gordon (7) there was not. Moreover, at the end of his judgment BENNETT, J., said (ibid., at pp. 775, 776):

In the present case it is clear that the testatrix has either bequeathed property for the payment of her debts or has bequeathed property charged with the payment of her debts. She has made no other disposition of her property. The facts of the case plainly fall within the reasoning of MAUGHAM, J., with which, if I may respectfully say so, I entirely agree. Where a solvent testator has made by his will a disposition of property which falls either within para. 3 of the schedule or within para. 4, and has made no other disposition of his property and has not otherwise indicated his intentions, there seem to me to be no grounds for a conclusion that such a testator has intended to vary or interfere with or alter the order in which the statute has said that assets are to be applied for the payment of debts and funeral and testamentary expenses.

Of those three conditions precedent enumerated by the judge, only the first applies in the present case, and, accordingly, it is, in my judgment, clear that the decision in Re Gordon (7) is not applicable to the present case. On the contrary, Re Littlewood (5) is, in my judgment, directly applicable and would, I think, have compelled me to reach the conclusion which I should have wished to reach independently of all authorities.

Declaration that the testator's house, No. 12, St. Thomas Square, Monmouth, the land near Redbrook and the moneys standing to his credit at the bank was the primary fund for payment of the testator's funeral and testamentary expenses (including estate duty on his personal estate) and debts and administration expenses. FORSYTH v. FORSYTH.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Jones, J.), January 13, February 13, 1947.]

Husband and Wife—Maintenance—Jurisdiction—Husband ordinarily resident in Scotland—Wife residing in England at wish of husband—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (c. 39), s. 4.

At the time of the marriage in 1943 the husband was in the army and the wife went to live with her husband's family in Scotland, where she remained until Christmas, 1945, when trouble arose between the parties. The husband, who was on leave, told the wife that, owing to shortage of room in his parents' house, he had decided that she should return to London until he was demobilised and that he would follow her in a few days. In this belief the wife returned to her parents' home in London, but the husband did not follow and from that date she did not see him again nor did she receive any money from him. In July, 1946, the wife took out a summons before the justices in the petty sessional division in which she was resident, alleging that the husband had deserted her. The summons was directed to the husband at his address in Scotland and was served on him under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction (Process) Act, 1881. At the hearing the solicitor representing the husband objected to the jurisdiction on the ground that the husband was a domiciled Scotsman, but called no evidence in support of this submission, nor did the wife call any evidence that the husband was a domiciled Englishman. The justices overruled the objection to the jurisdiction, found that the complaint of desertion was proved and made an order for the wife's maintenance, but they did not make a separation order. For the purpose of the appeal it was deemed that the husband was shown to be ordinarily resident in Scotland and that the wife at the material time was, at the express wish of the husband, resident in England.

HELD: residence of the husband in England was not a condition precedent to the exercise by the justices of the petty sessional division in which the cause of complaint wholly or partly arose of their jurisdiction under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Acts; the combination of the Summary Jurisdiction (Process) Act, 1881, and the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Acts, together provided that the husband was brought by special statute or legislation within the jurisdiction; and, therefore, by virtue of s. 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Process) Act, 1881, the process, which, by s. 8 of that Act, includes the summons to answer the complaint of desertion, was properly issued and the justices had jurisdiction to try the case.

APPEAL by a husband against a maintenance order made on the ground of desertion by Edmonton (Middlesex) justices. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD MERRIMAN, P.

James MacMillan for the husband.

E Bernard Lewis for the wife.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 13. LORD MERRIMAN, P., read the following judgment: This appeal by a husband against a maintenance order made on the ground of desertion by the justices of the petty sessional division of Edmonton, Middlesex, raises an important question of jurisdiction on which, so far as I am aware, there is no direct English authority.

F The facts are as follows. At the time of the marriage in 1943 the husband was serving in His Majesty's forces. The wife had also served in the A.T.S., but it would appear probable, though this is not definitely stated in her evidence, that she had been discharged on her marriage. She went to live with her husband's family in Scotland at 13, Torrie Road, Huntly. According to the wife's evidence, which is uncontradicted, they lived quite happily together until June, 1945, but on Christmas Eve, 1945, trouble arose in the household. G At that time the husband was on leave. He told his wife that there was no room in the house, one of his brothers having returned from India, and in these circumstances the husband had decided that it would be best if she returned to London until he was demobilised. He said that he would go there with her on the following Wednesday, but she saw nothing of him until one o'clock in the afternoon of that day, when he informed her that he did not intend to go to London until the Friday, as he was going to see his former employers about his job. However, he paid for her railway ticket and she departed, believing that he would be following on the Friday. The wife proved that she had not seen him since and that he had not sent her any money, though she had written to his address in Germany, from which I assume that he was serving in the British Army of the Rhine, to inform him that she had arrived safely at her mother's. Having heard nothing from him, the wife, on July 18, 1946, took out a summons before the justices at Edmonton, the petty sessional division in which she was resident, on the ground that her husband had deserted her. At the hearing on Sept. 12 the husband was represented by a solicitor, who objected to the jurisdiction on the ground that the husband was a domiciled Scotsman, and relied on M'Queen v. M'Queen (1). He called no evidence in support of this submission. The husband's counsel admitted that, as things stand, the point can be put no higher than that the wife called no evidence to show that the husband was a domiciled Englishman. It must, I think, be taken for the purposes of the case that he is shown to be ordinarily resident in Scotland. Apart from the evidence to which I have already referred, the summons was directed to the husband at the address already mentioned, and, as is admitted, was served on him there under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction (Process) Act, 1881. The justices overruled the objection to the jurisdiction, and on the uncontradicted evidence of the wife found that the complaint of desertion was proved, and made an order for her maintenance of 20s. a week. They did not make a separation order. They gave as the reason for their decision that they were of opinion that the husband had deserted the wife, that he was in the army and had made no effort to trace her, and that he intended making London the matrimonial home. It was argued on behalf of the husband that the last finding with regard to the matrimonial home was erroneous if it was intended to imply that there was a settled intention on the husband's part to change his domicile, or, if that was not implied, it was irrelevant. I agree that, if the husband's domicile was Scottish, there was no sufficient evidence of a change of domicile. In my opinion, the true interpretation of this finding is that the case is one in which the wife, at the material time, was, with the full consent of the husband, and, indeed, at his express wish, resident in England, where he was to join her in due course. At any rate, that is my own conclusion from the wife's evidence, and I propose to consider the important question of the jurisdiction of the justices to hear this case on that finding of fact, which justifies a finding of desertion according to English law. A B C D

It is argued on behalf of the husband that the residence in this country, not of the wife alone, but of both spouses, is a condition precedent to the exercise by the justices of the petty sessional division in which the cause of complaint wholly or partially arose of their jurisdiction under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Acts. It is conceded, of course, that, apart from the provision in s. 2 of the Act of 1895 that the Act shall not apply to Scotland, no such condition is actually expressed in these Acts, but it is argued that, although the objection that the parties must be domiciled in this country cannot be supported, the condition that both must be resident in this country must be implied. This is said to follow by analogy with the limitation on the jurisdiction of the High Court to pronounce a decree of judicial separation laid down in Graham v. Graham (2), Armytage v. Armytage (3), and Anghinelli v. Anghinelli (4). Seeing that by s. 5 (a) of the Act of 1895 the justices' court has power to include in an order a provision that a wife be no longer bound to cohabit with her husband, and that such a provision, while in force, has the effect in all respects of a decree of judicial separation on the ground of cruelty, it is suggested that it is absurd to suppose that the legislature intended to give justices the power to make an order which, in effect, is a decree of judicial separation against a husband resident out of the jurisdiction when the High Court has no jurisdiction to do so. E F G

The decision in Graham v. Graham (2) may, at least, afford a reason for justices, in their discretion, declining to include a non-cohabitation clause in an order against a non-resident husband, and, as I have already said, no such order was made in this case, but, in my opinion, it would be unsafe to press this analogy. The two jurisdictions have entirely different origins. The jurisdiction of the High Court to pronounce a decree of judicial separation is founded on the principles on which the Ecclesiastical Court pronounced a decree of divorce a mensa et thoro. The jurisdiction of the justices is based on a series of statutes, the first of which now in force was passed in 1895. Nor is the jurisdiction by any means co-extensive with that of the High Court. In this country, no doubt, the cardinal offences of adultery, desertion and cruelty are identical in quality whichever court is dealing with them, but there are incidental differences. For example, with regard to all grounds of complaint, by virtue of s. 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, the H complaint must be made within six months from the time when the matter of complaint arose. As regards desertion, no period of duration is prescribed beyond such as may be inherent in the very finding of desertion. As regards cruelty, on the other hand, no act of cruelty, however savage, comes within the jurisdiction of the justices unless it has the element of persistence. From this it follows that justices may grant, though they are not obliged to do so, what is in effect a judicial separation for desertion lasting, say, one month, while they cannot grant it in respect of a single assault, however brutal, unless that has been the subject of certain specified proceedings to which I will later refer. Not less important is the fact that such an order may be made against a husband by justices for wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance, habitual drunkenness, or for cruelty to the children of the wife, or insisting on sexual intercourse while suffering from venereal disease, or compelling the wife to submit herself to prostitution, in respect of which matters, as such, the High Court has no jurisdiction to pronounce a decree of judicial separation, while conversely, justices have no jurisdiction in respect of insanity.

Manifestly, therefore, the consideration that judicial separation might be ordered by justices in circumstances in which it could not be decreed by the High Court is not decisive of the question at issue, but there is an even more important distinction between the two jurisdictions. While that of the High Court depends on the residence of both spouses within the jurisdiction, although not necessarily in the same place, but extends to matrimonial offences committed out of the jurisdiction (Armstrong v. Armstrong (3)), that of the justices is not general, but is strictly local. Moreover, if s. 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, is to be read subject to the implied proviso that both the spouses must be resident in this country, I can see no justification, nor was any suggested in the course of the argument, for reading the proviso into part of the section only. If it is to be implied at all, it must be implied, in my opinion, throughout the section. As will appear when I come to deal with the section in detail, it would be inappropriate to more than one of its provisions.

It will, however, be convenient, first of all, to consider the decision in M'Queen v. M'Queen (1). The argument based on this decision was less strenuously pressed, but, on reflection, I consider that it is the more formidable of the two. In that case the husband alleged that he was a domiciled Scotsman residing in Scotland until, on the outbreak of the war of 1914-1918, he joined His Majesty's forces, and the wife was an Englishwoman whom he married during the war. They never resumed cohabitation on his discharge from the army in January, 1920. There was a conflict about the reason for their living separately, and the wife, in June, 1920, made a complaint to the West Ham police court on the ground that the husband had deserted her, whereupon that court issued a summons to the husband to appear to answer the complaint. The summons was duly served in accordance with the Summary Jurisdiction (Process) Act, 1881. The magistrate made an order which, again, was duly served in accordance with that Act. Default having been made in making the payments awarded, the magistrate issued a warrant to apprehend the husband and bring him before the court. This in turn, after being endorsed by a justice of the peace in the county of Kinross, was executed and the husband was lodged in the police cells at Kinross, with a view to his being taken to England. The husband presented a note of suspension and liberation on the grounds that he had been wrongfully arrested and imprisoned, since, being a domiciled Scotsman, he could not be imprisoned in respect of a warrant from one of the inferior courts of England. The matter came before LORD ASHMORE in the Bill Court, who, applying the reasoning of the opinions delivered in the House of Lords in Berkley v. Thompson (5), held that the whole substratum of the jurisdiction exercised by the magistrates' court necessarily collapsed, and that, there being no initial jurisdiction over the complainer, the English court had no power to cite him to that court, and, on that assumption, the subsequent procedure, including both the granting of the order and the warrant to apprehend, was all inept. He, therefore, continued the order for interim liberation. It is stated in a note in 85 Justice of the Peace (Notes), p. 335, that this decision was upheld by the Court of Session, but I have been unable to find any report of this decision.

Manifestly this case is decisive in Scotland on the question whether an English maintenance order can be enforced in the manner there attempted against a husband domiciled and resident in Scotland. We, however, are concerned, not merely with a particular method of enforcement, but with the jurisdiction to make an order at all, and, in so far as the case decides that the English court has no jurisdiction over the husband and no power to cite him to the court, it does not bind us. Nevertheless, we should naturally regard the decision with deference and be guided by it unless we were convinced that it was wrong. Incidentally, I find it impossible to accept the view of the case expressed in LUSHINGTON'S SUMMARY JURISDICTION (MARRIED WOMEN) ACTS, a textbook which I always find very helpful on this subject. It is made to appear (3rd ed., p. 2) that the decision depended on the acceptance by the court of the husband's story that the wife had refused to come to Scotland to live with him there, and that, therefore, the desertion, if any, was on her part. There was, no doubt, a conflict of evidence, but, as appears from the summary already given, I do not read LORD ASHMORE'S decision, which appears to me to be founded as a matter of principle on Berkley v. Thompson (5), as turning only on a question of fact.

However that may be, it is clearly necessary for this court to consider the bearing of Berkley v. Thompson (5), on the present case. That was a case under the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872. The putative father was domiciled and ordinarily resident in Scotland and was there served with the summons. Incidentally, the point that the service was imperfect under the Summary Jurisdiction (Process) Act, 1881, was disregarded in order that the question of principle might be decided (10 App. Cas. 45, at p. 46). The question was whether jurisdiction to adjudicate in bastardy could be derived from ss. 4 and 6 of that Act, or whether it must not be founded on service within the jurisdiction by which, as LORD SELBORNE, L.C., explained (ibid at p. 48), was meant, not the jurisdiction of the particular justices, but the jurisdiction of the law of that country to which alone the Act of Parliament applied. At the beginning of his opinion, LORD SELBORNE, L.C., said (ibid at p. 47):

I will observe two things at the outset. First of all, though a summary jurisdiction under the Bastardy Acts is given to justices, yet the bastardy law is one thing and the Summary Jurisdiction Acts are another; and this being a case of bastardy we shall have to consider the bastardy law in the first place, and then, if necessary, the application to that law of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts afterwards. Now the bastardy laws beyond all question did not, before the year 1881, give to the justices any jurisdiction in a case of this kind where the person summoned was a Scotchman, domiciled, and not only ordinarily but actually resident, in Scotland. Those Bastardy Acts were English Acts, they did not extend to Scotland, and did not contain any provisions whatever contemplating their execution in Scotland; and until the Act of 1881 I have not heard from the learned counsel any reference to any one of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts which gave a jurisdiction in bastardy cases except to execute those bastardy laws which did not, as I have said, extend to Scotland.

Later, after reading s. 3 of the Bastardy Acts, 1872, he said (ibid at p. 49):

It is impossible to read that provision without seeing that this legislation proceeds upon the footing that the presence of the putative father in England is necessary for the jurisdiction to attach . . .

(See also R. v. Humphrys (6)). That being so their Lordships, affirming a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division and the Court of Appeal, held that it was impossible to found jurisdiction otherwise non-existent on the provisions of ss. 4 and 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Process) Act, 1881, which regulate procedure in cases where jurisdiction exists. All their Lordships discussed the question as one of general principle. LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in particular, added immediately after the passage last quoted:

. . . and I must say, both with respect to the decision in R. v. Lightfoot (7) and with respect to that legislation, that they proceeded upon general principles; because the general principle of law is "Actor sequitur forum rei"; not only must there be a cause of action of which the tribunal can take cognizance, but there must be a defendant subject to the jurisdiction of that tribunal; and a person resident abroad, still more, ordinarily resident and domiciled abroad, and not brought by any special statute or legislation within the jurisdiction, is prima facie not subject to the process of a foreign court—he must be found within the jurisdiction to be bound by it. However, one need not here rest upon general principles, because there is the decision, and there is the statute of 1872.

This passage was recently applied with approval by LORD WRIGHT delivering the judgment of the Privy Council in Trower & Sons, Ltd. v. Ripstein (8).

It is vital to consider what LORD SELBORNE, L.C. meant by the phrase (10 App. Cas. at p. 47):

A . . . yet the bastardy law is one thing and the Summary Jurisdiction Acts are another; and this being a case of bastardy we shall have to consider the bastardy law in the first place, and then, if necessary, the application to that law of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts afterwards.

It is important to observe what is meant by “the Summary Jurisdiction Acts.” In Peagram v. Peagram, AVORY, J. said ([1926] 2 K.B. 165, at p. 173):

B I have no doubt that the expression “the Summary Jurisdiction Acts” in that section [the Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act, 1920, s. 7] means the Acts which form the code for regulating procedure of courts of summary jurisdiction, beginning with the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, and including the Summary Jurisdiction Acts of 1879, 1884 and 1899; but in my opinion it does not include the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, notwithstanding the title of that Act.

C There is a passage in the judgment of LORD HEWART, C.J. (ibid at p. 170) to the same effect. In other words, for the purposes of comparison in a case like the present, the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Acts stand in the same relation to the Summary Jurisdiction Acts as did the Bastardy Act, 1872, dealt with in Berkley v. Thompson (5), i.e., the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Acts are the substantive legislation and the “Summary Jurisdiction Acts” proper merely regulate the procedure: see s. 8 of the Act

D of 1895. For the present purpose it is necessary to include in the Summary Jurisdiction Acts the Summary Jurisdiction (Process) Act, 1881, which, by s. 1, is deemed to be included in the expression “Summary Jurisdiction Acts” and “Summary Jurisdiction (English) Acts,” and, as the subject-matter suggests, it would, apart from the fact that Ireland only is expressly excluded, necessarily be taken to apply to Scotland, differing in this respect, from the general body of the summary jurisdiction code. The Act of 1881 in any

E circumstances to which it applies is, in effect, the connecting link between the summary jurisdiction procedure in England and Scotland respectively. So far as the extent of jurisdiction is concerned, the question is whether there is any distinction between the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Acts and the Bastardy Act, 1872. Now, it is quite clear that in the passage already

F quoted from his opinion (10 App. Cas. at p. 49), LORD SELBORNE, L.C. regarded the wording of s. 3 of the Bastardy Act, in so far as it referred to the return to England of the man alleged to be the father after he had ceased to reside in England, as showing that the legislation proceeds on the footing that the presence of the putative father in England is necessary for the jurisdiction to attach. It is worth noticing, also, that, apart from this territorial limitation, the section also provides its own special limitation of time which differs from that

G provided over the whole range of summary procedure by s. 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848. Moreover, there is an even more important point, that s. 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Process) Act, 1881, deals specifically with the case of bastardy, and, so far from supporting the argument that one of the code of statutes regulating procedure gave jurisdiction to an English court though the putative father was to be found in Scotland, was held by LORD BLACKBURN (ibid at p. 57) to have precisely the opposite effect of making the bastardy summons triable in Scotland, notwithstanding the fact that, as

H in the case in question, the child was born and the mother ordinarily resident in England.

One must, however, also consider closely the passage immediately following in LORD SELBORNE’S opinion already quoted, and the further passage where he says with reference to s. 4 of the Act of 1881 (ibid at p. 50):

The learned counsel have contended that cases and persons which before were not within the jurisdiction of the English justices are brought within the jurisdiction of those justices by that section. To me it appears, quite clearly, that the section proceeds upon the assumption of jurisdiction under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts.

How can the process be issued under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts if the Summary Jurisdiction Acts give no power to issue such process? This point is not peculiar to bastardy cases; the argument goes to the extent, that any process whatever which a court of summary jurisdiction can be induced to issue, though in a case manifestly altogether beyond its jurisdiction, and as to which the Summary Jurisdiction Acts give it no jurisdiction, is nevertheless to be served and executed in the manner provided for in Scotland. To me the natural meaning of the words "process issued under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts" is process issued under the jurisdiction given by those Acts, and in the manner which those Acts authorise and require. It is begging the whole question to say that those Acts give jurisdiction to issue a summons in this case. On the contrary, all the enactments which have been referred to show that the justices have no such jurisdiction. That appears to me to go to the root of the whole argument.

This passage suggests that, apart altogether from the express terms of the Bastardy Act, LORD SELBORNE, L.C., might have been prepared to decide the case on the general principle that a person resident abroad, still more, ordinarily resident and domiciled abroad, and "not brought by any special statute or legislation within the jurisdiction" (p. 49) (I emphasise these words) is prima facie not subject to the process of a foreign court—he must be found within the jurisdiction to be bound by it. This involves a consideration of the relation between s. 4 of the Act of 1895 and s. 1 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848.

For a proper appreciation of the issues involved, it is essential to keep in mind the distinction referred to by LORD SELBORNE, L.C. at the end of the paragraph on p. 48 between the jurisdiction of the particular justices, which I will call the local jurisdiction, and the jurisdiction of the law of England to which the substantive Acts of Parliament, i.e., the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Acts, apply, which I will call the general jurisdiction. Manifestly, the decision in Berkley v. Thompson (5) precludes justices from assuming a jurisdiction over a person ordinarily resident abroad, which includes Scotland, and not found within the jurisdiction, merely by reason of the procedural provisions of the summary jurisdiction code, unless that jurisdiction is given by the substantive Act creating the subject-matter of the complaint, or as the case may be. Now, the material words of s. 1 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, are:

... where an information shall be laid before ... justices of the peace for any county ... within England ... that any person has committed or is suspected to have committed any offence or act within the jurisdiction of such ... justices for which he is liable by law, upon a summary conviction for the same before ... justices of the peace, to be imprisoned or fined, or otherwise punished, and also in all cases where a complaint shall be made to any such ... justices upon which ... they have or shall have authority by law to make any order for the payment of money or otherwise, then ... it shall be lawful for such ... justices ... to issue ... their summons directed to such persons, stating shortly the matter of such information or complaint, and requiring him to appear at a certain time and place ... to answer to the said ... complaint ...

It is clear, so far as an information is concerned, that the local jurisdiction of any given justices is strictly limited by the commission, or suspicion of the commission, of an offence within their own jurisdiction. So far as a complaint is concerned, the local jurisdiction again is limited by their being the justices who have authority to make an order for the payment of money or otherwise. It is unquestionable that applications by a married woman for an order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Acts are the proper subject of a complaint under s. 1 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, and it is, therefore, necessary to examine s. 4 of the Act of 1895 to see how the local jurisdiction of the justices is limited in this respect. Section 4, as amended, reads as follows:

Any married woman whose husband shall have been convicted summarily of an aggravated assault upon her within the meaning of section forty-three of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, or whose husband shall have been convicted upon indictment of an assault upon her, and sentenced to pay a fine of more than five pounds or to a term of imprisonment exceeding two months, or whose husband shall have deserted her, or whose husband shall have been guilty of persistent cruelty to her, or wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her or her infant children whom he is legally liable to maintain, may apply to any court of summary jurisdiction acting within the city, borough, petty sessional or other division or district, in which any such conviction has taken place, or in which the cause of complaint shall have wholly or partially arisen, for an order or orders under this Act; Provided that where a married woman is entitled to apply for an order or orders under this section on the ground of the conviction of her husband upon indictment, she may apply to the court before whom her husband has been convicted, and that court shall, for the purposes of this section, become a court of summary jurisdiction, and shall have the power without a jury to hear an application, and make the order or orders applied for.

A Other causes of complaint have been added by later Acts, but the limits of jurisdiction remain unchanged.

Now, first of all, it is desirable to see how the matter stands as regards the husband's conviction on indictment of assault in respect of which he is sentenced to pay a fine of more than £5 or a term of imprisonment exceeding two months.

B In this case, at least, no question of the jurisdiction of any particular petty sessional division is necessarily involved at all, seeing that the application for an order may be made at the time of the conviction to the judge of assize or to quarter sessions, as the case may be, who, by reason of the proviso at the end of the section, becomes a court of summary jurisdiction and may make the order or orders applied for. To take a simple illustration, suppose that a domiciled Scotsman resident in Scotland comes to Cumberland, where he knows his wife is living, and assaults her there. He is arrested and tried at the Carlisle Assizes.

C What ground is there for importing into the section that before the judge of assize makes an order on the wife's application he must be satisfied that the husband, as well as the wife, is resident in some part of England? I see no reason to doubt that the judge, if he passes the prescribed sentence, has jurisdiction to make an order in favour of the wife. If so, why does not the same consideration apply to a wife's application to the justices of the petty sessional division in which the husband has been summarily convicted of an aggravated assault

D upon the wife, having regard, especially, to the provision in s. 8 of the Act of 1895 that her summons may be issued and made returnable immediately on such conviction. I can see no ground for holding that the words of the statute should not be given their plain and natural meaning. In my opinion, it would be wholly alien to the obvious intent of this part of the section to import the irrelevant proviso that the husband should be resident in this country.

E It remains to consider how the matter stands as regards the other grounds of complaint mentioned in s. 4, or added by later Acts. As to these, it is essential to establish that the cause of complaint shall have wholly or partially arisen in the local jurisdiction of the justices. Now, as regards adultery and persistent cruelty, it is obvious that one act of adultery, or one act, at least, in the course of conduct alleged to constitute persistent cruelty whether to the wife or to her children, must have occurred in the local jurisdiction of the justices' court. To

F neither offence is the residence of either spouse necessarily relevant. As in the case of the convictions already dealt with, it may be argued that, if the adulterous association or the persistence in the course of cruelty, as the case may be, enables the husband to be found within the jurisdiction and there served with a summons, the appropriate court may have jurisdiction although he is ordinarily resident out of the jurisdiction but not otherwise. The same applies

G mutatis mutandis, to insistence on sexual intercourse while suffering from venereal disease, or to compelling the wife to submit herself to prostitution if the intercourse has occurred or the husband has exercised the compulsion within the jurisdiction. As regards habitual drunkenness, although the Habitual Drunkards Act, 1879, does, the Licensing Act, 1902, which creates the cause of complaint, does not, apply to Scotland. This is a special case which may depend on where the conviction takes place, but, as it does not appear to throw any light on the question, I express no definite opinion on the point.

H So far, there may well be instances of all these grounds of complaint where the appropriate court can act solely because the husband is found within the general jurisdiction and is served there, but that is a different thing from saying, to quote LORD SELBORNE, L.C., again, that he is "brought by legislation within the jurisdiction." There remain the two kindred grounds of complaint of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance and desertion. I describe these as kindred grounds because in either case the absence of the wife from the husband without just cause would defeat her application and because in both cases it is well settled in English law that the cause of complaint partially arises where the wife, justifiably living apart from the husband, resides : Price v. Price (10) ; Chudley v. Chudley (11). We have not been informed what is the law in Scotland corresponding to that relating to wilful neglect to maintain in this country. Suffice it to repeat that the precise provisions of this Act do not apply to Scotland. As to desertion, we are on surer ground. It is established on the highest authority that desertion as a matrimonial offence does not mean the same thing in Scotland as it does in England, notwithstanding the express use of the same word in the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, and the Divorce (Scotland) Act, 1938, respectively : see Bell v. Bell (12), and Wilkinson v. Wilkinson (13). I do not ignore the possibility that complications might arise in any given case if a court of summary jurisdiction in England can make a valid separation order against a husband, even though he be domiciled in Scotland, on grounds which would be insufficient in Scotland. When the Act of 1895 was passed, and a fortiori when the earlier Married Women (Maintenance in Case of Desertion) Act, 1886, was passed, it would have been impossible to assert, whatever common characteristics there might be, that the law relating to desertion was exactly the same in Scotland as in England, but the same consideration applies to a decree of judicial separation, for example, on the ground of "constructive" desertion when the spouses are resident in England but domiciled in Scotland.

Nevertheless, from the wording of s. 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, it would appear that, so far as an information is concerned, what the legislation contemplates is that an offence is created by law, and that the defendant, wherever he may be resident, has committed, or is suspected of having committed, that offence within the local jurisdiction of particular justices to enable them to deal with it. The residence of the offender may be where it is impossible to reach him, but, if it happens to be in Scotland, it seems to me to be reasonably plain that there is special legislation which brings him within the jurisdiction, and does so not merely when he can be found and arrested within the jurisdiction. Is there any reason why the same should not apply to a husband who has given rise to a cause of complaint which, in the words of s. 4 of the Act of 1895, wholly or partially arises within the local jurisdiction of the justices ? It would not be true to say that it is impossible to read this provision without seeing that this legislation proceeds upon the footing that the presence of the husband in England is necessary for the jurisdiction to attach. On the contrary, I must say that it seems to me that there is no warrant for regarding either the subject-matter of an information or the subject-matter of a complaint as being qualified by the condition that the person against whom the information is laid or the complaint made must be ordinarily resident within the general jurisdiction before he is amenable to the local jurisdiction of the justices. In my opinion, it is not the procedural Act alone, but the combination of that Act and the substantive Acts which together provide that the husband in this case is, in LORD SELBORNE'S words, "brought by special statute or legislation within the jurisdiction." Assuming this to be correct, the matter works out as follows : By virtue of s. 4 of the Act of 1881 the process, which by s. 8 includes the summons to answer the complaint of desertion, may be served in the manner admittedly followed in this case.

Moreover, it seems to be arguable that, so far from any subsequent process for enforcement being out of order, as was held in M'Queen v. M'Queen (1), it may be expressly covered by the following provisions, bearing in mind that the original order and any order for its enforcement are the subject of separate complaints and process thereon. By sub-s. (4) of s. 4 of the Act of 1881, the Act is not to apply to any process requiring the appearance of a person to answer a complaint for the recovery of a sum of money which is a "civil debt" within the meaning of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879. By s. 6 of the Act of 1879 where a sum of money claimed to be due is recoverable on complaint to a court of summary jurisdiction and not on information, such sum shall be deemed to be a civil debt, and by s. 35 any sum declared by that Act or by any future Act to be a civil debt, which is recoverable summarily, or in respect of the recovery of which jurisdiction is given by such Act to a court of summary jurisdiction, shall be deemed to be a sum for payment of which a court of summary jurisdiction has authority by law to make an order on complaint in pursuance of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. So far, this would appear to make

A the recovery of money payable under a maintenance order the subject of complaint as for a civil debt, but by s. 54 of the Act of 1879 the Act is to apply to the levying of sums adjudged to be paid by an order which is enforceable as an order of affiliation, and to the imprisonment of a defendant for non-payment of such sums, in like manner as if an order in any such matter or so enforceable were a conviction on information, and by s. 9 of the Act of 1895 the payment of any sum of money directed to be paid by any order under that Act may be enforced in the same manner as the payment of money is enforced under an order of affiliation. However, it is unnecessary to express a final opinion on this point, for, as I have said before, we are not concerned with enforcement but with jurisdiction to hear and determine.

B For these reasons, although I confess that my views on this matter have fluctuated more than once, I have come to the conclusion that, on the question of the jurisdiction to issue and serve the summons, at any rate, M'Queen v. M'Queen (1) was wrongly decided, and that it is our duty to say so. In my opinion, the process in this case was properly issued and served and the justices had jurisdiction to try this case. The appeal, therefore, will be dismissed.

JONES, J.: I have had the advantage of reading the judgment which my Lord has just delivered. I concur with it, and I have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

D EYRE AND ANOTHER v. REA

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Atkinson, J.), February 3, 4, 1947.]

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant—Breach—Damages—Measure—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 18.

E The defendant, the assignee of a lease, granted sub-leases of parts of the premises to five sub-tenants who, by arrangement with him, converted the premises into five separate flats. The defendant thereby was guilty of breaches of covenants in the lease not to alter the internal planning of the premises, not to permit the premises to be used otherwise than as a private dwelling-house in one occupation, and not to underlet or part with the possession of any part of the premises. In an action by the landlord for forfeiture for breach of covenant the judge refused a claim by the defendant for relief against forfeiture under s. 146 (2) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and granted a decree of forfeiture and an order for possession. On a claim by the landlord for damages for the breaches of covenant,

F HELD: the measure of damages prescribed in the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 18, for breach of covenant to keep and put premises in repair should not be extended to a breach of this nature, and, notwithstanding the fact that the premises, as converted, were, from a financial point of view, more valuable, the plaintiffs were entitled to the cost of restoring them to the state of an unconverted single dwelling-house, plus the loss of rent during the period of conversion.

ACTION for forfeiture for breach of a covenant in a lease, for a declaration of title to possession, and for rent, mesne profits and damages. The facts appear in the headnote.

C. L. Henderson, K.C., and B. L. A. O'Malley for the plaintiffs.
H. Heathcote-Williams for the defendant.

ATKINSON, J., reviewed the evidence, held that he had no option but to decree a forfeiture, and that there was no ground on which he could give relief to the defendant, the main reason being that there was no case of which he knew where relief had been given except on the basis of the breach being at once rectified, and continued :—On the question of damages, we have had an interesting argument. The plaintiffs say : “The damages we are entitled to are what it will cost us to put the house back into the condition in which it was. This action is merely based on the conversion, and we are entitled to have the house given back to us in the state in which it was, that is, single occupation. We are entitled to the cost of the re-converting. Only in that way can justice be done to us. That was the house that we let, that was the house which the defendant assured us he was going to maintain in that condition, that was the house which the covenants provided we should get back at the end of the lease, and we are entitled to have that re-converted.” The plaintiffs also say : “Apart from what we want and what we are entitled to in that way, we are under a moral obligation to other owners of leases of houses in that road to perform the covenants which we have made them undertake. We may not be legally bound to, but we would regard it as a great breach of faith to tolerate one of these houses being maintained as a block of flats when we have made everybody else covenant that he will not do any such thing. That is what we say our right is.”

Counsel for the defendant for a time created a doubt in my mind, because he did not draw the distinction between the breach of a covenant of this kind and the breach of a covenant to keep and put premises in repair. He referred to s. 18 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, which provides as follows :

(1) Damages for a breach of a covenant or agreement to keep or put premises in repair during the currency of a lease, or to leave or put premises in repair at the termination of a lease, whether such covenant or agreement is expressed or implied, and whether general or specific, shall in no case exceed the amount (if any) by which the value of the reversion (whether immediate or not) in the premises is diminished owing to the breach of such covenant or agreement as aforesaid . . .

He says that the only measure of damages under that breach of covenant to repair is : What would have been the value of the premises if they had been delivered up in a proper state of repair, and what is the value of the premises in the state in which they have been delivered up ? There may be cases in which no one would dream of repairing, in which a house was almost certainly going to be pulled down at an early date, and in a case of that kind quite a small sum might be found to be due, or, at any rate, the cost of repairs would not be the measure of damages. That has been emphasised in Hanson v. Newman (1), but, again, that is a case dealing only with repairs. There a lessee objected to carrying out the covenants of the lease as to painting and repair. It was held that, in assessing damages under s. 18 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, the court had to ascertain the actual value of the property in its unrepaired state at the date of re-entry and the value which the property would then have had if there had been no breach of covenant, and the amount of damage sustained by the landlord is the difference between the two values.

On the strength of that, counsel argues that the plaintiffs have now got something which, from the financial point of view, is more valuable than the house would have been if it had been in single occupation. They can let it for a higher rent, he says, and, therefore, they have suffered no damage. I cannot assent to that argument. Section 18 is limited to damages for a breach of a covenant to repair. The cases cited to me also dealt merely with covenants to repair. It seems to me that I cannot extend that principle to a breach of a covenant of this sort and say to the plaintiffs : “Despite that covenant and although you let and are entitled to receive back an unconverted house, that is, a house suitable for single occupation, because you have got something which you may be able to let at a higher rent than the house which you are entitled to have back, you have suffered no damage.”

The plaintiffs have their rights, and I have to measure their rights so far as they are not modified by some provision in an Act of Parliament. I think that what they are entitled to is the cost of restoring this house to the condition in which they were entitled to have it returned to them, that is, an unconverted house. The cost of that is £896 12s. The evidence is that it will take two to two and a half months to do the work, during which no rent can be earned, and the damage for that will be another £50. Therefore, the order will be that there will be forfeiture of the lease, a declaration that the plaintiffs are entitled to possession, and judgment in their favour for £140 rent, the sum of £194 16s. for mesne profits, and for £946 12s. damages for breach of the covenants set out in the statement of claim, and costs.

Judgment accordingly with costs.

Re BAUGHAN. THE OFFICIAL RECEIVER (TRUSTEE) v. A. H. BENNETT AND WALLIS AND STEEVENS, LTD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), January 20, February 3, 1947.]

Bankruptcy—Surplus available for distribution—Application—Priority—Statutory interest on debts proved—Excess interest on moneylender's claims—Claim by trustee of bankrupt's marriage settlement—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), ss. 30 (3), 33 (7), (8), 42 (2)—Moneylenders Act, 1927 (c. 21), s. 9 (1).

A trustee in bankruptcy had a surplus remaining in his hands after paying a dividend of 20s. in the £ on all debts other than debts which were postponed under the Moneylenders Act, 1927, s. 9 (1), (i.e., claims by moneylenders for interest in excess of 5 per cent. on the principal due to them). The question was whether this surplus should be first applied in payment of the postponed debts, or, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33 (8), in the payment of interest from the date of the receiving order to the creditors who had received 20s. in the £ on their proofs.

HELD: (i) the claim to excess interest was a debt proved in the bankruptcy within the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33 (7), while interest payable under s. 33 (8) was not such a debt, either within s. 33 (7) or for the purposes of the Moneylenders Act, 1927, s. 9 (1), and, therefore, the moneylenders' claim for postponed interest should be satisfied out of the surplus before the claims of creditors to statutory interest.

(ii) with regard to statutory interest, all debts were pari passu, and statutory interest would be payable in respect of all the claims, including those for excess interest.

During the lifetime of a bankrupt who had died without obtaining her discharge, her trustee in bankruptcy had paid a dividend of 20s. in the £ to all the creditors who had proved their debts. After the bankrupt's death, her trustee obtained a sum of money from the trustee of her marriage settlement on the ground that the covenant in the settlement to settle after-acquired property was void against him under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 42 (2). There was now a surplus available for distribution. The marriage settlement trustee having submitted a proof pursuant to s. 42 (2), the question was whether, as a postponed creditor, he was entitled to be paid a dividend out of this surplus before interest was paid on the claims of the other creditors under s. 33 (8) of the Act, or whether the statutory interest on the other claims should first be paid.

HELD: (i) the claim of the marriage settlement trustee against the bankrupt's estate was not a "debt" for the purpose of s. 33 (7) of the Act of 1914, and, accordingly, it was not one of "the foregoing debts" for the purpose of s. 33 (8), and was not entitled to be paid before the statutory interest on the other claims.

(ii) Section 42 (2) merely conferred the right to receive a dividend after all the claims of the creditors for valuable consideration had been satisfied, and these claims could not be regarded as "satisfied" until they had been paid in full with statutory interest.

CASE I—MOTION by the trustee in bankruptcy asking for directions as to which classes of creditors had priority in the distribution of a surplus remaining after a dividend of 20s. in the £ had been paid on all debts except those postponed under the Moneylenders Act, 1927, s. 9 (1). The question was whether the claims of moneylenders to excess interest had priority over the claims of the other creditors to statutory interest under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33 (8). CASE II—CASE STATED by the judge of the Oxford County Court sitting in bankruptcy. The trustee in bankruptcy had a surplus in hand after paying a dividend of 20s. in the £ on all proofs except a claim postponed under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 42 (2). The question was whether the postponed claim should be paid out of the surplus before statutory interest, under s. 33 (8) of the Act, was paid to the other creditors, or whether the statutory interest should be first paid. The facts appear in the judgment. E

V. R. Aronson for the Official Receiver.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 3. ROMER, J., read the following judgment. These two applications came before me on Jan. 20 last and, inasmuch as they both involved points of similarity, it was considered convenient that they should be heard and argued together, and this was, accordingly, done. The facts of the two cases, however, are not the same and will require separate and individual consideration. F

On the first application the Official Receiver, as trustee of the property of the debtor, seeks the directions of this court, pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 79 (3), in the circumstances set out in his report dated Aug. 28, 1946, and filed herein. This report of the Official Receiver is in the following terms: G

(1) The receiving order was made on Aug. 1, 1940, on a creditor's petition, and the order of adjudication was made on Aug. 5, 1940. The Official Receiver remained trustee of the estate. The debtor applied for his discharge on June 19, 1945, when it was granted subject to suspension for 2 months. (2) According to the statement of affairs the liabilities to rank for dividend were estimated at £2,769 8s. 8d. and the assets were estimated to produce £4,504. (3) At the date of the release of the Official Receiver as trustee, namely, on July 31, 1942, the only amount realised was £8 9s. 7d. which was absorbed in payment of fees and expenses. The debtor's estimate included £4,500 at which he valued his equity in a reversionary interest. Nothing was realised from this interest. (4) On Jan. 22, 1944, the debtor's mother died, leaving him her sole next of kin. His interest in the deceased's estate was claimed by the Official Receiver, and between Oct., 1944, and Jan., 1945, sums totalling £5,196 18s. were received on account of this interest. (5) Early in 1945, the Official Receiver caused notices to be given of his intention to pay a dividend. Twenty-four proofs were lodged for claims totalling £4,778 0s. 8d. Of this sum £202 3s. 7d. was admitted H as payable preferentially and was paid. Twenty proofs of creditors other than moneylenders were admitted to rank for dividend at sums totalling £2,460 16s. 7d. Four proofs by moneylenders were admitted for sums totalling £2,014 18s. 11d. Of this sum the amount admitted to rank for dividend with the other creditors was £1,434 11s. 7d. Total £3,895 8s. 2d. The remainder, £580 7s. 4d. was postponed pursuant to the Moneylenders Act, 1927, s. 9 (1). (6) On Mar. 16, 1945, a first dividend of 15s. in the £ was paid on proofs for £3,895 8s. 2d. (7) Further sums were then received by the Official Receiver from the realisation of the deceased's estate and at present the balance standing to the credit of the estate is £1,692 11s. 11d. Of this sum about £1,000 will be required to pay the balance of 20s. in the £ on the proofs admitted for dividend. (8) It then falls to be considered how the balance of approximately £692 should be applied. The possible claimants to this fund are (a) the four moneylenders with their claims for postponed interest totalling £580 7s. 4d., and (b) the creditors who will have received 20s. in the £, with their claims to statutory interest at 4 per cent. on the amount of their debts from the date of the receiving order, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33 (8). (9) The Official Receiver seeks the directions of the court as to which of these two classes of creditors has priority in the distribution of the said sum of £692.

On Nov. 4, 1946, an order was made appointing the United Auto & Finance Corporation, Ltd., to represent the creditors who are moneylenders and who had submitted proofs in respect of money lent, and appointing the Inland Revenue to represent the creditors other than moneylenders. These two classes of creditors were each represented by counsel when the case came before me. The precise direction which the Official Receiver requires, and which was argued before me, is an order directing him to what person or persons he should pay the sum of £692 now in his possession, being the surplus remaining in his hands after payment of 20s. in the £ on all debts other than debts which are postponed by reason of the provisions of the Moneylenders Act, 1927, s. 9 (1). The second application comes before this court by way of Case Stated, pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 100 (3), by the judge of the Oxford County Court, sitting in bankruptcy. The Case Stated is as follows:

(1) This motion coming before me on Jan. 6, 1947, I was requested by all the parties to state the following Special Case for the opinion of the High Court pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 100 (3), and I consented to do so. (2) I find the following facts, as stated in the Official Receiver's report dated Dec. 9, 1946, to be proved: (a) A receiving order was made against the bankrupt on Oct. 4, 1927, and she was adjudged bankrupt on the same day. By an order dated Oct. 17, 1927, it was directed that her estate should be administered in a summary manner and the Official Receiver is the trustee of her property. The bankrupt died on Dec. 20, 1942, without having obtained her discharge. (b) On the occasion of her marriage to James Baughan, the bankrupt, then Marjorie Bennett, spinster, executed an antenuptial settlement dated Nov. 5, 1908, of all money or property to which she would become entitled on the death of her father, Alfred Bennett, and of all money or property which might thereafter be acquired by her. By the said settlement all such property was conveyed to trustees to hold on trust for the bankrupt until the said intended marriage and after the said marriage on trust for the persons named in the said settlement. By cl. 7 thereof the bankrupt covenanted to assign to the trustees all property not thereinbefore settled to which she might become entitled during coverture. The said intended marriage was duly solemnised on Nov. 6, 1908. (c) The bankrupt's father, the said Alfred Bennett, died on Jan. 7, 1918. By his will he bequeathed a legacy of £2,000 to his wife, Mrs. Georgina Bennett, for life with remainder in equal shares to his three children, of whom the bankrupt was one. (d) By an assignment dated June 8, 1929, the Official Receiver sold the bankrupt's life interest under the said settlement for the sum of £1,000, but the assignment did not include any assets other than those set out in the schedule thereto. With the said sum of £1,000 and with other available assets the Official Receiver paid a dividend of 20s. in the £ to all creditors who had at that time proved their debts. (e) On Apr. 14, 1935, the said Mrs. Georgina Bennett died and shortly afterwards the executors of the said Alfred Bennett transferred to the trustees of the settlement of Nov. 5, 1908, war stock of the value of £706 0s. 6d., being the bankrupt's share of the said settled legacy of £2,000. (f) Until May, 1940, the settlement trustees paid dividends on the £706 0s. 6d. war stock to the bankrupt. The Official Receiver then for the first time learned of the position and intervened, contending that the covenant to settle after-acquired property in the settlement of Nov. 5, 1908, was void against him by reason of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 42 (2). The respondent, Alfred Harvey Bennett, who is the surviving settlement trustee, admitted the Official Receiver's claim and on Dec. 10, 1946, transferred the said war stock to the Official Receiver. (3) The Official Receiver now proposes out of this sum to pay 20s. in the £ on any new proofs which may be lodged and admitted and desires the directions of the court as to how he should dispose of the residue of the said sum. (4) On Dec. 9, 1946, the respondent, Alfred Harvey Bennett, submitted a proof pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 42 (2). (5) By an order made by this court on Dec. 11, 1946, it was ordered that the respondents, Wallis & Stevens, Ltd., be appointed to represent all the creditors other than the said Alfred Harvey Bennett on the trial of this motion.

Then certain copy documents, which I need not mention in detail, are attached to the Case. The concluding paragraph of the Case states :

The question for the opinion of the High Court is whether the Official Receiver should apply the surplus of the said war stock first in paying statutory interest on the claims of all the creditors, with the exception of the respondent, Alfred Harvey Bennett, pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33 (8), and next in paying dividends to the said Alfred Harvey Bennett as a postponed creditor pursuant to s. 42 (2) of the said Act, or whether, on the other hand, he should first pay dividends to the said postponed creditor and apply any surplus, after payment of 20s. in the £ on his proof, in paying statutory interest to the creditors who have proved.

The respondent, Mr. A. H. Bennett, the surviving trustee of the debtor's marriage settlement, claims that the fund available should be applied towards satisfying his claim as such trustee in priority to paying statutory interest on the claims of all the creditors for valuable consideration.

The point of law in common between the two applications, as hereinbefore appears, is that in each case a conflict arises between postponed claims, on the one hand, and creditors claiming statutory interest, on the other. The statutory provisions postponing the claims in question, however, are not the same and it is the difference in the language in which those provisions are respectively couched that prevents each of the two cases from being necessarily governed by a determination of the other.

The claim by the moneylenders, on the first application, to interest in excess of 5 per cent. on the principal due to them is subjected to postponement by the Moneylenders Act, 1927, s. 9 (1), which is in the following terms :

Where a debt due to a moneylender in respect of a loan made by him after the commencement of this Act includes interest, that interest shall, for the purposes of the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, relating to the presentation of a bankruptcy petition, voting at meetings, compositions and schemes of arrangement, and dividend, be calculated at a rate not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum, but nothing in the foregoing provision shall prejudice the right of the creditor to receive out of the estate, after all the debts proved in the estate have been paid in full, any higher rate of interest to which he may be entitled. The provisions of this sub-section shall, in relation to such a debt as aforesaid, have effect in substitution for the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 66 (1).

The analogous provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 66 (1), are as follows :

Where a debt has been proved, and the debt includes interest, or any pecuniary consideration in lieu of interest, such interest or consideration shall, for the purposes of dividend, be calculated at a rate not exceeding 5 per centum per annum, without prejudice to the right of a creditor to receive out of the estate any higher rate of interest to which he may be entitled after all the debts proved in the estate have been paid in full.

It is, I think, clear that the amount due to a moneylender for interest which his debtor agreed to pay in excess of 5 per cent. per annum on the loan is within the definition of "debts provable in bankruptcy" which is contained in the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 30 (3). It is not in respect of proof, but of the right to receive dividends, that the claim to such excess interest is subordinated to the claims of other creditors. It follows from this that a moneylender can include in the global sum for which he proves the amount of the excess interest due to him at the date of the receiving order, but he cannot get a dividend in respect of that amount until the debts which the other creditors have proved in the estate have been paid in full. The question then is whether the excess interest is subordinated further to the statutory interest which is payable on the debts of the other creditors proved in the estate. The provision for statutory interest is to be found in s. 33 of the Act of 1914. Sub-sections (1) to (4) of this section deal with preferential debts. Sub-section (5) enacts that s. 33 :

... shall apply, in the case of a deceased person who dies insolvent, as if he were a bankrupt, and as if the date of his death were substituted for the date of the receiving order.

Sub-section (6) deals with the position of the joint and several estates of partners. Sub-sections (7) and (8) are respectively in the following terms :

(7) Subject to the provisions of this Act, all debts proved in the bankruptcy shall be paid pari passu. (8) If there is any surplus after payment of the foregoing debts, it shall be applied in payment of interest from the date of the receiving order at the rate of £4 per cent. per annum on all debts proved in the bankruptcy.

Sub-section (9) is, for present purposes, immaterial.

A It was suggested in argument that "the foregoing debts" referred to in sub-s. (8) do not relate to the debts mentioned in sub-s. (7) (viz. "all debts proved in the bankruptcy"), but are referable to the preferential debts enumerated in sub-s. (1). I cannot accept this contention. Grammatically the words "foregoing debts" embrace all debts to which reference has been made in the earlier parts of the section and do not embrace some only to the exclusion of others. Moreover, the view contended for would lead to the curious result that B statutory interest would be payable in respect of the ordinary debts before anything was paid in reduction of the debts themselves. I, accordingly, read the words "the foregoing debts" as including both the preferential debts referred to in sub-s. (1) of s. 33 and also the universality of debts referred to in sub-s. (7). The result of this is that no creditor is entitled to statutory interest until all debts (preferential or ordinary) proved in the bankruptcy have been paid, and C that must mean paid in full. Inasmuch as a moneylender's claim to excess interest is a "debt" and is "provable," it would seem to follow that, if he in fact proves for it in the bankruptcy of his debtor, then the amount of such claim becomes a "debt proved in the bankruptcy" and must be paid before any surplus becomes available for the payment of statutory interest.

D Counsel, however, who argued the contrary view, said that the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33, and the Moneylenders Act, 1927, s. 9, do not stand alone and that there are other provisions of the bankruptcy legislation which also have to be considered on this question and that some guidance is also to be obtained from decided cases. These provisions and authorities conveniently lead to a consideration of the second application before me, to which they are mainly relevant. The postponement of the claim of Mr. A. H. Bennett, as trustee of Mrs. Baughan's marriage settlement, is due to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 42 (2), which is as follows :

E Any covenant or contract made by any person (hereinafter called the settlor) in consideration of his or her marriage, either for the future payment of money for the benefit of the settlor's wife or husband, or children, or for the future settlement on or for the settlor's wife or husband or children, of property, wherein the settlor had not at the date of the marriage any estate or interest, whether vested or contingent, in possession or remainder, and not being money or property in right of the settlor's F wife or husband, shall, if the settlor is adjudged bankrupt and the covenant or contract has not been executed at the date of the commencement of his bankruptcy, be void against the trustee in the bankruptcy, except so far as it enables the persons entitled under the covenant or contract to claim for dividend in the settlor's bankruptcy under or in respect of the covenant or contract, but any such claim to dividend shall be postponed until all claims of the other creditors for valuable consideration in money or money's worth have been satisfied.

G For present purposes two points on this sub-section call for comment—(1), the position and rights of a claimant whose claim is expressly declared to be void against the trustee in bankruptcy, and (2), the postponement of a dividend until the claims therein mentioned of other creditors have been satisfied, in contrast to the postponement (already mentioned) of a dividend on excess interest until all the debts proved in the estate have been paid in full.

H The first of these points was considered by TOMLIN, J., in Re Cumming and West (1). TOMLIN, J., expressed himself as follows ([1929] 1 Ch. 534, at pp. 547, 548) :

It is to be remembered that s. 42 (2) is framed in a special way. It provides that the contract or covenant shall be void against the trustee in bankruptcy except so far as it enables the persons entitled under the covenant to claim for dividend in the settlor's bankruptcy under or in respect of the covenant. That is curious language. Presumably the curious or unusual framework of the clause is due to the desire of the legislature to produce a special result. The contract is void against the trustee, but there is reserved out of the voidness, a right on the part of the persons entitled under that contract to claim for dividend. It has been quite fairly and properly admitted by Mr. Tindale Davis [for the settlement trustees] that, having regard to the decision in Ex parte Taylor (2), the trustee in bankruptcy is entitled, on a claim made within s. 42 (2), to reject the proof, leaving, of course, the claimant free, when all those creditors to whom he is postponed have been satisfied, to return to the charge, if he finds that the circumstances of the case are such that he can thereby obtain some advantage. The real explanation of these sections, and the explanation which seems to me to make them consistent throughout, is that "creditors" there means the persons entitled to prove; and that when there is a reference to "separate creditors," it means separate creditors, that is to say, persons whose claims are not made void by s. 42, but persons whose proofs the trustee is entitled to accept: and in the same way "joint creditors" means those creditors whose proofs the trustee is bound to accept; and that persons who claim under a contract made void against the trustee, are not creditors. They are persons having a special right—namely, a right to a claim for dividend in the settlor's bankruptcy, under or in respect of the contract, after all the claims of the other creditors for valuable consideration have been satisfied. If, as I think, that is the true meaning of these sections, the result is that the claimants in this case do not stand to-day as creditors; and their right to put in a proof, or their right to insist on the acceptance of that proof by the trustee, must depend upon all the creditors, that is to say, all the separate and joint creditors, whose proofs the trustee is bound to accept, having been first satisfied.

As I read that judgment, the position of a claimant such as Mr. Bennett in the present case is that he is not a creditor whose proof the trustee in bankruptcy is bound to accept, but he has the special right to which TOMLIN, J., referred, namely, the right to a dividend in the bankruptcy after all the claims of the creditors for value have been satisfied.

As to the provisions relating to payment of proved debts, on the one hand, and satisfaction of claims on the other, I was referred, in addition to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 66, and the Moneylenders Act, 1927, s. 9, to the terms of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, ss. 36 and 63, and to the Partnership Act, 1890, s. 3. The Bankruptcy Act, 1914, ss. 36 and 63, are as follows:

36 (1) Where a married woman has been adjudged bankrupt, her husband shall not be entitled to claim any dividend as a creditor in respect of any money or other estate lent or entrusted by him to his wife for the purposes of her trade or business until all claims of the other creditors of his wife for valuable consideration in money or money's worth have been satisfied. (2) Where the husband of a married woman has been adjudged bankrupt, any money or other estate of such woman lent or entrusted by her to her husband for the purpose of any trade or business carried on by him or otherwise, shall be treated as assets of his estate, and the wife shall not be entitled to claim any dividend as a creditor in respect of any such money or other estate until all claims of the other creditors of her husband for valuable consideration in money or money's worth have been satisfied. 63 (1) Where one partner of a firm is adjudged bankrupt, a creditor to whom the bankrupt is indebted jointly with the other partners of the firm, or any of them, shall not receive any dividend out of the separate property of the bankrupt until all the separate creditors have received the full amount of their respective debts.

The Partnership Act, 1890, s. 3, says:

In the event of any person to whom money has been advanced by way of loan upon such a contract as is mentioned in the last foregoing section, or of any buyer of a goodwill in consideration of a share of the profits of the business, being adjudged a bankrupt, entering into an arrangement to pay his creditors less than 20s. in the £, or dying in insolvent circumstances, the lender of the loan shall not be entitled to recover anything in respect of his loan, and the seller of the goodwill shall not be entitled to recover anything in respect of the share of profits contracted for, until the claims of the other creditors of the borrower or buyer for valuable consideration in money or money's worth have been satisfied.

It will be observed that, whereas the claims referred to in the Moneylenders Act, 1927, s. 9, and in the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, ss. 63 and 66, are postponed until the other debts have been paid, those dealt with by the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, ss. 36 and 42, and by the Partnership Act, 1890, s. 3, are postponed until the claims of other creditors have been satisfied. This difference in phraseology may well be of some significance.

CLAUSON, J., expressed his views as to what amounts to the "satisfaction" of a proving creditor in Re Howes (3). He there held that, where the assets of a bankrupt are sufficient to satisfy in full the statutory interest on the amounts due to the separate and joint creditors respectively, but are not sufficient to pay, in addition thereto, the amount due to a partner of a debtor, the separate and joint creditors are, on the proper construction of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33 (8), entitled, in priority to the partner of the bankrupt, to be paid the statutory interest in full on their respective debts proved in the bankruptcy. In the course of his judgment CLAUSON, J., said ([1934] Ch. 49, at p. 52) :

If the claim of Sir Charles Cottier's executors [Sir Charles Cottier was the partner of the debtor] for principal is postponed to the claims of the separate and joint creditors for interest, there is enough to pay to both separate and joint creditors their interest at the statutory rate in full. The question is, are the separate and joint creditors entitled to say that the claim of the executors for principal is so postponed ? The executors contend that they are not so postponed and that they are entitled to be paid their principal before either the separate or joint creditors receive anything for interest. That, in my view, is a claim which the executors of Cottier are not entitled to make. If I were to allow that claim, I should be enabling Cottier's executors to procure for the benefit of his estate a diminution of the total amount which would otherwise be payable out of Howes' estate to creditors of Howes to whom Cottier is liable, and that seems to me to be contrary to the principles of bankruptcy. It is suggested that I can find something in the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33, which, in some way, would assist me in holding in favour of the claim of Cottier's executors. I cannot find it. The principle appears to be well established by the older cases, and the principle seems to be, that just as a debtor cannot compete with his own creditors, so a partner of a debtor cannot compete with any of the debtor's creditors, so long as there are any creditors of that debtor not fully satisfied to whom the claimant is under liability. Here there are joint creditors not fully satisfied, for they are not fully satisfied until they have had not only their 20s., but also the 4 per cent. Accordingly, in my view the right course is that the separate and joint creditors will receive their 4 per cent. in full, upon the amounts of their respective debts for the time being outstanding ; and what remains after that will be available to meet the claim of Sir Charles Cottier's executors.

It is clear that CLAUSON, J., was entertaining and expressing the view that the separate and joint creditors could not be regarded as "satisfied" in respect of their debts until they received statutory interest on the amounts admitted to proof as well as the amounts themselves. A similar view appears to have been taken and applied by LORD ELDON, L.C., in Ex parte Reeve (4) where it was held that under a joint commission of bankruptcy the right of the creditors to interest subsequent to the date of the commission, in the case of a surplus, should be preferred to a debt from the separate to the joint estate. LORD ELDON, L.C., after pointing out that the course in bankruptcy had been to stop the proof at the date of the commission inasmuch as the debt to be proved was the debt due before the commission, said (9 Ves. 588, at pp. 590, 591) :

It is true, now a great deal of debt accrued after the bankruptcy is paid under it ; for instance, all interest accrued, though after the date of the commission, if the state of the effects allows it, upon a sort of equitable principle, the interest being considered as a kind of adjunct or shadow of the principal debt, which was due before the bankruptcy . . . If the principle is, that neither the partnership nor the individual debtor shall claim in competition with the creditors, and if the creditors are entitled to any interest, the interest is as much a debt as the capital ; and that principle will prevent either the partnership or the individual debtor ranking with the other creditors, until all their demand is satisfied ; which includes both the principal and interest of their debts.

Although the last passage is somewhat ambiguous, it is reasonably plain, I think, that the interest to which LORD ELDON, L.C., was referring was the interest subsequent, and not previous, to the commission.

Re Howes (3) and Ex parte Reeve (4) are not, of course, precisely relevant to present purposes, for both cases involved, and were decided upon, the well established principle as to partners which is stated in the judgments, and that principle is not in issue in the present case. But I have the guidance both of LORD ELDON, L.C., and CLAUSON, J., that a creditor is not "satisfied" until he has been paid not only his debt but subsequent interest as well. It is, moreover, to be observed that the "satisfaction" envisaged by the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 42 (2), is not of proved debts but of "claims" which prima facie should receive a somewhat wider interpretation than the word "debts" in a statute in which both expressions are used. Reference was made in argument to Re Genese (5) as supporting the proposition that a claimant in the position of the respondent, Bennett, should only be postponed to the extent necessary to pay creditors for value 20s. in the £ on their debts, and not further postponed to the claims of such creditors for statutory interest. The point, however, was not dealt with by CAVE, J., who decided the case, and I cannot regard it as an authority in the sense contended for.

I have come, accordingly, to the following conclusions as to the position of Mr. Bennett as trustee of Mrs. Baughan's marriage settlement: (i) That his claim against the bankrupt's estate is not a "debt" for the purpose of s. 33 (7) of the Act of 1914; (ii) that, accordingly, it is not one of "the foregoing debts" for the purpose of s. 33 (8); (iii) that s. 42 (2) merely confers the right to receive a dividend after all the claims of the creditors for valuable consideration have been satisfied; and (iv) that such claims cannot be regarded as "satisfied" until they have been paid in full with statutory interest. In my judgment, accordingly, the question asked by the Special Case in the matter of Mrs. Baughan should be answered by stating that the Official Receiver should apply the surplus of the war stock therein mentioned, first, in paying statutory interest on the claims of all the creditors, with the exception of the respondent, Alfred Harvey Bennett, pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33 (8), and, next, in paying dividends to the said Alfred Harvey Bennett as a postponed creditor pursuant to s. 42 (2) of the said Act.

The conclusions at which I have arrived on the second application do not, however, necessarily dispose of the first. As I have said earlier in this judgment, excess interest due on a moneylender's loan is a debt, and a provable debt. As was stated by GREENE, L.J., ([1936] 3 All E.R. 641, at p. 648) in Re a Debtor (6), the Moneylenders Act, 1927, s. 9 (1):

... does not destroy the excess interest for the purpose of the bankruptcy law; it leaves it as a real debt provable in bankruptcy and payable in bankruptcy, but, for certain limited and specific purposes, that debt is to be ignored or postponed.

A claim to excess interest, accordingly, differs substantially in quality from a claim which is postponed under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 42 (2). In my judgment, a claim to excess interest is a debt within s. 33 (7) of the Act and, accordingly, on the construction of this section, no surplus is available for the purposes of sub-s. (8) until this debt, together with the other debts, is paid in full. It is then said that, assuming this to be the effect of s. 33 if taken alone, nevertheless dividend is postponed by the Moneylenders Act, 1927, s. 9, until all the debts proved in the bankruptcy have been paid in full and such debts include statutory interest which, it is said, grows out of them. It is true that interest subsequent to the date of the receiving order is, in the words of LORD ELDON, L.C., in Ex parte Reeve (4) "a kind of adjunct or shadow of the principal debt," but the question is whether it is part of "the debts proved in the estate" for the purposes of s. 9. In my judgment, it is not. The phrase "debts proved in the estate" includes the total amounts for which creditors have successfully proved. I am unable to see why its ordinary signification should be varied so as to make it include also something for which a creditor has not proved, and for which he could not prove, namely, statutory interest on his debt. Had Parliament intended the dividend on excess interest to be postponed to statutory interest, it could either have said so in express terms or at least have assimilated it in treatment to such claims as those postponed by s. 42 (2) of the Act of 1914. As the legislature has done neither the one thing nor the other, I attribute to the phrase the same meaning as the words "debts proved in the bankruptcy" bear in the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33 (8), and in which statutory interest is plainly not included. Nor, I think, do the other provisions of the bankruptcy legislation to which I have referred lead to a contrary conclusion. In my judgment, accordingly, a debt in respect of excess interest takes precedence over statutory interest payable under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33 (8), and the dividend payable on such debt is not postponed to payment of statutory interest by reason of the Moneylenders Act, 1927, s. 9 (1).

On the first application, therefore, I will direct the Official Receiver to apply the balance of £692, which is in question, first, in satisfying the claims of the four moneylenders for postponed interest, and, secondly, in or towards satisfying the claims of creditors to statutory interest under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33 (8). It would appear that all debts are pari passu so far as statutory interest is concerned, and statutory interest will be payable in respect of all the claims including excess interest.

Orders accordingly. Costs of all parties in both applications to come out of the respective estates.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Humphreys, J.), January 29, 30, 1947.]

Husband and Wife—Maintenance of wife—Necessaries—Desertion by husband—No money paid to wife for her support—Payments made by third party to provide necessaries—Recovery by third party from husband of sums advanced.

On some date before Apr., 1945, the defendant left his wife and went to live with another woman. From time to time he made his wife payments with which she supported herself and the children of the marriage, but from Aug. 12, 1945, until Feb., 1946, when the wife instituted divorce proceedings and was granted alimony pendente lite, he made her no payments. As a result, between Dec., 1945, and Feb., 1946, the plaintiff, who was the wife's brother, gave her £90 which was needed for her support and was used to provide the ordinary necessities of life for her and the children.

HELD: applying the equitable doctrine enunciated in Deare v. Soutten (1869) L.R. 9 Eq. 151; 34 J.P. 244, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover this £90 from the husband.

ACTION tried by HUMPHREYS, J.

The plaintiff sought to recover from the defendant sums which he had paid to the defendant's wife to enable her to provide herself and her children with necessities after the defendant had left her and had ceased to support her. The facts appear in the headnote and the judgment.

J. Comyn for plaintiff.

J. Shaw for defendant.

HUMPHREYS, J.: The principle which must govern this case is to be found in Deare v. Soutten (1). The headnote of that case is as follows:

A person who has advanced money to a married woman deserted by her husband for the purpose of, and which has been actually applied towards, her support, is entitled in equity, though not at law, to recover such sums from the husband.

The judgment of LORD ROMILLY, M.R., is very short and is to this effect:

I am of opinion that this is a proper suit, and that the plaintiff is entitled to a decree. He refers to some cases and observes that an old case is overruled by Jenner v. Morris (2), a case to which I have been referred. I will not say he approved, because he was bound by it, but he certainly did not disapprove. Then he said:

The defendant is bound to repay what the plaintiff has advanced, but he is entitled to an inquiry as to the payments if he desires it, which would not be limited to the sums specified in the bill.

In that case no inquiry was asked for and the decree was drawn up for the payment of certain sums of money.

In this case the plaintiff alleges he comes within the terms of that equitable doctrine in these circumstances. The plaintiff is the brother of the defendant's wife. The defendant and the wife were married in 1928, and, they having lived together until the war, soon after the commencement of the war the wife was sent to the country with her three children, the children of the marriage. There she was kept by her husband. She was in different places and eventually arrived at and lived at Northampton. She left Northampton finally to come back to London where her husband had been living all the time, as far as I know. He certainly kept his house in London. She arrived back at a date which is given as about Apr. 30, 1945. She came to her husband's house and found it extremely uncomfortable. The husband did not live with her there; in fact, the husband had committed adultery and was at that time keeping and living with another woman. Whether technically in the language of the Divorce Court he had deserted her, I do not know and I do not mind, but he had for practical purposes deserted his wife, except that he was making her, and had made her up to that time, a perfectly reasonable allowance and he continued for a little time to make an allowance to her. It was not a regular weekly allowance, but sums were paid from time to time and, so far, she was not in want. She required nobody to help her to support herself because she was being supported, and so were the children, by her husband. A B C

The accounts produced in the case start on Apr. 30, 1945. That is quite an immaterial date because the brother is the person to be considered here and not the wife. She is not suing for anything. The brother says: "The moneys I advanced to the wife ought to be repaid to me by the husband." He did not advance any money in April. He only began to advance money in July, and that is the relevant period, from July, 1945, to February, 1946, when he ceased the advances, since the wife then obtained alimony pendente lite. In the period I have mentioned the plaintiff advanced £264 to the wife. D

The brother has, therefore, proved that he believed that the wife was in need of support for what the law calls necessities. That means reasonable support for herself and her three children which includes clothing, and so forth, as well as food. The cash which the husband supplied as from Apr. 30 to his wife totals £48 and that is all during the whole of that period from Apr., 1945, to Feb., 1946, that he supplied. E

But here we come upon a curious fact which neither party has really faced, and it is this. The husband, while his wife was living at Northampton, used to visit her and on one occasion he gave her a sum of £200. It was not part of her allowance, or anything of the sort. He gave her a sum of £200 to keep for him because, as he said, it was safer down in Northampton than it would be in London. Of course, everybody knows things were very unsafe in London and any house was likely, at any moment, to be destroyed by enemy action. It was a perfectly reasonable thing to do, and he trusted his wife. Most unfortunately, and very wrongly, because it was entirely without her husband's authority, she spent that money. Apparently she took the view which many women do take: "If my husband is now able to support some other woman as well as me, if he is living with another woman and committing adultery, I can live at a better rate than I should otherwise do"—in other words "I can make him pay for it." The brother, so far as the evidence goes, knew nothing of this £200. F G

From Aug. 12, to some date in Feb., 1946, the husband supplied not one penny towards his wife's keep. During that time she continued to live, and had to live, upon what her husband had given her, and I think it is a reasonable assumption to say—it is all one can do in a case of this sort, for figures are of very doubtful accuracy, as they are all estimates—that that £200 ought to have lasted her, and probably did last her, until nearly the end of the year. But when I come to the end of November, I think then, since for part of August, all September and all October the husband had not supplied a shilling, it is reasonable to say that her statement to her brother became true, that she had no money to support herself, and on Dec. 19 the brother gave her £30. He supplied another £40 in Jan., 1946, and a further £20 in Feb., 1946, making H

£90 altogether during that last period. At that time I think that the wife was justified in saying: "I ought to have an allowance to enable me to live decently and to clothe these three children." The defendant said: "I gave her first of all just what she asked for and then, when she went on asking, I made a calculation and I said to myself that if I let her have about £6 to £8 a week that would be reasonable, and so I went on giving her money when she asked for it rather on that basis."

A Now, on these various figures which have been given, the conclusion at which I have arrived is that the plaintiff has proved to my satisfaction that, as to the last three payments which were made by him to his sister, those not only were, as all the payments were, intended by him for her support, but they were, in fact, needed for her support since for several months the husband had paid not a shilling towards the maintenance of the wife and the children. He has, so far as it is possible to do it, satisfied me that those amounts must have been used for the ordinary necessities of life for her and the children, because they had no other means of support. He, therefore, has brought himself, so far as those three payments are concerned, within the equitable doctrine which I have referred to and which binds me.

I, therefore, give him judgment for £90 with costs.

Judgment for the plaintiff, with costs.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Cassels, J.), January 28, 29, 1947.]

E Limitation of Action—Public authority—Joinder as third party—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 39), s. 21—Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935 (c. 30), s. 6 (1) (c).

F Two lorries, one driven by the plaintiffs' servant and the other by the defendant, came into collision, as a result of which passengers in the defendant's lorry were injured. The defendant, who was driving an Army lorry at the time of the collision, as a servant of a public authority was entitled to protection under s. 21 of the Limitation Act, 1939, which provides that no action shall be brought against any person for any act done in execution of a public duty unless it is commenced before the expiration of one year from the date on which the cause of action accrued. The plaintiffs alleged that the accident was due wholly or in part to the defendant's negligence, and they sought a declaration that, in the event of the persons injured succeeding in an action for negligence against them, they would be entitled to claim an indemnity or contribution from the defendant as a third party, even though more than 12 months had then passed since the cause of action had accrued.

G Held: proceedings by a defendant against a third party were independent of and separate from the proceedings by the plaintiff against the defendant, and the Limitation Act, 1939, only started to run in favour of a third party when the defendant had been found to be liable to the plaintiff, and, therefore, the plaintiffs were entitled to the declaration.

Action tried by CASSELS, J.

The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that, in the event of any proceedings for damages being brought against them in respect of a certain accident, they would be entitled to claim indemnity or contribution against the defendant as a joint tortfeasor. The facts appear in the judgment.

Serjeant Sullivan, K.C., and P. M. O'Connor for the plaintiffs.
John G. Foster for the defendant.

CASSELS, J. : The questions which arise in this action are of deep concern for every litigant in an action for damages for negligence and all persons entitled to claim the protection of the Limitation Act, 1939.

On the evening of Nov. 2, 1944, the plaintiffs' lorry, driven by their servant, and an Army lorry, driven by the defendant and carrying soldiers, were going in opposite directions along a 25ft. road when they came into collision with each other with the result that four of the soldiers were injured. These proceedings are brought for a declaration that ... in the event of any proceedings for damages being instituted against these plaintiffs their servants or agents in respect of the accident mentioned in the pleadings in this action they shall be entitled to claim indemnity or contribution against the present defendant pursuant to the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6, in respect of any damages or costs that may be awarded against them.

The date of the accident was Nov. 2, 1944. Today is Jan 29, 1947. Up till this moment not one of those four injured soldiers in the defendant's lorry has started proceedings against either the plaintiffs or the defendant. The plaintiffs say : "This accident occurred. We are ordinary citizens. The person whose negligence was, we say, either entirely or partly responsible for causing this accident is entitled to call himself a public authority, because he was engaged on public duty at the time and was a public servant, for he was serving in the Army. If an action is brought against us, we want to be in a position to bring in the defendant as a third-party, so that, in the event of our being found to be liable, we can claim under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, indemnity or contribution in third-party proceedings. What we want is a declaration that we shall be entitled to maintain that claim notwithstanding the fact that the proposed third-party would be able to claim protection under the Limitation Act." That conjures up many interesting positions. It is said that there is a grave injustice on an ordinary citizen, possibly liable in damages for negligence to a plaintiff, if the circumstances show that there is another party who may also be liable in respect of the accident which gives rise to the action if that other party happens to be a public authority entitled to claim the protection of the Limitation Act, because, by delaying the institution of his proceedings for more than twelve months, the plaintiff may put it out of the power of the defendant to bring in the other party and render him liable to make contribution or pay an indemnity.

In Merlihan v. A. C. Pope, Ltd., and J. W. Hibbert (Pagnello Third Party) (1), decided by BIRKETT, J., a very similar set of circumstances seems to have arisen. The defendant in that case found himself unable to start third-party proceedings against the third-party within the twelve months, and the third-party pleaded the provisions of the Limitation Act, 1939, as he was entitled to, and his contention prevailed. BIRKETT, J., having in the course of that case found that the third-party equally with the defendant's driver was guilty of negligence contributing to the collision, went on to say ([1945] 2 All E.R., 449, at p. 450) :

The important matter which was relied on by counsel for the third-party is rather a difficult matter of procedure at law. In answer to the claim for contribution made by the defendants, the third-party said he was not liable by reason of s. 21 of the Limitation Act, 1939.

The judge then proceeded to show that the dates were all in favour of that contention. The Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6 (1), to which reference had to be made in that case and to which I make reference now, provides :

Where damage is suffered by any person as a result of a tort (whether a crime or not) :
(a) judgment recovered against any tortfeasor liable in respect of that damage shall not be a bar to an action against any other person who would, if sued, have been liable as a joint tortfeasor in respect of the same damage.

In giving his construction of that section of the Act, BIRKETT, J., said ([1946] K.B. 166, at p. 170) :

The point is a new one ; it has never been determined, and no real guidance on it exists. On behalf of the third-party it is contended that he is not liable to the plaintiff because of the Limitation Act, 1939, and, that in order to make the words in para. (c) of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, applicable to this case, the words "who is, or if sued 'in time,' would have been liable" must be substituted. It is clear that Pagnello was not sued in time. His liability arises because of his negligence on Mar. 15, 1943. That was the date on which he became a tortfeasor, and, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, the cause of action, as is not disputed, arose on that date. It was argued for the defendants, several cases being cited which do not call for discussion, that so far as concerns them, as against the third-party, the date of the accident, Mar. 15, 1943, is irrelevant ; and that while that may be the date of the cause of action as between the plaintiff and the third-party, the date of the cause of action as between the defendants and the third-party must be taken to have been June 14, 1945, because that was the first date on which they became liable, by the finding of the court against them, for the damage suffered by the plaintiff. They say, therefore, that the Limitation Act, 1939, has no application. The conclusion to which I have come is that it is not competent for the defendants to claim contribution from the third-party. I so hold on the express ground that the third-party is protected by the Limitation Act, 1939, because the cause of action in fact accrued on Mar. 15, 1943. The Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, certainly made a great change in the law and, apparently, this particular difficulty was not foreseen. In my opinion, it would not be a proper interpretation of s. 6, sub-s. 1 (c) to read it as if the material words were "who if sued in time would have been liable." There will be judgment for the third-party against the defendants with costs.

It is by reason of that decision by BIRKETT, J., that the plaintiffs in the present matter have sought a declaration that, as they have started these proceedings for a declaration within twelve months of the accident which may give rise to an action later on, they are entitled to say that their rights are still preserved, and that, if an action should be brought against the plaintiffs, they will be entitled to bring their third-party proceedings and to deprive the third-party of any protection which he might otherwise have had under the Limitation Act, 1939.

A plaintiff in a negligence case may bring an action against two defendants. If he does, each defendant is entitled to any defence which may be available. A plaintiff may obtain judgment against both defendants. He may obtain judgment against one defendant only, and the second defendant may obtain judgment against him for his costs. That is one set of proceedings. Another set of proceedings which may be available to a plaintiff who is claiming damages for negligence is an action brought by him against one defendant. That defendant is entitled, by what is known as third-party procedure, on leave being granted to him by the court, to bring in somebody else, not as a second defendant but as a third party, in order that, if he, the defendant, should be found to be liable to the plaintiff, he may pass on some of that liability to the third-party by claiming from the third-party an indemnity or contribution. That position is made possible by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 39 (2), which provides for the third-party procedure. Section 39 (2) provides :

(2) Every person served with any such notice as aforesaid [i.e., notice of being made a third-party] shall thenceforth be deemed a party to the cause or matter with the same rights in respect of his defence against the claim [i.e., the claim of the defendant against him as third-party] as if he had been duly sued in the ordinary way by the defendant.

The words "by the defendant" will be observed. Therefore, one has to bear in mind that third-party proceedings are in the nature of a separate action brought by a defendant against a third party, in which the cause of action is by no means necessarily the same as the cause of action which brings the plaintiff and the defendant before the court. The cause of action which brings a plaintiff and a defendant before the court in such a case as may arise out of this accident is negligence. The cause of action which entitles a defendant to bring a third party before the court is the liability of the third party to make contribution or to pay an indemnity. That cause of action has not arisen until the liability of the defendant has been ascertained.

By s. 39 of the Act of 1925 and the Orders and Rules of the Supreme Court notice of third-party proceedings is given to a third party before liability is established. If a plaintiff brings an action for damages against two defendants, he may get judgment against both, but, if a plaintiff brings an action against a defendant and the defendant brings in a third party, the plaintiff can never get a judgment against the third party. It is only the defendant who can get a judgment against the third party. Nor, in such proceedings, could the defendant succeed and yet leave the plaintiff with judgment against the third party. The proceedings by the defendant against the third party are independent of and separate from the proceedings by the plaintiff against the defendant, except that, when the defendant is made liable to the plaintiff, he then has his right open against the third party to establish if he can (and the onus may well be on him) that he possesses a right to indemnity and contribution from that third party.

My attention has been drawn to several cases in which declarations have been applied for and in some instances granted and in others refused, but I cannot help thinking that the granting of a declaration, which is part of the equity jurisdiction, is very much a matter for the discretion of the court in the circumstances of the case before it. I find it difficult to say that I should have arrived at the same conclusion as BIRKETT, J. arrived at on similar facts. I take the view that the Limitation Act only starts to run in favour of a third party when the defendant in the proceedings has been found to be liable for damages. Whether the judge who tries this case, if it ever should be brought to trial, will subscribe to the decision of BIRKETT, J., or will say that the point does not prevail in favour of the third party, I do not know, but it seems to me that, unless the legislature interferes, this position is bound to be faced in any case arising out of negligence where a plaintiff foregoes to sue one of the parties responsible for more than twelve months when the other party alleged to be responsible is entitled to the protection of the Limitation Act. That gives rise to such an injustice, to such an obstruction to justice being done, that, if this remedy which is sought by the plaintiffs here is calculated to meet the situation, it seems to me that that remedy ought to be granted.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P.), November 26, 27, 28, December 6, 1946.]

Prize Law—Freight—Ship of neutral country carrying contraband—Seizure with hostile intention—Neutral country becoming belligerent enemy.

A ship owned by a Japanese company was despatched before the outbreak of the war between Great Britain and Germany in 1939 with a cargo for Hamburg and Rotterdam. After the outbreak of the war, the ship, while en route, was diverted and searched by the Royal Navy, and the cargo was seized in prize. The ship was not detained as she belonged to neutral owners and was innocent. In Dec., 1941, Japan became an enemy. On Nov. 19, 1942, the goods were condemned in prize except that part destined for Rotterdam. The proceeds of sale of the part not condemned were released, but a sum in respect of freight had been retained. On a claim by the Crown for the condemnation of the freight, it was conceded that no distinction need be drawn between the freight in respect of the cargo released and that in respect of the cargo condemned.

HELD: (i) the liability to condemnation did not depend on the original seizure having a hostile character in relation to the property concerned.

(ii) even if liability to condemnation on the subsequent outbreak of war did depend on the intention at the time of seizure, a seizure without hostile intention would be subject to the implied condition that the intention might become hostile if the owner became a belligerent enemy.

CLAIM by the Crown for the condemnation in prize of the freight on certain consignments of cargo laden on board the Japanese ship, "Sado Maru." The case turns on the question whether, for goods or freight to be condemned in prize, it is necessary that they should have been seized with hostile intention. The facts appear in the judgment.

A. J. Hodgson for the claimant.
J. V. Nesbitt for H.M. Procurator-General.

Our adv. vult.

Dec. 6. LORD MERRIMAN, P. : In this case the Crown seeks condemnation of the freight on ten consignments laden on board the Japanese ship "Sado Maru," amounting to £2,267 3s. 10d. James Charteris Burleigh, the controller of the London branch of the Nippon Yusen Kabusiki Kaisya, the Japanese ship-owners, has entered a claim for this freight on the ground that it would have been recovered and received by the said branch after the goods had been carried to their destination. Strictly speaking, the claim is for compensation in lieu of the freight, which was payable in terms of the bills of lading on delivery at Hamburg or Rotterdam, as the case might be. The claim is based on the fact that this was an ordinary commercial shipment made before the outbreak of the recent war in Europe, and that, although that war had broken out when the ship herself was diverted and searched by the Royal Navy and the goods in question seized in prize, the ship herself was not detained, but was promptly released as belonging to neutral owners and being herself innocent.

The goods were condemned in prize on Nov. 19, 1942, as being contraband with an enemy destination, and therefore not protected by the Declaration of Paris, with the exception of a consignment of fatty acid which was the only parcel destined for Rotterdam and not Hamburg. The proceeds, for all these goods had in fact been sold and were represented in the hands of the marshal by the proceeds, had been released to the claimants who had satisfied the Procurator-General of their title, but the sum of £67 8s. 4d. in respect of the freight thereon was retained by the marshal for whom it might concern. Meanwhile, in Dec., 1941, Japan had become an enemy. It was expressly conceded on behalf of the claimant that no distinction need be drawn between the freight in respect of the cargo released and that in respect of the cargoes condemned. The first question, therefore, is whether the Crown is entitled to condemnation of so much of the proceeds of these goods in the hands of the marshal as represents freight. The second question is whether, in any event, the present claimant, representing the London branch of the Japanese company, has any claim to these monies. It has not been thought necessary to pursue the second question, which, if the Crown is entitled to a decree of condemnation, inevitably becomes academic.

The first question is of general importance. The claimant has made it clear that his only anxiety is to discharge his duty as the controller appointed by the Board of Trade under the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, and to assist the court in coming to a just decision, so that under s. 3A (3) (added to the Act by Defence Regulation, S.R. & O., 1940, No. 1289), he may eventually make a proper distribution of the assets of the London branch. The basis on which the Crown rests the claim for condemnation was stated by counsel as follows. He admitted that if Japan had remained neutral, compensation in lieu of freight would have been payable in respect of these consignments, whether they were condemned or released, upon the principle recognized in the "Fortuna" (1), the "Prosper" (2), and the "Juno" (3), that, it being solely due to the incapacity of the cargo that the ship-owner was prevented from effecting an entire execution of the contract of carriage, while he had done his utmost to carry it to its consummation, it was inequitable that the incapacity of the cargo should operate to the disadvantage of the ship. But he submitted that because Japan subsequently became a belligerent, the freight, being still in this country in the hands of the marshal, thereupon became liable to condemnation as good and lawful prize, as would the ship herself have been if she had not in fact proceeded on her voyage before Japan became a belligerent.

Counsel for the claimants did not dispute that it is well settled prize law that in certain circumstances property in the hands of the marshal, including the right to receive freight or compensation in lieu thereof (which, to avoid circumlocution, I will hereafter refer to simply as freight), is liable to condemnation on the outbreak of hostilities if it belongs to an enemy subject. But he contended that this liability depends upon the original seizure having a hostile character in relation to the particular property. The simplest illustration of a hostile seizure was, he submitted, the prohibition by Order in Council during a period of embargo in anticipation of actual hostilities, such as occurred during the Napoleonic wars, of the restoration by the court to the owners, potentially belligerent, of ships or freight, or of the departure of the ships themselves. In the present case, so he contended, the seizure was directed against the cargo, and there was no hostile intention against the freight due to the admittedly innocent ship-owners, and it was a mere accident that the cargoes or their proceeds had not been condemned and the freight restored to the ship-owners thereout, before Japan became a belligerent. This contention makes it necessary to examine some of the authorities upon which counsel for the Crown relied. I have derived great advantage from a consideration of a treatise on prize droits in the form of "A REPORT TO THE TREASURY ON DROITS OF THE CROWN AND OF ADMIRALTY IN TIME OF WAR," presented to the Treasury during the Crimean War by Mr. H. C. Rothery, who was registrar of the High Court of Admiralty from 1853 to 1878, revised and annotated in 1915 by Mr. E. S. Roscoe, the Admiralty Registrar during the war of 1914-1918. The object of this treatise was to afford guidance to the Treasury in regard to the distribution of the proceeds of droits, but it sets out, incidentally, the grounds of condemnation out of which these droits arose, and this is its value for the present purpose, a value which is enhanced by the fact that it records the grants actually made to captors out of what would now be called the Prize Fund. Moreover, this treatise was referred to with marked approval by SIR SAMUEL EVANS in the "Roumanian" (4).

I propose to begin with two cases, the "Prosper" (2) and the "Fortuna" (5) referred to on p. 86 of Mr. Rothery's treatise. I should say in passing that the reference to the "Fortuna" in the foot-note is inaccurate. The report in Edwards (supra) obviously refers to a later voyage of this ship. To appreciate the full significance of these two cases for the present purpose, it is necessary to bear in mind the following dates collected from pp. 20 and 21 of the treatise and the report of the "Prosper" (2). Both vessels were Danish. Both were seized in 1807 on suspicion of carrying enemy property, and both were restored. The dates of seizure and release in the case of the "Fortuna" (5) were July 13 and 27 respectively. In the case of the "Prosper" (2) the dates do not appear. In each case, however, the question of the cargoes and freight had not been adjudicated at the time of the release of the ships. On Sept. 2, 1807, an Order in Council was made placing an embargo upon Danish property, and on Sept. 10, as appears from the "Prosper" (2), an Order in Council directed the payment of all freight due to Danish subjects into the Admiralty Court. On Nov. 4, war was declared with Denmark, and on Dec. 18 the cargo in the "Fortuna" (5) was condemned as lawful prize to the captors on payment of freight, but the freight which, as Mr. Rothery observes, "was in the cargo but which belonged to the Danish owner of the ship," was condemned to the Crown as Danish property captured before hostilities. In the case of the "Prosper" (2) the cargo turned out to be Portugese property and was ultimately restored as such. Nevertheless, it was restored subject to the payment of freight to the Crown as succeeding to the rights of the enemy shippers and notwithstanding that the right to receive freight was a chose in action which the Danish ship-owner was not in a position to enforce. It will be seen, therefore, that in each of these cases, though the ship herself had been restored, in the case of the "Fortuna" (5) certainly before either the embargo or the outbreak of hostilities, the freight was treated as still being in the hands of the marshal by virtue of the cargo in each case being still under adjudication, and became vested in the Crown by reason of the outbreak of hostilities, although in one case the cargo was condemned and in the other it was restored.

Another case, the "Trende Sodskende" (6), illustrates the same point. In this case the vessel had been decreed to be restored. She had not left this country at the time of the embargo and was accordingly re-seized and ultimately condemned to the Crown as Danish property captured before hostilities. Meanwhile, the adjudication of the cargo had been in suspense, but it was subsequently condemned to the captors as enemy property, but the freight thereon was condemned to the Crown as Danish property captured before hostilities. The record of the grant made to the captors is extremely illuminating. They got nothing in respect of the ship, because she had been restored and afterwards re-seized to His Majesty's use, but "as the freight was not dependent on the ship, but was a thing reserved in judgment on the goods," ultimately condemned to the captors, the captors seemed to be entitled, so the King's Proctor reported, to a grant of one-fifth of the freight. It is only necessary to add that the "Prosper" (2) was referred to with approval in Francis Fenwick, Tyne & Wear Co., Ltd. v. H. M. Procurator-General (7) ([1942] A.C. 667, at p. 684). It is worthy of note in passing that the preface to 6 Christopher Robinson sets out a list of cases under appeal to the Privy Council where the vessels were condemned as enemy property on the breaking out of the Prussian hostilities. In one case at least, the "Twee Gebroeders" (8), the Crown was appealing against a decree of restoration. The "Constantia Harlessen" (9), like the "Trende Sodskende" (6), was a case in which the ship, before she was divested of her neutral character, had been captured and brought to Yarmouth, and freight was decreed to the Danish master by a Prize Court. But before the departure of the vessel the Danish hostilities broke out, and the ship was again seized and condemned to the Crown. Earlier in the voyage the cargo owners had advanced money on bottomry for certain necessary repairs to enable the voyage to proceed. In the circumstances this proved to be an advance against freight and not the subject of average. Accordingly, LORD STOWELL held that, although bottomry bonds, generally speaking, are disallowed as the subject of a claim in prize, nevertheless, the owners of the ship and cargo being entitled to set off against each other all deductions arising out of the immediate transaction, the Crown was obliged to accept the condemnation of the freight subject to the right of the cargo-owners to deduct the amount of the bottomry advances. In that case, although it is not expressly so stated, there appears to be no question of the cargo being liable to condemnation, seeing that the cargo owners were re-imbursed their advances, yet the Crown was entitled to condemnation of the freight subject to the re-imburement of advances, though the freight had originally been decreed to the Danish master while he was still a neutral.

The result, in my opinion, is that there is no foundation for imposing a condition that the original seizure of the freight itself, or of the goods in which the freight lies, must have been of a hostile character, but, even if liability to condemnation on the subsequent outbreak of hostilities did depend on the intention at the time of seizure, I should still be of opinion that the seizure, although devoid of hostile intention in the first instance towards the particular subject-matter as distinct from the rest of the property seized, would be subject to the implied condition that the intention might become hostile if the owner of the property became a belligerent enemy while the property itself remained in the custody of the Marshal. I hold that the sums in question are condemnable to the Crown as good and lawful prize.

ROMAN v. ROMAN

[COURT OF APPEAL (Morton and Bucknill, L.J.J.), February 10, 27, 1947.]

Divorce—Costs—Security for wife's costs—Appeal by wife against decree nisi granted to husband.

A wife, who was appealing against a decree nisi of divorce granted to her husband, applied for security for the costs of her appeal. She was in receipt of a weekly sum of £14 4s. gross from her husband under an order of the court, and she also owned some jewellery, HELD : there was no good reason for granting the application.

Per curiam : the question whether the Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to order a respondent husband to provide security for the costs of an appellant wife, and, if so, in what circumstances such jurisdiction should be exercised, was one of great importance, and, when it arose, it should, perhaps, be considered by a full court. If the jurisdiction existed, it should be exercised sparingly and not in a case where an appellant wife had sufficient estate of her own to pay her own costs.

MOTION by wife for security for the costs of her appeal from a judgment of BARNARD, J., who granted a decree nisi to her husband on the ground of her cruelty.

A. R. Ellis for the wife.

R. T. Paget for the husband.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 27. MORTON, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This was an application by an appellant wife for security for her costs in presenting an appeal against the judgment of BARNARD, J., whereby he found her guilty of cruelty and, exercising his discretion in the husband's favour in respect of his own adultery, granted him a decree nisi. We have already dismissed the application, but stated at that time that we would give the reasons for our decision later.

The careful researches of counsel for the wife and counsel for the husband have failed to reveal any case in the history of this court in which a party, successful in the court below, has been ordered by this court to give security for the costs of an appeal by the unsuccessful party. This court has, however, considered three times the question whether it could and should order an appellant husband to give security for the costs in this court of a respondent wife. In Vidal v. Vidal (1) the petitioner was the husband alleging adultery against the wife and his appeal was against the decision on that issue in his wife's favour. The Court of Appeal ordered the husband to pay £50 into court as security for the wife's costs, and a like sum in respect of the co-respondent. In Shufflebotham v. Shufflebotham (2) the wife had been the petitioner and had obtained a decree for dissolution of the marriage, with costs, after a trial which had lasted four days. She had obtained in the court below an order for security for costs for £150, and she asked this court (i) for security for the balance of costs in the court below not covered by the £150 security, and (ii) for security for costs of the appeal. The court refused to make an order, but Vidal v. Vidal (1) does not appear to have been cited. In King v. King (3) the husband had petitioned for divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery, and HENN COLLINS, J., dismissed the petition with costs on the ground that the wife had not committed adultery with the co-respondent. The husband appealed to the Court of Appeal. In the court below security for the wife's costs had been ordered, and she now moved for an order for security for her costs of the appeal. In an affidavit sworn by her she stated that she was without means to finance her costs in the appeal. The court held that it had jurisdiction to make such an order, and made an order accordingly, the amount of the security to be fixed by the registrar. In giving the judgment of the court, SCOTT, L.J., said ([1943] 2 All E.R. 253, at p. 254) :

The practice, however, both before and after the [Matrimonial Causes] Acts of 1857 and 1873, has always been only to give the wife security in cases where she has not sufficient estate to pay her own costs. This practice was recently recognised as still right and proper by the Court of Appeal in Johnstone v. Johnstone (4) . . .

Later in the judgment SCOTT, L.J., said (ibid., at p. 255) :

We expressly limit our decision to cases like the present because, where the judge, exercising divorce jurisdiction, makes a decree of dissolution on the ground of the wife's adultery against the wife, the doctrine of a common law agency of necessity would seem to be excluded. On the other hand, if a decree which terminates the married status excludes the rule, a solicitor might hesitate to undertake the conduct of an impecunious wife's case if he had only the common law principle of agency upon which to rely to get his costs and were driven to sue the husband ; and it may be that, for the sake of public policy in relation to the protection of the married status, the rule of ordering security should be regarded as, for that very reason, equally enforceable in the case of a wife seeking to appeal from an adverse decision against her. That question we keep open.

The question thus left open, whether this court has jurisdiction to order a respondent husband to provide security for the costs of an appellant wife, and, if so, in what circumstances such jurisdiction should be exercised, is one of great importance, and it may be that if and when it arises, it should be considered by a full Court of Appeal. It is not, however, necessary for us to decide this question in the present case. We think that the jurisdiction, if it exists, is one which should be exercised sparingly and we feel no doubt that it should not be exercised in a case where an appellant wife has sufficient estate of her own to pay her own costs.

In the present case it appeared to us, from the evidence filed, that the wife, who is receiving a weekly sum of £14 4s. gross from her husband under an order of the court, could provide for her costs of an appeal by selling or possibly by pledging, certain jewellery owned by her. Thus there appears to be no good reason for granting the wife's application, which is dismissed with costs.

Application dismissed with costs.

Workmen's Compensation—Compensation—Amount—Partial incapacity—Difference between current and pre-accident earnings—Changes in economic position of labour market—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (c. 84), s. 9 (3) (i).

On a true construction of s. 9 (3) (i) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, in calculating the weekly payment in the case of partial incapacity, if the workman is bona fide earning what he reasonably can earn, it is not open to the employer to diminish the "difference" between this figure and his pre-accident earnings—actual or as adjusted under the Acts—by showing that the whole or part of the difference is due to changes in the "economic position of the labour market" between the two dates. Conversely, when the workman, though on a less well paid type of work as a result of his incapacity, gets more as a result of such changes, the employer gets the benefit of this excess.

APPEAL by the employers from an award of JUDGE ALCHIN at Bow County Court.

At the date of the award the workman, who was then partially incapacitated, was earning at the same rate as he was before the accident, but his actual earnings were less than his pre-accident earnings, the reduction being wholly due to economic causes, viz., the reduction of working hours consequent on the winding-up of war contracts. The county court judge awarded the workman 50 per cent. of the difference between his current and his pre-accident earnings.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 25. SOMERVELL, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. The argument in this case turns on the construction of s. 9 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, and I will read the relevant parts of s. 9 (1) and (3). The court is not concerned with total incapacity which is dealt with in s. 9 (2). Section 9 (1) provides:

The compensation under this Act where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury shall be a weekly payment during the incapacity of an amount calculated in accordance with the rules hereinafter contained . . .

By s. 9 (3) :

The rules for calculating the weekly payment in the case of partial incapacity shall be :
(i) If the maximum weekly payment would, had the incapacity been total incapacity, have amounted to 25s. a week or upwards, the weekly payment in case of partial incapacity shall be one-half the difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average weekly amount which he is earning or is able to earn in some suitable employment or business after the accident . . .

A If the workman does not show that "partial incapacity for work results from the injury" under s. 9 (1), then he is entitled to no compensation. If he establishes this, then s. 9 (3) has to be applied.

The findings of the county court judge sitting as arbitrator are as follows :

B (1) that as a result of his accident on Feb. 16, 1944, the workman was totally incapacitated for work of any kind until Sept. 25, 1944 ; (2) that since that date he has been partially incapacitated for work requiring the use of his right hand by reason of a substantial weakening of grip in that hand ; (3) that he is at present earning at least as much as he would have done if the accident had never happened—it was suggested that he had been prevented by his accident from doing certain Sunday work which would have brought him some pay at overtime rates, but I accept the evidence to the contrary given on behalf of the employers ; (4) that his actual earnings are, in fact, less than his pre-accident earnings ; but (5) that, since Nov., 1945, such reduction was and is wholly due to economic causes, namely, the reduction of working hours consequent on the winding-up of war contracts.

C On these findings he awarded the workman 50 per cent. of the difference between his present and his pre-accident earnings and the employers appeal. As there was some dispute about the meaning of finding (3) it is relevant to look at the evidence, from which it is clear that, since the workman had been back at work, he had been employed on lighter work and, according to his own evidence and that of the doctors, the loss of his finger had impaired his grip. He said that he could not do the full heavy work which he was previously doing.

D Counsel for the employer submits, first, that on the judge's findings there was no incapacity for work within s. 9 (1). He accepted LORD LOREBURN's definition of incapacity for work as set out in Ball v. William Hunt, Ltd. (1) ([1912] A.C. 496, at p. 499) :

E I think there is incapacity for work when a man has a physical defect which makes his labour unsaleable in any market reasonably accessible to him, and there is partial incapacity for work when such a defect makes his labour saleable for less than it would otherwise fetch.

As the judge awarded the workman half the difference between his pre-accident earnings and the wages he was getting, it is, we think, clear that he found incapacity for work as defined by LORD LOREBURN. Finding (3) simply means
F that he is getting at present from his old employers as much as he would have got from them if he had not been injured. His wage-earning capacity has, however, been diminished and his labour is "saleable" in the market for less than it would otherwise fetch.

The issue on the second and main point is how a reduction in earnings due to economic causes has to be dealt with in applying s. 9 (3). Counsel for the employers submits that on principle, construing the Act as a whole, and on the most recent House of Lords' authority, Jones v. Amalgamated Collieries, Ltd. (2), one must imply after the word "difference" the words "resulting from the injury" or words with that sense. If this is right, on the findings here the workman would be entitled to nothing. Alternatively, he submits that the actual earnings must be disregarded and the court must consider what the workman is able to earn, disregarding any diminution in the amount of what
H he is able to earn due to changes in general working or economic conditions since the accident.

The general idea behind each of these two submissions is clearly that the principle of s. 9 (3) of the Act is to give compensation in respect of loss of earnings or earning capacity due to the accident, no more and no less. If this had been the intention, it would, we think, have been comparatively simple to put it into words. It is also, we think, worth noting at the outset that this principle can have no operation where the change in economic conditions results in a general increase of earnings. A workman before his accident is earning £5 a week. After, owing to partial incapacity, he earns £4. Wages rise and he is able to earn £5, but, if uninjured, he would now be able to earn £6. Here is a loss of earning capacity due to the accident, but it is admitted that under the formula in s. 9 (3), though construed as counsel for the employers contends, he can get nothing. It may be the legislature was aiming at simplicity rather than logic.

Counsel for the workman submitted that the county court judge was right. He based part of his argument on the history of the legislation and part on other sections in the present code. Each of these gives some support to his argument. The earlier authorities show that the causes which we have to consider today fell to be considered, not under the words "is able to earn" in para. (2) of sched. I to the Act of 1897 or "is earning or is able to earn" in para. (3) of sched. I to the Act of 1906, but under the discretion entrusted to the judge by both Acts in determining the amount of the difference between that sum and the proper pre-accident figure: see Bevan v. Energlyn Collieries (3). That discretion was removed by s. 4 of the Act of 1923 and its place was taken by the fixed proportion of 50 per cent. The legislature removed the words which enabled the extraneous causes in question affecting compensation to be dealt with on the lines for which counsel for the employers contends.

Counsel for the workman also relied on s. 11 (3) of the Act of 1925, which is now extended and replaced by s. 6 of the Act of 1943. These sections contain express provisions enabling the arbitrator to take economic changes into account in so far as these changes consist of a rise or fall in rates of remuneration and provide for a consequential adjustment of the pre-accident earnings. A concrete illustration will explain. Before the accident the workman is earning £6. At the time when compensation is being assessed the £6 figure has fallen to £4 owing to a 33½ per cent. drop in rates of remuneration. The partially incapacitated workman is earning £3. Applying these sections the pre-accident figure is reduced to £4 and the workman's compensation is 50 per cent. of £1. If counsel for the employers is right on the construction of s. 9 (3), this result, where rates were reduced, was already attained without the legislative introduction of these express provisions. The introduction of these provisions seems to us to point to the conclusion that s. 9 (3) is not on its true construction concerned with these economic changes, at any rate, in the application of it to actual post-accident earnings. When the legislature intended that they should come into the assessment of compensation, it used express words and made their application operate to increase or reduce compensation according to whether they had caused an increase or reduction of one element in earnings, namely, rates of remuneration. We only refer to these sections as aids in interpretation as they do not, of course, apply in this case since the reduction was not due to a variation in rates of remuneration.

Turning to the authorities, we will deal first with Cardiff Corpn. v. Hall (4), a decision of this court which was approved by the House of Lords in Bevan v. Nixons Navigation Co., Ltd. (5). Both cases dealt with a workman who at the material date though partially incapacitated was fit for certain work, but could not obtain employment owing to the then conditions of the labour market. He was not, therefore, earning anything. VISCOUNT DUNEDIN in Bevan's case (5) stated the question of principle in these words ([1929] A.C. 44, at p. 49):

The whole controversy turned on the words "is earning or is able to earn." Does "is able to earn" mean is in such a physical condition that he is able to earn and that alone, or does it also include the proviso of employment if the workman fairly attempts to get it?

It was held that the workman was able to earn the sum which he would have received if he could have got employment of the kind for which he was fit. VISCOUNT DUNEDIN had some doubt about the correctness of the decision in the Cardiff Corpn. case (4), which, though decided under a different statute, was regarded as applicable to the words in s. 4 of the Act of 1923 now embodied in s. 9 (3) of the Act of 1925. It has, however, not only stood unchallenged for many years, but in VISCOUNT DUNEDIN's view later legislation had been based on its correctness.

It was suggested in argument before us that, in applying the criterion of what the unemployed man was able to earn at the material date, as explained in Bevan's case (5), it was not sufficient to consider the wages ruling at the time, but it was open to the employer, or, apparently, the workman, to show that those wages had been reduced or increased by economic factors since the date of the accident. This contention was based on the following sentence from VISCOUNT DUNEDIN's opinion. Referring to s. 16 of the Act of 1923, the later legislation on which he relied, VISCOUNT DUNEDIN said ([1929] A.C. 44, at p. 53):

It seems to me necessarily to exclude the idea that "able to earn" applies to any circumstances not personal to the man himself.

- A It is not necessary in this appeal to come to a conclusion on this point. It did not arise in Bevan's case (5) and we incline to think that VISCOUNT DUNEDIN's sentence must be regarded as confined to the facts with which he was dealing, and not as a ruling on the above suggestion. This is we think borne out by words which LORD BLANESBURGH uses (ibid., at p. 66): "... actual fact, if he is earning or, if he is not earning, estimate of what he is able to earn." We regard Bevan's case (5) as a decision solely on the construction of the words "is able to earn," and, therefore, not an authority on the "is earning" problem with which we are dealing. This view of Bevan's case (5) is consistent with, and, we think, confirmed by, the decision in Blakemore v. Delta Mill Co., Ltd. (6), to which we refer later.

- Before referring to that case it is necessary to refer to two previous decisions, one of this court, Lyon v. Taylor Bros. (7), and one of the Court of Session, Dykes v. Baird (William) & Co., Ltd. (8). In Lyon's case (7) the partially incapacitated workman was working at the same rates as before the accident. Owing to slackness of trade and not to his incapacity he earned 37s. 8d. instead of 50s. which he was earning before the accident. This court held that he was not entitled to any compensation. SCRUTTON, L.J., with whom the other members of the court agreed, construed the words "earns or is able to earn" as meaning "earns, or is able to earn, whichever is the greater." Applying the principle of Bevan's case (5), the slackness of trade was not personal to the workman and but for that he would have been able to earn 50s. Dykes' case (8) was decided under the Act of 1906, but the decision is applicable to the construction of the words with which we are concerned. But for economic causes, i.e., slackness of trade, the man would have been earning £1 15s. 1d., but he was, in fact, earning £1 10s. 3d. The Court of Session held that under the words "is earning or is able to earn" the proper figure was £1 10s. 3d. In other words, the English Court of Appeal had decided that you add on to what a man is earning what he would be able to earn if trade was not slack. The Court of Session decided that you do not. In White v. London & North Eastern Ry. Co. (9) LORD ATKIN doubted the correctness of the decision in Lyon's case (7). LORD WARRINGTON expressly approved the decision in Dykes' case (8), though he thought Lyons' case (7) could be distinguished. This court, in Matthews v. Harland & Wolff, Ltd. (10) held that Lyon's case (7) must be regarded as overruled by White's case (9) and followed Dykes' case (8). Matthews v. Harland & Wolff, Ltd. (10) was approved by the House of Lords in Blakemore v. Delta Mill Co., Ltd. (6).

- The principle there laid down by the House of Lords, in our view, concludes this appeal in favour of the workman. The argument of counsel for the employers involves the conclusion that the principles laid down in Blakemore's case (6), which we regard as binding on this court, ought, in the light of Jones' case (2), to be regarded as dicta not necessary for the decision. We will deal with this argument when we come to Jones' case (2). In the Court of Appeal in Blakemore's case (6) the Master of the Rolls and possibly SLESSER, L.J., decided the case on its special facts, but the House of Lords, in our view, based its decision on clear principles, deliberately laid down, which, therefore, are binding on this court. We will try to summarise them. The words "is earning or is able to earn" are strictly alternative. The words "is earning" are to be applied when the workman is earning as much as he reasonably can, or, as it is sometimes put, is "bona fide earning" If he is doing this, then the first alternative applies, and the fact that this amount is affected by general economic conditions such as slackness of trade is irrelevant for the purpose of applying s. 9 (3). In short, "is earning" is a statement of actual fact and means what it says, unless the workman's will to earn is in fault. LORD THANKERTON pointed out that, if what we may call the thesis of Lyon's case (7) was right, the words "is earning" were unnecessary. The workman's actual earnings would be merely an item of evidence in deciding what he is able to earn, and the phraseology of the Act of 1897 in which the words were "is able to earn" need not have been altered. LORD THANKERTON says (28 B.W.C.C. 193, at p. 208):

In my opinion the Act provides a simple method though it may not be a logical one, as the actual earnings of the workman are presumably conditioned by the existing economic position of the labour market an element which falls to be excluded in assessing the amount which he is able to earn: Bevan v. Nixon's Navigation Co., Ltd. (5).

LORD RUSSELL concurred in LORD THANKERTON's opinion and LORD BLANESBURGH based his opinion on similar reasoning. In Hunnissett v. Southend Corpn. (11) this court applied Blakemore's case (6) to facts which are, as near as may be, indistinguishable from those of the present case. A plumber was injured and when he resumed work he was incapable of climbing ladders. He, in fact, earned as much as if he had been able to climb ladders, his actual earnings however being less than his pre-accident earnings for reasons unconnected with his injury. He was held entitled to compensation based on this difference. That decision is binding on this court unless overruled expressly—and this is not suggested—or by necessary implication.

Jones v. Amalgamated Collieries, Ltd. (2), on which the employers rely, was dealing with a different problem. A partially disabled workman, while earning £3 15s. 4d. a week, was conscripted and his pay and allowances came to £2 0s. 9d. a week. He claimed that compensation should be assessed on the basis of this latter figure as his actual earnings. In this court MACKINNON, L.J., and GODDARD, L.J., held that the pay and allowances were not earnings within the section, and the question, therefore, was what was he able to earn. He was able to earn £3 15s. 4d. because he had been earning it until the operation of the National Services (Armed Forces) Act, 1939, debarred him from continuing to do so. DU PARCQ, L.J., while recognising that a reduction of wages through a general economic depression did not prevent the actual earnings being still the proper testing figure, held, in effect, that the pay and allowances being wholly unrelated to his capacity or incapacity for work were not what he was "earning" within the meaning of the section. The House of Lords also declined to take the figure of pay and allowances as the figure of what the workman was earning within the meaning of the section, but this decision was not on the basis that the pay and allowances were not earnings. LORD THANKERTON had no doubt that they were earnings within the meaning of s. 9 (3). He said, however ([1944] 1 All E.R. 1, at p. 4):

I am unable to distinguish this case from for instance the case of the workman, sustaining injury from two successive accidents, the first of which leaves him subject to partial incapacity for work, and the second of which increases the partial incapacity. The wage which he may be in fact earning after the second accident would be accepted as the amount of his earnings, but there would necessarily remain an inquiry with a view to allocating the parts of the total reduction which resulted respectively from the injury caused in each accident, so as to ascertain the compensation due by the particular employer against whom the claim was made.

LORD THANKERTON goes on to say that the same principle would apply if the second injury was not an industrial accident and was entirely unconnected with the first injury. He was not, of course, laying down an exhaustive statement of the law of successive accidents in relation, for example, to industrial disease which have given rise to difficult problems. The passage we have quoted is, however, of importance as showing the basis of the ratio decidendi in Jones' case (2). VISCOUNT SIMON and LORD MACMILLAN also referred to this analogy. LORD RUSSELL based his opinion on very general grounds and among them counsel for the employers particularly relied on certain statements which might be read as expressing a general principle, and so read lend support to his argument, but, if taken in their generality, cannot, in our respectful opinion, be reconciled with Blakemore's case (6). That case was cited and is referred to in LORD THANKERTON's opinion, and both he and LORD RUSSELL were parties to the Blakemore decision (6). The expressions of opinion in Jones' case (2) to which counsel for the employers has called attention cannot, in our view, be read as intended to overrule or throw doubt on the ratio decidendi in Blakemore's case (6).

The conclusion we come to on the construction of the section in principle and on authority is as follows. If the workman is bona fide earning what he reasonably can earn, it is not open to the employer to diminish the "difference" between this figure and his pre-accident earnings—actual or as adjusted under the Acts—by showing that the whole or part of the reduction is due to changes in the "economic position of the labour market" between the two dates. Conversely, when the workman, though on a less well paid type of work as a result of his incapacity, gets more as a result of such changes, the employer gets the benefit of this excess: see SCRUTTON, L.J., in Bromley v. Staveley

- A Coal & Iron Co., Ltd. (12) (16 B.W.C.C. 77, at p. 86). Such changes are constantly taking place, and, if the legislature had intended the definite provisions of the section about actual earnings to be modified by economic fluctuations, express words would and could easily have been found to make that intention clear. There may, however, be other causes unconnected with the injury which require, as LORD THANKERTON suggested, an allocation of the total reduction or, as LORD RUSSELL suggested, a consideration of what the workman is able to earn. A second accident or injury is one such cause. Conscription, which, of course, affected a very large number of people, is another. It is not necessary in order to decide the present cases to attempt a formula which would cover all such possible causes.

- The result in the present case is clearly anomalous in that the workman is receiving the same wages as he would have received if uninjured. There are other cases in which part only of the difference is due to his injury and part to other causes. In all such cases the employer is paying compensation for a loss which is in whole or in part not truly attributable to the injury, compensation for which is clearly the main purpose of the Act. As has been pointed out, the anomaly operates in the opposite sense when an employer is by an economic upward change relieved of the obligation to compensate in respect of a loss of earning capacity caused by the injury. It may be that Parliament felt that an examination into these economic changes would complicate the procedure, though so far as changes in rates are concerned some examination has been necessary since 1925, when s. 11 (3) was first enacted. It is also worth noting that in some cases no great difficulty has been found in arriving at the proportion of the difference which could reasonably be attributed to the injury. It seems clear that in 1923 and 1925 Parliament could not have contemplated the great drop in hours worked which resulted from the high overtime worked in the recent war. All these problems will in future be dealt with under the new legislation, but it seemed worth while to add these observations on the working of the old statutory system with which we have had to deal.

- In this appeal, therefore, we agree with the county court judge. Notwithstanding finding (5), the compensation to which the workman is entitled is 50 per cent. of the difference between his actual earnings and his pre-accident earnings and the appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Scott, Tucker and Cohen, L.JJ.), February 21, 1947.]

- Landlord and Tenant—Rent restriction—Recovery of possession—Premises not in reasonable state of repair—Certificate of sanitary authority—Whether ipso facto bar to landlord's right of possession—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 12; sched. I (b).*

A certificate issued by a sanitary authority under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 12, that a dwelling house to which the principal Acts apply is not in a reasonable state of repair is not, of itself, ipso facto, a bar to the landlord's right of possession. Under

s. 3 of, and sched. I (b) to, the Act the court must consider whether it is reasonable to make an order for possession. The contractual obligation to pay rent is not suspended in toto by reason of the failure of the landlord to comply with such a certificate, for s. 3 (3) of the Rent Restrictions (Notices of Increase) Act, 1923, only suspends the right to recover, and consequential remedies for non-payment of, permitted increases in the rent.

APPEAL by landlord from an order of DEPUTY JUDGE SMYLLIE, at Runcorn County Court, dated Oct. 8, 1946.

The deputy county court judge refused possession of premises, which were subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts on the ground that dilapidations of which the landlord complained were the result of his own neglect to carry out repairs directed by the local sanitary authority, and he refused to give judgment in the landlord's favour for arrears of rent on the ground that the rent was not recoverable while the premises remained in a state of non-repair.

J. H. L. Royle for the landlord.

The tenant did not appear.

SCOTT, L.J. : To make clear the position that has arisen I think I should read, first, the judge's observations when he gave judgment. He said :

These premises were in a state of non-repair. Notice served on the landlord to remedy the defects, yet nothing done. In my judgment, the rent was not recoverable while the premises remained in such condition. The dilapidations complained of by the landlord were and are the result of his own neglect to carry out the repairs directed by the local authority, and, accordingly, the landlord's claim fails.

The reference to the notice served on the landlord to remedy the defects is a reference to a certificate given on Mar. 20, 1943, by the sanitary authority of the district where the house is situated. It purported to be given under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 12, and was as follows :

To all whom it may concern. The sanitary authority of the urban district of Runcorn, having caused the dwelling-house . . . to which the Rent Restrictions Acts apply, to be inspected, and being satisfied that the house, which is situate in the said district, is not in a reasonable state of repair, hereby certify, upon the application of Mr. Philip Harold Lowe, the tenant of the house, that it is not in a reasonable state of repair.

The judge decided that the certificate was, of itself, ipso facto, a bar to the landlord's right of possession. In our view, having regard to the pleadings before the judge and the evidence called, there are certain matters with which the judge has not dealt, but which ought to have been dealt with, to enable him to come to a conclusion on the question whether or not the landlord was entitled to possession.

The particulars of claim were these. Paragraph 1 asked for possession. Paragraph 2 alleged that the tenant held the premises of the landlord as tenant from week to week at a weekly rental of 8s. 4d., inclusive of rates. Paragraph 3 alleged that the landlord duly determined the tenancy by serving upon the tenant, on July 15, 1946, notice to quit the premises at the end of the next complete week of the tenancy, but that the tenant still retained wrongful possession. Paragraph 4 alleged arrears amounting to £73 15s. 2d. (that is, nearly four year's rent at that rate), and para. 5 alleged that the condition of the dwelling-house had deteriorated owing to acts of waste by, or the neglect or the default of, the tenant or persons residing or lodging with him, contrary to para. (b) of sched. I to the Rent Restrictions Act, 1933. No written defence was put in, although the defence at the hearing was that there was no right to possession because of the condition of the premises.

Under s. 3 of the Rent Restrictions Act, 1933, there is the familiar provision that no order for recovery of possession of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts apply shall be made or given unless the court considers it reasonable to make such an order and the court has power so to do under the provisions of the schedule. I turn to the schedule, and there it appears at the outset that the question of reasonableness is a fundamental issue that the court has to consider. Non-payment of rent is one of the expressed grounds for granting possession. The obligation of repair is not shown in the present case to have been a term of the contract of tenancy. There was no evidence even of demands for a specific amount of rent. Nevertheless, we think, for reasons which will appear, that the case must go back, to be re-tried, and then the question of the amount of rent and non-payment of it, a fortiori of arrears, will be investigated.

Whether or not the landlord succeeds in showing what the rent was, so as to enable the court to come to a conclusion as to the quantum of rent, there will still remain the question what was the position in regard to the duty of repairs. I think that may probably be found to rest on s. 2 of the Housing Act, 1936, which imposes on the landlord a statutory obligation to keep the house in all respects reasonably fit for human habitation. A contention was put forward on behalf of the landlord that the state of the house was due to the act or default of the tenant, which would come within the proviso to s. 3 (3) of the Rent Restrictions (Notices of Increase) Act, 1923, which says :

Where a tenant has obtained from the sanitary authority a certificate that the house is not in a reasonable state of repair [as was the case here] and has served a copy of the certificate upon the landlord [as was the case here] it shall be a good defence to any claim against the tenant for the payment of any sum which the tenant is by virtue of this Act liable to pay by way of rent or on account of arrears . . . and . . . the production of the said certificate shall be sufficient evidence that the house was and continues to be in the condition therein mentioned unless the contrary is proved : Provided that the foregoing provision shall not apply in any case where and so far as the condition of the house is due to the tenant's neglect or default or breach of express agreement.

It should be borne in mind that that section related only to increases of rent permitted under the Acts of 1920 and 1923 read together where the landlord incurs expenditure in improving the house, but the principle underlying the proviso is relevant to the question whether it would be reasonable, in spite of the condition of the house, to make the order for possession. That will necessarily involve an investigation into who was really responsible for the condition of the house. On that topic we say nothing, but it is a matter that the judge will have to investigate carefully. If he comes to the conclusion that it was the fault of the landlord, he may reasonably say that he will refuse possession. If he comes to the conclusion that it was not the fault of the landlord and that the tenant has been a bad tenant, obviously it would be reasonable to give the landlord possession that he may not lose his rent any longer and that the house may be put into a good condition for somebody else. The case must go back for a re-trial from beginning to end, with due regard to those questions.

TUCKER, L.J. : I agree that there should be a new trial, and that the whole case should be open for re-consideration by the county court judge who has to deal with it. He may have to consider the relationship between the parties—whether there is, in fact, a relationship of landlord and tenant, and, if there is, what are the obligations under the contractual tenancy, if there was one, both with regard to repairs and to the payment of rent. Provided he is satisfied that the relationship of landlord and tenant exists and that by conduct or agreement or otherwise there was an agreement to pay some particular amount by way of rent, he will then have to consider whether there has been a failure to pay the rent, and, if so, whether that failure was of such a kind as to make it reasonable for him to make an order for possession. Where the judge who heard this case went wrong was in holding that the obligation to pay rent, which he assumed to exist, was suspended in toto by reason of the failure of the landlord to comply with the notice which had been served on him by the local authority. There is no provision under any of the Rent Restrictions Acts which suspends the need to pay the ordinary contractual rent for failure to comply with such a certificate. The right to recover rent and consequential remedies for non-payment are only suspended in the cases of permitted increases in the rent. The judge may also have to consider what was the contract between the parties as to repairs, and, if there was no contract, what the statutory obligation was on the landlord or on the tenant with regard to repairs and whether or not there has been any neglect or default on the part of the tenant under para. (b) of the sched. I to the Act of 1933. For these reasons I agree that there should be a new trial as proposed by my Lord.

THOMAS v. HARRIS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Scott, Tucker and Cohen, L.JJ.), February 20, 1947.]

Contract—Equitable assignment—Erection of tombstone on father's grave—Assurance policies handed to son by father before his death, with request to erect tombstone and pay for it out of the policy moneys—Son's lien on policies for cost of tombstone.

B

A few months before his death, a father handed over certain life assurance policies to his son with a request that after his death the son should erect a tombstone for him and pay for it out of the assurance moneys. The son took the policies and paid the premiums to keep them up, and after his father's death he erected the tombstone as requested. In an action by the father's executrix and sole beneficiary for the return of the policies, the son contended that he had a lien on them for the amount paid for the tombstone :—

HELD : there was a binding contract between the father and the son involving an assignment of the policies by way of charge to the extent of the amount paid by the son for the tombstone.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from JUDGE TOPHAM, K.C., at Southampton County Court.

The plaintiff, as executrix of William Harris, brought an action against the deceased's son for the return of certain assurance policies issued in favour of the deceased and detained by the son. The defence was that the son had a lien on the policies for the amount paid by him in respect of a tombstone for the deceased. The judge found that there was a contract between the deceased and his son in regard to the erection of the tombstone, and he held that the son was entitled to be refunded out of the policy moneys.

C. A. Emanuel for the plaintiff.

E. S. Fay for the defendant.

F

SCOTT, L.J. : William Harris died on Nov. 27, 1944, having made a will dated June, 1937, appointing the present plaintiff sole executrix. Probate was granted in July, 1945. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant, who was the son of the deceased, detained certain life assurance policies issued by the Manchester Assurance Co. in favour of the deceased, and she claimed the return of the policies or their value and damages for detention. The defence was that the defendant had what he called a lien on the policies in respect of moneys paid by him which were chargeable against the estate of the deceased. The moneys in question were made the subject of a counterclaim by him. There were three items, the only relevant one being the third which was : "Stonemason's account in respect of tombstone and grave, £35 10s." The judge held that the defendant was entitled to the benefit of the assurance moneys to the extent of the tombstone and grave, and that is the only matter in controversy in this court. The deceased was looked after by a step-daughter whom he made executrix under his will by which he left all his property to her. Consequently, the defendant, the son, who had the policies in question in his possession and repaid himself out of the policy moneys for the amount he had paid for the tombstone, has to justify his action in doing so.

H

The whole question turns on what happened in July, 1944. The deceased was then a patient at the West End Institution and on July 29 his step-daughter at his request handed over the assurance policies in question to the son. The judge in his judgment made certain specific findings as to that occasion and as to a previous conversation between father and son. His judgment is short, and I will read the whole.

A I find that deceased in his lifetime asked the defendant to bury him and to erect a tombstone and to pay for it out of the assurance moneys, for which purpose he was to collect the papers. This he did, not knowing that deceased had left any will. I hold that defendant performed these services [i.e., the funeral and the erection of the tombstone] at the request of the deceased, implying an obligation to pay for the services. The direction to take the moneys out of the assurance policies created a charge or lien on the policies.

He therefore, held that the defendant had a lien on the policies for a sum which included the amount payable in respect of the tombstone.

B In my view, that judgment amounts to a finding that a contract was made in July, 1944, between the deceased and his son, and given effect to by the step-daughter, acting as agent for her father in the matter; that, under that oral contract, the son promised his father to see to his funeral and to erect the tombstone; and that, in consideration of that promise, the father, through the step-daughter, gave over the possession of the policies. That the father intended thereby to give to the son a charge on the policies is clear, and that charge would,

C I am satisfied, amount to an assignment in equity of the policies to the extent of the charge on them, and would, as an assignment, be binding on the estate in the hands of the executrix. That that was the nature of the bargain is proved by the fact that the son was given possession of the policies, took them away, and himself paid premiums on them to keep them up. In short, the transaction was a binding contract, made orally, involving an assignment of the policies by way of charge to the extent of the claim in question in respect of

D the tombstone. It follows, therefore, that the claim of the executrix for the amount deducted by the son from the policy moneys fails, because he was entitled to deduct them under the assignment and contract thereby made. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

TUCKER, L.J. : I agree. I read the judgment of the county court judge as amounting to a finding that there was a contract made between the deceased
E man and the defendant, partly oral and partly by conduct; that there was a request by the deceased in his lifetime to his son to erect a tombstone on his death; that there was a request by the deceased to the son, and an authority conferred by the deceased on the son, to collect the assurance policies, and an authority to him to repay himself the expenses of erecting the tombstone out of those policy moneys. I think that the defendant accepted that offer during the lifetime of the deceased when he collected the policies, and that he
F completed the acceptance of the offer on the death of the deceased by erecting the tombstone. The county court judge has held that the result of those words and that conduct was to create a contract involving an obligation on the part of the deceased to see that the son was paid out of the assurance moneys.

Counsel for the plaintiff has argued that on the evidence there was no intention on the part of the parties to enter into any binding contractual relationship.
G He says there was a mere request by a dying man to his son to put up a tombstone, and that the law will not infer from such a request any binding legal obligation. If the matter had stood there, there would have been a great deal to be said for that argument. In ordinary circumstances I do not think one would infer a binding legal contract if a father asks his son to put up a tombstone and the son, in duty bound, does so, but this case is very different, because I think the inference that the parties were contracting comes from the promise
H and authority conferred on the son to collect the assurance policies and pay himself out of them. In my view, that indicates that the father and the son were entering into an arrangement (which became perfected when the son carried out the father's request) whereby the son was to receive remuneration for the services which he performed pursuant to that request, and I agree that, the son having got possession of the assurance policies in those circumstances with the assent and by the authority of the deceased, the policies were charged to the extent specified in his favour. For those reasons, I agree that the appeal fails.

COHEN, L.J.: I agree. I read the evidence and the judge's judgment in the same sense as TUCKER, L.J., and, so interpreting them, I agree so entirely with his reasons that I do not find it necessary to add any of my own.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Workmen's Compensation—Course of employment—Accident on way to work—Contractual obligation to proceed by most expeditious route—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (c. 84), s. 1 (1).

B

A workman who lived at W. was employed to work at M., where the employers carried on their business. The terms of the employment were that the workman might, though it was not obligatory, travel from W. to M. by the 7.40 a.m. train from W., which arrived at M. at 8.15 a.m., and that he was to be paid as from 8 a.m. While proceeding one morning from W. station by the most expeditious route to his work he slipped and injured himself.

HELD: there was a contractual obligation imposed on the workman by the concession to go to his work as quickly as possible after arrival at M. station; the accident, therefore, arose "out of and in the course of the employment" within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 1 (1); and the workman was entitled to an award.

APPEAL by the workman from an award in favour of the employers made by His Honour JUDGE CLEMENTS at Margate County Court and dated Nov. 14, 1946. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD OAKSEY, L.J.

F

G. H. Crispin for the workman.

J. H. C. Goldie for the employers.

LORD OAKSEY, L.J.: This is an appeal by the workman from Margate county court the judge of which took the view that the case was covered by Allen v. Siddons (1). In Dec., 1945, the workman was engaged as a plasterer by the employers, who are a firm of builders and decorators. The workman lived at Whitstable and the employers were carrying on their business at Margate. The terms agreed upon were that the workman might travel from Whitstable to Margate by a train starting from Whitstable at 7.40 a.m. and arriving at Margate at 8.15 a.m. and was to be paid as from 8 a.m. On the morning in question, after he had arrived at Margate and was proceeding to his work—and it is agreed that we must treat it, for the purposes of this appeal, as if he were proceeding by the most expeditious route from Margate station—he slipped and injured himself.

H

The question is whether that accident arose "out of and in the course of" his employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 1 (1). In Allen v. Siddons (1), the workman was employed on the terms that he should be paid from 7 a.m. and that his hours began at that time, but in practice he was only bound to be at his work at 7.30 a.m., and he could get there in any way he pleased. He went, in fact, on a motor cycle and he was injured on his way to work. It was held, in accordance with a large number of cases which had decided that a man is not, as a general rule, in the course of his employment when he is on his way to work, that he was not entitled to succeed because he was not in the course of his employment. As LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN put it in Alderman v. Great Western Ry. Co. (2) ([1937] 2 All E.R. 408, at p. 412):

A The cases in which men are employed to work at a distance from their homes and have to find lodgings for themselves must be innumerable. Yet there is no case in the books, or at all events none was cited, in which such a one, meeting with an accident, when merely on his way to or from his work, has been held entitled to compensation. In order to entitle him to compensation in such a case, some other element must be present (involving the discharge of a contractual duty to the employer) which in law extends the course of his employment so as to include the moment of time when the accident occurred.

B Allen v. Siddons (1) was decided in accordance with that principle on the ground that the workman was only on his way to his work and was not performing any contractual obligation to the employer in getting to his work, although it was within the time of his work because he was paid from 7 a.m. and had not to be there until 7.30 a.m.

C On the other hand, in Blee v. London & North Eastern Ry. Co. (3), in which the dictum of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN which I have just read was cited, the facts were that a man in the service of a railway company was employed on the terms that after he had done his daily work he might be called out on any emergency for which the railway company desired him. If he was called out, it was his duty to go to the emergency as quickly as possible. On the night in question he was called out on an emergency, and he was proceeding as quickly as he could to the work when he was knocked down and injured. The county court judge in that case found that the accident occurred in the course of his employment. It was argued on behalf of the employers that he was just as much on the way to his work at that time as he would have been in an ordinary case where a man was going to his work, but the House of Lords held that, in the special circumstances of that case, because the emergency made it necessary for him to go as quickly as possible to his work although the particular route was not prescribed, going to such an emergency as quickly as possible was in the course of his employment. Adopting the words of LORD RUSSELL, another element was present involving the discharge of a contractual duty to the employer.

E In my opinion, this case falls within the principle of Blee's case (3) and the principle which has been laid down in a great number of other cases, namely, that it was in the course of the workman's employment because at the time he was performing a duty which he owed to his employer by virtue of his contract. There was an element present involving the discharge of a contractual duty to the employer. The permission to use the 7.40 a.m. train, although he was to be paid from 8 a.m. and the 7.40 a.m. train only arrived at 8.15 a.m., was a permission which involved the obligation to proceed as quickly as possible to his work by the most expeditious route after he had arrived at Margate at 8.15 a.m. It was in the performance of that duty of getting from Margate station to his work as quickly as possible that the workman was injured.

F In my opinion, this distinguishes the present case from Allen v. Siddons (1), where the man's only duty was to be at his work at 7.30 a.m., although he was paid from 7 a.m. He had no duty to proceed by any particular route, or particular way, or at a particular pace. Therefore, at the time he was injured there was no contractual obligation imposed on him. In the present case there was a contractual obligation imposed by the concession of going by the 7.40 a.m. train to go to his work as quickly as possible when he arrived at Margate station. For these reasons, I think the appeal must be allowed.

H MORTON, L.J. : I agree. At first sight this case bears a strong resemblance to Allen v. Siddons (1), and it is not surprising that the county court judge thought himself bound by that case, but I entirely agree, for the reasons given, that the present case is distinguishable from Allen v. Siddons (1), and falls within the principle laid down in Blee's case (3).

It was argued by counsel for the employers that in the present case there was no de facto control by the employers of the workman while he was walking to his place of work. In one sense that is true, because the employers were probably not on the spot at the time, but the same could be said of Blee's case (3), and I think the words LORD MAUGHAM used in that case are applicable also to the present case. LORD MAUGHAM said ([1937] 4 All E.R. 270, at p. 274):

We can test the view of the arbitrator by supposing that a superior officer of the company happened to meet the workman loitering on his way to the place or diverging from the proper route. Could not the officer properly have ordered the workman to proceed direct to the place to which he has been called? The circumstance as to payment affords, I think, a decisive answer in the affirmative.

So here, I think, it is clear that it would have been within the powers of the employers to direct the workman, if he was diverging from his route, to proceed to his place of work by the most expeditious route. I agree the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs.

MOTION for an order of certiorari.

On the application of a tenant, the Paddington and St. Marylebone Furnished Houses Rent Tribunal reduced the rent of certain premises. The landlords applied for an order of certiorari on the ground that the tribunal, in arriving at their decision, had not considered certain facts which they should have taken into account, and that there was no ground on which the tribunal could have reduced the rent to the amount fixed in their order. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

G. H. Crispin for the landlords.

The Attorney-General (Sir Hartley Shawcross, K.C.) and H. L. Parker for the tribunal.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: In this case the counsel for the landlords obtained an order for leave to move for a writ of certiorari to bring up and quash a decision of the Paddington and St. Marylebone Furnished Houses Rent Tribunal, which was set up under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946. Under that statute, the Minister of Health can appoint tribunals for different districts. Where a tribunal has been appointed the provisions of s. 2 take effect, and under that section either the landlord or the tenant of a furnished letting can refer the question to the tribunal to decide whether the rent paid is a fair and reasonable one or not. Section 2 provides:

(2) Where any contract to which this Act applies is referred to a tribunal, then, unless at any time before the tribunal have entered upon consideration of the reference it is withdrawn by the person or authority by whom it was made, the tribunal shall consider it and, after making such enquiry as they think fit, and giving to each party (and, if the house is one the general management whereof is vested in and exercisable by a housing authority, to that authority) an opportunity of being heard, or, in his option, of submitting representations in writing, shall approve the rent payable under the contract or reduce it to such sum as they may, in all the circumstances, think reasonable, or may, if they think fit in all the circumstances, dismiss the reference, and shall notify the parties and the local authority of their decision in each case.

- A It will be observed that this subsection leaves entirely to the discretion of the tribunal what rent is to be paid because that matter is to be what they think reasonable. There is no provision in the Act for any appeal either to this court or to any other tribunal, and it is a well-known principle of law that no appeal lies from a decision of a tribunal unless the right of appeal is given by statute.

- B Certiorari was moved in this case on the ground that the tribunal have not considered certain matters which they ought to have taken into account in determining whether or not a rent of £5 a week, which was the contract rent between the landlord and tenant, was a fair rent, and it is said there was no ground on which the tribunal could have reduced the rent to what they did, namely, £3 6s. That raises the whole question what are the grounds on which certiorari can be moved.

- C Certiorari is a very special remedy, and when it is sought in order to bring up the order of a judicial tribunal the question which has to be considered is whether or not the tribunal were acting within their jurisdiction. "Acting within their jurisdiction" is an expression which has been applied to more than one set of circumstances. It is, for instance, applied to a case where it is said that a court is not properly constituted. It may be that justices or other members of a court are alleged to be disqualified or to have a bias in the matter which should have resulted in their not sitting and in those circumstances this court has never hesitated to grant the writ to bring up the order to be quashed because the members of a tribunal had no jurisdiction to give a decision in the case, but it is very old and definite law that certiorari to quash proceedings only lies for want of jurisdiction or where the order is bad on its face. It may be bad on its face because, on looking at it, the court can see that the tribunal, in making it, acted outside their jurisdiction, or it may be shown that they decided some question which was not before them. Certiorari will lie for other purposes, such as removing cases for trial to the High Court, but to-day, we have only to consider whether or not this order is good on its face and whether it purports to decide a question which it was within the jurisdiction of the tribunal to decide.

- D Counsel for the landlords has cited to us a number of cases, but many of them I need not consider because they deal with mandamus and not certiorari, and entirely different considerations apply to mandamus from those which apply to certiorari. Where it has been shown that a tribunal have declined to consider matters which they ought to have considered, or have considered matters which they ought not to have considered, or have not decided the case according to law, this court has in many cases granted mandamus to the tribunal commanding them to hear and determine according to law. In this case no mandamus is sought, but what is said is that the order is bad because the tribunal have not taken into consideration matters which they ought to have taken into consideration.

- G In the most recent case, R. v. Minister of Health (1), GREER, L.J., in the Court of Appeal approved the statement of the law which is contained in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Vol. 9, para. 1493, and he said that the result of the cases is correctly summarised there. The paragraph is this :

- H Where the proceedings are regular upon their face and the magistrates had jurisdiction, the superior court will not grant the writ of certiorari on the ground that the court below has misconceived a point of law. When the court below has jurisdiction to decide a matter, it cannot be deemed to exceed or abuse its jurisdiction, merely because it incidentally misconstrues a statute, or admits illegal evidence, or rejects legal evidence, or misdirects itself as to the weight of the evidence, or convicts without evidence.

Those are all matters of appeal. They are not matters in respect of which certiorari will lie, nor are they matters which can be brought before the court on this proceeding merely because the statute gives no right of appeal. We are not concerned with the policy of the statute. We are not concerned with whether it would be a good thing or a bad thing if a right of appeal had been given. We have only to see whether this order is good on the face of it and whether it is an order which it is within the jurisdiction of the tribunal to make.

The main ground on which this application depends is that the chairman of the tribunal, having stated in his affidavit that the tribunal accepted that the figures adduced by the landlords represented the costs actually incurred by them, went on to say:

The tribunal was not in a position to form any judgment whether the rent of Flat No. 10 [the premises in question] bore a proper and fair proportion to the rents receivable in respect of the whole building or what would be a reasonable rent for the other flats. The tribunal, however, considered the cost reasonably involved in running this block of furnished flatlets as well as the value of the accommodation and services provided to this particular tenant.

As we have no jurisdiction to act as a court of appeal, it does not seem to me that it would be useful or desirable that I should express any opinion whether or not those were matters which ought or ought not to have been taken into account by the tribunal. On this application we cannot give a decision which would be binding on any other tribunal as to what they ought or ought not to take into account. Parliament has chosen to make them the absolute masters of the situation and to leave the decision of these cases to them without appeal, and we can only assume that they will act properly, but whether they do or not, it is not a matter on which it would be useful for us to give a decision because we have no power to control them as we have of controlling other inferior courts whose decisions we consider by way of appeal. Therefore, I do not propose to say whether I think they ought or ought not to have taken into account whether the rent of this particular flat "bore a proper and fair proportion to the rents receivable in respect of the whole building." We have only to see whether the order is or is not valid on its face. It is a perfectly good order on its face, and we have only then to consider whether it was within the jurisdiction of the tribunal to entertain this matter. It follows from the fact that the tribunal were exercising the functions with which they had been entrusted by the Act of Parliament that it must have been within their jurisdiction to consider it and to give a decision. What we are really being asked to say is either that they have misconstrued the statute or that they have rejected evidence or misdirected themselves in some way, but even if they came to a decision without evidence, that is not a matter on which certiorari can be granted, and it follows that this application must fail.

CASSELS, J.: My Lord has dealt with every point with which I should desire to deal, and I agree with the judgment.

HALLETT, J.: I agree, but there is one more point to which I should like to draw attention. In the chairman's affidavit he discloses that the tribunal refused to take into account items in respect of accountants' fees and solicitors' costs although they accepted that those items had, in fact, been incurred by the landlords. What LORD GODDARD, C.J., has said about our expressing no opinion on the other point, I have no doubt applies also to that. We are expressing no opinion whether the tribunal were right or wrong in refusing to take those items into account. We are merely saying that the legislature has not thought fit to constitute this or any other court an appellate body and we are not going to exceed our powers.

Application dismissed.

Re GOLDSMITH'S WILL TRUSTS, BRETT v. BINGHAM AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), February 25, 1947.]

Wills—Condition—Gift subject to condition precedent—Gift of freehold property after death of testator's widow, subject to payment of £800 to testator's estate within 6 months of testator's death—Whether time specified of the essence of the matter.

A By his will the testator gave to his wife a legacy of £1,000, a life interest in the income of all his real estate, and the residue of his personal estate, and, after her death, certain freehold property to B., subject to the payment by B. of £800 within 6 months of the testator's death to form part of the residuary estate. There was no express gift over of the property in question, but there was a gift over of the residuary estate after the widow's death. The testator died on Nov. 6, 1922, and the widow died on Dec. 7, 1945. On Mar. 5, 1946, B. offered to pay the sum of £800. The question was whether the gift took effect, notwithstanding that the condition as to payment had not been performed within the time specified :—

C HELD : on the true construction of the will, the time specified for the payment was of the essence of the matter, because the fulfilment of the condition would have provided a capital sum which, if invested, would produce income for the widow during her life, and, therefore, a performance after her death could not put the parties in the same position as if the will had been strictly complied with. Accordingly, in the events which had happened, the conditional devise had failed and the property had fallen into the testator's residuary estate.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether a gift subject to a condition precedent in the testator's will took effect notwithstanding that the condition had not been performed within the time specified in the will. The facts and the relevant clauses of the will appear in the judgment.

F A. F. Maurice Berkeley for the plaintiff.

C. D. Myles for the defendant, Bingham.

A. J. Belsham for the residuary devisee and legatee.

G WYNN-PARRY, J. : By his will dated Sept. 5, 1922, the testator, Ephraim Thomas Goldsmith, appointed the plaintiff, Charles Edward Brett, and the defendants, James Hobden and Henry Bingham, executors and trustees of his will. By cl. 2 he bequeathed to his wife the sum of £1,000 to be paid to her as soon as possible after his decease. By cl. 3 he gave, bequeathed and devised :

H . . . all my real estate and the residue of my personal estate as to freeholds and copyholds to the use of my trustees in fee and as to personal estate unto my trustees absolutely upon the following trusts : (a) To pay the net income thereof after payment of all rents, rates taxes expenses of management and such outgoings as in the opinion of my trustees are properly chargeable to income to my said wife during her life. (b) After her death to pay out of my personal estate [certain pecuniary legacies]. (c) As to my freehold house Mount Ephraim with the garden and the land (about 5 acres) used and occupied by me therewith upon trust after the death of my said wife for the said Charles Edward Brett during his life and upon his death upon trust for the said Arthur Thomas William Goldsmith in fee simple absolutely. (d) As to my freehold house Seaforth with garden and the land (about 20 acres) used and occupied therewith upon trust after the death of my said wife for the said Henry Bingham in fee simple but subject to the payment by him of the sum of £800 to my trustees within 6 months of my decease to form part of my residuary estate.

By para. (e) he dealt with a newly-built cottage adjoining the property dealt with in the preceding paragraph by devising it after the death of his wife to Edwin Leopold Message in fee simple, subject to this condition :

... subject to the payment by him of the sum of £200 to my trustees within 6 months of my decease to form part of my residuary estate.

He dealt with other properties in paras. (f) and (g), and in para. (h) he proceeded as follows :

And as to all the residue of my estate both real and personal not otherwise hereinbefore disposed of upon trust after the death of my said wife for the said James Hobden absolutely subject to payment of all death duties and other liabilities to which my estate may be subject with the exception mentioned in cl. 4 hereof.

By cl. 4 he provided :

I direct that all the gifts devisees and legacies contained in this my will are to be given and paid free of all duties except the devise to Henry Bingham and the devise to Edwin Leopold Message who are to be severally responsible for the estate succession and other duties (if any) accruing thereon respectively.

The testator died on Nov. 6, 1922, and the 6 months period mentioned in paras. (d) and (e) of cl. 3 of the will expired on May 6, 1923. On Dec. 7, 1945, his widow died. On Mar. 5, 1946, the defendant, Bingham, offered to the other executors a cheque for £800, which they refused. That offer, it will be observed, was made within 6 months of the death of the widow, but, of course, long after the expiration of the period of 6 months from the death of the testator.

Now the first question with which I am concerned is primarily one of construction, and for that purpose it is unnecessary for me to go into the evidence which has been read which deals with the circumstances, according to the recollections of the various deponents, in which it came about that the defendant, Bingham, did not offer payment of the £800 until 1946. The first question which is asked by the summons is :

Whether upon the true construction of the said will and in the events which have happened the conditional devise in cl. 3 (d) of certain freehold property known as "Seaforth" to the defendant Henry Bingham has failed and the said property from and after the death of the said testator's widow has fallen into and forms part of the residuary estate of the said testator and should be held in trust for the defendant James Edward Hobden absolutely [subject, of course, to the condition as to the payment of death duties and other liabilities in cl. 3 (h) of the will], or whether the devise is still operative and effective, in which case the property would now become available for the defendant, Bingham, subject to the payment by him of the £800.

The principle upon which the court has to proceed in considering a gift of this nature, subject to a condition which has not been performed or strictly performed, is stated by ROMER, J., in Re Goddwin (1) where he said ([1924] 2 Ch. 26, at p. 30) :

It is well settled by authority that where a gift in a will is made subject to a condition, even a condition precedent, to be performed within a specified time, but the condition is not in fact performed within that time, then, at any rate in the absence of an express gift over, it is always a question for the court to determine whether the time so specified was of the essence of the matter.

It will be observed that in the will before me there is no express gift over. ROMER, J., then proceeded (ibid., at pp. 30, 31) :

In determining that question the court must have regard to what was presumably the intention of the testator in inserting the condition, what it was that he desired to bring about or to guard against ; and if the court finds that a performance of the condition at a time subsequent to the expiration of the period fixed by the testator in substance provides for the very thing that the testator intended to provide for, so that all parties can be put in substantially the same position as they would have been in had the condition been performed within the proper time, time is not regarded as of the essence, and such performance is treated as a sufficient compliance with the condition.

In the case before ROMER, J., he had to consider the question that arose by reason of the failure by the widow of the testator, to whom he had bequeathed an annuity of £500 per annum, to perform the condition upon which that annuity was bequeathed, namely, to discharge his estate from a liability which he had incurred by a previous covenant to pay the lady an annuity of £70. ROMER, J., said ([1924] 2 Ch. 26, at p. 31) :

In the present case there can, I think, be no doubt that the only object of the testator in imposing the condition that the £70 annuity should be released was that the lady should not be paid both the annuity and the £70 a year . . . An execution of a release by her at the present time would, so far as the other parties are concerned, have precisely the same effect as though she had executed the release within the 6 months specified by the testator.

A In Re Packard (2), which was followed by ROMER, J., in Re Goodwin (1), SARGANT, J., having considered the decision of LORD THURLOW, L.C., in Taylor v. Popham (3), said ([1920] 1 Ch. 596, at p. 603) :

B But the really important thing is, that the language of the Lord Chancellor in Taylor v. Popham (3) is clearly not limited to cases as to release from debts or payment of money, but applies generally to the performance of a condition precedent outside the time mentioned in the will but under such circumstances that the parties can be placed in substantially the same position as if the terms of the will had been strictly complied with. It seems to me that there is nothing to show that the direction that the settlement should be executed within 12 months is more than a directory provision. It is not of the essence or the substance of the condition ; and it is quite clear that all the parties interested can be placed in precisely the same position as if the condition had been literally and accurately complied with, because the funds, which ought to have been settled within 12 months of the death of the testator, have throughout been treated as if they had been so settled, and they can be now settled in the way required, so that there will be a continuous settlement of the funds as from the death of the testator.

C I was also referred to Paine v. Hyde (4), but I think I can confine myself to the few more modern authorities to which I have already referred.

The question then arises : What is the effect of applying the principle that emerges from those two cases to the present case ? Turning back to the judgment of ROMER, J., in Re Goodwin (1), there is no express gift over in the present case, and, therefore, the question arises for the court to determine whether the time specified in cl. 3 (d) of the will is of the essence of the matter. The next point to which I have to direct my mind is : What is to be presumed to have been the intention of the testator in making that condition, if any such intention can be extracted from a fair reading of the will ? Counsel for the defendant, Bingham, intimated that he was not in a position to address any argument to me to the effect that the reference to "within 6 months of my decease" should be read as a reference to 6 months from the decease of the widow. The evidence which has been read to me was, to a certain extent, directed towards an attempt to suggest that there had been a slip in the drafting of the will. With that I am not concerned. I have to consider the will as it stands, and it is plain beyond doubt on the language of this will that both in paras (d) and (e) the condition is the payment of the specified sum of money within six months of the decease of the testator. It does not appear to me to be a case in which it is so clear that the testator has made a slip in his will that, although I cannot take it into account for the purpose of construing a gift, yet I ought to hesitate to impute to him a particular intention which can only be imputed to him upon the basis of the language that he has in fact used, language which, it is suggested, is plainly indicative of what he intended. There is room for speculation either way, and, therefore, my duty is to take the will as it stands and ask myself on the basis of the language which the testator has used what presumably was his intention. I think, giving the matter the best consideration I can, that, having regard to the language of this will, it must be treated that the testator intended the £800 mentioned in para. (d) and the £200 mentioned in para. (e) to be paid within 6 months of his death for the purpose of bringing about what was the necessary consequence of those payments, namely, an increase in the income of his estate which would have been invested and which would be income payable to his widow during her life. It was suggested with some ingenuity by counsel for the defendant, Bingham, that the object really was to produce within 6 months of the death of the tenant for life a fund which would be sufficient to discharge the pecuniary legacies payable under cl. 3 (b) on the death of the widow. That was countered with at least equal ingenuity by counsel for the residuary legatee who pointed out that by cl. 2 of the will there was a bequest to the widow of a sum of £1,000 which at least represented the total of the two sums of £800 and £200 referred to in paras. (d) and (e) of cl. 3. It is to be observed that the amount of the pecuniary legacies is less than the total of those two sums. With regard to the other argument, it will be observed that, whereas that total more than represents the amount of the pecuniary legacies, the direction in cl. 2 is to pay the wife a certain sum as soon as possible after the decease of the testator. I do not think I can place great weight on either argument, but I cannot disregard the consequence that the fulfilment of either of the conditions in question would have been the provision of a capital sum which, if invested, would have produced income which would have been available to augment the amount payable to the widow during the rest of her life.

Having arrived at that point, I again refer to the statement of principle by ROMER, J., in Re Goodwin (1). He said ([1924] 2 Ch. 26, at pp. 30, 31):

... if the court finds that a performance of the condition at a time subsequent to the expiration of the period fixed by the testator in substance provides for the very thing that the testator intended to provide for, so that all parties can be put in substantially the same position as they would have been in had the condition been performed within the proper time, time is not regarded as of the essence, and such performance is treated as a sufficient compliance with the condition.

At the same time, I have in mind the observation of SARGANT, J., in Re Packard (2) where he said ([1920] 1 Ch. 596, at p. 603):

... the language of the Lord Chancellor in Taylor v. Popham (3) is clearly not limited to cases as to release from debts or payment of money, but applies generally to the performance of a condition precedent outside the time mentioned in the will but under such circumstances that the parties can be placed in substantially the same position as if the terms of the will had been strictly complied with.

It is clear that a performance of the condition at this date cannot result in placing these parties in the same position as if the terms of the will had been strictly complied with, for within the phrase "the parties" must be included the life tenant, i.e., the widow, who is now dead. It, therefore, seems to me to follow that, taking the view of the will that I do, I cannot proceed on the basis of attributing no intention to the testator. This is a case in which, applying the principle underlying Re Packard (2) and Re Goodwin (1), I am not able to say that time is not of the essence.

Accordingly, it follows, in my view, that question 1 of the summons must be answered by declaring that, on the true construction of the will and in the events which have happened, the conditional devise of the property in question has failed and the property has fallen into and forms part of the residuary estate of the testator.

Declaration accordingly.

PHOENIX ASSURANCE CO., LTD. v. MINISTER OF TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Henn Collins, J.), February 12, 13, 14, 20, 1947.]

Town and Country Planning—War damage—Re-development of land—Compulsory purchase—Order by Minister—Powers of Minister—Town and Country Planning Act, 1944 (c. 47), s. 1 (1).

Before the Minister of Town and Country Planning makes an order under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944, s. 1 (1), declaring land shown to have sustained war damage, with or without other land contiguous or adjacent thereto, to be subject to compulsory purchase he must be satisfied on reasonable grounds that such an order is requisite for the purposes to which the section refers. The matter is not so peculiarly within the administrative capacity of the Minister that the making of the order is purely a matter for his discretion so that a court of law cannot inquire into the grounds on which he satisfied himself or call his jurisdiction into question.

Liversidge v. Anderson ([1941] 3 All E.R. 338) distinguished.

[EDITORIAL NOTE.] This case, with Franklin v. Minister of Town and Country Planning (ante, p. 396), decided under the New Towns Act, 1946, limits the powers of the Minister of Town and Country Planning when making orders under that Act and the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944, in the same manner as that in which the powers of the Minister of Health under the Housing Acts have been restricted: in relation to the confirmation of clearance and compulsory purchase orders. The wording of the several statutes differ. Under the Housing Acts the Minister "may" confirm an order after he has considered any objection. Under the Act of 1944 he may make an order where he is "satisfied that it is requisite," while under the Act of 1946 he must be "satisfied that it is expedient." In Errington v. Minister of Health ([1935] 1 K.B. 249; 99 J.P. 15) the Court of Appeal held that the Minister exercised a quasi-judicial function in confirming a clearance order under the Housing Acts, and that decision has been accepted and applied in a number of cases ranging from Offer v. Minister of Health ([1936] 1 K.B. 40) and Horn v. Minister of Health ([1937] 1 K.B. 164; 100 J.P. 463) to the recent Price v. Minister of Health (ante, p. 47) and Summers v. Minister of Health (ante, p. 184). Unless the decisions in Franklin v. Minister of Town and Country Planning and the present case are reversed on appeal, it must now be taken that the same principle governs the exercise by the Minister of Town and Country Planning of his powers under the Acts of 1944 and 1946. A distinction is drawn between the Housing and Town Planning legislation and such a provision as that of reg. 18B of the Defence Regulations which empowered the Home Secretary to make a detention order against any person whom he had "reasonable cause to believe to be of hostile origin or associations." Under that regulation the matter was held to be purely one for the executive discretion of the Home Secretary who could not be called on to give the grounds on which he had reasonable cause of belief: see Liversidge v. Anderson ([1941] 3 All E.R. 338). The distinction is based on the fact that Defence Regulation 18B was a temporary measure designed to meet a national emergency, while the Housing Acts and those of 1944 and 1946 are part of the ordinary statute law, and also on the inclusion in those statutes of provisions relating to the holding of public inquiries and the consideration of objections by the Minister. If, it is said, the questions under the Acts of 1944 and 1946 fall to be decided simply in the executive discretion of the Minister all mention of inquiries and consideration of objections was in practice a mere waste of paper.

APPLICATION to quash an order made under s. 1 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944. The facts appear in the judgment.

J. Scott Henderson, K.C., and J. T. Molony for the applicants.

The Attorney-General (Sir Hartley Shawcross, K.C.) and H. L. Parker for the Minister of Town and Country Planning (respondent).

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 20. HENN COLLINS, J., read the following judgment. In this case the applicants apply to quash the order made by the Minister of Town and Country Planning on Nov. 6, 1946, entitled the City of Plymouth (City Centre) Declaratory Order, 1946, on the ground that, so far as it relates to the property of the applicants, there was no jurisdiction under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944, to make it.

The matter arises in this way. There has been extensive war damage in the city of Plymouth, and the local planning authority, taking advantage of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944, applied to the Minister for an order declaring the area of the city which was delineated in their application to be subject to compulsory purchase. Within that area the property of the applicants lies. It has suffered no war damage, and the plan which the local authority put forward for dealing with the whole area which they are seeking to make subject to compulsory purchase discloses that they intend to leave the applicants' building standing, and to leave it abutting on a public road though that road is to be laid out afresh and widened by taking in land from the side of the existing road remote from the applicants' building. The evidence given on behalf of the local authority at the public inquiry, which has been made available on this motion, amply bears that out. The local authority desire to have the whole area over which their plan extends in one ownership and to take advantage of the fact that compulsory purchase will enable them to buy more cheaply than they could buy in an open market, but do not propose to do anything with the building other than to apply it to its present uses. The applicants say that in that state of things there is no jurisdiction in the Minister to accede to the application, so far as it relates to the applicants' property, to make the declaratory order of which they complain.

The power conferred upon the Minister in this behalf is to be found in s. 1 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944. The subsection is in these terms :

Where the Minister of Town and Country Planning (in this Act referred to as "the Minister") is satisfied that it is requisite, for the purpose of dealing satisfactorily with extensive war damage in the area of a local planning authority, that a part or parts of their area, consisting of land shown to his satisfaction to have sustained war damage or of such land together with other land contiguous or adjacent thereto, should be laid out afresh and redeveloped as a whole, an order declaring all or any of the land in such a part of their area to be land subject to compulsory purchase for dealing with war damage may be made by the Minister if an application in that behalf is made to him by the authority before a time limited in the Act. Under that subsection the Minister must satisfy himself that there has been extensive war damage in the area, and that war-damaged property, with or without contiguous or adjacent land, requires to be laid out afresh, before he can make the declaratory order. So much is common ground, and it is not disputed by the applicants that their property is adjacent to the damaged area, but they say that the Minister must satisfy himself of all the matters mentioned in the subsection in respect of each piece of property to which the order is to apply, and they contend, first and foremost, that he must do so on reasonable grounds. It is on this last contention that the matter was mainly contested.

On the part of the Minister it was urged that the satisfaction of the Minister on the various matters about which he has to make up his mind is that which founds his jurisdiction to make the declaratory order, and that his satisfaction—for which I will substitute the word "opinion" lest I seem to be disrespectful—his opinion is a matter so peculiarly within his personal, or, at any rate, his administrative, capacity that, as in Liversidge v. Anderson (1) the making of the order is a matter for his executive discretion, and that, therefore, a court of law cannot inquire into the grounds on which he satisfied himself or call his jurisdiction in question. Support for that argument was sought by reference to s. 1 (7), which provides that, if the Minister is satisfied that the materials supplied to him by the local authority are adequate for enabling the expediency of making an order to be considered, certain preliminary steps shall be taken. The emphasis was on the word "expediency," but I do not think this furthers the argument at all. Indeed, I think it tends rather the other way. The local authority would, indeed, have a poor case if they could not show that it was even expedient, let alone requisite, that the order should be made, and I do not think the use of the word "expediency" in that subsection weakens or colours the word "requisite" in subs. (1). The preliminary steps to which I have referred include publication by Gazette and local advertisement of a notice describing the land to which the application relates, stating that an application for an order under the Act is about to be considered by the Minister, or naming a place where a copy of the application and relevant maps and descriptive matter may be seen. A notice is also to be served on such persons as the Minister may specify, and thereupon, if any objection is duly raised to the application, the provisions of sched. I are to apply.

Pausing there for a moment, those provisions make it appear that the public notice is definitive, not only of the general scope, but also of the details, of the proposed lay-out at least so far as the local authority is concerned, and that it is only in relation to that particular lay-out that powers are sought, and they cannot, by embracing in the scheme property which, in fact, falls outside the provisions of s. 1, get compulsory powers over it on the ground that their plans might hereafter be modified so as to bring the property within the provisions of s. 1. They could not, for instance, say that their submitted plan may hereafter be so altered that the new road will run through, and not in front of, the applicants' property, and so justify the expediency of their scheme as regards the applicants' building. Whether the Minister can do so is another matter.

A That depends on the more basic question which I have formulated, but, for the moment, I am only saying that I find no support in s. 1 (7) for the argument that the Minister's "satisfaction" is a matter of executive discretion. It is, however, worth observing that, by para. 3 (b) of sched. I, once a declaratory order is made, objection to a compulsory purchase order in respect of any property may be treated as irrelevant, with the result that, though by some alteration of the lay-out on which the application for powers was founded the land in question has ceased to satisfy the requirements of s. 1, it can be acquired compulsorily.

B This observation has, I think, a double bearing. The Attorney-General would have it that any planning must at all times be fluid, and that it was, therefore, necessary to read s. 1 as giving the Minister, as the ultimate arbiter, a purely executive discretion. I think there are limits, so far as objectors are concerned, to its fluidity. The other bearing is this. The statute is one which C impinges on the right of the owners of property, it may be very heavily, as in the instance I have given. It is, therefore, to be read rather in favour of the individual than against him. No such considerations as those present in Liversidge v. Anderson (1) are present. This is not a measure by way of preventing a public danger when the safety of the State is involved, and considerations which operated in that decision have no place in this matter.

D The presumption is, therefore, rather against the argument on behalf of the Minister than in favour of it. There are certainly no express words which compel the construction he contends for unless they are the words "where the Minister is satisfied that it is requisite." I think that those words prima facie mean satisfied on reasonable grounds of the facts to which the section refers. The existence of war damage is not a matter of opinion, nor is the question whether land is to be laid out afresh, and I have given the grounds for my opinion that the proposed plan is that from which the requirement for a fresh lay-out is to be deduced. Furthermore, when one turns to sched. I, one finds that a code is laid down for dealing with objections which are not withdrawn. Although in some cases, as provided by para. 4, the Minister may decide to overrule the objection without more material from the objector than his written objections, yet para. 5 provides that the Minister shall, subject to the foregoing, afford the objector an opportunity of appearing and being heard by a

E F person appointed for the purpose and shall afford the same opportunity on the same occasion to the authority making the application, and, finally, that he may, by para. 6, order a public inquiry. Why is he required by statute to hear objections or to hear both sides if he hears one, if his functions are purely executive? A careful executive officer would, no doubt, avail himself of all these facilities to help him in his decision, but why should the legislation have made it incumbent on him if in the last resort he can properly form his opinion without any grounds at all? It seems to me little to the point to say that a responsible Minister will not act or form an opinion on insufficient grounds, for it is clear to me on the evidence adduced on one side or the other on the motion that he has done so in this case. The applicants' property is not to be laid out afresh, and there is no evidence before me that it requires to be. Though the Attorney-General stated that the Minister did not wholly accept the lay-out propounded by the

G H local authority, he did not go the length of saying that this particular land required to be laid out afresh, nor was any evidence adduced on the part of the Minister to that effect.

The argument on behalf of the Minister really amounts to this, that s. 1 means that, if the planning authority have made an application which conforms to and have taken the steps required by s. 1 (4), (5) and (6), the Minister may, in his absolute discretion, make a declaratory order in respect of all or any of the land embraced by the application. Those, however, are not the words of the section, and, in my judgment, that is not what it means. For these reasons

I think the order should be quashed so far as it relates to the property of the applicants, with costs.

Order quashed.

Re BALL, HAND v. BALL.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), January 21, 1947.]

Wills—Construction—“Dependants.”

There is not sufficient certainty about the word “dependants” in a will to enable a court to give effect to it.

[AS TO “DEPENDANTS,” see WORDS AND PHRASES, Vol. 2, pp. 68, 69.]

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine a question arising under the will of Charles Cornelius Jannaway Ball. By his will, made on Oct. 7, 1935, the testator gave a freehold house and his furniture to his wife during her widowhood and after her death or remarriage to his son, Charles Ball, “or his dependants equally.” The testator died on Nov. 11, 1940, and his son, Charles, died intestate on Dec. 11, 1940, leaving a widow and three children. The testator’s widow died on Apr. 3, 1945. The house and furniture had been sold and the question was who was entitled to the proceeds.

L. R. Norris for the executrix.

A. A. Baden Fuller for the son’s children.

R. L. Stone for the son’s widow.

ROXBURGH, J.: I now have to determine the destination of the proceeds of the sale of the house and the furniture, having regard to the fact that the son survived the testator but predeceased the testator’s widow.

It is surprising that the word “dependants” has, apparently, not been considered in any reported case on the construction of a will. It has been given statutory definition in the Workmen’s Compensation Act, 1925, s. 4, and in the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, s. 1, but those two definitions are mutually exclusive and that shows that I could not apply either of them as a suitable definition for the word “dependants” in a will. Counsel for the three children of the son, Charles, has suggested two possible definitions. First: “A person who to some extent depends on others for the provision of the ordinary necessities of life,” and, secondly: “A person to some extent maintained by another.” If that is the best that can be done in the way of definition—and I have no reason to think that anything better can be done—there is not sufficient certainty about the word “dependants” in a will to enable the court to give effect to it. Therefore, as the gift to “dependants” in the present case is a substitutionary gift and is, in my judgment, incapable of taking effect, the gift to the son, Charles Ball, takes effect as an absolute and indefeasible gift, and I so hold.

Declaration accordingly. Costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client in due course of administration.

A In an action by landlords claiming (i) arrears of rent (amounting to over £370) under a lease and mesne profits, and (ii) recovery of possession of premises which were within the Rent Restrictions Acts, judgment was given for the landlords. The tenant contended that, since the action was brought in the High Court, the landlords were not entitled to costs by reason of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 17 (2).

B HELD : (i) the claim, being for arrears of rent under a lease, arose out of the lease and not out of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, and was for a sum beyond the limit of the jurisdiction of the county court, and, therefore, it could not have been brought in the county court, notwithstanding that the premises were within the Rent Restrictions Acts, and an action for possession alone should have been brought in the county court.

C (ii) Section 17 (2) of the Act of 1920 applied only to cases where the whole claim arose out of the Act, and it did not, therefore, apply to this claim.

E ACTION by landlords claiming (i) arrears of rent under a lease and mesne profits, and (ii) recovery of possession of composite premises (i.e., a house and claimed was over £370. Judgment was given for the plaintiffs and the question arose whether, since the action was brought in the High Court, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover costs by virtue of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 17 (2).

H. C. Leon for the plaintiffs.

H. V. Lloyd-Jones for the defendant.

F HILBERY, J. : The last question which arises is one on the question of costs. Counsel for the defendant contends that, as this action is one to recover possession of premises which are within the Rent & Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, since the action is brought in the High Court, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover any costs. That, he says, is by virtue of s. 17 (2), of the Act, which provides :

G A county court shall have jurisdiction to deal with any claim or other proceedings arising out of this Act or any of the provisions thereof, notwithstanding that by reason of the amount of claim or otherwise the case would not but for this provision be within the jurisdiction of a county court, and, if a person takes proceedings under this Act in the High Court which he could have taken in the county court, he shall not be entitled to recover any costs.

H Counsel for the defendant argued that, as this case involves an application for possession of the premises and is a proceeding arising out of the Act or any of the provisions of it—though, like SCRUTTON, L.J. (in Russoff v. Lipovitch (1))
I cannot discover why both these phrases are used, since a proceeding cannot arise out of the Act except because of the provisions of it—the county court has jurisdiction, notwithstanding that, by reason of the amount of claim or otherwise, the case would not, but for this provision, be within the jurisdiction of a county court.

I do not think Russoff v. Lipovitch (1) determines the point I have to decide, namely, whether this action arises out of the provisions of the Act. It is true that, if this action had been a claim for possession of the premises, since the premises are within the Act, the decision of Russoff v. Lipovitch (1) would have decided the matter and it must have been held by me that it was a claim or other proceeding arising out of the Act, but this action was for two things. It was an action claiming, in the first place, the arrears of rent and mesne profits, to the extent of the amount for which I have had to give judgment, £445 by the time of the trial and £370 2s. 6d. at the date of the writ. That was not a claim which arose out of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. It arose out of the lease, and could never have been brought in the county court because it was outside the amount which is the limit of the jurisdiction of the county court. The claim for possession was a claim which the county court could have entertained, and which the county court alone should have entertained if it had stood alone, but the action was for arrears of rent and, in the second place, for possession, and, although the premises are within the Act, and, therefore, the claim in respect of the possession arises out of the Act, yet, as the claim for the rent arises out of the lease, the whole action is not one to which s. 17 (2) applies. That sub-section applies to a claim or proceeding arising out of the Act and provides that the county court shall have jurisdiction to deal with such a claim. It is true that the sub-section gives the county court jurisdiction to deal with such a claim, notwithstanding that, by reason of the amount of the claim or otherwise, the county court would not otherwise have jurisdiction. It is the amount of the claim arising out of the Act which, if in excess of the county court jurisdiction, is not to prevent the county court having jurisdiction. That sub-section deals with a case where the whole claim arises out of the Act.

In my view, therefore, this claim cannot be said to be within that sub-section, and there must be judgment for the plaintiffs for costs.

[King's Bench Division (Lewis, J.), February 6, 7, 12, 13, 1947.]

Agency—Remuneration—Commission—Estate agent—Contract to pay commission on introduction of "party prepared to purchase"—Willing purchaser found—Vendor's refusal to complete.

A firm of estate agents, having received instructions to sell a house, sent to the intended vendor printed terms of commission containing reference only to commission on sales and lettings, with a covering letter stating that there was enclosed "a copy of our terms of commission which are on the usual scale and which would become payable by you in the event of our being instrumental in introducing a party prepared to purchase on the terms of your instructions or on terms acceptable to you." The agents obtained a prospective purchaser and terms were agreed, but the vendor withdrew before the contract was signed.

HELD: the contract being for the payment of commission on the introduction, not of a purchaser in the sense of a person ultimately purchasing, but of a person prepared to purchase, the agents were entitled to their commission.

ACTION tried by LEWIS, J.

The plaintiffs who were estate agents, claimed from the defendant commission on a contract to obtain a prospective purchaser for the sale of a house. The facts appear in the judgment.

John Busse for the plaintiffs.

B. M. Goodman for the defendant.

LEWIS, J.: The plaintiffs are the well-known firm of Giddys, who are auctioneers and estate agents, and the defendant is Mrs. Horsfall, a widow, of "Redlands," Maidenhead Court, Berkshire. The plaintiffs sue her for commission which they allege to be due to them in respect of certain work which they say they did for her under a contract in relation to the house, "Redlands," in which Mrs. Horsfall still, apparently, lives.

THE statement of claim puts the plaintiffs' case in three different ways. First, it is said that there was an agreement to pay commission amounting to £136 5s. 0d. on certain terms and that there has been a breach of the agreement, and that amount, the work having been done by the plaintiffs to earn that commission, the defendant has not paid. Alternatively, the plaintiffs say that they are entitled to that sum as a reasonable amount for their work and labour in and about negotiations for the sale of "Redlands," and in the further alternative they plead that they are entitled to a sum, preferably the same sum by way of damages on the ground that the defendant prevented them from earning their commission under the contract which it is said they entered into. But shortly, the issue I have to try is whether the plaintiffs are right in saying that a contract was entered into with the defendant under which she agreed to pay the plaintiffs commission at a certain rate and according to a certain scale if they introduced to her a person who was ready and willing to purchase the house, "Redlands," at a price acceptable to the defendant and on the agreed terms and conditions as to possession and other similar things. There is no dispute about the figures. The sum claimed, £136 5s. 0d., is agreed as a figure, so that, if the plaintiffs are right in their contention as to what the contract was and in saying that they did what they were employed to do, there is no question that they are entitled to that amount. Put, again, shortly, the defendant's answer to the claim of the plaintiffs is this: "I never agreed, as you said I did. In so far as the written documents are concerned, they do not mean what you, the plaintiffs, say they mean, and you have not done, on my interpretation of the contract, what you undertook to do, and I do not owe you anything."

[HIS LORDSHIP said that the defendant wished to sell her house "Redlands," and she approached the plaintiffs with that object. A representative of the plaintiffs viewed the premises and a figure of £6,000 was mentioned. He continued:—] On June 12, 1945, after the inspection of the house the plaintiffs wrote a letter to the defendant referring to the interview they had had with her. The last paragraph of the letter, it is said, contains the terms on which the plaintiffs undertook the business. That paragraph says this:

We take this opportunity of enclosing herewith a copy of our terms of commission which are on the usual scale and which would become payable by you in the event of our being instrumental in introducing a party prepared to purchase on the terms of your instructions or on terms acceptable to you.

Enclosed in that letter was a printed document headed "Terms of Commission," and in that document there is no reference to any commission payable to the agents except on sales or lettings and so on—nothing which suggests that the plaintiffs would be entitled to any commission unless the matter went through. On receipt of that letter and enclosure the defendant did nothing. She did not write accepting it and she did not write quarrelling with it.

One of the matters I have to decide is what the last paragraph of the letter of June 12 means. Having arrived at the proper construction to put on it, I have to enquire whether what happened afterwards amounted to a performance by the plaintiffs of what they were to do. [HIS LORDSHIP said that the price at which the property was to be offered was reduced on the plaintiffs' advice to £5,250 and later to £4,950, to which figure the defendant agreed. A Mrs. Stow made an offer to the plaintiffs to purchase at the latter price "subject to contract," but when the defendant was informed she said she required £5,250.

The plaintiffs were able to obtain Mrs. Stow's acceptance of the increased figure and she paid a deposit, but, after certain negotiations as to the date of possession, the defendant informed the plaintiffs that she was not prepared to proceed with the sale.] There was, undoubtedly, an agreement by the defendant to sell this property for £5,250 with vacant possession on Sept. 30. The defendant backed out of it. It was, no doubt, as between the defendant and Mrs. Stow, an agreement from which the defendant was entitled to back out, because she had stipulated that the agreement should be subject to contract and no contract had been prepared or completed. That, however, is not the question I have to decide. I have to decide whether the plaintiffs have earned their commission. That depends, of course, on what the terms of the contract with regard to commission were. A

It is said on certain authorities which are well known, particularly Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (1) in the House of Lords, that when a commission is to be payable on introducing a purchaser something more may have to be done than merely producing a person who is prepared to purchase. The use of the phrase "the purchaser" contemplates a sale and the commission agent is not entitled to his commission unless the person he puts forward as a prospective purchaser does purchase, but in the present case, on the terms of the last paragraph of the letter of June 12, that was not the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant. The agreement is contained in this paragraph: B

We [i.e., the plaintiffs] take this opportunity of enclosing herewith a copy of our terms of commission which are on the usual scale and which would become payable by you in the event of our being instrumental in introducing a party prepared to purchase on the terms of your instructions or on terms acceptable to you. C

It does not say: "The commission will be payable in the event of Messrs. Giddys introducing a purchaser." It says: "Introducing a party prepared to purchase on the terms" laid down. In my view, there is a wide difference between a contract which contains a clause "commission is due on my introducing a purchaser" and "commission is due on my introducing a person who is ready and willing to purchase on your conditions." In the latter case, so long as the person produced is a willing purchaser or is prepared to be a willing purchaser on the terms set out, the estate agents have earned their commission, whether or not there is a sale to that person. I am satisfied that that is the right view to take of the construction of that contract and one which is supported by Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (1), which was considered in Jones v. Lowe (2), in what with respect I venture to think was an admirably clear judgment of HILBERY, J. He pointed out passages in their Lordships' speeches which bear out the proposition that there can be a contract by a would-be vendor with estate agents to this effect: "I will pay you commission if you will introduce a person who is prepared to purchase," on certain terms. That is a different contract from one in which a house agent says: "I will introduce to you a purchaser and then I am entitled to my commission." In the latter case he has not introduced a purchaser until the person introduced has purchased. The latter does not become a purchaser until the sale is complete, and it is a very different matter from agreeing to pay a commission to an estate agent if he produces a would-be purchaser. That distinction was pointed out in Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (1), and I would refer to the passages in their Lordships' opinions which HILBERY, J., cited in Jones v. Lowe (2). HILBERY, J., said ([1945] 1 K.B. at p. 75): D E F G

It seems to me hard, if an agent has done to the full extent what the parties contemplated that he should do, that he should not be entitled to say: "I have done what I contracted to do because I have introduced someone willing to purchase although he never in fact has become the actual purchaser." I do not feel, however, that it is open to me to put that construction on the words of the contract in the present case [the words of the contract in that case were: "in the event of my introducing a purchaser"] because I think that the observations made in the House of Lords, and particularly those of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN and LORD ROMER, in Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (1) show that they were clearly of opinion that if an agent is employed to introduce a purchaser for a house and before the purchaser has entered into a binding and legal contract, the house is withdrawn from the market, the agent cannot say that he has earned his commission. LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN said: "I do not assent to the view, which I think was the view of the majority in the first Trollope case (3), that a mere promise by a property owner to an agent to pay him a commission if he introduces a purchaser for the property at a specified price, or at a H minimum price, ties the owner's hands, and compels him (as between himself and the agent) to bind himself contractually to sell to the agent's client who offers that price, with the result that if he refuses the offer he is liable to pay the agent a sum equal to or less than the amount of the commission either (a) on a quantum meruit or (b) as damages for breach of a term to be implied in the commission contract. As to the claim on a quantum meruit, I do not see how this can be justified in the face of the express provision for remuneration which the contract contains."

A A little later on HILBERY, J., still citing the speech of LORD RUSSELL OF KILL-OWEN, says ([1945] 1 K.B. at p. 76):

Later in his speech, LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN said: "It is possible that an owner may be willing to bind himself to pay a commission for the mere introduction of one who offers to purchase at the specified or minimum price; but such a construction of the contract would in my opinion require clear and unequivocal language." There, again, having regard to the former passage I have read, the learned lord is drawing a distinction between the case of "introducing a purchaser" and one in which the contract is for the introduction of a person who is "willing to buy." LORD ROMER was clearly of the same opinion as LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN. He said: "Where an owner of property employs an agent to find a purchaser, which must mean at least a person who enters into a binding contract to purchase, is it an implied term of the contract of agency that, after the agent has introduced a person who is ready, willing, and able to purchase at a price assented to by the principal, the principal shall enter into a contract with that person to sell at the agreed price subject only to the qualification that he may refuse to do so if he has just cause or reasonable excuse for his refusal?"

C In that passage LORD ROMER is again contrasting the situation of an agent employed to find a purchaser who becomes entitled to his commission on introducing a purchaser who enters into a binding contract with that of an agent who has only got so far as to find someone who is ready, willing and able to purchase, and his observations afford the clearest indication that he was of the same opinion as LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN.

D Those decisions make it clear that in a case like the present before an agent is entitled to get his commission from the vendor it must be clearly shown that the contract was: "I, the agent, am entitled to get my commission if I introduce to you somebody who is able and willing and is prepared to buy your house." If, however, that is the form of contract, it is not necessary that the person introduced by the agent should become the actual purchaser or enter into a binding contract to purchase.

E The question I have to ask myself, if that is a correct statement of the law, as I understand it to be, is: Is this contract clear? It is said that the last paragraph of the letter of June 12 is not clear. It is suggested that the result of the enclosure in that letter of the printed document containing the terms of commission (which were only applicable to commission paid on sales), and of reading that document with the last paragraph of the letter is that it is not clear that the estate agents were saying: "We shall earn our commission if we introduce to you a person who is willing to purchase."

F I have considered that particular clause and it seems to me it is perfectly clear. It says: "We take this opportunity of enclosing herewith a copy of our terms of commission which are on the usual scale." If the paragraph had ended there, the recipient of that letter would immediately have seen that certain percentages on the price or rent obtained were charged for selling or letting. That would be saying: "We, the estate agents, do not claim our commission unless there is a sale or, in the case of a letting, there is a letting—a sale to a person we have introduced, or a letting to a person we have introduced."

G If, as I say, the last paragraph of the letter of June 12 had ended where I broke off, a great deal might be said for the contention that the plaintiffs earned their commission only if there were a sale, but the paragraph goes on, and, I venture to think, underlines the position clearly: "[the commission] would become payable by you in the event of our being instrumental in introducing

H a party prepared to purchase on the terms of your instructions." It does not say: "would become payable by you in the event of our being instrumental in introducing a purchaser." Then it might very well be said, on the authority of the case in the House of Lords, that that means a purchaser who actually either purchases or, at all events, enters into a binding contract to purchase. It might be the fact that, as Mrs. Stow did not, in fact, purchase and did not even enter into a binding contract, the plaintiffs should be held to be wrong, but looking at that paragraph, I think it is abundantly clear that the plaintiffs were saying: "The scale commission—the arithmetic of it—is to be found on the printed circular which we enclose, and commission at that rate will be payable by you if we introduce a bona fide person who is prepared to pay and is capable of paying the price you are asking for 'Redlands.' " Mrs. Stow was perfectly able and willing and capable. She was anxious to buy and I am constrained to say that the plaintiffs are entitled to the commission which they claim. Therefore, there will be judgment for the amount of £136 5s. 0d.

STARKEY v. WHITWICH COLLIERY CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Scott and Somervell, L.JJ. and Romer, J.), January 15, 16, 17, February 26, 1947.]

Workmen's Compensation—Termination of compensation—Objection by workman—Reference to medical referee—Medical referee's certificate—Interpretation by registrar—Arbitration proceedings started by workman—Jurisdiction of judge to entertain pending decision by registrar—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (c. 84), ss. 12 (3), 19 (2).

On Jan. 26, 1945, employers served on a workman notice under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 12 (3), of their intention to terminate, on grounds set out in an accompanying doctor's certificate, weekly payments which were being made to him in respect of injuries sustained as the result of an accident while in their employment. On Jan. 29, notice was given by the workman objecting to the termination, accompanied by a doctor's certificate disagreeing with the employers' doctor. On Feb. 16, an application, signed by both parties, was made to the court for a reference to a medical referee under s. 19 (2) of the Act, and on Feb. 24 the employers paid into court a sum representing the disputed compensation. On Mar. 3, the medical referee's certificate was given, and on Mar. 23, the employers applied to the registrar for repayment of the amount in court on the ground that, according to the certificate, the workman was no longer incapacitated. At the request of the workman, who disagreed with this interpretation of the certificate, the registrar postponed indefinitely the hearing of the employers' application. On Oct. 25, 1945, the workman started arbitration proceedings, but the county court judge refused a hearing on the ground that he had no jurisdiction.

HELD, by SOMERVELL, L.J., and ROMER, J.: From the moment when the employers made a payment into court under s. 12 (3), the registrar was clothed with exclusive jurisdiction (subject to appeal) to determine the appropriate destination of the money so paid into court, and, as a necessary foundation for his decision, to determine the effect of the medical referee's certificate, and, therefore, the judge was entitled to refuse to hear the arbitration proceedings in which the interpretation of the certificate was relevant.

Per SCOTT, L.J. (dissentiente): The county court judge ought to have exercised his discretion by staying the arbitration to keep alive the workman's right to ask for an award in the event of the proceedings under s. 12 resulting in a decision that there was continuing incapacity due to the accident, in however small a degree.

APPEAL by the workman from an award of DEPUTY-JUDGE TURNER at Ashby-de-la-Zouch County Court, dated Apr. 18, 1946. The judge held that he had no jurisdiction to hear arbitration proceedings when the matter in dispute was subject to such order as the registrar might make on the effect of a medical referee's certificate. The workman appealed from that decision. The facts appear in the judgments of SOMERVELL, L.J., and ROMER, J.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 26. SCOTT, L.J. : I will ask SOMERVELL, L.J. to read the first judgment. SOMERVELL, L.J. read the following judgment. This is an appeal by the workman from a decision of the county court judge who dismissed an application for arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, in the following circumstances.

The workman was a coal miner employed by the respondents on and before Sept. 29, 1942. On that date he was, while kneeling at the coal face in the course of his employment, bruised by a fall of stone and sustained serious injuries. From that date until Jan. 25, 1943, full compensation was paid by the employers under the Act. After that date partial compensation was paid. There was no award or recorded agreement. On Jan. 26, 1945, the employers served on the workman a notice under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 12 (3), of their intention to end the weekly payments after 10 days, on the grounds set out in an accompanying doctor's certificate. These were in substance that the injury arising from the accident was in the left ankle and that the workman had wholly recovered from that injury. Section 12 provides :

An employer shall not be entitled otherwise than in pursuance of an agreement or arbitration to end or diminish a weekly payment except in the following cases : . . . (3) where the medical practitioner who has examined the workman under section eighteen of this Act has certified that the workman has wholly or partially recovered, or that the incapacity is no longer due in whole or in part to the accident, and a copy of the certificate (which shall set out the grounds of the opinion of the medical practitioner) together with notice of the intention of the employer at the expiration of ten clear days from the date of the service of the notice to end the weekly payment, or to diminish it by such amount as is stated in the notice, has been served by the employer upon the workman : Provided that—(i) in the last-mentioned case, if before the expiration of the said ten clear days the workman sends to the employer the report of a duly qualified medical practitioner (which report shall set out the grounds of his opinion) disagreeing with the certificate so served by the employer, the weekly payment shall not be ended or diminished, except in accordance with such report, or if and so far as the employer disputes such report, except in accordance with the certificate given by the medical referee in pursuance of section nineteen of this Act ; and (ii) where an application has been made in pursuance of the said s. 19 to refer the dispute to a medical referee, it shall be lawful for the employer, pending the settlement of the dispute, to pay into court—(a) where the notice was a notice to end the weekly payment, the whole of each weekly payment becoming payable in the meantime ; (b) where the notice was a notice to diminish the weekly payment, so much of each weekly payment so payable as is in dispute ; and the sums so paid into court shall, on the settlement of the dispute, be paid to the employer or to the workman according to the effect of the certificate of the medical referee, or, if the effect of that certificate is disputed, as in default of agreement may be determined by the registrar or, on appeal, the judge.

On Jan. 29 notice was given on behalf of the workman objecting to the termination of the payments accompanied by a doctor's certificate disagreeing with the employers' doctor. On Feb. 16, in accordance with the procedure laid down in s. 12, the workman and the solicitors for the employers signed an application to the court for a reference to a medical referee under s. 19 (2). On Feb. 24 the employers paid into court a sum representing the disputed compensation in respect of five weeks from Feb. 6 to Mar. 13. On Mar. 3, 1945, the medical referee gave his certificate. The medical referee's certificate inter alia recommended that the workman should be provided with a flat foot support for the foot which was injured. The employers having made arrangements to provide this, applied on Mar. 23, 1945, to the registrar for the repayment of the disputed compensation deposited in court, on the ground that on the certificate the workman was no longer incapacitated. The workman through his solicitor did not accept this view of the certificate, and there was, therefore, a dispute as to its effect, and the registrar fixed Apr. 19 for both parties to attend in order that he could deal with the matter under the provisions which I have read. On Apr. 13, 1945, the workman's solicitors asked the registrar to "hold up this question" until he heard from them again. The workman consulted fresh solicitors, and on Oct. 25, 1945, the workman started arbitration proceedings, which were stated to be as to the amount or duration of the compensation payable. In their answer dated Dec. 1, the employers inter alia took the point that the matter was subject to such orders as the registrar might make with respect to the money in court on the effect of the medical referee's certificate and, therefore, the judge had no jurisdiction to make an award. The matter finally came on for hearing on Apr. 8, 1946. The judge in substance accepted the employers' contention, and held that the present proceedings were misconceived and that the application must be dismissed with costs. From that decision the workman appeals.

It is, I think, convenient to formulate in outline the argument as put forward for the employers before considering the counter-arguments. The employers have invoked the procedure of s. 12, which confers jurisdiction on the registrar to determine the dispute as to the effect of the certificate on the lines as laid down by SCRUTTON, L.J., in Rhodes v. Digby Colliery Co., Ltd. (1). The referee's certificate is admittedly not only a relevant but a conclusive document in any arbitration proceedings. If these proceedings are allowed to continue, its effect, the determination of which is the issue under the proceedings pending before the registrar under the expressly conferred statutory jurisdiction, will arise for determination. The county court judge was, therefore, right in refusing to entertain or proceed with the application, the registrar not having exercised his jurisdiction.

Counsel for the workman emphasised a number of points with which I agree. A workman, if he so desires, is entitled to get an award. If, under s. 12, the result is a decision of disablement, total or partial, there is no procedure under s. 12 for embodying that result in an award. The jurisdiction of the registrar is based on and limited to the money (if any) in court. The award to which the workman is entitled, again assuming disablement, will extend in futuro until one or other of the conditions laid down in the Act for altering it is fulfilled. With this I agree. I think that the workman would have a right to apply for an award governing future payments if, as a result of the s. 12 procedure, he remains entitled to some compensation. In so far as the headnote to Rhodes v. Digby Colliery Co., Ltd. (1) suggests the contrary, I think it goes beyond the decision and is wrong. That case, as it seems to me, lays down the principle that the medical certificate, if there is no dispute as to its effect, or the registrar's or judge's decision as to the effect of that certificate if there is a dispute, is conclusive in any subsequent arbitration proceedings until a change of circumstances can be proved. This, I think, is the principle also as stated by ATKIN, L.J., in Crewe v. John Rhodes, Ltd. (2) (18 B.W.C.C. 303, at p. 315).

The real question is whether the judge was right in holding that the arbitration could not be held pending the decision of the registrar. If, after the effect of the certificate has been determined by registrar or judge, the workman desires to have an award, he is, of course, entitled to obtain one if under the certificate he can substitute a claim for compensation. Counsel for the workman referred to and relied on various authorities. Pudney v. France (William), Fenwick & Co. (3) laid down that where all that has happened under s. 12 (3) is the serving of the notice by the employer, the workman who had not served his counter certificate within the period stipulated is not debarred from bringing arbitration proceedings. That case and the reasoning in it does not really help here, and counsel did not suggest it was conclusive. In Tempus Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Trott (4), the s. 12 procedure had been operated and a medical referee's certificate had been obtained, but no money had been paid into court. The jurisdiction of the registrar to determine the effect, if disputed, of the certificate did not, therefore, arise as it is based on money having been paid into court. The court held that in these circumstances any question arising on the certificate was for the judge either in a review under s. 11 or in an original arbitration under s. 21. The point that arises here did not, therefore, arise.

A I cannot find anything in what was said by the Lords Justices to throw doubt on the conclusion to which I have come in this case. I think the judgment of GREER, L.J., though it does not cover this case, on the whole supports my conclusion. Counsel also relied on Ocean Coal Co. v. Davies (5), where the employer contended that the man had recovered and stopped payments. He did not operate s. 14 of the Act of 1923, the predecessor of s. 12. The employer

B took proceedings by way of review on Sept. 21 to have the compensation terminated as from Sept. 3, the date when the employers' doctor had certified that the workman had recovered. The only question was whether the workman, who admitted before the review proceedings that he had entirely recovered by Sept. 3, could claim compensation from Sept. 3 till Oct. 27, the date of the hearing, on the ground that, although he had recovered, no step under the Act had been taken justifying the termination of payments. The issue is far

C removed from that with which we are concerned, and I do not think the decision or anything said in it really assists.

The judge was, in my opinion, right in refusing to hear the arbitration proceedings, on the ground that the effect of a document, which was a relevant document in these proceedings, was in issue in proceedings before a court which had statutory jurisdiction to deal with the issue, and, so far as the money in court is concerned, must deal with it. Not only was the application made to the registrar prior in date to the application for arbitration, but I think the statute contemplates that where a medical certificate comes into existence under s. 12, with its reference to s. 19, a dispute as to its effect is to be determined under the procedure laid down in s. 12 on the issue as to the disposal of the money in court, where money has been paid into court, and not in other proceedings. The judge could, I think, have stayed or adjourned the application, but he was entitled to come to the conclusion that in the circumstances it was misconceived and dismiss it as he did.

It is worth noting that there would not appear to be any great substance in the issue which we have to decide. If, as I hold, the employer is right, the effect of the certificate will be determined in the first place by the registrar with a right of appeal to the county court judge. If the workman is right, the effect of the certificate will be determined by the county court judge, not

F necessarily the same individual, sitting as arbitrator.

The appeal ought, therefore, in my judgment, to be dismissed.

SCOTT, L.J. : I will ask ROMER, J., to read his judgment.

ROMER, J., read the following judgment : I agree with the conclusions which have been expressed by SOMERVELL, L.J. Throughout the hearing of this appeal I felt, as I still feel, great difficulty in appreciating what useful

G purpose the issue by the workman of his application for arbitration on Oct. 25, 1945, was intended at that time to serve. The position as between himself and the employers was then as follows. The employers, having taken the view that the workman had recovered from the injury which he had suffered on Sept. 29, 1942, took the appropriate steps, on Jan. 26, 1945, to bring into operation the machinery provided by the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 12. On Jan. 29, 1945, the workman served the counter-notice envisaged by the section,

H relying upon the report of his own doctor, whose view of the workman's condition differed from that which had been expressed in the medical report obtained by the employers. On Feb. 16, 1945, a joint application was made by employers and workman for a reference of the matter pursuant to s. 19 of the Act to a medical referee, and this application resulted in the certificate of Mar. 3, 1945, which was considered by the county court judge. Although both parties had co-operated down to Feb. 16, in utilising the s. 12 procedure, it is clear, I think, on the authorities, that it still remained open to the workman to jettison that procedure and proceed to arbitration instead, had he desired to do so. On

Feb. 24, 1945, the employers made a payment into court under s. 12 (3). From that moment onwards, in my judgment, the registrar was clothed with exclusive jurisdiction (subject to appeal) to determine the appropriate destination of the money so paid into court and, as a necessary foundation for his decision, to determine, in the event (which happened) of dispute, the effect of the medical referee's certificate.

On the latter point his decision, or that of the county court judge if taken to appeal, would, I think, be decisive for the purpose of any subsequent arbitration proceedings: see Crewe v. John Rhodes (2), and Rhodes v. Digby (1). The registrar gave an appointment for an inquiry into these matters but, at the request of the workman, the hearing thereof was, by agreement, deferred indefinitely. At no time prior to Oct. 25, 1945, when the workman issued his application for arbitration, had he any reason to suppose that the employers had abandoned, or were intending to abandon, the s. 12 procedure. The exclusive jurisdiction of the registrar, to which I have referred, was, accordingly, still alive. Had he been given an opportunity of exercising it he might have attributed to the medical referee's certificate an effect favourable or unfavourable to the workman. If unfavourable, then (subject to appeal) cadit quæstio. If favourable, then ground for applying for an award would have resulted. Without, however, giving the registrar an opportunity of considering the certificate at all the workman applied for arbitration. This application could only result in an award if the referee's certificate was interpreted favourably to the workman, and it was made to a tribunal (namely, the county court judge) which at that time had no jurisdiction to decide that question one way or the other. By para. 2 of their answer to the application the respondents pleaded that "the judge has no jurisdiction to make an award on this application." That plea, couched as it was in the present tense, was, I think, well founded; for the making of an award at that time involved the exercise by the judge of jurisdiction which was statutorily vested in another tribunal, namely, the registrar. This view of the matter was accepted by the judge, who, accordingly, dismissed the application for want of current jurisdiction. It was conceded by counsel for the employers, on the hearing of the appeal before us, that the judge might, alternatively, have stayed the application, allowing it to remain on the file until the registrar had discharged his functions under s. 12. This concession was rightly made because the judge might well, at some time thereafter, have acquired full power to deal with the application and make an award. I do not think, however, that he was wrong in concluding that he had not, at the time when the application was before him, the necessary jurisdiction to enable him to deal with it or in making an order for its dismissal on that ground.

SCOTT, L.J.: I am in general agreement with the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J., with which ROMER, J., concurs, but I think that the judge ought to have exercised his discretion by staying the arbitration to keep alive the workman's right to ask for an award in the event of the proceedings under s. 12 resulting in a decision that there was continuing incapacity due to the accident, in however small a degree. This being the position, I cannot agree that the judge was right in upholding the employers' contention that he had no jurisdiction, for, so long as the s. 12 procedure was incomplete, he had no right to assume that it would, as an inevitable and foreseeable result, end in a decision inter partes wholly terminating the workman's right, not merely to a present payment week by week for some measure of incapacity, but even to a declaration of liability. Unless, when the workman started his proceeding for arbitration, he had no right under the Act even to launch it, the judge was, for the reasons I have already given, clothed with jurisdiction, and in holding that he had none was misdirecting himself in law.

My own view is that this court ought, therefore, to set aside his judgment and substitute a stay, pending the termination of the s. 12 proceeding in a decision by the registrar, or, on appeal from him, by the judge, with liberty to either party to apply in the stayed arbitration, but my brethren differ, and the judgment will, therefore, be as they think right.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

RICHES v. WESTMINSTER BANK, LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Simon, Lord Wright, Lord Porter, Lord Simonds, Lord Normand), January 23, 24, 27, 28, March 21, 1947.]

Income tax—Assessment—Interest of money—Interest included in judgment for debt or damages—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40) sched. D, para. 1 (b); All Schedules Rules, r. 21—Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934 (c. 41), s. 3 (1).

In an action against the respondents as judicial trustees of the will of R., deceased, the appellant established a claim to a sum of £36,255 representing a debt. In giving judgment for the appellant for that amount, the judge exercised his discretion under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, s. 3, by awarding the appellant an additional sum of £10,028 as interest, being 4 per cent. per annum on the principal sum from the date when the cause of action arose to that of the judgment. The respondents paid to the appellant the principal sum, but paid only £5,014 of the additional amount, claiming that the £10,028 was taxable income within the Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. D, from which they were bound to deduct tax at the standard rate in force for the year 1943-1944.

HELD: (i) the additional sum awarded under the Act of 1934, was "interest of money" within the meaning of the Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. D., para. 1 (b). The proposition that interest is awarded as damages imported the justification for the award, but did not affect the quality of interest as such, and it was irrelevant that the additional sum only came into existence when the court exercised its discretion to award it, for it represented the total of periodical accretions of interest during the whole time in which the payment of the debt was withheld.

APPEAL by the defendant from a decision of the Court of Appeal, reported [1945] 2 All E.R. 111, affirming a decision of EVERSHEDE, J., reported [1945]

1 All E.R. 466. The plaintiff bank sought a declaration to determine the question whether a sum of money awarded as interest pursuant to the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, s. 3, and included in the total sum for which judgment was pronounced in favour of the defendant against the plaintiffs in another action between the same parties, was, or was not, "interest of money" within the meaning of the Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. D, and as such subject to tax. The facts appear in the opinions of their lordships.

Frederick Grant, K.C., and N. E. Mustoe for the appellant.

Dovan, K.C., and L. C. Graham-Dixon for the respondents.

VISCOUNT SIMON: My Lords, the question which the House has to decide has not, it seems, come previously before the courts. It is whether a sum of money, awarded under the powers conferred by the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, s. 3 (1), as interest, and included in the total sum for which judgment is given, is "interest of money" within the meaning of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918. If it is, the defendant, when paying the judgment debt, is entitled to deduct income tax on the amount of this award of interest, and the plaintiff must "allow such deduction" on receipt of the balance, while the defendant will retain what is deducted if he has paid it out of profits or gains brought into charge to tax (r. 19 of "All Schedule Rules"), or will account for it to the Revenue in so far as the payment is not made out of profits or gains brought into charge (r. 21 of "All Schedules Rules").

The facts which give rise to this question may be shortly stated as follows. The appellant had an agreement with one Ridsdel that, in consideration of the appellant introducing to him a transaction for the purchase of a block of shares, Ridsdel would pay to the appellant half of any profits which he realised on the resale of the shares. Ridsdel resold the shares at a profit, but fraudulently pretended that the sum which he thereafter paid over represented the whole of the appellant's share of the profit. Later, the appellant ascertained that the profit of which he was to receive one half was much greater than Ridsdel had represented, and after Ridsdel's death he brought an action before OLIVER, J., against the respondents as judicial trustees of Ridsdel's estate for the balance due to him, which was ascertained to be a sum of £36,255. The judge, exercising his power under s. 3 of the Act of 1934, in addition to giving judgment in the appellant's favour for this amount, awarded an additional sum of £10,028, being the equivalent of interest on £36,255 at 4 per cent. per annum from June 14, 1936 to May 14, 1943, so that the total sum for which judgment was given was £46,283. The respondent bank has paid to the appellant the amount due under the judgment except that it has deducted £5,014 representing income tax at the rate of 10s. in the £ on the additional sum of £10,028.

The appellant contends that the additional sum of £10,028, though awarded under a power to add interest to the amount of the debt and though called interest in the judgment, is not really interest such as attracts income tax, but is damages. The short answer to this is that there is no essential incompatibility between the two conceptions. The real question, for the purpose of deciding whether the Income Tax Acts apply, is whether the added sum is capital or income, not whether the sum is damages or interest. Before the coming into force of the Act of 1934, the rule at common law prevailed that when an action for the payment of a debt succeeded the court could not add interest on the debt down to judgment unless interest was payable as of right under a contract expressed or implied. Provisos (b) and (c) of s. 3 show that these exceptions were not touched by the Act of 1934 and the discretion conferred on the court by the enacting words is a discretion to add interest when judgment is given for a debt or damages, although there is no contractual right to interest. The added amount may be regarded as given to meet the injury suffered through not getting payment of the lump sum promptly, but that does not alter the fact that what is added is interest. This is the view taken by EVERSLED, J. and by the Court of Appeal (DU PARCQ, and MORTON, L.JJ. and COHEN, J.) and this view, in my opinion, is correct.

Two decided cases which might seem to give support to the argument of counsel for the appellant are Re National Bank of Wales, Ltd. (1) and Simpson v. Exors. of Bonner Maurice (2). In the former, R. S. WRIGHT, J., had before him a case in which an ex-director of the bank had been ordered to pay to the liquidator of the company a sum of money together with interest thereon at 5 per cent. per annum on the ground that he had been guilty of misfeasance in sanctioning the payment of dividend out of capital. The judge declined to allow this individual to deduct income tax from the interest he was ordered to pay. He is reported as saying, ([1899] 2 Ch. 651), that it is not a question of contract at all and that the order made had the effect that the company had had its capital withheld and had suffered damages equivalent to 5 per cent. per annum for that reason. The judge added : (p. 651)

I can see no reason why it should not get the whole of the damages back. It is called "interest" but it is really damages for withholding its capital from the company.

These observations have long been considered as of doubtful validity and the time has come to say that they are wrong. If damages are increased by adding interest on a principal sum, that does not prove that such interest is not liable to tax. Simpson v. Exors. of Bonner Maurice was of a very special character. It arose under art. 297 of the peace treaty with Germany after the 1914-1918 war. Article 297 provided that the nationals of allied and associated Powers should be entitled to compensation in respect of damage or injury inflicted upon their property, rights or interests in Germany. Before the war a British subject had deposited securities, stocks and shares in banks in Germany. He died during the war, and as a result of the peace treaty claims on the part of his representatives were admitted in respect of amounts representing in part the capital value of these securities and in part compensation under the treaty computed on the basis of interest on certain amounts. The decision of ROWLATT, J., that this compensation could not be regarded as interest was confirmed by the Court of Appeal. The treaty did not give to the claimants any right to interest as such and the view taken was that the whole amount was compensation such as was authorised by the treaty. ROWLATT, J. observed (14 Tax Cas. 593) that the case was :

... like damages for detention of a chattel, and unless it can be said that damages for detention of a chattel can be called rent or hire for the chattel during the period of detention, I do not think this compensation can be called interest.

I do not consider that this decision can be regarded as leading this House to a conclusion in favour of the appellant.

Counsel for the appellant advanced a further argument that the added sum was not in the nature of "interest" in the sense of that expression in the Income Tax Acts because the added sum only came into existence when the judgment was given and from that moment had no accretions under the order awarding it. (Interest on a judgment debt is, of course, a separate matter and counsel did not challenge the view that this latter interest was subject to tax). But I see no reason why, when the judge orders payment of interest from a past date on the amount of the main sum awarded, (or on a part of it) this supplemental payment, the size of which grows from day to day by taking a fraction of so much per cent. per annum of the amount on which interest is ordered, and by the payment of which further growth is stopped, should not be treated as interest attracting income tax. It is not capital. It is rather the accumulated fruit of a tree which the tree produces regularly until payment. I move that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD WRIGHT : My Lords, this appeal raises the question whether a sum of £10,028 awarded to the appellant as interest pursuant to the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, (hereinafter called the Act), s. 3 (1), and included pursuant to that section in the total sum for which judgment in the King's Bench Division was given in favour of the appellant, is "interest of money" within the meaning of the Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. D, para. 1 (b), which enacts (inter alia) that tax under this schedule shall be charged in respect of " (b) all interest of money."

The appellant brought the action against the judicial trustees of one Ridsdel, claiming one half of the profits realised by Ridsdel by the sale on joint account with the appellant of certain shares in 1936. The action was commenced in 1939 when the appellant discovered that Ridsdel had not disclosed the true amount of the profit realised. The judge at the trial by his judgment given on May 17, 1943, found in favour of the appellant, holding that £36,255 was due on balance to him and in addition awarded him £10,028 in exercise of his discretion under the Act, as being interest at 4 per cent. per annum on £36,255 from June 14, 1936, when the profits were realised by Ridsdel, to May 14, 1943. The Court of Appeal affirmed that judgment. The respondent claimed that he had satisfied the judgment by a payment of £41,269, which was arrived at after deduction of £5,014 representing income tax on the sum of £10,028 pursuant to the Income Tax Act, 1918, All Schedules Rules, r. 21. The appellant claimed that income tax was not deductible and the respondent then brought the action out of which this appeal arises claiming that the payments made to the appellant satisfied the judgment. The dispute involved the question whether the sum of £10,028 was interest under the Act.

The main questions in the appeal may be described as being whether the sum of £10,028 awarded as part of the judgment was interest under the Act and, if so, whether it fell within the words of the Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. D, para. 1 (b), which have been quoted above. Both courts below (as already stated) answered both questions in the respondent's favour. Their judgments deal so admirably with the issues that I should have been content to agree with them without more, but, having regard to the general importance of the questions, I add a brief statement of my reasons for agreeing.

The contention of the appellant may be summarily stated to be that the award under the Act cannot be held to be interest in the true sense of that word because it is not interest but damages, that is, damages for the detention of a sum of money due to the respondent from the appellant and hence the deduction made as being required under the All Schedules Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918, r. 21, is not justified because the money was not interest. In other words, the contention is that money awarded as damages for the detention of money is not interest and has not the quality of interest. EVERSLED, J., in his admirable judgment, rejected that distinction. The appellant's contention is, in any case, artificial and is, in my opinion, erroneous because the essence of interest is that it is a payment which becomes due because the creditor has not had his money at the due date. It may be regarded either as representing the profit he might have made if he had had the use of the money, or, conversely, the loss he suffered because he had not that use. The general idea is that he is entitled to compensation for the deprivation. From that point of view it would seem immaterial whether the money was due to him under a contract, express or implied, or a statute, or whether the money was due for any other reason in law. In either case the money was due to him and was not paid, or, in other words, was withheld from him by the debtor after the time when payment should have been made, in breach of his legal rights, and interest was a compensation whether the compensation was liquidated under an agreement or statute, as, for instance, under the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 57, or was unliquidated and claimable under the Act as in the present case. The essential quality of the claim for compensation is the same and the compensation is properly described as interest. For reasons that go back far in history the distinction between interest proper as it has been called, that is, interest due under a contract, statute or the like, and interest by way of damages, that is, not due under an agreement express or implied has since very early days been recognised in England whether in the ecclesiastical or common law courts. Moneylending was condemned by the mediaeval mind as usurious (TAWNEY, RELIGION AND THE RISE OF CAPITALISM, at pp. 54 and 55). The reproach of usury was not answered by saying the interest was due under a contract. Tawney states (p. 54):

What remained to the end unlawful was interest as a fixed payment stipulated in advance for a loan of money or wares without risk to the lender.

The profits should go, it was said, to the borrower since he makes the loan profitable by his work. These ideas could not survive the exigencies of modern commerce, but they did, and still in a sense do, influence the rules relating to interest. The legislature found it necessary to intervene in 1833 by means of the Civil Procedure Act (Lord Tenterden's Act) of that year which qualified the old English rule that prima facie money claims do not carry interest. Before that date it had been held as, for instance, in Page v. Newman (3), that a common law court in awarding damages was not entitled to award interest in addition in the absence of express or implied contract or statute. The Admiralty Court, however, claimed and exercised that right. The court of equity also, when making a money decree, held itself entitled to award interest for the period between the time when the money was due and the date of the decree, when it thought that proper in order to effect a restitutio in integrum.

The Civil Procedure Act, 1833, corrected to some extent the limitations of the common law courts' powers in this matter. By s. 28 of that Act the jury were to be entitled, if they should think fit, to allow interest to the successful plaintiff in a limited class of cases, that is, where the debt was a sum certain under a contract in writing payable at a time certain or, if otherwise, made payable by a demand in writing fixing a certain date and notifying the debtor that in default interest would be claimed. Section 29 similarly enabled the jury to give damages "in the nature of interest" in certain torts and also on claims on policies of insurance. The element of discretion found in the earlier Act was preserved by the Act of 1934. The Act was general in its terms. It made no distinction between interest and damages in the nature of interest. The word, indeed, was used indifferently. The essential similarity of different types of interest is put beyond doubt by s. 3 (1) (b) of the Act which, after para. (a) has excluded power to give compound interest, provides that the Act is not to apply to any debt where the interest is payable as of right. This would include all cases of what is called interest proper, under a contract or the like, so that the interest particularly dealt with by the Act is what has been called interest by way of damages. The category (c) included in s. 3 (1) of the Act was necessary to exclude interest awarded on the dishonour of a bill of exchange the award of which, though often described as damages, is now statutory. The award is not in the discretion of the court where the interest is payable as of right. It is clear that the Act used the word "interest" in its widest sense, including both interest proper and interest by way of damages. It is not a consolidating Act, but a reforming or amending Act. It is intended to enlarge the powers of the court. In 1893 this House reviewed the then existing position as it stood at common law and the established principle up to that date.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., in London, Chatham & Dover Ry. Co. v. S.E. Ry. Co. (4) said ([1893] A.C. 440) that the words of Lord Tenterden's Act (the Act of 1833) kept claims for interest within very narrow limits which to him seemed too narrow for the purposes of justice, but he held that the authorities which he cited made it impossible to reopen the question or to hold that in the circumstances before the House in that case interest could be awarded. The interest in question was an instance of what has been called interest by way of damages, but it may be noted that throughout such interest is still described as interest, even though the court was debarred from awarding it by the then state of law. The case itself was typical. A large sum of money was due but was not paid for a substantial period. The decision was that, as it was not within the express terms of the Act of 1833, no interest could be awarded. The purpose of the Act of 1934 was to remove the fetters still left under Lord Tenterden's Act and to effect the reform which the Lord Chancellor thought that justice required. In my judgment, the Act has done so.

The question that remains is whether the interest is within the scope of the charging words of the Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. D, cited above which charges "all interest of money." In my opinion, there is no incompatibility for this purpose between interest proper and interest by way of damages especially since the Act of 1934, and, as I think, before that Act. Thus, there does not seem to be any reason why the sum in question should not be taxed. I do not repeat the reasoning which I have sought to explain in the earlier part of this judgment. It is true that in Re National Bank of Wales (1), WRIGHT, J., distinguished damages from interest. The judge held that the debtor should repay 5 per cent. per annum on sums which he had wrongfully withheld. He said ([1899] 2 Ch. 651): "it is called interest but is really damages." If the judge was meaning that such damages were not capable of being treated as interest, he was, in my opinion, guilty of an error in law, even before the Act of 1934. I do not think it necessary to express any opinion on the actual decision of that case which turned on its particular facts. The same may be said of various decisions under the Income Tax Act, 1918, determining whether particular payments were interest within sched. D. The distinction through these cases is whether the payments were payments of profits, that is, were income, or were payments on capital account estimated in terms of interest. This latter type of case is less frequent in the books, but a good illustration is to be found in Glenboig Union Fireclay Co., Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (5), in which it was held that the sum there awarded was, in truth, though described as interest, only a method of determining the value of the fireclay sterilized in the hands of the company for which it was entitled to compensation. That was a payment on capital account. It was for the destruction of a capital asset, which was indeed the source of profits but could not be regarded as income. On the other side of the line is Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Barnato (6), where the payment was a sum of compound interest which had been made to the taxpayer in commutation of his share of profit in a partnership. It was a sum of profit, not capital. I need not go through the numerous cases which have been cited to illustrate the circumstances under which a sum has been taxed as income or has been held immune on the ground that, whether called interest or not, it was really a payment on capital account. In regard to some of these decisions opinion may differ as to the exact result arrived at on the facts, but they all agree in using the word "interest" and in drawing as the relevant distinction that between capital and income. This distinction depends on substance, not on the mere name. A

Of some minor contentions which have been raised, I shall briefly advert to one. It was said that the sum in question could not be interest at all because interest implies a recurrence of periodical accretions, whereas this sum came to existence uno flatu by the judgment of the court and was fixed once for all. But in truth it represented the total of the periodical accretions of interest during the whole time in which payment of the debt was withheld. The sum awarded was the summation of the total of all the recurring interest items. D
The objection fails. In my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD SIMONDS: LORD PORTER, who is unable to be here, has asked me to say that he has read and agrees with the opinion I am about to deliver.

My Lords, this appeal, which is brought from an order of the Court of Appeal affirming an order of EVERSLED, J., raises for the first time a question of some general importance arising under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, s. 3. E

The appellant, in the year 1936, entered into an agreement with one Ridsdel under which, in consideration of his introducing to Ridsdel a transaction which involved the purchase of a block of shares in a certain limited company, Ridsdel was to pay him one half of any profits which might be made on a resale of the shares. Ridsdel bought the shares and resold them at a profit of £93,350, but he paid to the appellant sums amounting to £10,420 only, alleging that the profit was no more than £20,840. On Apr. 2, 1939, Ridsdel died, and the appellant, having discovered shortly afterwards that the profit was far greater than was alleged, on Apr. 2, 1942, commenced an action in the King's Bench Division against the respondent as judicial trustee of Ridsdel's last will in which he claimed (inter alia) an account of the profits made on a resale of the said shares and payment of the difference between the sum already received by him and one half of the profits found to have been made on taking such account. F

It is unnecessary to say anything more about this action, which was vigorously defended, except that OLIVER, J., gave judgment for the appellant for the sum of £36,255 (being the difference between the sum of £10,420 already received by the appellant and £46,675, i.e., one half of the profit of £93,350 admittedly made by Ridsdel), together with a further sum of £10,028 (making £46,283 in all) which the judge in the exercise of his discretion awarded as interest under the section to which I have referred. This sum of £10,028 represents interest at 4 per cent. per annum on £36,255 from June 14, 1936 (when that sum should have been paid), to May 14, 1943 (the date of judgment). G
From this judgment the respondent appealed to the Court of Appeal, but his appeal was dismissed. H

In July and August, 1943, the respondent paid the appellant sums amounting to £41,269, made up of the sum of £36,255, of a sum for interest on the judgment after the date of judgment and of a sum of £5,014, being the sum of £10,025 included in this judgment as interest after deduction of income tax therefrom at the standard rate then prevailing of 10s. in the £. For this balance of £5,014 the respondent held itself accountable to the Crown. The respondent made this deduction under the All Schedules Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918, r. 21, and it is common ground that the deduction, if permissible, must be made under this rule. The appellant, however, contended that the deduction was not permissible and threatened to levy execution under the judgment unless the balance of £5,014 was paid to him. To avert this event the respondent commenced an action in the Chancery Division against the appellant, claiming that the judgment had been satisfied by the payments already made. In this action EVERSHED, J., gave judgment for the respondent.

B The Court of Appeal unanimously affirmed his decision. Hence this appeal.

My Lords, to me the case appears a very plain one, and but for the novelty and importance of the point I should have been content to adopt without further words of my own the reasons and conclusion of the judges in the courts below. The question may be simply stated. It is whether, where in an action for the recovery of any debt or damages the court exercises its discretionary power under s. 3 of the cited Act and orders that there shall be included in the sum for which judgment is given interest on the debt or damages, the sum of interest so included is taxable under the Income Tax Acts.

C I will remind your Lordships first of the provisions of the Income Tax Act, 1918, under which, if at all, this sum is taxable. Under s. 1 of the Act tax is charged on profits and gains described or comprised in the scheds. A, B, C, D, E, contained in sched. I to the Act and in accordance with the rules respectively applicable to those schedules. By sched. D, para. 1 (b), it is enacted that tax under this schedule shall be charged in respect of "(b) All interest of money . . ." I do not think it necessary to make further reference to the provisions of the Income Tax Act. It is sufficient to say that in order to attract tax it must be established that the sum in question was income, and that it was that species of profit or gains which answers the description "interest of money."

E It is convenient now to set out the section of the Act of 1934 under which payment was ordered :

3. (1) In any proceedings tried in any court of record for the recovery of any debt or damages, the court may, if it thinks fit, order that there shall be included in the sum for which judgment is given interest at such rate as it thinks fit on the whole or any part of the debt or damages for the whole or any part of the period between the date when the cause of action arose and the date of the judgment : Provided that nothing in this section—(a) shall authorise the giving of interest upon interest ; or (b) shall apply in relation to any debt upon which interest is payable as of right whether by virtue of any agreement or otherwise ; or (c) shall affect the damages recoverable for the dishonour of a bill of exchange.

(2) Sections 28 and 29 of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, shall cease to have effect.

F My Lords, I do not think that it could readily have occurred to anyone that interest awarded under this section was not "interest of money" within the taxing provision, were it not that behind it there lies a history to which I must shortly refer. Taken by itself, the section provides in unambiguous terms that, where judgment is given for a principal sum, the court may order that it shall be an interest-bearing principal sum. The principal sum is "money" and the interest on it is "interest of money." I can see no reason why it should not be "interest of money" for the purposes of tax. That the word "interest" is used in no unusual sense plainly appears from provisos (a) and (b) where it can only have its familiar meaning. It has, however, been urged by counsel for the appellant that this view of the section, simple and straightforward as it is, ought not to be entertained by your Lordships, and, as I have said, he invokes the history of this branch of the law to support his argument. My Lords, while I am ever prepared to consider any statute in the light of pre-existing law, I must admit to a reluctance to be diverted by the shadow of the past from the plain meaning of plain words. So it is that in this case I get little help from the Aristotelian view of the sterility of money or the mediæval conception, embodied in some of our earliest statutes, that the increase of money by way of interest is indefensible usury or even from the way in which in statute and in judicial utterance reference is made to "compensation" or "damages" when interest becomes payable otherwise than under a contractual obligation. The stages of the appellant's argument clearly appear in his formal reasons. They may be thus summarised. First, he says that interest awarded under the Act of 1934 is of the same character as interest awarded under the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, ss. 28 and 29; secondly, that interest awarded under those sections was an award of damages or in the nature of damages; and, thirdly, that an award of damages, or in the nature of damages, is not "interest of money" within the meaning of the Income Tax Acts."

The first stage in this argument does not carry me far. By s. 3 (2) of the Act of 1934 the relevant sections of the earlier Act are repealed. The character of the interest to be awarded under s. 3 (1) is surely to be ascertained from the words of that subsection rather than from those of the sections which it supercedes, but, assuming that the later statute is to be interpreted in the light of the earlier one, it can only be to s. 28 that reference may be made. It will be observed that in the section we have now to construe "debt" and "damages" are joined together. Whether the principal sum, for which judgment is given in respect of debt or damages, interest may be awarded in respect of that sum. This may be contrasted with the earlier statute, which, by s. 28, provided for the allowance of "interest" simpliciter, but, by s. 29, provided for the giving of "damages in the nature of interest." I should not be prepared to concede that it makes any difference for the purposes of income tax whether a sum of money is called "interest" or "damages in the nature of interest" or "interest in the nature of damages," but the appellant's argument ties him to s. 28 which refers to the allowance of "interest" and nothing else.

I come then to the second stage and ask: What is the character of interest allowed under the Act of 1833, s. 28? Here the argument is that, call it interest or what you will, it is damages and, if it is damages, then it is not "interest in the proper sense" or "interest proper," expressions heard many times by your Lordships. This argument appears to me fallacious. It assumes an incompatibility between the ideas of interest and damages for which I see no justification. It confuses the character of the sum paid with the authority under which it is paid. Its essential character may be the same, whether it is paid under the compulsion of a contract, a statute, or a judgment of the court. In the first case it may be called "interest", and in the second and third cases "damages in the nature of interest," or even "damages," but the real question is still what is its intrinsic character, and in the consideration of this question a description due to the authority under which it is paid may well mislead. I will illustrate my meaning by a citation from LORD HERSCHELL's speech in London, Chatham and Dover Ry. Co. v. S.E. Ry. Co. (4) ([1893] A.C. 437):

But, my Lords, the appellants contended that even although they might not under the terms of Lord Tenterden's Act be entitled to interest, yet interest might be given by way of damages in respect of the wrongful detention of their debt. I confess that I have considered this part of the case with every inclination to come to a conclusion in favour of the appellants, to the extent at all events . . . of giving them interest from the date of the action; and for this reason, that I think that when money is owing from one party to another and that other is driven to have recourse to legal proceedings in order to recover the amount due to him, the party who is wrongfully withholding the money from the other ought not in justice to benefit by having that money in his possession and enjoying the use of it, when the money ought to be in the possession of the other party who is entitled to its use. Therefore, if I could see my way to do so, I should certainly be disposed to give the appellants, or anybody in a similar position, interest upon the amount withheld from the time of action brought at all events. But I have come to the conclusion, upon a consideration of the authorities, agreeing with the court below, that it is not possible to do so, although no doubt in early times the view was expressed that interest might be given under such circumstances by way of damages.

I note in passing that what LORD HERSCHELL would fain have done was done by the section now under review, but my purpose in citing this passage is to show that interest may be none the less interest because it is awarded by way of damages. So, again, in Webster v. British Empire Mutual Life Assurance Co. (7), where a claim was made for interest on certain policy moneys, but the policy contained no provision for interest, JAMES, L.J., said (15 Ch.D. 174):

A policy of assurance does not bear interest. That is conceded on all hands. In itself, there is neither an express nor an implied contract to pay interest on the amount payable. Under the Act 3 and 4 Will. 4, c. 42, whether it comes within any common law principle or not, anything in the nature of interest can only be given, in my view, as damages for the wrongful detention of money which ought to have been paid.

A These and similar observations, which I might multiply (e.g., in a line of cases concerned with "specially indorsed" writs, see Ryley v. Master (8), were cited on behalf of the appellant to show that a sum awarded as interest under the Act of 1833, s. 28, is in essence not "interest proper" but damages. But, to my mind, the answer is given by EVERSHED, J., in his judgment in words which I cannot improve on and, therefore, adopt ([1945] 1 All E.R. 472):

... the proposition that interest is awarded as damages or by way of damages, as in the case of Cook v. Fowler (9) imports the justification for the award or for the rate awarded, but does not affect the quality of interest as such ...

B Perhaps the position may become even clearer if for "damages" the word "compensation" is substituted. It would be difficult, I suppose, in a case where a man, being deprived of the use of his money, was awarded interest by way of compensation, to say that what he was awarded was not interest but something else. That is the very language of equity: cf. Vyse v. Foster (10). In that case as JAMES, L.J., points out (L.R. 8 Ch. App. 328) the executors or trustees had committed a breach of trust by allowing trust money to remain outstanding on the personal security of persons engaged in trade. They were bound, therefore, to make good the trust funds and interest. The language that JAMES, L.J., employs is illuminating. He says (p. 333):

This court is not a court of penal jurisdiction. It compels restitution of property unconscientiously withheld; it gives full compensation for any loss or damage through failure of some equitable duty; but it has no power of punishing anyone.

D The trustee must pay interest to his cestui que trust (I say nothing of his alternative remedy) to compensate for the interest he has lost. It might equally well be called damages or interest by way of damages. It is inherently a sum of money of precisely the same character as the interest awarded in a court of law under the Civil Procedure Act, 1833.

E My Lords, having discussed in a general way the nature of a sum of money awarded as interest under the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, s. 28, I turn to the cases decided under the Income Tax Acts to see whether they assist the appellant. I find in them just what I expected to find. The question in each case is whether the receipt is of an income or a capital nature. That is the test for income tax purposes, not whether it is called "interest" or "damages." Thus, in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Ballantine (11), arbitrators to whom a claim for (inter alia) "additional costs, loss and damages" was referred awarded an amount which included a sum described as interest. The Court of Session having concluded that what was described as interest was, in fact, part of the total sum awarded by way of damages rejected the claim of the Revenue to tax on it. As COHEN, J., has observed ([1945] 2 All E.R. 120), the matter is summed up in the judgment of the LORD PRESIDENT where he says (8 Tax Cas. 612):

... if the decree was substantially one of damages, the interest ordered to run on it was just part of the damages and not therefore chargeable to income tax.

G Again in Glenboig Union Fireclay Co., Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (5) the claim to tax was rejected because, though certain sums were described as interest, yet in substance a capital sum of compensation was awarded, the element of interest being introduced in modum aestimationis. So, also, in Simpson v. Exors. of Bonner Maurice (2) tax was held not to be exigible on any part of a sum which was paid by way of compensation under art. 297 (e) of the Treaty of Versailles. It is sufficient to cite a sentence from the judgment of LAWRENCE H.L.J., in that case to show how different were its circumstances from those where interest was allowed under the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, or is ordered under the Act of 1934. He said (14 Tax Cas. 605):

Article 297 of the Treaty says nothing about the payment of interest, and the money paid under the direction of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal was paid as compensation and not as interest.

Numerous cases also were cited which fell on the other side of the line, i.e., in which sums of money described and paid or received as interest were held to be "interest of money" and taxable as such. I will mention only two of them. In Schultze v. Bensted (12) the question was as to the liability to tax of interest on a sum which a negligent trustee had failed to get in and which he had been ordered to make good to the trust estate, a state of affairs strictly comparable with that to which I referred when observing on Vyse v. Foster (10). The trustee having duly paid the interest, it was, in the words of LORD JOHNSTON (7 Tax Cas. 34):

... a surrogatum for that which ought to have termly reached the hands of the trustees and have been applied by them as income . . . A

It was, accordingly, liable to tax. In Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Barnato (6) the circumstances were very similar. There, too, the defendants became bound under a consent order founded on certain admissions to pay, not only a principal sum, but interest on it, and compound interest at that, and it was held that such interest was liable to tax. This decision, if I may say so with respect, was plainly right. It illustrates the proposition that that which reaches the hand of the recipient as interest on a principal sum is income liable to income tax, notwithstanding that it may come to him in a single sum and as the result of a hostile suit. B

I have left to the last a case rightly relied on by the appellant. I refer to Re National Bank of Wales, Ltd. (1). In that case a director, having been found liable to refund to the company the principal sum of £37,000 (being the amount of certain dividends improperly paid out of the funds of the company), was ordered also to pay interest at the rate of 5 per cent. from the dates when the dividends were paid. A question arose on settling the minutes of judgment whether income tax should be deducted from the interest so ordered to be paid. WRIGHT, J., declined to allow tax to be deducted saying that it was not a question of contract at all, that the matter must be regarded as if the director had fraudulently given away £37,000 of the capital of the company, that the company had by its capital being withheld all those years suffered damages equal to 5 per cent. per annum and that he saw no reason why it should not get the whole of the damages back. He concluded ([1899] 2 Ch. 651): C

It is called "interest" but it is really damages for withholding its capital from the company. I have tried to find some authorities on the question, but I am unable to find any. D E

I agree with counsel for the appellant that, if this case was rightly decided, he is entitled to succeed here, but the reasoning of WRIGHT, J., cannot, in my opinion, be supported and his decision must be overruled.

It was further urged on behalf of the appellant that the interest ordered to be paid to him was not "interest of money" for the purpose of tax because it had no existence until it was awarded and did not have the quality of being recurrent or being capable of recurrence. This argument was founded on certain observations of LORD MAUGHAM in Moss Empires, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (13) ([1937] A.C. 795) in regard to the meaning of the word "annual." It would be sufficient to say that we are here dealing with words in the Income Tax Act which do not include either "annual" or "yearly," but in any case I do not understand why a sum which is calculated on the footing that it accrues de die in diem has not the essential quality of recurrence in sufficient measure to bring it within the scope of income tax. It is surely irrelevant that the calculation begins on one day and ends on another. It is more important to bear in mind that it is income. F

Finally, it is right to say a very few words on a point taken by DU PARCQ, L.J., in his judgment and for that reason, but, as I understand it, for that reason only, put forward in this House on behalf of the appellants. The learned Lord Justice expressed a doubt, which argument did not dispel, whether a defendant who is required by the order of the court to pay a judgment debt for a fixed sum which includes interest can be said to be making a payment of interest when he pays that sum. The liability to pay interest, he suggested, is superseded by, or merged in, the judgment debt. This opens an attractive vista, e.g., to mortgagees, who, by persuading their mortgagors to allow judgment to be recovered against them for the interest from time to time due, might thus escape liability to tax on that interest, but, with great respect to G H

the learned Lord Justice, I do not think that the suggestion is well founded. No doubt, for some purposes an obligation of lower degree is merged in one of higher degree, a doctrine presumably based on the policy of avoiding multiplicity of suits, but I do not think that this has any relevance as between third parties as e.g., between the creditor and the Crown when the question is whether a certain sum is capital or income and if income whether it is taxable income in the hands of the creditor. The question is the same and must be determined by the same considerations whether the sum is paid voluntarily or under an order of the court.

I would add that, having had the privilege of reading the speech which LORD NORMAND is about to deliver, I wish to express my concurrence in his observations on the cases decided by the Court of Session on this subject. In my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD NORMAND : My Lords, I respectfully agree with the opinion of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack and also with that of LORD SIMONDS. I propose merely to add some observations on the Scots Law as it is affected by the decision in this appeal and on the Scots cases cited by counsel.

Claims for interest may arise in Scots Law ex pacto, ex lege or ex mora. Interest ex pacto is beyond question income in the hands of the recipient. The same may be said of interest ex lege, and it was so decided in Sweet v. McDiarmid (14). Interest ex mora corresponds to the interest awarded to the present appellant under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, s. 3. That interest ran from the date at which the principal sum was first wrongfully withheld from the appellant and it is wrongful retention of the debt from the creditor that is the legal ground for an award of interest ex mora in Scotland (Carmichael v. Caledonian Ry Co. (15), LORD WESTBURY, p. 131). The correspondence is not complete—for example, interest is awarded by the Scottish courts as of right, whereas in England the award depends on the exercise of a discretion which the statute has committed to the jury or the court. Nevertheless, the principle of the decision in this appeal will apply to interest awarded ex mora in Scotland.

The retention of the principal sum in the present instance was fraudulent, but the award of interest either under the statute in England or ex mora in Scotland does not depend on proof of fraudulent retention or of negligent retention of the principal. The commonest example, indeed, of an award of interest ex mora is a decree for interest from the date of citation in an action in which the pursuer has successfully sued for the disputed amount due to him on an open account, where there is neither averment nor proof of fraud or negligence (Blair's Trustees v. Payne (16)). The wrongful withholding is then merely the refusal of the creditor's demand contained in the summons and the implied denial of his right. Even when there is no proof of fraud or negligence the interest awarded is sometimes spoken of as damages both in England and in Scotland, but in Scotland, at least, it would, I think, be more appropriately described as compensation. This matter of terminology is, however, of no great importance, for the liability of a payment to income tax does not depend on whether or not it is a payment of damages, but on whether or not it is received as income. The interest payments which were the subject of litigation in Schulze v. Bensted (12), had been decerned for in an action (Lee's Trustees v. Dun (17)), raised by trustees against the representatives of a deceased trustee of the same estate. It was an action of damages based on negligence. In allowing the Revenue's claim to income tax on this interest, the LORD PRESIDENT cited with approval the definition of interest in BELL'S DICTIONARY, "interest of money may be defined to be the creditor's share of the profit which the borrower or debtor is presumed to make from the use of the money," and he treated the interest awarded as the just recompense to the creditors for being deprived of the use of the money or in other words as interest awarded ex mora. He held, accordingly, that this interest was received by the creditors as the fruit or income of the principal sum which ought to have been paid to them on the date from which the interest ran. LORD JOHNSTON, agreeing with the LORD PRESIDENT's conclusion, said (7 Tax Cas. 34) :

When it [the interest] reached the hands of the trustees it was a surrogatum for that which ought to have termly reached the hands of the trustees and have been applied by them as income, in which case it would have been subject to income tax, and when it did reach their hands, I think they were equally bound to apply it in accounting with the beneficiaries as income, and I am unable to see any sound reason for holding that it did not become liable to income tax in the hands of the trustees when received.

LORD JOHNSTON, in the course of his opinion, took occasion to say that where a pursuer recovers damages with interest from the date of decree he did not think that that interest was chargeable. I do not agree with LORD JOHNSTON on this point, and I am of opinion that in such a case the interest, even if it is properly to be considered as part of the damages, is nevertheless received as income by the creditor in the judgment debt. However that may be, Schulze v. Bensted (12), is authority for the proposition that interest awarded ex mora, even in an action of damages, is income and not capital in the hands of the creditor and is subject to income tax. In short, it decided practically the same point as has arisen in the present appeal and it decided it in complete accordance with the opinion which has been expressed by my noble and learned friend.

There are cases in which a calculation of interest is used as a means of arriving at a capital sum of damages. Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Ballantine (11), is an example. In that case an arbiter having a duty to award a sum as compensation for "outlays and loss" assessed it in the form of annual interest, and it was held that, though the compensation was described as interest and though it was calculated as interest is calculated, the creditor received it as capital. Similarly, in Glenboig Union Fireclay Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (5), a sum received by a company as compensation for deprivation of a capital asset and calculated on the basis of the annual profits which the company might have expected to earn by exploiting the asset was treated as a capital sum, but while there may be difficulty in deciding in particular cases whether a payment described and calculated as interest is not in truth a capital payment, it is now settled that interest awarded ex mora, whether it is to be regarded as damages or not, is income of the creditor.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

NEILD v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Morton and Somervell, L.JJ.),
March 7, 11, 1947.]

Revenue—Excess profits tax—Exemption—Profession—Profits dependent on personal qualifications—Questions for consideration—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939 (c. 109), s. 12 (3).

Revenue—Appeals—Case Stated—Reference back—Reasonable doubt about finding.

To determine whether, and to what extent, a taxpayer is entitled to the benefit of the exemption from excess profits tax contained in s. 12 (3) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, consideration must be given not only to the question whether or not the profits comprised in the assessment arose from the carrying on by the taxpayer of a profession, but, if so, also whether or not the profits of the profession were dependent wholly or mainly on his personal qualifications.

In appeals by way of Case Stated by Commissioners of Income Tax although, in many cases, it is necessary and proper for the court itself to place a construction on what the commissioners have stated in the Case, there is a statutory right to refer back to the commissioners matters which are not found with sufficient clarity, and this power is one which ought to be exercised by the court whenever there is a clear doubt as to what the finding of the commissioners means.

(1) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Mawse, [1919] 1 K.B. 647; 88 L.J.K.B. 752; 12 Tax Cas. 749; Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the Crown, from a decision of MACNAGHTEN, J., dated July 26, 1946, and reported [1946] 2 All E.R. 405.

The taxpayer, who was a member of the British Optical Association and also of the Worshipful Company of Spectacle Makers, employed mechanics, and he and they made spectacles in accordance with his own prescriptions and in some cases in accordance with the prescriptions of others. He exhibited in a shop window at the entrance to his premises optical frames without glasses and unpriced, and he advertised in the local press. If a person troubled about his eyesight called on him, he would examine the patient's eyes and ascertain whether there was any disease. If he found that the patient was suffering from some eye disease, he would advise him to go and consult an oculist. If, on the other hand, he thought there was no disease, he would prescribe spectacles, and spectacles in accordance with that prescription would then be made, fitted to a frame, and sold to the customer for the sum of 10s. 6d.

The taxpayer was assessed to excess profits tax in the sum of £1,402 for the chargeable accounting period ended Apr. 5, 1943, that amount being arrived at by deducting his standard profits, £1,500, from his net profits of £2,902. The General Commissioners, on an appeal by the taxpayer, held that £750 out of that profit was "professional" and the remainder trading profit, but did not say whether they affirmed or reduced the assessment. At a further hearing, held at the request of the parties, the commissioners determined that the appeal should be dismissed on the ground that the taxpayer's business was mainly of a "commercial" nature. MACNAGHTEN, J., held that, on the facts found by the commissioners, the £750 which, in their opinion, was due to the carrying on of the profession of an oculist, ought to be deducted from the sum representing the combined profits of both the profession and the trade carried on by the taxpayer, and made an order that the assessment be reduced by £750. The Crown appealed.

LORD GREENE, M.R. : The taxpayer appealed to the General Commissioners for the city of Lincoln against an assessment to excess profits tax in respect of profits derived from his activities as an optician. The ground of the appeal was that he was carrying on a "profession" within the meaning of sub-s. (3) of s. 12 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939. That section, after charging excess profits tax on the excess over the standard profits derived from a "trade or business," provides, in sub-s. (3), that :

The carrying on of a profession by an individual or by individuals in partnership shall not be deemed to be the carrying on of a trade or business to which this section applies if the profits of the profession are dependent wholly or mainly on his or their personal qualifications. . .

The questions, therefore, before the commissioners were whether or not the profits comprised in the assessment arose from the carrying on of a profession, and, if so, whether or not the profits of the profession were dependent wholly or mainly on the taxpayer's personal qualifications. Those two questions are both questions of fact, subject to this, that, as in all questions of fact, whether they are propounded by a statute or whether they are propounded under some principle of law outside a statute, they can only be answered within certain limits. In other words, it has always been in such a case for the court to say whether there was evidence sufficient in law to support the conclusion of fact.

The commissioners held a first hearing on Feb. 15, 1945. They heard the evidence and, they expressed their view in these words :

The commissioners held that £750 of the profit of £2,902 for the chargeable accounting period ended Apr. 5, 1943, was professional and the remainder trading profits.

It is to be observed that that finding does not answer either of the two questions which it was relevant for the commissioners to consider. It was suggested that, in giving that opinion, they were, in effect, finding that, even if the activities of the taxpayer were professional, nevertheless the profits were not wholly or mainly dependent on his personal qualifications. Whatever they may have meant, they have not said that, and it is a little difficult to see exactly how their minds were working and whether they were directing their attention to the first question : Aye or no, was it a profession ?, or the second question: Aye or no, were the profits of that profession wholly or mainly due to personal qualifications?, or, thirdly, whether by that finding they were intending to say that there were two separate activities each of which could be severed from the other so that you could treat the professional activity as falling within sub-s. (3) and the other activity as not falling within sub-s. (3) but remaining within sub-s. (1). The last was the view the learned judge took, but, there again, it is not what they said. I think it right to say that, although in many cases it is necessary and right for the court to place a construction on what commissioners have said, it must always be remembered that a Case stated by commissioners is not like a will, phrases in which the court has to interpret one way or the other without calling up the ghost of the testator to say what he meant. There is a statutory right to refer back to the commissioners' matters which are not found with sufficient clarity in Cases Stated, and that seems to me to be a power in the court which ought to be exercised wherever the court finds that there is a reasonable doubt what the finding of the commissioners means. It might lead to great injustice to one side or the other if the court, treating the matter, so to speak, as though it was a will requiring interpretation, put its own conclusions on what the commissioners meant. I do not mean, of course, that in every case where there might be thought to be some arguable point of interpretation the Case ought to be remitted. There must be something which raises a clear doubt in the minds of the court whether the finding means one thing or another.

In the present case the language that is used appears to me to indicate one of two things. Either the commissioners did not appreciate what the questions were to which they ought to direct their minds, or, if they did, in using language which is not the language of the section, they were intending to come to some conclusion other than that which the section appears to contemplate. I find it very difficult to interpret exactly what they meant. There is a further doubt in regard to the view that the learned judge took. I am not expressing an opinion one way or the other, but it arises in this way. The parties rightly took the view that the first finding of the commissioners was not sufficient to dispose of the appeal, and by agreement they resolved to go back to the commissioners and invite them to complete the task which they had left only half performed. There was, accordingly, an adjourned hearing where various contentions were put forward, and the commissioners gave this decision:

That the appeal be dismissed, as in their opinion the taxpayer's business was mainly of a commercial nature and, therefore, liable to excess profits tax.

There again, that is not an answer to either of the questions which the statute requires to be considered, and, just as in the former instance I expressed no opinion what the finding meant, so now I express no opinion what the finding meant. I content myself with pointing out that it is not the finding which the statute requires, and, for my part, I find it difficult, with any real degree of conviction, to put a meaning on the findings of the commissioners, particularly when we have got to reconcile the first finding with this later one. In that connection, one of the points to which, perhaps, the learned judge did not pay sufficient attention lies in the fact that in the later finding the commissioners speak of "the taxpayer's business," which would appear to suggest that they were regarding the business as one entity and not as two severable entities, and that introduces a further ambiguity and doubt about the meaning of what they said in their earlier decision.

These matters of doubt are all the more puzzling in view of the simplicity of the question. I will not say the answer was an easy one, but the question was an easy one. Once the facts were found by the commissioners, the answer to the question called, not for any complicated expression of opinion, but for a mere simple finding of fact one way or the other. That being so, after having the benefit of a discussion with counsel on both sides we have come to the conclusion that MACNAGHTEN, J. ought to have sent the matter back if he thought, as he did think, that the commissioners were intending to find it was a case of severance, as in Maxse's case (1), so that they could state exactly what they did mean. That is the course that we propose to take on all the issues which arise—to send the Case back to the commissioners to elucidate their finding by answering the proper questions to which their minds ought to be directed.

One further point was raised by counsel for the taxpayer, but he did not press it, viz., that in the circumstances the first finding of the commissioners was the only one that had any validity in law, because, he said, when they had found that they were functi officio and could not, even by consent, resume the hearing. But when it was pointed out to him (as MACNAGHTEN, J. thought) that the first decision of the commissioners by no means fulfilled their statutory duty, he felt himself compelled to treat the Case (as he had agreed to treat it)

- A as a continuation of the original hearing in order that the commissioners might dispose of the whole appeal. The language in which they have done that, taking the document as a whole, appears now to contain such an element of doubt and obscurity as to leave it uncertain in my mind whether the commissioners have, so to speak, pleaded themselves within the section, either in whole or in part, and counsel for the Crown very properly thought that, in fairness to the taxpayer, these matters should be sent back to the commissioners that they may give a clear answer to the questions which the statute requires them to answer.

The appeal will stand over generally, and in the meantime this Case is remitted to the commissioners who are to take the matter further into their consideration and answer the following questions and report thereon to this court, viz., (a) whether the profit the taxpayer appealed from, or any, and, if so, what, part thereof, was derived from the carrying on of a profession. (b) If question (a) is answered in the affirmative, whether the profit so derived was dependent wholly or mainly on the personal qualifications of the taxpayer.

MORTON, L.J. : I agree.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree.

E ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. NORTHWOOD ELECTRIC LIGHT AND POWER CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Morton and Somervell, L.JJ.), March 3, 4, 1947.]

Revenue—Stamp duty—Receipt—Electricity pre-payment meter card—Entry by collector—Stamp Act, 1891 (c. 39), s. 103 (1).

- F O., a consumer of electricity supplied by the defendant company, paid in advance for his supply by means of coins inserted in a pre-payment meter. On Mar. 8, 1944, a collector employed by the company called at O.'s house, inspected the meter, took out the coins, and entered in the "amount due and collected" column of his pre-payment collection sheet the sum of £2 7s. 11d., which was the balance due to the company after deducting rebate and a small amount put back into the meter. In the final column of his pre-payment collection sheet the collector wrote his initials. A carbon copy of the various entries made on the sheet appeared on a pre-payment meter card which was enclosed in an envelope and left on O.'s premises, the envelope stating on its face that the card was the property of the company. In a suit to recover a fine under the Stamp Act, 1891, s. 103 (1), for giving a receipt liable to duty and not duly stamped,
- G
- H HELD : the phrase "gives a receipt" in s. 103 of the Stamp Act, 1891, must bear its ordinary prima facie meaning—viz., that the receipt is given in such a way that it can be retained by the recipient and will be available to him at any time as evidence of the payment which he has made, and the entry in the column "amount due and collected" in the circumstances in which O. had the pre-payment meter card in his possession was not a receipt given to him within the meaning of the sub-section.

Qu. : whether a receipt given subject to a condition that it shall be returned to the giver of the receipt at the expiration of some period, or on some other condition, can ever be a receipt which is "given" within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891.

APPEAL by the Crown from a decision of MACNAGHTEN, J., dated July 22, 1946, and reported ([1946] 2 All E.R. 324). The facts appear in the headnote and in the judgment of MACNAGHTEN, J., who held that the company had not given a receipt liable to duty and were, therefore, not liable to a fine under the Stamp Act, 1891, s. 103 (1).

The Solicitor-General (Sir Frank Soskice, K.C.) and C. H. Stamp for the Crown.

Sir Roland Burrows, K.C., and C. Fletcher-Cooke for the company.

LORD GREENE, M.R.: The document which is said by the Crown to contain a receipt within the meaning of s. 101 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and to have been given by the Northwood Electric Light and Power Co. to the consumer, contains a number of recorded particulars. The body of it comprises 14 columns in which there are figures and records which are important for the regulation and control of the consumption of the current by the consumer. There are other particulars, but the Crown picks on one of those columns, "Amount due and collected," and claims that the entries in that column constitute receipts, and that, in the circumstances in which the consumer has this card in his possession, they are receipts given to him within the meaning of the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, and s. 103 of the Act which imposes the relevant penalty.

The document, taken as a whole, appears to me clearly to be framed and filled in for purposes other than those of acknowledging the receipt of money, but that does not necessarily result in it not being or containing a receipt. Taking the document as a whole and remembering that the entries on it are reproduced on two other documents with which the consumer is not concerned, but which are kept for the purposes of the company's records, its general object appears to be what I may call administrative. The card and the other two documents are filled up to enable the checking by the company of its returns of the current consumed by the consumer and the money collected from the slot at the meter. It also has a useful function from the point of view of the consumer. I can find no contractual right on the part of the company to leave the card on the consumer's premises, nor can I find any contractual right on the part of the consumer to require that the company should leave it on his premises, but no sensible consumer would object to the company leaving it there, and no sensible company would, I imagine, arbitrarily take it away. It is mutually convenient to the company and the consumer that the consumer should have this record because, by looking at it, he can see what current he has consumed, what amount he has put in the box, what has been collected from him, what rebates he has been allowed, and generally can check his position. It is suggested that the endorsement on the envelope in which the card is supposed to be kept on the consumer's premises records some kind of contract between the company and the consumer with regard to the retention of the card and gives to the consumer some sort of right as against the company to insist on keeping the card. The envelope, the terms of which we are to assume the consumer in question here was acquainted with, states on its face: "This envelope and card are the property of the Northwood Electric Light and Power Co., Ltd. Please keep them clean and where they can soon be found." Then comes this which is particularly relied on: "The entries on the card enable the consumer to check the quantity charged for and record the amount of money collected from the meter." The word "record" refers to the words "The entries on the card." That is a statement of the convenient purposes which this card will serve from the consumer's point of view. The words do not suggest—but this is not by any means conclusive—that one function of the document is to act as a receipt given by the company to the consumer.

- It is suggested that there is to be inferred from the language used some sort of contract under which the consumer is entitled to say to the company: "This document is my voucher and I am entitled as between you and me to keep it as a voucher." It is not suggested that he can claim to keep it for ever, because, again, it is common ground that, when a tenancy changes and one consumer goes away and is replaced by another, the old consumer does not take his card. It runs, so to speak, with the house. Accordingly, the consumer has, it is said, a limited property in the card in the sense that he is entitled to insist on keeping it so long as he is in the house. I do not myself put his rights as high as that. I can discover no right in him to hold this document for five minutes if the company chooses to take it away from him. Indeed, to say that he is entitled to hold it for longer is in a sense really begging one of the questions which we have to decide, for this reason. Assuming this to be a receipt given within the meaning of the Act, if the right of the consumer to keep this card against the will of the company is non-existent, or even if it is existent for a limited period, that is to say, until the card comes to an end and is filled up, or until the consumer leaves the premises and gives up taking the supply, then this card fails to give to the consumer what a receipt in the ordinary acceptation of that word gives. It is true it might enable him, if he found himself in dispute with the collector, to refer the collector to the card, but it certainly cannot operate in a way that a receipt ordinarily operates. One of the objects of a receipt, as, indeed, the Act contemplates, is that it can be produced as evidence in a court of law. If it is not stamped, it cannot be so produced. The Act, therefore, recognises the use of such a document in a court of law as being one of the things which one would expect the holder of a receipt normally to enjoy. Unquestionably, if you say a person has given you a receipt for something, what you mean is that he has given you something in the plenary sense which you can keep as your own and produce on occasion when required and, particularly, in a court of law.

It is said that this document is a receipt within s. 101 (1), and the words mainly relied on are these:

- For the purposes of this Act the expression "receipt" includes any note, memorandum, or writing whereby any money amounting to £2 or upwards . . . is acknowledged or expressed to have been received or deposited or paid . . .

- It is common ground that, before duty is attracted to a document which fulfils that description, the document must be "given." That is to be found in the schedule which imposes a duty of what is now 2d. on a "receipt given for, or upon the payment of, money amounting to £2 or upwards." Under s. 103 (1) a person only becomes liable to a fine if he "gives a receipt liable to duty and not duly stamped." That is what it is said the company gave here by this document.

- I do not find it necessary to go into the question whether this document is, in itself, a receipt within the meaning of s. 101 (1). I may, however, call attention to the fact that, to be a receipt, it must be a document whereby the receipt or deposit or payment of money is acknowledged or expressed. As was pointed out by LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., in A.-G. v. Carlton Bank (1) ([1899] 2 Q.B. 165), the words "acknowledged or expressed" do appear to mean "acknowledged or expressed to somebody"—one would think acknowledged or expressed to the person paying or depositing money. That means that the document must, so to speak, have a bilateral operation. A mere entry in a man's own book in which he notes up against a debt owing to him that it has been paid is not an acknowledgment or expression to anybody, but a mere note made for his own convenience. On the other hand, to take the example put by MORTON, L.J., in the course of the case, if he tears out the sheet from his book and gives it to the payer, the document which started by being a unilateral document may, by that very act, acquire the quality of an acknowledgment or expression.

This case might be considered from the point of view of whether the action of the company in relation to its card as between itself and the customer imports that bilateral quality of acknowledgment or expression, having regard to the absence of any right on the part of the consumer to keep it, but I need not go into that rather subtle aspect of the case because to attract duty the document must be "given." It is not, I think, to be disputed that, when one considers that word in this context in relation to a document of the character of a receipt, the qualities and advantages of which are well known, one of them being, as the statute itself contemplates, its production in a court of law, prima facie, nobody can be said to have "given" a receipt if he attaches a condition under which the right of the recipient to keep it is in some way limited or circumscribed. It was suggested that cases might be thought of in which a document so limited or circumscribed might, nevertheless, amount to a receipt. I am not concerned to dispute that. In fact, one example is quite common—a deposit receipt, which will frequently, if not generally, bear on its face some such statement as that "the money deposited will be handed back against the surrender of this receipt." That is a case where the right of the person to whom the receipt is handed is circumscribed in the sense that in certain conditions he has to hand it back, but a deposit is rather a special type of transaction, quite unlike the ordinary payment of a debt, because, once the money deposited has been paid back, the usefulness of the receipt comes to an end for all practical purposes. In the case of a debt that is not true, because a debt may be claimed again. Examples were put of cases where receipts might be given on the terms that they should be handed back to the giver within quite a short period. It was said, if a man's tailor handed to him a document, on the face of it a receipt, with a condition imposed that the customer should hand it back to the tailor after six months, he would, nevertheless, be said to have given a receipt provided—and this is important—that the customer had in some way conducted himself so as to effect what amounted in law to a waiver of his right to demand an unconditional receipt. One, of course, can think of absurd cases like that, but it might very well be that a tailor who endeavoured to impose such conditions on his customers would find a very powerful reaction on their part. I am not, however, disposed to dispute the proposition, for the purposes of this argument, that, if a payer clearly waives any right to an unconditional receipt and accepts the document on the terms that it shall not be his but that he shall hand it back after a limited period, such a thing can be a receipt "given." What I am concerned to point out is that that is not the natural meaning of the word, and that, if such a case would still fall within the meaning of the word "gives" in the Act, it could only so fall if the prima facie meaning of the word was clearly excluded on the facts. It seems to me that, to deprive the payer of his right to an unconditional unlimited receipt, there would have to be some clear acceptance on his part of the condition which it is sought to impress on the giving of the document.

What is the position here? The document can be taken away by the company at any moment. Even if the construction put forward by the Crown is right, when the customer leaves the house he ceases to have any right to have this document at all. The document for mutual convenience is kept and used on the consumer's premises. He is not given the opportunity of insisting on a receipt. If the argument is true that he has waived his right to a receipt, the waiver must have resulted from the fact that he has had imposed on him a document which is put into his custody for quite temporary purposes. How that can amount to a waiver I am unable to understand. Moreover, the argument, with all respect to the Solicitor-General, cannot be successful for another reason. When one looks at s. 103 one finds these two subsections. First, there is the one under which the present claim is brought:

If any person (1) gives a receipt liable to duty and not duly stamped . . .

It is said that the company gave to the customer here a receipt liable to duty, and the word "gives" for that purpose is construed as covering the leaving of this document on the premises of the customer in the circumstances which I have stated. It is said that it is given notwithstanding the fact that the waiver of what might be called a prima facie plenary right to an unconditional customer has no right to keep it as against the company, and that there is a receipt. According to the Crown, the subsection has been satisfied and a receipt has been given. Then we come to sub-s. (2):

In any case where a receipt would be liable to duty [any person] refuses to give a receipt duly stamped.

It is conceded that that subsection comes into operation when the customer demands what I call a plenary unconditional receipt, and that in this case the customer could say to the company: "Please give me a receipt which I can keep, something quite different from this document, a receipt which is to be my property." It is admitted that in response to that request the company could not impose a condition that the customer's right to keep the document should in any way be limited. Accordingly, if the Crown is right, this curious position would arise. First, a stamp has to be placed on this card whenever the collector makes the relevant entry in respect of a sum of more than £2. The customer next day can say to the company: "Give me an unqualified receipt," and the company would be bound to give him such an unqualified receipt under a penalty of £10 if it refused. Accordingly, the Crown would obtain two sums of 2d. each in respect of the same payment. This involves, be it observed, giving a different meaning to the word "give" in sub-s. (2) from what it has in sub-s. (1), because in sub-s. (2), admittedly, it must mean "give out and out, give without any condition or limitation as to the recipient's right to keep it." On the other hand, if the Crown is right, in sub-s. (1) the words "gives a receipt" are satisfied by something much less, namely, the dealing with a card such as this so that the customer's right to keep it is momentary only, because the company can take it away whenever it pleases, or, anyhow, can take it away directly the customer leaves the house, and thereby deprive the customer of the benefit which the ordinary plenary, unconditional receipt would confer on him. I cannot, in relation to one transaction and one sum of money, construe the phrase "gives a receipt" in one sense in sub-s. (1), and in a different sense in sub-s. (2). It appears to me that in this case there are no circumstances from which the customer can be said to have any choice in the matter so far as keeping this card is concerned, though, I suppose, he could say to the company: "Take it away. I do not want it," but he has no right to demand that he can keep it as long as he likes. I can find nothing in the circumstances which, in the remotest degree, could be construed as a waiver by the customer of his right to demand a full receipt or as in any way an acceptance binding on him of something less than a full receipt.

That being, so, it seems to me that the phrase "gives a receipt" must bear its ordinary prima facie meaning, namely, that the receipt is given in such a way that it is and will be available to the recipient for the purpose which it purports to effect whenever he may choose to want it for that purpose.

There is one other matter which I should mention because it does, I think, strengthen the argument—if, indeed, it requires strengthening—and that is the language of sub-s. (2) of s. 101 which provides:

The duty upon a receipt may be denoted by an adhesive stamp, which is to be cancelled by the person by whom the receipt is given before he delivers it out of his hands.

Can it be said that the company has delivered this card out of its hands when it retains the property in the card and can take it back at any moment when it likes, or, at any rate, at the moment the customer leaves the house? It seems to me, giving the language its ordinary meaning, that that cannot be said.

In the cases where this section has come under construction, and there are only a few, it seems to have been assumed by the judges who have dealt with it that a person to whom a receipt is "given" is meant to retain it. That phrase "retain it," and another phrase "to be kept as evidence of payment by the recipient" appear in the judgment of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., in A-G v. Carlton Bank (1), but I think that in the judgments of the Court of Session in Day v. Glaister (2) there is an even clearer expression that that is the fundamental conception. There, dealing, of course, with a different class of case from this one, LORD TRAYNER describes the operation of the statute in this language (37 Sc.L.R. 738):

It appears to me that what the statute provides for is limited to any note, memorandum, or writing given by one person to another, to be retained by the recipient as his voucher, either of the discharge of a payment made, as in the ordinary case of a payment of a debt, or acknowledgment of an obligation undertaken in respect of the receipt of money, as in a deposit. Sections 102 and 103 of the Act appear to me plainly to refer to "receipts" which have passed from one person to another, and those are, in my opinion, the kind of notes or memoranda to which s. 101 alone refers.

I need not quote more from those judgments. Although the point that we have to decide was not, of course, before the judges in those cases, it is significant that the language that they use makes it clear that, in their opinion, they are dealing with something which any ordinary person, understanding the language of business, would regard as "giving" a receipt—not something conditional, but something outright. In my opinion, the learned judge was perfectly right, and this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

MORTON, L.J.: The writing in question in this case does not require a stamp under the Stamp Act, 1891, unless (a) it is a receipt, and (b) it has been "given" within the meaning of sched. I. A creditor, who has been paid money, may write on a sheet of paper: "I acknowledge that I have received £1,000 from A.B. who owed me that sum," but, unless and until that piece of paper is given to A.B., the debtor, it requires no stamp. I do not pause to consider whether the document which I have described is a document "whereby any money is acknowledged or expressed to have been received" within s. 101 while it still remains in the creditor's desk and has not been given to the debtor. Coming to the facts of the present case, I feel grave doubt if the relevant entry on the card is a "receipt" within the definition in s. 101. It is an entry on a document belonging to the company, made by an employee of the company by way of record in the course of his duty. It is stated in the Case that:

Save in this respect that the collector's duty is to perform the acts stated [including making the entry on the card in question] the collector has no authority to give receipts on behalf of the company.

I think, if I may respectfully say so, that there is great force in the observations of LORD TRAYNER with regard to this matter in a passage in Day v. Glaister (2), which was not read by the Master of the Rolls. In referring to s. 101 of the Stamp Act, LORD TRAYNER says (37 Sc.L.R., 737):

... it is obvious that the language is capable of covering more than it was intended to express. For, taken literally, it would cover and include any note or memorandum which a man might make in his own books acknowledging receipt of £2 or upwards from another. This is plainly not intended by the Act. An entry in his cash book made by A. to the effect that he has received £60 from B. would fall within the meaning of the words of the Act descriptive of a receipt, but are plainly not within its intention or meaning.

To that, I would add that LORD TRAYNER, apparently, had not in his mind at that moment the further point that a receipt must be "given" before it requires a stamp. That is pointed out by BRAY, J., in General Council of the Bar (England) v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (3), ([1907] 1 K.B., 477), where he says:

It is plain that the attention of LORD TRAYNER was not called to the words of the schedule "receipt given."

Let me assume, however, that the entry in question does amount to a receipt within the meaning of the Act. Was it ever "given"? In my view, it clearly was not. It was contained in a card, deposited in the flat whereof Mr. Oliver was the occupant. If Mr. Oliver, the consumer, left the flat, he had no right to take the card with him. That is recognised in the Case:

The electricity pre-payment meter card is the property of the company. It remains at the premises on change of occupancy.

For the reasons already given by the Master of the Rolls, I think that Mr. Oliver could not have objected if the company had taken the card away. There is nothing in the contract between the parties, consisting of an application by Mr. Oliver and a document containing the conditions of supply, which says that Mr. Oliver is to be entitled to retain this document. If there is some agreement outside the conditions of supply, I do not at the moment see what the consideration was for that agreement, nor do I see any reason why it should be implied from the circumstances. However, let me again make an assumption in favour of the Crown's contention. Let me assume that Mr. Oliver could have objected to the removal of that card. The fact remains that the card was the company's property, and that Mr. Oliver only had the very limited right to insist that it should remain in the flat while he was an occupier. In my view, there was still no "giving" of the receipt to Mr. Oliver.

A The argument of the Solicitor-General and Mr. Stamp involves them in a number of difficulties which I shall not examine in detail, but I will refer to one, taking, first, their own definition of what the word "gives" means in the statute. "Gives," they said, means "delivering or making available for use as a voucher." I then drew attention to the fact that that definition did not define the period for which the document was to be made available for use as a voucher, but I received the reply that the definition was quite general and quite simple. If the document was made available for use as a voucher, it was a receipt within the meaning of the Act and it must be stamped. To test this argument, I shall take the case of a debtor who owes £1,000 and pays it in full. The creditor hands to him a receipt—I will call it a receipt B for the moment—with a note on it: "This document remains the property of the creditor and has to be returned to the creditor at the end of six months." There is no assent by the debtor, let me assume, to this limitation of time, but that is the only receipt which he gets. Has the debtor been given a receipt within the Stamp Act? At first sight I think the Solicitor-General was inclined to answer that he had not. If that is the right answer, it seems to me to follow C that Mr. Oliver was not given a receipt in the present case. Later, both the Solicitor-General and Mr. Stamp were inclined to answer "Yes" to the question just stated. They were then asked: "Supposing that the receipt is stamped, as you say it ought to be, and the debtor subsequently, either before or after the expiration of the six months, says: 'Now, I want you to give me a receipt which I can keep,' would a refusal of that request involve an offence by the creditor under s. 103 (2) of the Act?" They replied that it D would, because the creditor could not have refused to make the receipt available simpliciter and without any condition. If that is so, it leads inevitably to the conclusion that counsel for the Crown are attributing a meaning to the phrase "give a receipt" in sub-s. (1) of s. 103 different from that which they attribute to the same phrase in sub-s. (2). That is an illustration of the difficulties arising from the contention of the Crown.

E I would add that I would like to reserve for consideration if and when the point arises the question whether a receipt given subject to a condition that it shall be returned to the giver of the receipt at the expiration of some period, or on some other condition, can ever be a receipt which is "given" within the meaning of the Stamp Act. That question does not arise in the present case, in my view, because the so-called receipt was never given to the consumer at all. Therefore, I have formed no view on that question. I agree F that the judgment of the learned judge was right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree with the judgments which have been delivered, and the reasons and conclusions which have been come to. MACNAGHTEN, J., said ([1946] 2 All E.R., 326):

G In my opinion, the word "gives" in s. 103 means what it says—that the person to whom it is given can keep it as his own.

H It was pointed out in the course of the argument that the actual piece of paper may not be originally the property of the payee. It may be produced by the payer. I think the learned judge clearly meant that a receipt is given when, after the transaction has taken place between the parties, the payer is in possession of a document which must be a receipt within s. 101 and which he can keep as his own. I do not exclude the possibility of a special arrangement clearly made between the parties, such as was referred to by the Master of the Rolls as appearing in what I think is the normal form of receipt when a deposit is made and what is called a deposit receipt is given. I should also like to say that there is no suggestion in this case that the position as already explained by the Master of the Rolls was a colourable arrangement arrived at between the parties to avoid the payment of duty.

The Solicitor-General pressed on us—indeed, I think it was the foundation of his argument—that the word "given" in its context in the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, should be read as meaning "made available." I join issue with the argument at that initial point. There are many cases which one can think of in which something might be made available in the ordinary sense of that word, of which no one could say that it had been given. One example is as good as another. A man might, for instance, have a circular saw and think it right to make it available to his neighbour for his use for a limited time, but it would clearly be an inapt use of the word "given" to say that he had "given" the saw to his neighbour. I prefer the meaning which MACNAGHTEN, J., places on the word in its context, and I think that is the meaning which it has. So construed, for the reasons which have been given by my brethren, it seems to me impossible to say that a receipt was given to the consumer in this case.

SKELDING v. PERRINS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Scott and Somervell, L.JJ., and Romer, J.), February 26, 1947.]

Workmen's Compensation—Compensation—Industrial Disease—Cataract—Compensation only payable for 4 months from date of disablement unless workman has undergone operation—Proviso enabling arbitrator to continue payments if "satisfied on the advice of the medical referee that an operation could not for medical reasons be performed within 4 months"—"Could not for medical reasons"—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (c. 84), s. 43, sched. III—Workmen's Compensation (Industrial Diseases) Consolidation Order, 1929 (S.R. & O., 1929, No. 2), para. (3), proviso (a)—Workmen's Compensation (Cataract) Order, 1932 (S.R. & O., 1932, No. 424).

A workman was certified, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, as suffering from cataract, owing to the nature of his work. The medical referee stated that, although an operation could be performed within 4 months from the date of disablement, there were, in his opinion, medical reasons why such an operation should not be performed within that time :

HELD : an operation could not be performed for medical reasons within the meaning of proviso (a) to the Workmen's Compensation (Industrial Diseases) Consolidation Order, 1929, para. (3) (as amended by the Workmen's Compensation (Cataract) Order, 1932), if medical opinion, as stated by the medical referee, regarded it as inadvisable, and the workman was, therefore, entitled to compensation under the proviso. The object of para. (3) was to put pressure on a workman suffering from cataract to take medical advice whether he should undergo an operation and only to deprive him of compensation if he refused to undergo it against medical advice.

[FOR THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION (INDUSTRIAL DISEASES) CONSOLIDATION ORDER, 1929, AS AMENDED BY THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION (CATARACT) ORDER, 1932, see WILLIS'S WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION, 37th Edn., p. 720].

APPEAL by the employer from an award of His Honour JUDGE LANGMAN, made at Stourbridge County Court on June 6, 1946, allowing a workman's claim for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation (Industrial Diseases) Consolidation Order, 1929, para. (3), proviso (a) (as amended).

A. P. Marshall for the workman.

SCOTT, L.J. : This case depends entirely on the correct interpretation of a paragraph in the Workmen's Compensation (Industrial Diseases) Consolidation Order, 1929 (as amended by the Workmen's Compensation (Cataract) Order, 1932, extending the provisions of s. 43 of and sched. III to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, to various diseases which were not in the original schedule. The particular disease in question is eye cataract. The Order provides :

(1) Subject to the modifications hereinafter specified the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 43, shall extend and apply to the diseases, injuries, and processes, specified in . . . the schedule annexed to this Order, as if the said diseases and injuries were included in . . . sched. III to the Act . . .

Para. (3) of the Order is in the following terms :

A person suffering from cataract shall not be entitled to compensation under the provisions of the said section on account of that disease . . . for more than 4 months unless he has undergone an operation for cataract. Provided (a) that where the judge, committee or arbitrator is satisfied on the advice of the medical referee that an operation could not for medical reasons be performed within 4 months from the date of disablement, compensation may be continued for such further period and subject to such conditions as the judge, committee or arbitrator may direct.

There is a second limb which I do not think adds anything to the first limb of the proviso on the question of interpretation that we have to deal with today.

The workman in question had a cataract in the left eye, in respect of which he was duly certified in accordance with the schedule and compensation was paid for a time. He consulted an ophthalmic surgeon, the matter was referred to the medical referee, and the referee affirmed the decision of the certifying surgeon that he was suffering from cataract and thereby incapacitated.

Referring to the words in the proviso "on the advice of the medical referee that an operation could not for medical reasons be performed within 4 months . . ." the employer says that in this case an operation could be performed, and that argument was submitted to the court although it was quite clear from the decision of the medical referee that it was, in the view of the doctors, inadvisable to perform the operation. The eye in question was the left eye, and the right eye was not then substantially affected by cataract. On Apr. 4, 1945, the referee, dismissing the appeal from the certifying surgeon's certificate of disablement of the workman, certified in the following terms :

He is suffering from cataract caused by exposure to rays from molten or red hot metal and is thereby disabled from earning full wages at the work he was employed upon. He is fit for light work which does not involve exposure to rays from molten or red hot metal. Left eye : mature cataract. Vision perception of light. Right eye : signs of early cataract formation.

The county court judge remitted the matter to the referee for further information explanatory of his certificate. On that, the referee said :

(i) I do not consider there were any medical reasons for performing an operation on this man's left eye before July 11, 1945. (ii) As there are no medical reasons for an operation, then the question of the delay in operating being due to the inability to obtain a bed or place in hospital does not arise.

I read the second reason simply to make it quite clear that the negative opinion of the first paragraph meant a positive opinion that there were no medical reasons for an operation. July 11, 1945, was the date of the expiry of the 4 months' period.

The matter came to this court on appeal by the employers, and we thought some further elucidation was desirable. The first question we addressed to the referee was :

Whether an operation could or could not for medical reasons have been performed before July 11, 1945.

The answer was—

An operation could have been performed on the left eye and there are no medical reasons why such operation could not have been performed. In my opinion, however, medical reasons do exist why such operation should not have been performed.

In a separate explanatory paragraph he adds :

The operation would, undoubtedly, have improved the vision of the left eye, though further optical assistance would have been necessary to render the eye effective. Even with optical assistance, however, the eye could not be made to focus with the right eye. Each eye could be utilised independently, probably with equal efficiency, but in the ordinary course of nature, the applicant would use the right eye to the exclusion of the left.

I construe that answer as amounting to a statement that medical advice was against an operation. On that it is contended by counsel for the employers that the proviso in para. 3 of the Order must be read in a strictly literal sense, namely, that, if it is surgically possible to operate, then, unless the operation is performed, the four months limitation extinguishes the workman's right, even although competent medical advice was against performing the operation because, regarding the case as a whole, there was no sufficient justification, on balance, for performing it.

In construing the proviso, it is right to have regard to the fact that there had, when the delegated legislation was passed, been a long series of cases coming up to this court in which it had been held that, where a workman refused to undergo an operation, the onus of proving that the workman's refusal was unreasonable was on the employer. I think in the case of cataract that refusal to submit to operation was the mischief aimed at by the terms of the Order, which was intended to put pressure on the workman to take medical advice whether he should undergo an operation, but only to deprive him of compensation if the doctors were of opinion that an operation should be performed and if he then refused to undergo it. In the present case, the medical referee has in terms advised that there were no reasons in favour of the operation. In my opinion, that is enough to satisfy the proviso, and there must be judgment in favour of the workman.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree. It is said that we are construing "could" in the relevant provision of the schedule as "should." The addition of the words "for medical reasons" seems to me in effect to make this the proper construction. It cannot have been intended to force on the workman an operation which is medically inadvisable, nor is there any method of forcing a doctor to perform an operation which he thinks inadvisable. It does not seem to me that we are putting a forced construction on the words if we hold that an operation cannot be performed for medical reasons if medical opinion, under this provision, as stated by the medical referee, regards it as serving no useful purpose or otherwise inadvisable.

ROMER, J.: I agree.

SAGE v. SAGE.

STOCKBRIDGE v. STOCKBRIDGE.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, J.), March 5, 12, 1947.]

Divorce—Parties—Co-respondent—Naming and making alleged adulterer co-respondent—Discretion of court to dispense with necessity—"Special grounds"—Burden of proof—Matters for consideration of court—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 177 (1)—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1944, r. 5.

In applications under s. 177 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and r. 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1944, for relief from the need to name an alleged adulterer and make him a co-respondent, unless the husband discharges the burden, which is on him, by showing "special grounds," the Act requires that the alleged adulterer be made a co-respondent. The mere fact of the prevalence at any particular time of a particular class of cases does not afford any valid reason for relaxing, in favour of the husband, the plain requirements of the Act and rules. The court must be satisfied on the facts of each particular case that special grounds exist. Though it is the duty of the court, in the exercise of its discretion, to strike a balance between the need of safeguarding the public interest, on the one hand, and of avoiding unnecessary hardship to the litigants, on the other, the public interest is the paramount consideration. Mere proof of hardship to the parties is not enough by itself to constitute special grounds. The husband must also satisfy the court on the facts of the particular case that the risk of presentation of a false case, or of other injury to the public interest, is so small as to be almost negligible.

Where a child was born to the wife on June 6, 1945, and it could be shown that the husband was overseas from May, 1940, to May, 1945, and the wife had made a written confession in which she gave the name of the alleged adulterer, but stated that he was a Canadian and she did not know his address and that adultery took place on only one occasion during an interval at a dance, and the husband's solicitor had sworn an affidavit in which he said that he could not think of any inquiries which might be made with a view to ascertaining the identity of the alleged adulterer.

A HELD: there being no hope of ascertaining the identity of the alleged adulterer or of obtaining evidence against him and as the possibility of collusion between the husband and the wife or of connivance on the part of the husband could be disregarded, leave would be given to proceed without making the alleged adulterer a co-respondent, but, as a name had been furnished by the wife, it would not be right to dispense with naming the alleged adulterer in the petition as being "a man whose name is stated by the respondent to be A.B., but whose identity is unknown to the petitioner."

C Where, however, a child was born to the wife on July 13, 1945, and it could be shown that the husband was overseas from March, 1943, until after that date, and the wife had disclosed in writing the name and address in England of the alleged adulterer and had stated that, while she had not actually cohabited with him, adultery had taken place on a number of occasions at the house where she had lodged while her husband was away, but she was unable to furnish the name and address of any witness who could speak of the association, and the court was not satisfied that all reasonable efforts had been made to obtain evidence against the alleged adulterer,

D HELD, while the probability of collusion or connivance was extremely slight it could not be completely disregarded as in the previously mentioned case, and in view of that fact and the fact that it did not appear that all reasonable efforts had been made to obtain evidence against the alleged adulterer, leave would not be given to dispense with making him a co-respondent and still less with naming him in the petition.

E [EDITORIAL NOTE. As is clear from the terms of the statute and the statutory rule and from the authorities the question whether leave shall be given to a husband petitioner to dispense with naming an alleged adulterer in the petition or making him a co-respondent is entirely one for the discretion of the court to be exercised on the particular facts of the case, but practitioners, when considering whether or not applications for leave should be made, should find of considerable assistance the five matters indicated by WILLMER, J., in the latter half of his judgment.

APPLICATIONS, referred by the registrar, for leave to proceed with petitions for divorce without naming the alleged adulterers.

H John B. Lately for the husbands.

WILLMER, J., read the following judgment: I have before me two applications by husbands for leave to proceed with their petitions without naming the alleged adulterers. Both cases are of a type which is now common in this court, for in both it is sought to prove the alleged adultery by furnishing evidence (a) that the wife has given birth to a child, and (b) that the husband was at all material times absent on military service overseas, so as to preclude the possibility of his being the father of the child. In each case the name of an alleged adulterer has been furnished by the wife, but in neither case is the husband acquainted with him, and in both it is said that it will not be possible for the husband to offer any evidence of the adulterer's guilt. It is in these circumstances that the husbands ask to be relieved of the obligation of naming the alleged adulterer. So much is common to both cases, but there are, as I think, material differences between the facts of the two cases, to which I will refer in a moment. The cases have been referred to me by the registrar before whom they came in the first instance, because (so I was informed) there is a large number of similar cases now awaiting decision, and it was hoped that my decision in these two cases might afford some guidance in dealing with the other cases. In view of the importance of the matter I thought it right to call for argument in open court, and I have taken time to consider my decision.

The applications are made under s. 177 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, the material words of which are as follows :

On a petition for divorce presented by the husband . . . the petitioner . . . shall make the alleged adulterer a co-respondent unless he is excused by the court on special grounds from so doing.

It is also necessary to refer to r. 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1944, which provides as follows, again omitting immaterial words :

Unless otherwise directed, where an alleged male adulterer is named in a husband's petition for divorce . . . such alleged adulterer shall, if living at the date of the filing of the petition, be made a co-respondent in the case. . .

It will be noticed that the Act is silent about naming an alleged adulterer. Rule 5 provides in terms only for the case of an adulterer who is named, and there is no provision in the rules dealing in terms with the case of an unnamed adulterer. It is well settled, however, that the expression "alleged adulterer," as used in the Act, includes not only a named adulterer but also one whose name and identity may be unknown to the husband. It has, accordingly been held in the recent case of Eastham v. Eastham (1) that where the name of the alleged adulterer is unknown it is still necessary for the husband to ask the court for leave to proceed without naming the adulterer. In other words, it is necessary to seek the decision of the court on both questions, namely, (a) whether the husband is to have leave to proceed without naming an adulterer, and also (b) whether an adulterer who has been named is to be made a co-respondent.

It is clear both from the terms of the Act itself and from the decisions under the corresponding section of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, that the question to be decided is one for the discretion of the court. It is, therefore, impossible to lay down any rule which will be of general application, and in Saunders v. Saunders (2) the Court of Appeal expressly decided that any attempt to do so would be wrong. Each case must be decided on its own merits, and I wish to make it clear that nothing which I say in this judgment is intended in any way to lay down any general rule which might fetter the discretion of the court in any future cases. I think, however, that it is both permissible and useful to state what considerations I have attempted to bear in mind in arriving at my decision in the present cases, and what are the circumstances which the court may properly, in my judgment, take into consideration in exercising its discretion in similar cases.

Counsel for the husbands was careful to confine his argument to those cases in which the incontrovertible facts raise something in the nature of an irresistible inference that adultery has been committed, and in which (as in the present cases) the husband, apart from the confession of the wife, has no evidence whatever as to who the adulterer was. He contended that in such cases to insist on the alleged adulterer being named in the petition, and still more to insist on his being made a co-respondent, would have the effect of inflicting grave hardship, not only on the husband, but also on the proposed co-respondent. The husband would be put to the expense of proceeding against a man against whom he would have no chance of succeeding, with the added danger of being condemned in costs in case the alleged adulterer saw fit to defend and assert his right to be dismissed from the proceedings. As to the alleged adulterer, it was pointed out that he might well be himself a married man, and that the only effect of naming him in proceedings which were bound to be abortive as against him might be to precipitate the break-up of two homes instead of one. Counsel conceded that, in addition to considering the parties, the court must also bear in mind the public interest in minimising the risk of any collusive design to present a false case, and contended that the duty of the court was to strike a just balance between the necessity of safeguarding the public interest, on the one hand, and the avoidance of unnecessary hardship to the parties, on the other, but he argued that in cases such as those now before the court the risk of a false case being presented was reduced almost to vanishing point, and that any public advantage to be gained from naming the alleged adulterer would be far outweighed by the hardship which might be caused to the parties. Counsel further pointed out that the court, in exercising its discretion on this matter (as on any other), should pay due regard to the contemporary conditions and to the present day needs of the community, and he appeared to suggest that the fact of the prevalence of this type of case at the present time might itself afford good reason for some relaxation of the practice of the court in favour of petitioners.

A The reports are full of cases in which applications similar to those in the present cases have been made. I need not refer to the earlier decisions, for in 1896 all the previous authorities were reviewed by GORELL BARNES, J., in Jones v. Jones (3), where many of the essential facts were similar to those of the present cases. In that case GORELL BARNES, J., sought to lay down a rule which he expressed in the following terms ([1896] P.170) :

C I am of opinion that, where the relief sought against the respondent is on the ground of adultery alleged to have been committed with a man, whose name and identity are known, and who is alive, the petitioner must make such person a co-respondent, and that the court ought not to excuse him from so doing, merely because he finds that he cannot obtain evidence, which will prove his case as against such co-respondent.

In the particular case GORELL BARNES, J., was not satisfied that the husband could not get evidence against the alleged adulterers, and he refused the application.

D In the following year the Court of Appeal, in Saunders v. Saunders (2), while not disagreeing with the actual decision in Jones v. Jones (3), expressed their disapproval of the rule laid down by GORELL BARNES, J., on the ground that such a rule would act as a fetter on the discretion of the court. They insisted that the court must apply its mind to each particular case and decide, on the facts of the particular case, what it was just and expedient to do, being guided by the statute, the rules of court, and what experience shows to be the dangers to be avoided. Later in the same year, in Edwards v. Edwards (4) another similar case came before the court, and SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., took the opportunity of commenting on and to some extent explaining the two previous decisions. He pointed out that there are many cases where the facts are so clear as hardly to call for the exercise of the court's discretion. Thus, where the alleged adulterer is dead, or is actually unknown, e.g., because he has escaped and cannot be found, the court can in practice do no other than grant leave to proceed without a co-respondent. On the other hand, where the alleged adulterer is a known person whom the husband believes to be guilty, the court can in practice do no other than insist upon his being made a co-respondent. The real difficulties, calling for the exercise of the court's discretion, arise in the intermediate class of case where the evidence points to a known man whom, however, the husband states he cannot prove, and does not believe, to be guilty. G SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., suggests that the mere belief of the husband that the alleged adulterer is not guilty cannot by itself be sufficient to excuse his being made a co-respondent ; but that if the husband can go further, and satisfy the court that no evidence can be obtained against the man accused, then there may be a case for relieving the husband from making him a co-respondent.

I doubt whether anything more is to be collected from the authorities, but H I must just mention one more case which was cited to me, if only to say that I think it must be mis-reported. This is Gleed v. Gleed (5), which was before LORD MERRIVALE, P., in 1927. The wife had supplied the name of the alleged adulterer, but his identity and whereabouts were unknown, and he was believed to be somewhere in Australia. According to the report, LORD MERRIVALE gave leave to proceed without making the alleged adulterer a co-respondent. The facts disclosed were so strikingly similar to those of one of the cases now before me that I thought it would be useful to examine the actual record of the case. Having studied the file I find that the alleged adulterer, was, in fact, named and made a co-respondent, and the real question before the court, and the only question, was whether leave should be granted to dispense with service on him. I do not think, therefore, that this decision helps me very much in dealing with the present applications.

In my judgment, the wording of the Act makes it clear that it is for the husband to make out his case for relief from naming the alleged adulterer and making him a co-respondent. Unless the husband discharges the burden which is on him, by showing "special grounds," the Act requires that the alleged adulterer be made a co-respondent. The burden must be discharged on the facts of the particular case, and I do not at all assent to the proposition that the mere fact of the prevalence at any particular time of a particular class of case affords any valid reason for relaxing in favour of husbands the plain requirements of the Act. The court must be satisfied on the facts of each particular case that special grounds exist. While I agree with counsel for the husbands that the duty of the court is to strike a balance between the need for safeguarding the public interest, on the one hand, and for avoiding unnecessary hardship to the litigants, on the other, I desire to leave no doubt that, in my judgment, the public interest is the paramount consideration. In other words, I do not think that mere proof of hardship to the parties is enough by itself to constitute "special grounds," unless the husband can also satisfy the court that on the facts of the particular case the risk of presentation of a false case, or of other injury to the public interest, is so small as to be almost negligible.

In pursuance of these general observations it seems to me that the following are the sort of questions that the court may well ask itself in each particular case :—

(1) Is there any ground for suspecting that a false case is being presented ? In the ordinary type of non-access case, on proof of the essential facts, i.e., the birth of a child coupled with proof of the absence of the husband overseas at the material time, no room is left for doubt that adultery has, in fact, been committed, but the possibility remains that husband and wife may have entered into a collusive bargain to conceal the identity of the real adulterer or the wife may be deceiving her husband by accusing an innocent man so as to cloak the identity of the real adulterer. Obviously the probability of collusion between the parties diminishes the longer the absence of the husband overseas has been, but, if there remains any reasonable doubt as to the truth of the wife's accusations against the alleged adulterer, to name him and make him a co-respondent clearly provides some safeguard in the public interest.

(2) Is there any ground for suspecting that the husband has connived at the adultery of his wife ? The mere fact that he is proved to have been overseas at the time of the alleged adultery is clearly not sufficient by itself to negative the possibility that he may have connived at it, but equally it is clear that the longer the husband's absence overseas has been the less likelihood can there be of his having connived at his wife's adultery.

(3) Has the husband, in fact, taken all reasonable steps to see whether evidence against the alleged adulterer can be obtained ? Where nothing but the names of the alleged adulterer has been disclosed, and the husband has no knowledge of any such person, it may well be that no further steps are open to the husband to obtain evidence against him, but where the wife discloses both the name and address of the alleged adulterer, it seems to me that she discloses the identity of the man accused unless on further inquiry it appears that no such person exists. Where the identity of the alleged adulterer has been so disclosed, it is clear that the husband has scope for further inquiry, since evidence may be obtained as to the movements and behaviour of the alleged adulterer at the material time. Still more is this the case when the time and place of the alleged adultery has been disclosed. Unless it appears that reasonable steps to obtain evidence have, in fact, been taken, it appears to me that no case for dispensing with making the alleged adulterer a co-respondent has been made out.

(4) What is the hardship that the husband will suffer if the court insists on the alleged adulterer being made a co-respondent ? Various hardships have been suggested. (a) The husband may be put to further, and, possibly, abortive expense in endeavouring to obtain evidence against the alleged adulterer. It seems to me that the hardship of incurring this expense must be weighed against the probability or otherwise of its being fruitful. In other words, I do not think that a husband can be required to do more than is reasonable in the circumstances of the particular case. (b) The husband may incur a liability for costs in the event of the alleged adulterer (on being made a co-respondent) appearing and asserting his right to be dismissed from the proceedings. I am not unduly impressed by this alleged hardship. It seems to me that this is one of the risks which any husband must accept when he elects to institute proceedings. (c) Since the husband must swear an affidavit verifying to the best of his belief the allegations in his petition, he may be forced by the court into a position where he must either abandon the proceedings or else swear to the truth of something which he does not genuinely believe to be true. This, I feel, is a point of some substance, but I do not see why it cannot be overcome by allowing, in a proper case, some degree of elasticity in the wording of the charge in the petition. Where the court is not satisfied that reasonable inquiries have been made by the husband for the purpose of obtaining evidence against the alleged adulterer, I do not see how the husband suffers any hardship in being forced to abandon his proceedings if he cannot conscientiously swear to his belief in the truth of the allegation in his petition. But where, after diligent inquiries, the husband is left in the position that he still has nothing whatever to go on beyond what the wife has told him, I see no reason why he should not be allowed to say so in his petition, that is to accuse the wife, for instance, of adultery "with a man whose name is stated by the respondent to be so and so but whose identity is unknown to the petitioner," or whatever form of words may be suitable to the facts of the particular case. In such a case it seems to me that the husband would have strong grounds for asking the court for leave to proceed without making the alleged adulterer a co-respondent.

(5) Lastly, the court may properly, I think, ask itself whether any unnecessary hardship will be imposed on the alleged adulterer by naming him and making him a co-respondent. Consideration can be properly given to the question whether, if he is a married man, the effect of naming him may not be merely to precipitate the break-up of another marriage. But against this it is to be remembered that if he is in fact an innocent man it is rather to his interest to be made a co-respondent, so that he may have the opportunity of coming forward to vindicate his character. Moreover, the court must never lose sight of the possibility that the man named by the wife may be merely a cloak to conceal the identity of the real adulterer, in which event the best chance of ascertaining the truth may well lie in making the alleged adulterer a co-respondent, so as to give him a chance of defending the proceedings, and exposing the falsehood of the wife's allegation.

Bearing these considerations in mind, I proceed now to consider the facts of the two cases actually before me. In the case of SAGE it is alleged that a child was born on June 6, 1945, and admissible evidence will be given to show that the husband was serving overseas from May, 1940, until May, 1945. There was thus a prolonged period of non-access before the date when the child must have been conceived. The wife has made a written confession, in the course of which she gives the name of the alleged adulterer, but states that he is a Canadian and that she does not know his address. She does not admit to any cohabitation with this man, but states that the adultery took place on one occasion in the interval of a dance which both were attending. The husband's solicitor has sworn an affidavit, in the course of which he says that he cannot think of any inquiries which might be made with a view to ascertaining the identity of the alleged adulterer. On these facts I see no hope of ascertaining the identity of the alleged adulterer or of obtaining evidence against him. With so prolonged a period of non-access I think that the possibility of collusion between the husband and the wife or of connivance on the part of the husband can be altogether disregarded. In the circumstances I give leave to proceed without making the alleged adulterer a co-respondent. Since a name has been furnished by the wife, I do not think it would be right to dispense with naming the alleged adulterer, but I think it would be quite proper for the petition to allege that the wife "committed adultery with a man whose name is stated by the respondent to be A.B., but whose identity is unknown to the petitioner."

In the case of STOCKBRIDGE it is alleged that a child was born on July 13, 1945, and admissible evidence will be given to show that the husband was overseas from March, 1943, until after the date of the birth of the child. In this case, therefore, there was a period of about 18 months of non-access before the date when the child must have been conceived. In such circumstances I think that the probability of collusion or connivance is extremely slight, but that it cannot be completely disregarded as in the case of SAGE. In this case also the wife has disclosed in writing the name of the alleged adulterer, but she has also gone further and given his address, which is in Birmingham. She states that she did not actually cohabit with this man but that adultery took place at an address in Sussex on a number of occasions over a period when she was in lodgings at that address while working on the land. She is unable to furnish the name and address of any witness who can speak of the association. In these circumstances it is said that the husband cannot obtain any evidence against the alleged adulterer, but there is nothing to show that any effort to do so has, in fact, been made beyond asking the wife. In this case the husband knows, not only the name of the alleged adulterer, but also his address, i.e., his identity. The person so identified is resident in this country, and must, presumably, be known to persons who may be able to speak to his movements and behaviour during the material period. Moreover, the husband knows the address where it is alleged that adultery was habitually committed. He thus has two possible lines of inquiry which have so far not been tried. I am not satisfied in the circumstances that in this case all reasonable efforts have been made to obtain evidence against the alleged adulterer. I do not think, therefore, that in this case it would be right to give leave to dispense with making the alleged adulterer a co-respondent, still less to dispense with naming him altogether. For these reasons I allow the application in SAGE's case, to the extent of dispensing with making the alleged adulterer a co-respondent, but dismiss that in the case of STOCKBRIDGE.

Theatres and Places of Entertainment—Cinematograph—Sunday performance—Permission—Condition—Prohibition of admission of child under 15—Sunday Entertainments Act, 1932 (c. 51), s. 1.

It is not ultra vires a licensing authority, when allowing, under s. 1 (1) of the Sunday Entertainments Act, 1932, cinematograph theatres in their area to be opened on Sundays, to impose a condition that children under the age of 15 years, whether accompanied by an adult or not, should be excluded. The authority, when imposing conditions, may take into consideration matters which do not directly affect the premises or the nature of the performance, but which are designed to effect a benefit to the community.

ACTION by licensees of a cinematograph theatre for a declaration that a condition attached to a permission granted by the licensing authority for Sunday performances was ultra vires. The facts appear in the judgment.

Gallop, K.C., and Sidney H. Lamb for the plaintiffs.

Fitzgerald, K.C., and Vernon Gattie for the defendants.

HENN COLLINS, J. : This is an action in which the plaintiffs, Associated Provincial Picture Houses, Ltd., seek a declaration against the mayor, aldermen and burgesses of the borough of Wednesbury to the effect that the limitation in a licence which the defendants granted in respect of performances in cinematograph theatres on Sunday within their area was beyond the powers of a local authority to impose, namely, that a child under the age of 15 years, whether accompanied by an adult or not, was to be excluded from Sunday performances.

A The Act under which the local authority acted was the Sunday Entertainments Act, 1932, s. 1 of which provides that the authority which has power in the area to grant cinematograph licences may, notwithstanding any enactment relating to Sunday observance, allow places in their area to be opened on Sundays for the purpose of cinematograph entertainments, and these are the significant words : "subject to such conditions as the authority think fit to impose." The plaintiffs say that, in acting under that section, the local authority must act reasonably, and, subject to a proper understanding of that phrase, I think it is common ground that they must ; but what is said is that the test of reasonableness is what the court thinks reasonable rather than what the local authority think reasonable. That is a strong contention and one which would require to be supported by clear words in the section because the words in themselves are without limitation.

C The chief support in favour of the plaintiffs' argument is to be found in Theatre de Luxe (Halifax), Ltd. v. Gledhill (1). In that case there was a difference of opinion in a court consisting of three judges. The high-water mark on the other side is to be found in Harman v. Butt (2), a decision under the Act of 1932, and it is said that I have a free hand to decide as I think fit.

D Let us first see whether there really is such a conflict as has been indicated. I have come to the conclusion that there is not. Theatre de Luxe (Halifax), Ltd. v. Gledhill (1) was not a decision under the Act of 1932. It was a decision under the Cinematograph Act, 1909, and very different considerations, it seems to me, are to be applied to an Act which abridges personal rights from those which apply to one which tends to enlarge them. The approach is different. When an Act circumscribes private rights, this court, as has been pointed out very many times, is not astute to find that the abridgment is greater than necessity requires. Before the passing of the Cinematograph Act, 1909, anybody was free to give a cinematograph performance, all other things being equal, by whatever means he liked. The Act of 1909 was an Act to make better provision for securing safety at cinematograph and other exhibitions and introduced for that purpose a system of licensing. It was not to be supposed, ex facie, at any rate, that the licence which the Act contemplated was to go beyond the purposes for which the Act was expressed to have been passed, and the view of the majority in that case was that the ambit of the discretion of the licensing authority was circumscribed by the conditions visualised by the Act. The third member of the court, ATKIN, J., took the view that among the considerations which bore on that question was the question whether what was proposed was in the public interest. That alone was the line of difference between them. Whenever that case was cited in relation to the Cinematograph Act, 1909, it was, I will not say, blown on, but at any rate, strictly cribbed, cabined and confined within its particular circumstances, and it has never been taken, as I see it, for a decision on the words which appeared in s. 2 (1) of the Act : "on such terms and conditions and under such restrictions as . . . the council may by the respective licences determine," or any similar words, wherever they appear and in whatever correlation.

H In Harman v. Butt (2) ATKINSON, J., had to consider, not an Act abridging the rights of the subject, but one which did exactly the opposite thing. Up to the passing of that Act it was unlawful to hold a cinematograph exhibition on Sunday. The Act enabled performances to be given on Sunday, which was an enlargement of the public right, and the same considerations did not obtain in that case as obtained in the earlier case, and the difference of approach may account for the difference between the two decisions. I think that that is the explanation. ATKINSON, J., felt himself in no difficulty in deciding under the Act of 1932 that it was not ultra vires the authority to impose a condition that no child under the age of 16 years should be admitted, that is to say, it was not beyond their powers to take into consideration matters which did not directly affect the premises or the nature of the performance, but which were designed to effect a benefit to a section of the community.

Which of those two authorities should I follow? It was urged on me that I was untrammelled by authority, but I do not take that view. Other things being equal, I would naturally accept as right, and binding on me in that sense, the decision under the Act of 1932 of ATKINSON, J., unless there is something in the Divisional Court decision to constrict me to the other view. I have given my reasons for thinking that the earlier decision is not really in pari materia with that which I have to decide today, and without any hesitation, therefore, I follow the decision in Harman v. Butt (2), I hold that this limitation is not outside the powers of the defendant local authority, Wednesbury Corporation, and I decline to make the declaration which the plaintiffs seek. Consequently, the action is dismissed, with costs.

EASTERN COUNTIES BUILDING SOCIETY v. RUSSELL.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Hilbery, J.), January 31, February 25, 1947.]

Guarantee—Mortgage—Surety—Proviso that surety's liability should cease if "amount owing in respect of advance" reduced below certain sum—

Inclusion of compound interest, solicitors' charges and fines in "amount."

Building Societies—Mortgage—Interest—Compound interest—Right to charge—No agreement for compound interest in mortgage deed.

Under a building society mortgage deed the mortgagor was entitled to "an advance . . . of £775" by purchasing $7\frac{1}{4}$ £100 shares of the society at an aggregate bonus for the $7\frac{1}{4}$ shares of £38 15s. (i.e., at £5 a share), this latter sum also being lent to her. By a proviso to the surety's covenant, the liability of the surety was to cease if "the amount owing . . . in respect of the advance" was reduced below the sum of £700. There was no agreement in the deed for compound interest. In an action by the building society against the surety for payment of the amount due under the mortgage deed and unpaid by the mortgagor, the amount claimed included compound interest and solicitor's charges, but, of the actual sum of £775, less than £700 was still owing. The surety contended (i) that the society's accounts had been kept on a wrong footing and did not correctly show the true balance for which the surety could be held liable, since there was no agreement for compound interest in the deed; (ii) that his liability had already ceased before the action was brought because the words "the amount owing . . . in respect of the advance" in the proviso discharging him from liability referred solely to the £775 advance to the mortgagor and did not include compound interest and other charges.

Held: (i) the society was not entitled to charge compound interest since there was no express agreement to that effect in the mortgage deed and an agreement could not be implied because there was no evidence that the mortgagor or surety knew that it was a custom of building societies to keep their accounts in that way. The society's accounts had, therefore, been kept on a wrong footing and did not correctly show the true balance for which the surety could be made liable.

(ii) the words "the amount owing . . . in respect of the advance" in the proviso to the surety's covenant did not include the entire amount due under the deed, but only the amount still due in respect of the £775, and the surety was, therefore, discharged from liability.

ACTION by a building society against a surety for payment of an amount due under a mortgage deed and unpaid by the mortgagor. The defence was that, by a proviso to the surety's covenant, the surety was already discharged from liability before the action was brought. The facts and the relevant clauses of the mortgage deed appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 25. HILBERY, J., read the following judgment. The plaintiffs' claim is as mortgagees against the defendant as surety for the due performance by the mortgagor of the mortgagor's covenants contained in a mortgage deed dated Jan. 6, 1937. The plaintiffs claim by the statement of claim that there is an amount due under the mortgage deed in question and unpaid by the mortgagor. The defendant denies that that is the sum due and pleads that before action brought his liability as surety under the deed had absolutely ceased and determined according to the special proviso contained in the mortgage deed.

The material recitals and covenants in the mortgage are as follows :

Whereas (a) The mortgagor is the estate owner of the property described in the schedule hereto in respect of the residue of a term of 99 years from June 24, 1879, granted therein by the lease particulars whereof are contained in the said schedule subject to the payment of the yearly rent of £8 by the said lease reserved and to the covenants on the part of the lessee and conditions therein contained. (b) The mortgagor being a shareholder in the society hath by purchasing at a bonus at the rate of £5 per share become entitled to an advance from the funds thereof of seven shares and three quarters of another share of £100 per share amounting in all to £775 on her giving the security hereinafter contained. (c) It has been agreed that the said sum of £775 and the said bonus together with interest for the same or such part thereof as shall from time to time remain unpaid shall be repaid by monthly instalments of £7 0s. 10d. each the first of such instalments to be payable on Friday Feb. 12 next and the subsequent instalments to be payable successively on the second Friday in each succeeding calendar month until the whole of the said sum of £775 and the said bonus and interest shall be repaid. (d) It has been further agreed that this deed shall contain the provisions in default of payment of any instalment interest or other moneys or any fines payable by the rules of the society now in force hereinafter contained. Now this mortgage witnesseth as follows : 1. In consideration of the sum of £775 to the mortgagor now paid out of the funds of the society (the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged) the mortgagor as beneficial owner hereby demises unto the trustees the property described in the schedule hereto To hold the same unto the trustees for all the residue now vested in the mortgagor of the said term of 99 years granted therein by the said lease as aforesaid (except the last 10 days of the said residue) subject to the proviso for vacating this deed hereinafter contained. 2. Provided always that if the mortgagor shall pay to the trustees all the instalments fines interest and other moneys payable by virtue of the hereinbefore recited agreements or the rules of the society at the times and in the manner thereby provided and shall observe and perform all the rules of the society now in force and the covenants herein contained then the trustees shall at any time thereafter upon the request of the mortgagor indorse upon this deed a proper receipt for all moneys intended to be hereby secured and thereupon this deed shall be vacated. 3. Provided that in case the mortgagor shall neglect or refuse to pay any of the said instalments fines interest or other moneys payable by virtue of the aforesaid agreements or the rules of the society at the times and in manner aforesaid or shall fail to comply with the said rules or to observe the said covenants (of which neglect or refusal the production of the certificate of the manager for the time being of the society shall be conclusive evidence) then the entire sum of money which according to this deed and the rules of the society shall for the time being be secured by this deed shall be and become immediately payable and shall be deemed to be due within the meaning of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and the trustees may at any time thereafter without any further notice to or consent on the part of the mortgagor exercise all the powers by the same statute conferred on mortgagees. 4. The mortgagor hereby covenants with the trustees as follows: (a) That the mortgagor will during the continuance of this security punctually pay to the trustees all the aforesaid instalments fines interest and other moneys payable by virtue of the hereinbefore recited agreements at the times and in manner aforesaid and in default of the payment of any sum or sums so to be paid as aforesaid will immediately pay the entire sum of money which according to the said rules and this deed shall for the time being be secured by this deed together with interest thereon from the time of such default until payment at the rate of £6 per centum per annum and such interest shall be a charge upon the property hereinbefore expressed to be hereby assured. (b) That the mortgagor will observe and perform all the rules of the society and will from time to time put and keep every message and building comprised herein in good and tenable repair and condition and insured against fire in the trustees' names in such office and through such agency as the trustees shall from time to time determine to the full value thereof and will deliver to the trustees the policy of such insurance and produce to the trustees on demand the receipt for the current year's premium. 5. And whereas it was a condition upon the making of the hereinbefore mentioned advance that the surety should enter into the covenant herein-after contained Now in pursuance of such condition and in consideration of the premises the surety hereby covenants with the trustees that if the mortgagor shall neglect to make any of the several payments which ought to be made pursuant to any covenant on the part of the mortgagor hereinbefore contained or shall fail to comply with any of the regulations prescribed or to be prescribed by the rules of the said society or any of them in respect of the hereinbefore mentioned advance which on the part of the mortgagor ought to be complied with then and in such case the surety his executors or administrators will from time to time and at all times when thereunto required make the several payments and comply with the several rules and regulations in respect of which the mortgagor shall have made default as aforesaid and in case the property hereby expressed to be assured shall be sold under the statutory power of sale will on demand pay any deficiency which may arise by reason of the proceeds of such sale being insufficient to liquidate the sums then due by virtue of this deed and will pay all costs occasioned by such default and that the liability of the surety his executors or administrators under this covenant shall not be affected by reason of the directors or trustees of the society giving time to the mortgagor or not proceeding to enforce the making of the payments and compliance with the rules and regulations anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding Provided always that if and whenever the amount owing to the society in respect of the advance hereby made shall be reduced below the sum of £700 then and in such case the liability of the surety his executors and administrators under the covenant hereinbefore contained shall absolutely cease and determine.

The issues which I have to decide are whether, on a true construction of the deed, it is established by the plaintiffs that the sum claimed is outstanding in respect of the mortgage and that the defendant, as surety, is liable to make that sum good, or whether it has been established by the surety that he is discharged because the amount outstanding in respect of the "advance" was reduced below £700 on any of the dates when it is said to have been so reduced. The plaintiffs' counsel contends: (i) that the business sense of the transaction embodied in the mortgage is that the plaintiffs only meant to discharge the surety if the total amount outstanding on the security of the mortgaged property was reduced below £700; (ii) that their account as kept between them and the mortgagor shows that the total amount outstanding and owing was never reduced below £700 and that the surety was, therefore, never discharged; (iii) that if the words "the advance" in the proviso under which the surety claims to have been discharged are to be construed as referring only to the amount advanced on the shares taken by and allotted to the mortgagor, none the less the words "amount owing in respect of the advance" are not the same as "of the advance there remains owing," and that the words "in respect of" are comprehensive enough to include interest, solicitor's charges, and fines. He further argued that, if, in the proviso to cl. 5, the word "advance" was intended to refer only to the £775, then it was necessary to include in the deed a provision for apportionment as otherwise the proviso to the surety's covenant could not be worked out, and the absence of such a provision for apportionment shows that no such thing was in the contemplation of the parties. Lastly, he stresses the fact that the accountants on both sides agreed in their evidence that building societies' accounts are not kept as the defendant here contends the accounts in this case should have been kept; that the way in which the plaintiff society kept the account in this case is the method in general use by building societies; and the parties would have expressly provided for a different or special method if they had intended that this or any special method should have been employed.

The defendant contends: (a) that the way in which the plaintiff society has kept the account is not in accordance with the terms of the mortgage deed and does not correctly show the amounts from time to time due from the principal debtor, inasmuch as interest is periodically capitalised with the result that compound interest has been debited to the mortgagor and forms part of the total amount alleged to be due from the mortgagor, and solicitors' charges incurred since the date of the mortgage have been included; (b) that in the proviso discharging him from his suretyship if and when the amount owing in respect of the advance is reduced below the sum of £700, the word "advance" refers solely to the £775 advance to the mortgagor referred to in the deed and not to what is expressly referred to in the deed as "the entire sum of money which," according to the deed and the rules of the society, "shall for the time being be secured" by the deed; and (c) that the expression in the proviso "owing . . . in respect of the advance," read in its context, should not be construed so as to enlarge it and make it comprehend the items which the plaintiff society seeks to make it include.

After repeatedly considering the whole written instrument and all the material surrounding circumstances in which this mortgage instrument was drawn up and executed, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs' contentions are not well founded. The mortgage instrument, like any other written contract, must be taken to express what the parties intended to be the contract between them. It is not the function of the court to make a contract for the parties which would seem reasonable or which will more conveniently fit the circumstances which have supervened. The whole instrument, as it stands, must be construed so as to give effect to the intention of the parties discovered from the actual terms agreed by the parties and employed by them in the written instrument as expressing what they intend to agree. It must be borne in mind that the plaintiff society was the party putting forward the written instrument as expressing the terms on which they were willing to contract.

If, therefore, there be a doubt about how an expression in the instrument is to be interpreted, it is to be construed contra proferentes. Moreover, the question here does not arise between the two principals to the contract, but between the society and the surety, and the terms employed in the contract, defining the surety's undertaking and expressing the terms on which he is to be freed from his undertaking, ought to be strictly construed. Rather will the court in case of doubt lean in his favour.

Neither equity nor law will put a construction on the document which results in imposing on the surety any more than, on the strictest construction of the instrument, he must be said expressly to have undertaken, or so as to detract from the right given to the surety by the proviso defining the circumstances in which the surety is to be held discharged. If authority is needed for saying that the surety's contract has been said to be one strictissimi juris, I would refer to Bacon v. Chesney (1), Stamford, Spalding & Boston Banking Co. v. Ball (2) and Blest v. Brown (3) (per LORD WESTBURY, L.C., (4 De G.F. & J. 376)). There is plenty of authority for saying that the courts treat a surety as a favoured debtor: per TURNER, L.J. (7 De G.M. & G. 279, 280), in Wheatley v. Bastow (4), per EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C. (25 Ch. D. 703) in Re Sherry, London & County Banking Co. v. Terry (5), and per DALLAS, C.J. (1 Bing. 176) in Williamson v. Gould (6). Such are the principles which I must apply in construing the document in question.

In the first place, however, it is convenient to decide whether the plaintiff society's method of keeping the account as between themselves and the mortgagor is correct, i.e., is in compliance with the contract and, therefore, binding on the defendant. The society has added the interest on the loan at the end of each year. The total of loan, fines (if any) and interest has been brought forward to the next year's account, and, at the end of the next year, interest on the outstanding total, including the amount so brought forward, has again been calculated and added, and so on from year to year. The result has been that the mortgagor has been charged compound interest and compound interest has gone towards making up the alleged outstanding indebtedness of the principal debtor for which the surety is now in this action sought to be made liable. It is beyond question that there is no express agreement for compound interest to be found in the mortgage deed. It is too well established for it to be necessary to cite the authorities that a mortgagee cannot charge compound interest unless there is an agreement to that effect, and so, as there is here no express agreement for such a charge, the plaintiffs' account has been kept on a wrong footing and does not correctly show the true balance for which the surety could be held liable. An agreement for compound interest can, of course, be implied and here the plaintiff society urges the argument that building society accounts are always kept in this way, but, although that may be true and the building society may know when it enters into such a mortgage contract as this that it intends to keep the account in this way, there is no evidence before me that the mortgagor or the surety knew it. They were not like parties to a contract all of whom are in the same trade, contracting in that trade and knowing its usages. Indeed, the plaintiffs' evidence here was that the account was so kept as a matter of convenience, because the keeping of the account so as to allocate the instalment payments rateably against the sums lent by the society and the fines or other dues, and so as to make rests, would involve much more elaborate book-keeping. The argument that, because no stipulation is made in the deed for allocating, therefore, the inference should be drawn that the parties did not intend that that method should be adopted, seems to me to be of less force than to say that, since compound interest cannot be charged against a mortgagor without express agreement and there is no such agreement here, and since, by the deed in question, the surety is given an absolute discharge if the amount outstanding in respect of the advance is reduced at any time below the sum of £700, the inference is that the account must be kept so as to show the true position of the surety at all times.

While I am, therefore, of opinion that these contentions of the plaintiff society are wrong, the question still remains whether or not the surety is right in saying that under the proviso he has, in fact, been discharged because, as he contends, the words "amount owing in respect of the advance hereby made" refer only to the advance by the society of the £775. The recital (b) states that the mortgagor, by purchasing seven £100 shares and three quarters of another £100 share at a bonus of £5 per share, had "become entitled to an advance . . . of £775" on giving the security contained in the mortgage. If one turns to the rules of the society, it is possible to ascertain what this means and why it is so expressed. The mortgagor, wishing to obtain an advance from the plaintiff society to enable her to purchase the property in question, had first to become a member. This she could do by applying for and obtaining the allotment to her of a sufficient number of shares of a nominal £100 and any fraction of a £100 share, representing a total nominal value equal to the total advance required by her. If the society was willing to make the advance, then the requisite shares and fraction of a share would be allotted to the borrower at a bonus per £100 share fixed by the society. This bonus the society might, and did here, lend to the borrower. It amounted to £38 15s. The plaintiff society itself was, therefore, at all times well aware of what, by its rules or the terms of the mortgage, it was calling "advance" and the distinction between the advance and the bonus paid to obtain the advance. When one looks at the other clauses in the deed, one finds that, where it is intended that a right or obligation is either dependant on or to include, in addition to the £775, the entire amount due under the deed, that intention is expressed in terms—for example, in cl. 2, 3 and 4—but in the clauses affecting the surety, the language is altered. In cl. 5, where the intention is to make the surety liable, while he remains bound for "the several payments which ought to be made pursuant to any covenant on the part of the mortgagor" therein contained or prescribed by the rules of the society, care is taken expressly to say so. In binding the surety by that clause to make good any deficiency which may arise in the case of the enforcement of the security by a sale of the property mortgaged, it is expressly provided that the surety is to provide sufficient

“to liquidate the sums then due by virtue of” the deed. When it is borne in mind that in the same clause the recital is that “it was a condition upon the making of the hereinbefore mentioned advance that the surety should enter into the covenant” which follows, and the only specific previous mention of an “advance” is the mention in recital (b) of an advance on the 7½ shares of £775, the inference seems to me almost irresistible that the society, in drawing the mortgage deed, has taken care to distinguish throughout

A between the entire sum which, according to the deed and the rules of the society, shall for the time being be secured by the deed and the amount of the “advance” made on the shares. The proviso to the surety’s covenant, giving the surety the absolute discharge from his liability, does not adopt the language used to define the extent of his undertaking as surety which has just been used. The proviso does not say, as it so easily could have said : “Provided always that if and whenever the amount owing to the society by

B virtue of this deed,” the language theretofore used where this was intended, but takes care to use the expression : “. . . the amount owing to the society in respect of the advance.”

Applying the principles of construction which I have already stated and which I believe are applicable, I feel forced to the conclusion that the defendant’s contention is right. Even if the £38 15s. lent to the mortgagor to enable her to acquire the 7½ shares is added to the £775 by construing the reference in the proviso to the “advance” as intended to include this £38 15s., still it was conceded that, if the allocation must be made for which the defendant contended, the defendant would still be discharged.

There remain two further arguments of the plaintiff society to be dealt with. It was contended that the words “in respect of” attached to the word “advance” in the proviso are comprehensive enough to include solicitor’s

D charges, interest and fines, and ought not to be construed as the same as if they had been “of the advance there remains owing.” I see no reason to read the words in other than the way in which they would normally be used in such a context. In the ordinary use of language, a person speaking of the amount owing in respect of an advance would mean the amount of the debt remaining unpaid. It was pointed out by counsel for the defendant that there is support for this view and for the view that lawyers so use the expression, for example,

E in the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 115 (5), sched. III, form No. 2. Lastly, since the language of the deed has a natural and ordinary meaning which does not result in anything which on the face of it is contrary to, or fails to give effect to, the apparent intention of the parties, and bearing in mind that this is a question of construction of a written contract of suretyship and the principles which should, therefore, be employed, I see no reason to give it an

F interpretation which the plaintiffs’ counsel advanced as the canon of construction which I should apply when he invited me to give it what he submitted was its business sense.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Henn Collins, J.), February 18, 19, 1947.]

Negligence—Railway train—Underground train—Duty of company's servants to shut doors before departure of train—Contributory negligence.

The plaintiff entered the carriage of an underground train belonging to the defendant Board, and the train left the station with the door open: The plaintiff stood with his back to the doorway, holding on to a rail provided for the purpose. He had no experience of underground trains without automatic doors and had no reason to suppose the door was not shut. The train swayed on a curve, the plaintiff lost his balance, and fell out of the train and was injured.

HELD: the defendant Board were negligent in not ensuring that the train door was closed before the train started, and there was no contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

ACTION for damages for personal injuries alleged to be due to the negligence of the defendant Board, their servants or agents.

On Oct. 23, 1945, the plaintiff and a friend entered a train belonging to the defendant Board at Westminster station on the District Railway. The door of the carriage was open when the plaintiff approached the carriage to enter it, and the train was started with the door open. The plaintiff and his friend stood inside the carriage, near the door, and they held the rails provided for the purpose. When the train was between Westminster and St. James's Park stations it swayed or jerked with the result that the plaintiff lost his balance, fell backwards out of the train through the open door, and was injured.

King Anningson for the Board.

HENN COLLINS, J.: It is alleged by the plaintiff that it was negligent on the part of the defendant Board to start the train without the doors being shut. To that the answer by the Board is that they must in these days have regard to the exigencies of the traffic. To satisfy the public requirements the trains have to follow one another at intervals of two minutes or even less in the "rush" hours. They cannot be allowed to stand at stations for more than 35 seconds or less, and in those circumstances it is not reasonable to suppose that the Board's servants can shut the doors. Prima facie, there is no doubt in my mind that it is a negligent thing on the part of the Board to let a train go out of a station with the doors open. Their duty is to take all reasonable steps for the safety of their passengers. The question is whether, having regard to the exigencies of the traffic, it is reasonable to say that the steps that would be necessary to see that the doors are closed must be taken. I know that there is an ever-increasing tendency at the moment to say that the individual must be sacrificed to the majority. That is really the foundation of the argument which was addressed to me on this submission that the Board could not take precautions which in the past they were undoubtedly bound to take. The whole basis on which we have hitherto proceeded may be altered, but none the less I see no good reason why the Board should start their trains when they can see that a door is open. They have to delay the start of the train by so much time as it will take to remedy that defect, and, subject to the inconvenience that that would put on the public, I think it is their duty to do it.

It is then said that the plaintiff was the architect of his own wrong in that he was negligent in not holding on tight and not shutting the door behind him. It may be that some day there will come along a passenger who is an habitual traveller on these trains and knows all about open doors and the danger of having one's back to them and not holding on, but I believe the plaintiff when he says he had no experience of underground trains that had not got automatic doors. Accepting that evidence, as I do, he had no reason to suppose the door had not shut behind him. I do not see how a passenger can be expected to guard against a danger of which he is not aware, and for that reason I do not think he was guilty of contributory negligence. I find the railway company responsible for the accident that happened.

C. BURLEY, LTD. v. STEPNEY CORPORATION.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Hallett, J.), March 4, 5, 1947.]

Carriers—Carriage of goods—Implied warranty that goods not dangerous—Disposal of refuse by barge—Warranty negatived by contract—Negligence—Public Health (London) Act, 1936 (c. 50), ss. 92, 304.

Under a contract with the defendants, the plaintiffs provided barges at the defendants' wharf for the reception and removal of refuse. The tipping into the barges was screened to prevent the dispersal of smell and dust, and the plaintiffs' lighterman was unable to see what was tipped in. The defendants' foreman could see, however, and he noticed that one load of "trade refuse" included barrels containing "swarf" or metal shavings. He had no reason to think the swarf dangerous and raised no inquiry, but, in fact, it was mainly magnesium, which, when brought into contact with heat generated by other refuse, caught fire in two barges, started a series of explosions, and caused damage. By cl. 13 of the contract: "the council shall not be held responsible for any damage or mischief caused by or through the refuse after it has been shot for disposal into the contractors' barge or barges," and by cl. 16: "the contractors shall bear all risk and responsibility of whatever kind which shall attend or result from the execution of this contract."

HELD: (i) the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher (1868) (L.R. 3 H.L. 330) did not apply to the shooting of the swarf into the barges.

(ii) there being nothing in the appearance of the swarf to indicate to the foreman that it was dangerous, there was no negligence on the part of the defendants in allowing it to be shot into the barges.

(iii) while the balance of authority was in favour of the view that there is an implied warranty that goods delivered for carriage are safe to be carried, irrespective of whether the person delivering the goods for carriage knows of the danger and irrespective of whether the person to whom they are delivered is under a common law or statutory duty to carry them, that doctrine could not be suitably extended to a case of this kind having regard to the terms of the contract.

(iv) even if the warranty were implied in this case, yet the liability for the breach was negatived by the express terms of the contract.

ACTION for damages for breach of an implied term of a contract and for negligence. The facts appear in the judgment.

Pritchard, K.C., and Scott Cairns for the plaintiffs.

Mitchison, K.C., and Geraint Rees for the defendants.

HALLETT, J.: The plaintiffs are a company who for many years past have contracted with the defendants, the Stepney Borough Council, for the removal by barge and disposal of all classes of refuse from the council's Duke Shore Wharf, Limehouse, and Devonshire Street Wharf, Mile End. The agreement which was in force at the material time was dated Mar. 8, 1935. By that agreement the contractors had to provide barges to be moored alongside the said wharves to provide:

... an immediate and constantly open shoot for the reception of the whole or any portion of the refuse which may from time to time be brought to the said wharves from any portion of the metropolitan borough of Stepney for disposal ... there shall be one or more barges constantly in attendance at the council's wharves aforesaid for the purpose of receiving at any or all hours of the day and night any refuse which may be brought on to the said wharves for disposal.

The obligations of the council with regard to the collection of refuse can be found in the Public Health (London) Act, 1936. Section 87 of that Act deals with the removal of house refuse, and s. 92 with the removal of trade refuse. By s. 92 (1) it is provided:

If a sanitary authority are required by the owner or occupier of any premises to remove any trade refuse, the authority shall do so ...

The persons requesting the removal have to pay a reasonable sum. Accordingly in addition to removing house refuse and the products of street cleansing, the defendants were compelled by law to remove trade refuse. Trade refuse was dealt with in one of three ways. If there was only a small quantity, the dustman who was removing house refuse might take the trade refuse and make the appropriate charge; if there was a larger quantity, the council might send

A a vehicle specially for the trade refuse; and, if the person concerned desired it, he could send his own vehicle to one of the council's wharves with the refuse. In whichever way the refuse arrived, the loaded vehicle was weighed on its arrival on a weigh-bridge. In the case of a private vehicle, an attendant would ask whether the vehicle was brought there merely to be weighed or whether it was brought there to shoot something. If he was told it was brought there to shoot something, he would ask what was the nature of the load, and he would be told that it was trade refuse. Beyond that, he would not concern himself. The vehicle having passed over the weighbridge and the appropriate charge having been made to the private person or, in certain cases, the appropriate cost having been allocated, it would go on to one of the stages and would tip its contents through a hole into the barge which was moored alongside. No doubt to prevent the dispersal of smell and dust, screens are erected around the stage, and they are continued down so as to shroud the whole course of the tipping from the stage into the hold of the barge. The result, I hold, was that the lighterman in charge of the barge on behalf of the plaintiffs for the most part cannot see what is being tipped into his barge. From time to time the screens may be raised. They are raised, for instance, in the concluding stages of the loading that the trimmers employed by the defendants may level off the cargo. On the other hand, the defendants' foreman stands somewhere on the stage and has a view of what is going down through the hole into the barge.

C I am concerned here with two barges. The first of them, called the "Carnation" was loaded on Apr. 5, and the second of them, called the "Wise" started loading on Apr. 9. The "Carnation" was delayed in leaving the wharf and did not arrive at the plaintiffs' wharf at Sittingbourne until Apr. 11. The "Wise" did not finish loading until Apr. 13, and she did not get to Sittingbourne until Apr. 16. In the case of both barges much the same thing happened. When the crane man started to unload the "Carnation" by means of a grab, there was a muffled explosion between the middle hold and the fore hold, and the grab man noticed that the cargo was on fire at that part. The explosions went on during the whole of the afternoon. The fire brigade pumped water on to the cargo, and it is a matter of some significance that when the water was pumped in it made things worse. There seems to be no doubt that the source of the trouble was some large drums the contents of which have been analysed. In the case of the "Wise" very much the same thing happened. There was no sign of any trouble until the grab was dropped into the cargo for the first time, and then there was a muffled explosion, and a series of muffled explosions going on for, I think, about two hours, and then other symptoms of fire. In the result, damage was done, and special damages have been agreed, subject always to the question of liability.

F As to the cause of these explosions, up to a point, I think, there is no doubt. It turns out that on Apr. 5, and again on Apr. 11, a private lorry load arrived at the Duke Shore Wharf, and was stated to be "for disposal," which is taken as meaning that it was trade refuse delivered to the council for disposal having regard to the provisions of the Public Health (London) Act, 1936, s. 92. The foreman saw that part of the load consisted of large barrels like oil drums. He noticed that these barrels contained what can, perhaps, be described as metal shavings—I believe that the word that is sometimes used for them is "swarf"—which were curly, and looked to him like aluminium in colour. He took no steps to find out what the contents of the drums or barrels, in fact, were, but he saw the drums tipped down through the hole. In some cases the contents came out of them, some drums being split open by falling from that height. It is established with reasonable certainty that the shavings which were so tipped into the barges consisted largely of magnesium. I say "largely" because the analysis which was made showed that in addition to the large percentage of magnesium other chemicals were present in the swarf—barium peroxide, a compound of iron, and probably other substances. Mr. Henville, the public analyst and chemist of the defendants, agreed that it was dangerous to put magnesium into a cargo of this kind. He also agreed that once it was burning one would get the various phenomena which the witnesses spoke to, the explosive effect, the bright light, and so on. The position, then, is that the council allowed to be tipped into these two barges something which was of a dangerous and explosive nature when tipped into, and ultimately buried beneath, such a cargo, because there is evidence that the other contents of these barges, in particular the vegetable matter associated with the house refuse and street cleansing, tend to generate heat and that when the loading was completed the barrels were underneath some part of such contents.

Those being the facts, I have to consider the legal position. I hope I have already made it sufficiently clear that neither the plaintiffs' servants nor the defendants' servants knew that the material which was being tipped into the barges was dangerous. In so far as it is relevant, I should express my view that neither of them could reasonably be expected to know that the material was dangerous.

Counsel for the plaintiffs, on whom the onus lies, puts his case in three ways. I hope I shall not be wanting in any due respect to his argument if I deal first, and rather summarily, with the third one. His third point was that this is a case where the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher (1) applies, because the defendants allowed this dangerous substance, magnesium, to escape from their wharf into the barges and there to cause damage, and, therefore, they are liable. I propose to say nothing more about that argument except that I am quite unable to accept the contention that the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher (1) has any relevance whatsoever in a case of this kind.

Counsel's other grounds require more consideration. In the first place, he contends that it is an implied term of the contract between the parties that the refuse to be removed thereunder should not contain matter which is dangerous, explosive or liable to spontaneous combustion. That contention has made it necessary for me to look at a considerable number of cases, because, at least since the days of Brass v. Maitland (2) in 1856, there has been some doubt about what is the extent of liability of a person who delivers to be carried something which turns out to be dangerous. A majority view was held by LORD CAMPBELL, C.J. and WIGHTMAN, J., in Brass v. Maitland (2), and a minority view was held by CROMPTON, J. There have been several cases since then where the matter has been discussed, namely, Acatos v. Burns (3); Bamfield v. Goole & Sheffield Transport Co., Ltd. (4); Mitchell, Cotts & Co. v. Steel Brothers & Co., Ltd. (5); Great Northern Railway Co. v. L.E.P. Transport and Depository, Ltd. (6), and Transoceanica Societa Italiana di Navigazione v. H. S. Shipton & Sons (7). The difference of opinion as to the extent of the liability is also to be found among the text-book writers. One view is expressed in SCRUTTON ON CHARTER-PARTIES, art. 31, and another view in CARVER ON CARRIAGE OF GOODS BY SEA, arts. 278 and 279, and the differences have been placed on record in SALMOND ON TORTS, 10th edn., p. 567. On the whole it seems to me that the balance of authority is in favour of the view that there is an implied warranty that goods delivered for carriage are safe to be carried, and that is so irrespective of whether the person delivering the goods to be carried knows of the danger, and irrespective of whether the person to whom they are delivered is under a common law duty or a statutory duty to carry them, but I think that that doctrine cannot be suitably extended to a case of this kind, having regard to the nature of the business arrangement between these parties and to the terms of the written contract between them.

Counsel's second ground was that there was negligence on the part of the defendants and their servants in causing or allowing the refuse to contain such dangerous matter. With regard to that, if these "things"—I am using a perfectly neutral noun—which were tipped into the barges had been obviously abnormal or dangerous (such as an unexploded Mills hand grenade), or if they had been things of a kind which would put a reasonably careful foreman on his guard, then I think, if they had been tipped in without any further enquiry or precaution, counsel might well have made good his case on negligence. But wisdom after the event does not tend in any way to show negligence before the event on the part of those who did not then possess that wisdom. We know now that this swarf was composed largely of magnesium. We know now that to put swarf largely composed of magnesium into a cargo of refuse of this description was a dangerous thing to do, but that is a long way from convincing me that the persons engaged in supervising the tipping on behalf of the defendants ought to have realised, if they had exercised reasonable care, that these drums and the metals in them were potentially dangerous. It is not a matter which lends itself to a long discussion, and I think it sufficient to say that I am not satisfied that there was any negligence on the part of the defendants.

A I now come to the contract. I have already said that, to my mind, the absolute warranty which the cases on balance may establish to be implied, generally speaking, in the case of shipments, is inapplicable here having regard to the terms of the agreement between the parties, but counsel for the defendants goes further and says that, even if the warranty were to be implied, yet liability for the breach is negatived by the express terms of the contract. It may be that those are only two slightly different ways of putting the same thing, either saying that the warranty ought not to be implied, or that, if it is implied, the liability for its breach is negatived by the express terms of the contract, but it is put in those two ways, and I, therefore, return to the contract. The second recital to the contract is :

And whereas the contractors' representative attended before the public cleansing committee of the council at a meeting held on Feb. 19, 1935, when the contractors' said representative offered on behalf of the contractors subject to the conditions and stipulations embodied herein to remove by barge and dispose of all classes of refuse . . .

C Then it is provided that barges are to be there to provide "an immediate and constantly open shoot for the reception of the whole or any portion of the refuse which may from time to time be brought to the said wharves from any portion of the metropolitan borough of Stepney for disposal." By cl. 1 (b) a definition of "refuse" is provided :

D "Refuse" shall include house refuse, ashes, cinders, breeze, dust, road slop scrapings or sweepings, surplus soil from excavations and street works, trade refuse, gully soil, snow, ice, litter, manure, offal, garbage and rubbish of any description whatsoever.

I doubt very much whether the words "rubbish of any description whatsoever" can be limited by the application of the doctrine of ejusdem generis, and, indeed, I do not think counsel for the plaintiffs has so contended, but the point is not vital because there are included in the list of the kinds of refuse the two words "trade refuse."

E Under the Act of 1936 "trade refuse" is defined in s. 304 in a way which, perhaps, is not very helpful :

"Trade refuse" means the refuse of any trade, manufacture or business or of any building materials.

F There is not a particle of evidence before me tending to show that what caused the damage here was not trade refuse. On the contrary, in so far as the guilty material has been identified, it was this swarf to which I have already referred, and in so far as I am entitled to form any view about it I should form the view that that was trade refuse. I think it was delivered to the council as such, and I can see no grounds on which the council could have refused to receive it as such. The obligation, then, of the contractors was to take and remove "any refuse," including trade refuse, "which may be brought to the said wharves for disposal." It is into that obligation that the plaintiffs seek to import the limitation : "Provided always that such refuse is warranted by the council to be safe for such reception and removal." To my mind there are no sufficient grounds for implying that limitation.

G The matter, however, does not end there, because I must now refer to cl. 13 and 16 of the contract. The words of cl. 16 are very wide :

H The contractors shall bear all risk and responsibility of whatever kind which shall attend or result from the execution of this contract.

I agree that a large part of cl. 16 would appear to contemplate third party claims, but I am very doubtful indeed whether there can be found in cl. 16 any sufficient materials for limiting the operation of the clause to third party claims, as was done, for instance, in The Lindenhall (8). However that may be, there is also cl. 13 which provides :

That the council shall not be held responsible for any damage or mischief caused by or through the refuse after it has been shot for disposal into the contractors' barge or barges . . .

Counsel for the plaintiffs made a twofold answer. His first answer was that this was not "refuse." He said: "It is true that the council were not to be responsible for any damage caused by or through the refuse, but that meant refuse such as was contemplated by the contract, and the refuse contemplated by the contract did not include the refuse which was the cause of the damage or mischief here." I have already examined that aspect of the matter, and I have explained, I hope sufficiently clearly, why I reject that contention. A

The second way in which counsel dealt with cl. 13, as I understood it, was this. He said: "Yes, but while the council was not to be responsible for any damage or mischief caused by or through the refuse, that was also to be subject to the council's implied warranty that the refuse which they were going to put on board our barges was not refuse which was 'dangerous, explosive or liable to spontaneous combustion'." I think I have also dealt with that contention. I think that both the grounds on which counsel seeks to limit the operation of cl. 13 are unsound, that cl. 13 must be given its full effect, and that, accordingly, the council are not responsible for the damage or mischief caused by or through the refuse with which I am now concerned, after it had been shot for disposal into the contractors' barges. B

The truth of the matter is that while it was impracticable, as I have no doubt, for the plaintiffs to scrutinise what was tipped into their barges so as to see whether it was safe or not, so also it would have been impracticable for the council to scrutinise what was tendered to them for disposal as trade refuse, except in a general sort of way. If something was tendered to them which was smouldering or hot or obviously had elements of danger in it, no doubt, the council would have rejected it, and it may be that they would have been negligent if they had not done so. Again, if there was tendered to them as trade refuse something which obviously was not trade refuse, but was a dangerous thing such as an unexploded bomb or shell, again it may be that, if they had not rejected it, they would have been negligent. But I think that to suggest that when metal shavings were tendered to them it was their business to remove part of the metal shavings and have them analysed before they allowed them to be tipped, is to suggest something which was obviously unpractical. C
However that may be, I think they have prudently protected themselves against their alleged liability by inserting the provisions which they introduced into the contract that they made with the plaintiffs. There will, therefore, be judgment for the defendants with costs. D E

Judgment accordingly.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Simon, Lord Wright, Lord Porter, Lord Simonds and Lord Normand), January 28, 30, March 21, 1947.]

Income Tax—Exemption—Charity—Trust to maintain institute in London to give social, educational and other amenities to Welsh people or people connected with Wales—Trust property comprising houses—Direction to trustees to apply rents and profits from settled properties to carrying on institute and maintaining properties—Rents and properties so applied—Whether trust for charitable purposes—Whether moneys applied for charitable purposes only—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), s. 37 (1) (a), sched. A.

Charities—Charitable trusts—Charitable purposes—Trust to maintain institute to give social educational etc., amenities to Welsh people.

Under a trust deed dated Oct. 12, 1937, certain freehold property in London was held by the trustees to maintain an institute in London for the benefit of Welsh people resident in or near or visiting London with a view to creating a centre in London for promoting the moral, social, spiritual and educational welfare of the Welsh people and fostering the study of the Welsh language and Welsh history, literature, music and art. "Welsh people" meant and included persons of Welsh nationality by birth or descent, or born or educated or at any time domiciled in the Principality of Wales or the county of Monmouth. Without prejudice to the general purpose the deed provided that the institute might be used for particular purposes, which included the provision of a meeting place where Welsh people could obtain facilities for social intercourse, study, reading, rest, recreation and refreshment; the holding of concerts, lectures and other forms of instruction, discussion and entertainment; educational purposes connected with the Welsh language or subjects; the establishment of a library; the provision of a hostel for the accommodation of Welsh people in London; and generally for such other purposes, being charitable and for the benefit of Welsh people, as the trustees might think fit. The trust property was maintained in two blocks—the institute block which was occupied by an association incorporated in 1925 for substantially the same purposes as those recited in the deed of trust, and a second block which was let out to tenants. The trust deed directed the trustees to apply the rents and profits arising from the settled properties in carrying on the institute and towards the maintaining, equipping and using the settled properties for the purposes of the institute and generally for carrying into effect all or any of the trusts of the deed. The trustees made two donations to the association, the objects to which they were intended to be directed being certain activities of the association including public lectures and debates, a music club, literary and educational classes, the maintenance of the head-quarter premises, comprising lounge and writing rooms, library, billiard room, tea and games rooms, badminton and table tennis clubs, dances, socials, whist, and bridge drives and a central information bureau. The trustees claimed that, though the association was not established for charitable purposes, they themselves were so established, and that, in applying the rents of the second block of trust property to the purposes of the association, they had applied them to charitable purposes only, and consequently, they were entitled to exemption from income tax, sched. A, in respect of the rents of that property. The claim of the trustees that the property was vested in them for charitable purposes was based on the contentions (a) that the dominant purpose of the trust was the fostering of Welsh culture, which was a purpose beneficial to the community composed of the people of the United Kingdom, (b) that that purpose was beneficial to the community composed of the people of the Principality of Wales and the county of Monmouth which is an integral part of the United Kingdom and in itself constitutes a political body settled in a particular territorial area, and (c) because the maintenance of the institute (the expressed method of effectuating that purpose) was itself a purpose beneficial to a section of the British community which was determined by reference to impersonal qualifications (namely, persons with Welsh connections who were resident in or near or visiting London) and was not a selection of private individuals chosen on account of personal qualifications :—

HELD : (i) in determining whether a trust was charitable, two propositions must be borne in mind, viz., (a) that it was still the general law that a trust was not charitable and entitled to the privileges which charity confers unless it was within the spirit and intendment of the preamble to 43 Eliz. c. 4, which was expressly preserved by the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, s. 13 (2); and (b) that the classification of charity in its legal sense into four principal divisions by LORD MACNAGHTEN in Income Tax Special Purposes Commissioners v. Pemsel ([1891] A.C. 583), must always be read subject to the qualifications appearing in the judgment of LINDLEY, L.J., in Re Macduff ([1896] 2 Ch. 466), as expanded in the opinion of VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., in A.-G. v. National Provincial Bank ([1924] A.C. 265), namely, that LORD MACNAGHTEN did not mean that all trusts beneficial to the community were charitable, but that there were certain beneficial trusts which fell within that category, with the result that it was not enough to say that a particular trust was for public purposes beneficial to a community or for the public welfare, but it must also be shown to be a charitable trust.

(ii) in the present case the charitable character of the trust was asserted simply because the purpose of the deed was said to be beneficial to the community or a section of the community; it was not alleged that the trust was for the benefit of the community and beneficial in a way which the law regards as charitable; and, therefore, in its mere statement, the claim was imperfect and must fail.

(iii) on a true construction of the trust deed the property was not vested in the trustees for charitable purposes only, and, on the facts, the rents applied to the purpose of the association were not applied for charitable purposes only.

APPEAL by the taxpayers from a decision of the Court of Appeal (SCOTT, LAWRENCE and MORTON, L.J.J.) dated June 13, 1945 and reported [1945] 2 All E.R. 236.

The appellants were trustees of a trust to maintain an institute in London to give social, educational and other amenities to Welsh people. The trust property comprised certain houses let to tenants and the trustees were directed by the deed to apply the rents and profits of those houses to carrying on the institute and maintaining the properties. The trustees claimed exemption from income tax under sched. A in respect of those houses on the ground that (i) the trust under which the houses fell was for charitable purposes, and (ii) that the rents and profits of the houses were applied for charitable purposes only within the meaning of the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 37 (1) (a). The decision of the general commissioners disallowing the claim was upheld by the special commissioners, by MACNAGHTEN, J., and by the Court of Appeal. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD SIMONDS.

Cyril King, K.C., and F. W. Bucher for the appellants.

Sir David Maxwell Fyfe, K.C., J. H. Stamp and Reginald P. Hills for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

MAR. 21. VISCOUNT SIMON: My Lords, I have had the great advantage of reading in print and of studying the exhaustive opinion prepared in this case by LORD SIMONDS. I agree with it, and need say no more except that I move that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD WRIGHT: My Lords, I also have had the privilege of studying the opinion about to be delivered by LORD SIMONDS. I agree with it, and have nothing to add.

LORD SIMONDS: My Lords, LORD PORTER has asked me to say that he concurs in the opinion that I am about to deliver. My Lords, the question raised in this appeal is whether under a trust deed dated Oct. 12, 1937, and made between Howell J. Williams Ltd., as trustees of the one part, and Sir Howell Jones Williams, therein called the settlor, of the other part, certain properties were vested in the trustees for charitable purposes within the meaning of s. 37 (1)(a) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and whether the rents of those properties were in the years 1940-41 and 1941-42 applied by them to charitable purposes only.

Section 37 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, is as follows:

Exemption shall be granted—(a) from tax under sched. A in respect of the rents and profits of any lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages belonging to any hospital, public school or almshouse, or vested in trustees for charitable purposes, so far as the same are applied to charitable purposes only . . .

I will now state the relevant provisions of the trust deed. It begins by reciting that it is supplemental to a transfer of Jan. 16, 1930, whereby certain freehold property specified in the schedule (together with other property) was transferred to the trustees. This property consisted of certain premises in the Gray's Inn Road in the parish of St. Pancras and No. 11 Mecklenburgh Square and Nos. 29, 30 and 31 Doughty Street in the same parish. It further recites that the property had been purchased by the trustees out of moneys provided by the settlor and that the Young Wales Association (London) Ltd. (thereinafter called "the Association") had been incorporated on Mar. 21, 1926, with (inter alia) the following objects, viz.: (i) to promote Welsh interests in London, and to provide means of social intercourse between persons of Welsh nationality, birth, domicile, education or sympathies; (ii) to consider and discuss all questions affecting Welsh interests; (iii) to foster the study of the Welsh language, and to procure the delivery of lectures on subjects connected with Welsh history, literature, music and art; (iv) to form and maintain a library of periodical, historical and other literature in the Welsh language or relating to Wales, and, finally, that the property had for some time past been and was then occupied used and enjoyed by the association with the consent of the settlor for the purposes of the association. I come to the operative part of the deed. Clause 1 contains an important definition. "The expression 'Welsh people' shall mean and include persons of Welsh nationality by birth or descent or born or educated or at any time domiciled in the Principality of Wales or the county of Monmouth." Clauses 2 and 3 I can pass over. Clauses 4 and 5 cannot fairly be summarised and I state them in extenso.

4. The trustees shall hold the settled properties and the endowment fund for the purpose of establishing and maintaining an institute and meeting place in London to be known as "The London Welsh Association" (hereinafter called "the institute") for the benefit of Welsh people resident in or near or visiting London with a view to creating a centre in London for promoting the moral social spiritual and educational welfare of Welsh people and fostering the study of the Welsh language and of Welsh history literature music and art. 5. Without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing provisions the trustees may use or permit such part of the settled properties as is required to be used as the institute for all or any of the following purposes:—(a) For providing a meeting place for Welsh people in London and their friends where they can obtain facilities for social intercourse study reading rest recreation and refreshment. (b) For meetings concerts lectures and other forms of instruction discussion or entertainment especially in relation to subjects connected with the Welsh language and Welsh history literature music and art. (c) For any educational purposes connected with the Welsh language or Welsh subjects or likely to be of value or interest to Welsh people. (d) For establishing and maintaining a library of periodical historical and other literature in the Welsh language or relating to Wales or which is likely to be of use to Welsh people. (e) As a hostel for the accommodation of Welsh people in London. (f) For any of the purposes of the association or of any similar association which may be formed for the benefit of Welsh people in London and which purposes may be within the general scope of the trusts declared in cl. 4 hereof. (g) Generally for such other purposes being charitable and for the benefit of Welsh people as the trustees may from time to time think fit Provided always that the trustees shall not permit any alcoholic liquor to be sold or consumed on any part of the settled properties for the time being occupied or used for the purposes of the institute.

Clause 9 will be found to be important and I set out the substantive part of it:

9. The trustees shall apply the income arising from the endowment fund and any rents and profits arising from the settled properties and any other profits income or contributions which may be received by the trustees in carrying on the institute and otherwise for the maintenance repair and insurance of the settled properties and in payment of the rates and other outgoings and towards the cost of maintaining equipping and using the settled properties for the purposes of the institute and generally for carrying into effect all or any of the trusts of this deed.

Clause 10 provided that the institute should not be used for meetings of any political party or for the purposes of any such party, and that no part of the property, capital, or income for the time being subject to the trusts thereof should at any time be used or applied for any such purposes or for any other purposes not being charitable, with a proviso that that prohibition should not prevent any application of money or property for purposes necessarily incidental to carrying out the charitable trusts of the deed. Clause 13 authorised the trustees to delegate their power to carry on the institute by appointing managers and cl. 14 authorised them to exercise that power by appointing the association to act as managers of the institute. I do not think it necessary to refer to any other provisions of the deed. On the day following its execution Howell J. Williams Ltd. resigned the trusteeship of the deed and in their place seven individuals (including the settlor) were appointed trustees. The survivors of them are the present appellants.

The relevant facts as found by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts are these. I take them from the Case Stated, which will at the same time conveniently show the nature of the claim which is the subject of appeal to this House. Paragraph 4 of the Case states that the trust property had always been maintained as two blocks, that the first block (thereinafter referred to as "the institute block") consisted of property in Gray's Inn Road and Mecklenburgh Square which was adapted for use as an institute in accordance with the trusts of the deed, that the second block, consisting of 29, 30 and 31 Doughty Street was let out to tenants, that the first block only—and not, as incorrectly indicated in the recitals to the deed, the whole of the trust property—was until May, 1941, occupied by the Young Wales Association (London), Ltd., which later changed its name to the London Welsh Association Ltd., and was thereafter referred to as the association. In the next paragraph of the Case the claim is stated. I think it worth while to set it out.

The trustees were not in this claim contending that this association was established for charitable purposes only. The claim before us was that not the association but the trustees were so established: that in applying the rents of 29, 30 and 31, Doughty Street to the purposes of the before-mentioned association (which they claimed was an application of income of the trust under cl. 9 of the trust deed) they had applied the same to charitable purposes only and that consequently they were entitled to exemption from income tax, sched. A, in respect of the rents of the said properties.

From para. 7 of the Case it appears that the trustees, in exercise of their powers under the deed, allowed the association to occupy the institute block and to act as managers of the institute, and that the association so acted until May, 1941,

A and that before that date they made two donations to the association for the purposes of the institute, but that after that date the association had been unable to continue in occupation of the premises, which had been let to the Welsh Services Club, and similarly after that date no further donations had been made. In para. 11 of the Case there is a summary of the evidence given before the commissioners by a Mr. V. J. Lewis, one of the trustees of the deed and at one

B time secretary of the association. Since the question raised in this appeal appears in one aspect to turn on findings of fact, I cannot omit a reference to this evidence. It appears that Mr. Lewis and two of his co-trustees met and considered what should be done with the funds which they held under the deed, and they decided to make two donations to the institute. They considered that they were carrying out the purposes of the deed, because it was necessary that the institute should be maintained. The association were running the

C headquarters premises at a loss, although making a profit on their other activities, and he and his co-trustees knew that any donation which they made would be paid into the headquarters account from which the activities of the institute were financed. This was one of two accounts, the other being the general account. On the headquarters account there was a debit balance. On the general account there was a credit balance. Into this account the sub-

D subscriptions of members of the association were paid and also donations from another distinct trust, and out of it was paid printing, postage and secretarial expenses, corporation duty, etc. The association did not keep separate accounts as to the expenditure of the donations. The objects (said Mr. Lewis) to which the donations were intended to be directed were numbers 1, 4, 5, part of 7 and 8 and 11 of the activities of the association as set out in its booklet which was annexed to the Case. These activities are there described as follows:—

E 1. Public lectures and debates, a music club, and literary and educational classes . . . 4. The maintenance of headquarters premises at 11, Mecklenburgh Square, W.C.1, comprising lounge and writing room, library (where current Welsh and English periodicals and newspapers may be found), billiard room, tea and games rooms, etc., available for the use of headquarters members of the association, and of all donors and subscribers. The headquarters premises and in particular the London Welsh Hall are increasingly becoming the meeting place of the committees and functions of the various London Welsh societies and other organisations. 5. Badminton and

F table tennis clubs are maintained in connection with the headquarters premises . . . 7. Dances, whist and bridge drives, and annually a dinner and a garden party. 8. A weekly social and dance is held for headquarters members in the London Welsh Hall, on Saturday evenings. The charge made for admission is only 6d. (ordinary members, and visitors on the introduction of a member, may obtain admission at 2s.): a dance band is provided, and the popularity of these weekly functions among the younger members of the London Welsh community is undoubted. . . . 11. The headquarters

G office of the association serves in many ways as a central information bureau for London Welsh people and visitors to the metropolis.

Mr. Lewis said that in making these donations the trustees regarded themselves as contributing to dances, whist and bridge drives held at the institute and as part of the activities taking place there and not to any such activities held elsewhere. A prominent part of the activities of the institute consisted of lectures, debates, music club and literary and educational classes. Classes

H were held in the Welsh language, history and literature. The trustees did not contribute towards the theatre guild referred to in No. 2 of the list of the activities. I must assume that the commissioners accepted as facts the statements which they set out without comment in this Case. The commissioners then state (as should always be done with clearness and particularity) the rival contentions of the trustees and the Crown. I have referred earlier in this opinion to the claim made by the trustees. Of the Crown it is only said that the contention of the trustees was resisted on its behalf. The decision of the commissioners was as follows:

Under the terms of the trust deed the purposes of the institute, to which the rents of the properties in question held by the trustees have been applied, are wide and inclusive. While certain of its features conform to the idea of a charity, we have come to the conclusion that these features are not so dominating, nor is the general character of the institute such, as effectively to distinguish it from an ordinary social club. We are unable to say that it is established for charitable purposes only; and the application accordingly fails.

I have thought it necessary to state the facts at this length because it has been a matter of some controversy what the commissioners really decided. The issues being two-fold (a) whether the trust property was vested in the trustees for charitable purposes, and (b) whether the rents were applied for charitable purposes only, it is at least arguable that the commissioners, notwithstanding that the facts stated in the Case related mainly to the second issue, yet decided only the first issue. It is not clear what view was taken on this point by MACNAGHTEN, J., before whom came the appeal from the commissioners. He found it sufficient to say that he saw no ground for questioning their conclusion, adding that, if their decision was open to criticism at all, it was that it might have been expressed in even stronger terms. When the matter came before the Court of Appeal, the confusion was made apparent and there was some difference of opinion between the members of that court, SCOTT, L.J., thinking it possible to read into the decision of the commissioners a plain finding of fact that the income in question was not applied to charitable purposes only, while MORTON, L.J. (if I read his judgment correctly) was prepared to assume that there was no finding of fact fatal to the appellants' case. In these circumstances, while I cannot entertain any doubt that on the facts stated in the Case it was not open to the commissioners to come to any other conclusion on the second issue than that the rents in question were not applied for charitable purposes only, I think it right also to examine the question whether, irrespective of the application of the rents in any year, the trust property itself is vested in the appellants for charitable purposes. That this expression means "for charitable purposes only" is conceded by the appellants.

My Lords, the claim of the appellants that the property is vested in them for charitable purposes is based on these contentions, (a) that the dominant purpose of the trust is the fostering of Welsh culture which is a purpose beneficial to the community composed of the people of the United Kingdom, (b) that the purpose aforesaid is beneficial to the community composed of the people of the Principality of Wales and the county of Monmouth which is an integral part of the United Kingdom and in itself constitutes a political body settled in a particular territorial area, and (c) because the maintenance of the institute (the expressed method of effectuating the purpose aforesaid) is itself a purpose beneficial to a section of the British community which is determined by reference to impersonal qualifications (namely, persons with Welsh connections who are resident in or near or visiting London) and is not a selection of private individuals chosen on account of personal qualifications. I have taken this statement of the appellant's contentions from the formal reasons in their written Case, because in them so clearly appears the fallacious argument on which in this and other cases, which it has been my fortune to hear, an attempt has been made to establish the charitable character of a trust.

My Lords, there are, I think, two propositions which must ever be borne in mind in any case in which the question is whether a trust is charitable. The first is that it is still the general law that a trust is not charitable and entitled to the privileges which charity confers unless it is within the spirit and intendment of the preamble to 43 Eliz. c. 4, which is expressly preserved by s. 13 (2) of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888. The second is that the classification of charity in its legal sense into four principal divisions by LORD MACNAGHTEN in Pemsel's case (1) ([1891] A.C. 583) must always be read subject to the qualification appearing in the judgment of LINDLEY, L.J. in Re Macduff (2) ([1896] 2 Ch. 466):

Now SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY did not mean, and I am certain that LORD MACNAGHTEN did not mean to say, that every object of public general utility must necessarily be a charity. Some may be and some may not be.

This observation has been expanded by VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C. in this House in A.G. v. National Provincial Bank (3) ([1924] A.C. 265) in these words:

LORD MACNAGHTEN did not mean that all trusts beneficial to the community are charitable, but that there were certain beneficial trusts which fall within that category : and accordingly to argue that because a trust is for a purpose beneficial to the community it is therefore a charitable trust is to turn round his sentence and to give it a different meaning. So here it is not enough to say that the trust in question is for public purposes beneficial to the community or is for the public welfare ; you must also show it to be a charitable trust.

A But it is just because the purpose of the trust deed in this case is said to be beneficial to the community or a section of the community and for no other reason that its charitable character is asserted. It is not alleged that the trust is (a) for the benefit of the community and (b) beneficial in a way which the law regards as charitable. Therefore, as it seems to me, in its mere statement the claim is imperfect and must fail.

B My Lords, the cases in which the question of charity has come before the courts are legion, and no one who is versed in them will pretend that all the decisions, even of the highest authority, are easy to reconcile, but I will venture to refer to one or two of them to make good the importance of my two general propositions. In Houston v. Burns (4), the question was as to the validity of a gift "for such public benevolent or charitable purposes in connection with the parish of Lesmahagow or the neighbourhood" as might be thought proper. This was a Scottish case, but upon the point now under C consideration there is no difference between English and Scottish law. It was argued that the limitation of the purpose to a particular locality was sufficient to validate the gift, that is to say, though purposes beneficial to the community might fail, yet purposes beneficial to a localised section of the community were charitable. That argument was rejected by this House. If the purposes are not charitable per se, the localisation of them will not D make them charitable. It is noticeable that LORD FINLAY L.C. ([1918] A.C. 341) expressly overrules a decision or dictum of LORD ROMILLY to the contrary effect in Dolan v. MacDermot (5) (L.R. 5 Eq. 62).

Next I will refer to Dunne v. Byrne (6), a case in the Privy Council, which is the more valuable because LORD MACNAGHTEN himself delivered the judgment of the Board. In that case the question was of the validity of a residuary gift "to the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Brisbane and his successors to be used and expended wholly or in part as such Archbishop may E judge most conducive to the good of religion in the diocese." What could have been easier than to say that such a trust was beneficial to the community, and moreover to a section of the community sufficiently defined by a reference to the diocese, and was therefore charitable ? Yet the only argument was that the benefit to the community was of a character which fell within the preamble to the Statute of Elizabeth, i.e., for religious purposes, and, F therefore, was charitable. And it is to be observed that this contention was rejected on the narrow ground that the terms of the bequest were not identical with religious purposes. LORD MACNAGHTEN said ([1912] A.C. 411) :

The language of the bequest (to quote LORD LANGDALE's words in Baker v. Sutton (7) (1 Keen, 233)) would be "open to such latitude of construction as to raise no trust which a court of equity could carry into execution."

G One more decision out of many to the same effect may be cited. In Farley v. Westminster Bank (8) a testatrix had bequeathed the residue of her estate in part to the respective vicars and church-wardens of two named churches "for parish work." Could it be doubted that the purpose of the gift was beneficial to the community ? It could fairly be described in the very words in which the appellants here assert the charitable nature of their trust. Yet the gift failed. It was, in the words of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN ([1939] H 3 All E.R. 494) :

... for the assistance and furtherance of those various activities connected with the parish church which are to be found ... in every parish ...

It would be unduly cynical to say that that is not a purpose beneficial to the community. Yet it failed. And it failed because it did not fall within the spirit and intendment of the preamble to the Statute of Elizabeth.

My Lords, I must mention another aspect of this case, which was discussed in the Court of Appeal and in the argument at your Lordships' bar. It is not expressly stated in the preamble to the statute, but it was established in the Court of Chancery, and, so far as I am aware, the principle has been consistently maintained, that a trust to be charitable must be of a public character. It must not be merely for the benefit of particular private individuals. If it is, it will not be in law a charity though the benefit taken by those individuals is of the very character stated in the preamble. The rule is thus stated by LORD WRENBURY in Verge v. Somerville (9) ([1924] A.C. 499):

To ascertain whether a gift constitutes a valid charitable trust so as to escape being void on the ground of perpetuity, a first enquiry must be whether it is public—whether it is for the benefit of the community or of an appreciably important class of the community. The inhabitants of a parish or town, or any particular class of such inhabitants, may, for instance, be the objects of such a gift, but private individuals, or a fluctuating body of private individuals, cannot.

It is, I think, obvious that this rule, necessary as it is, must often be difficult of application and so the courts have found. Fortunately, perhaps, though LORD WRENBURY put it first, the question does not arise at all if the purpose of the gift, whether for the benefit of a class of inhabitants or of a fluctuating body of private individuals, is not itself charitable. I may, however, refer to a recent case in this House which in some aspects resembles the present case. In Keren v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (10) a company had been formed which had as its main object (to put it shortly) the purchase of land in Palestine, Syria or other parts of Turkey in Asia and the peninsula of Sinai for the purpose of settling Jews on such lands. In its memorandum it took numerous other powers which were to be exercised only in such a way as should, in the opinion of the company, be conducive to the attainment of the primary object. No part of the income of the company was distributable among its members. It was urged that the company was established for charitable purposes for numerous reasons, with only one of which I will trouble your Lordships, viz., that it was established for the benefit of the community or of a section of the community, whether the association was for the benefit of Jews all over the world, or of the Jews repatriated in the Promised Land. LORD TOMLIN, dealing with the argument that I have just mentioned on the footing that, if benefit to “a community” could be established, the purpose might be charitable, proceeded to examine the problem in that aspect and sought to identify the community. He failed to do so, finding it neither in the community of all Jews throughout the world nor in that of the Jews in the region prescribed for settlement. It is, perhaps, unnecessary to pursue the matter. Each case must be judged on its own facts and the dividing line is not easily drawn, but the difficulty of finding the community in the present case, when the definition of “Welsh people” in the first deed is remembered, would not, I think, be less than that of finding the community of Jews in Kerens’ case (10).

At an early stage in this opinion I said that cases on the law of charity are not easy to reconcile. I would not be taken as suggesting that there is any doubt about the present case. I agree with the judges of the Court of Appeal that, on the construction which they have adopted of the trust deed—and it is the only possible construction—the property is not vested in the appellants for charitable purposes only. It is clear, as I have already said, that they have not applied the income for charitable purposes only, and I do not doubt that they have applied them strictly in accordance with their trust. “Matters,” said RUSSELL, L.J., “have been stretched in favour of charities almost to bursting point”: see Re Grove-Grady (11) ([1929] 1 Ch. 582). That point would be reached if your Lordships held that this trust deed has a purpose which falls within the spirit and intendment of the preamble. It clearly does not, and, if it does not, let the community be what you will, let the purpose be as beneficial as you like, here is no charity.

My Lords, it would not be right for me in a case which raises in such a general form the broad question of charitable trusts to ignore a line of authorities relied on by the appellants. More accurately, I think, there are two lines of authorities which are apt to converge and cross each other. There is, first, the class of case of which Re Smith (12) is typical. In that case the testator gave his residuary estate “unto my country England for—own use and benefit absolutely " (sic). This was held to be a good charitable trust. Here no particular purpose or benefit was defined. Secondly, there is the class of case, of which Goodman v. Saltash (13) may be regarded as the prototype. There LORD SELBORNE, L.C. used the words cited so often in the reports (7 App. Cas. 642) :

A gift subject to a condition or trust for the benefit of the inhabitants of a parish or town or of any particular class of such inhabitants is (as I understand the law) a charitable trust.

In the one class of case there is no particularity of benefit and the widest range of beneficiary, in the other the beneficiaries are localised and the nature of the benefit defined. How are these cases to be reconciled with the decisions of this House to which I earlier referred? In TUDOR ON CHARITIES, 5th edn., at p. 45, it is said :

It is hard to avoid the conclusion that the foregoing cases, which establish that gifts for the benefit of particular districts are charitable, are anomalous. They cannot be related to the Statute of Elizabeth, and they logically involve the proposition that purposes which are not charitable in the world at large are charitable if confined to a specified locality, for, public or benevolent purposes are not charitable, while there is nothing to prevent the trustees of a fund given for the benefit of a parish from spending it upon public or benevolent purposes, and yet the gift of such a fund is charitable. Nevertheless, the gift for public purposes in a particular parish is not charitable.

Your Lordships may think that this sounds like a cry of despair, and, in truth, there is some ground for it, but I would suggest that it is possible to justify as charitable a gift to "my country England" on the ground that, where no purpose is defined, a charitable purpose is implicit in the context. It is at least not excluded by the express prescription of "public" purposes. Where the gift is localised, but the nature of the benefit is defined, no reconstruction is possible except on the assumption that the particular purpose was in each case regarded as falling within the spirit and intendment of the preamble to the Statute of Elizabeth, though I find it difficult to ascribe this quality to the benefit taken by the freemen of Saltash. If this affords no solution of the problem, I can only invite your Lordships to maintain the principles which have consistently been asserted in this House over the last 50 years in this difficult and intricate branch of the law. I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD NORMAND : I respectfully agree with my noble and learned friend, LORD SIMONDS. Discordant decisions have resulted from the occasional failure to keep in mind the two propositions which my Lord has now re-asserted and from the tacit assumption that all trusts beneficial to the public at large or to some section of it are entitled by a benevolent construction to the special privileges of charitable trusts. Yet the line between charitable and non-charitable trusts is sometimes difficult to draw, even when correct principles are applied, particularly where the claim is made that the trust is charitable because its purpose is the furtherance of the moral improvement of the community. The decision in Inland Revenue v. Falkirk Temperance Cafe Trust (14), a case which has some resemblance to the present, must, I think, rest on the ground that the predominant purpose of the trust was the moral improvement by means of temperance of the inhabitants of Falkirk and that the cafes and temperance hotel provided by the trust were so subordinated to the predominant purpose that it was possible to distinguish them from an ordinary commercial venture in catering and hotel-keeping. In the present case the decision of the commissioners was that, while certain features of the institute conformed to the idea of charity, they were not so dominating nor was the general character of the institute such as effectively to distinguish it from an ordinary social club. In my opinion, this conclusion is amply supported by the facts and is well founded in law.

Appeal dismissed.

Re DIPLOCK'S ESTATE, DIPLOCK AND OTHERS v. WINTLE AND OTHERS (AND ASSOCIATED ACTIONS).

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), November 26, 27, 28, 29, December

Mistake—Mistake of law—Money paid under a mistake as to the construction of a will—Residue of testator's estate paid to charitable institutions by executors—Directions in will void for uncertainty—Right of those entitled under an intestacy to recover from institutions sums paid—Money had and received—Personal claim in equity.

Money—How far money can be followed—Money paid to charitable institutions by executors under a mistake as to the construction of a will—Directions in will void for uncertainty—Right of those entitled under an intestacy to trace.

By his will the testator directed his executors to apply the residue of his estate "for such charitable institution or institutions or other charitable or benevolent object or objects in England" as the executors might "in their absolute discretion select." The testator died on Mar. 23, 1936, and by 1938 the executors had distributed more than £200,000 out of the testator's residuary estate to various charitable institutions. In Sept., 1939, one of the next of kin of the testator challenged the validity of the directions in the will, and in June, 1944, the House of Lords held that the bequest was void for uncertainty.
In an action by those entitled under an intestacy to recover from the institutions the sums paid to them,

HELD: (i) the rule that the mistake on which an action for money had and received could succeed must be a mistake of fact and not a mistake of law was of general application and in no way depended on the pre-existence of a contract between the parties; the mistake in the present case was one as to part of the general law of England, namely, the law defining the requisites for the creation of a valid charitable trust, or, at least, a mistake as to the construction of the will, either of which was a mistake of law; and, therefore, the plaintiffs could not maintain a claim at law for the return of the money as money had and received.

Rogers v. Ingham (1876) (3 Ch. D. 351); Hilliard v. Fulford (1876)
(4 Ch. D. 389); Re Haich, ([1919] 1 Ch. 351); and per ATKINSON, J., in Anglo-Scottish Beet Sugar Corp. v. Spalding U.D.C., [1937] 3 All E.R.
335, referred to.

(ii) so far as a mere money demand is concerned, where, as in the present case, an executor or administrator has paid money or transferred property, part of the estate of the deceased, to a person not entitled thereto in such circumstances as not to make the recipient an express trustee, the only remedy open to the legatee or next of kin rightfully entitled against the recipient is either to pursue a common law claim for money had and received in the name of the executor or administrator or to pursue in equity a claim analogous to the common law action for money had and received in which it would be unnecessary to join the executor or administrator as plaintiff, but in both cases it would be essential to demonstrate that the money had been paid under a mistake of fact and not one of law, a mistake in construing a will being regarded for that purpose as a mistake of law, and, therefore, the plaintiffs did not have a personal claim in equity against the defendant charities for the return of the sums paid to them.

(iii) where a person other than the true owner thereof pays money into an account at his bank and does not mix that money with other money, the true owner of the money can, at common law, follow it into that account, and, further, can follow it out of the account into any asset or assets which can be shown to have been purchased wholly with it. The common law right does not depend on any fiduciary relationship between the true owner of the money and the person who deals with it. The equitable doctrine of allowing the tracing of money where it has been mixed with other money, e.g., (in a banking account) applies only where a fiduciary relationship exists between the person into whose account the money has been paid and the true owner. Therefore, where the institutions had paid the money received from the executors into a mixed account, those entitled under an intestacy could not invoke the equitable doctrine of tracing.

A Re Hallett's Estate (1880) (13 Ch. D. 696), applied. Sinclair v. Brougham, ([1914] A.C. 398), considered.

(iv) the plaintiffs were not entitled to be recouped any sum paid by the executors to one of the defendant institutions and applied by that institution in the discharge of a debt then owing by it.

B Trevillian v. Exeter Corporation (1854) (5 De G. M. & G. 828), and observations of LORD DUNEDIN and LORD PARKER in Sinclair v. Brougham, ([1914] A.C. 435, 440, 441), explained and distinguished.

C (v) where the defendant institution treated in its accounts money or securities as representing the money received by it from the executors, that did not amount to an earmarking of such moneys so as to preserve their identity and thus to allow the plaintiffs to claim the money or assets in question. The alleged right must be rested on the common law right to follow assets, and not on the equitable doctrine of tracing, for the alleged earmarking took place when the institutions concerned were not fiduciary agents, and in each case the money was first mixed in the banking account of the institution and then lost its identity.

D (vi) where the executors had imposed a condition as to how the money was to be applied by the defendant institution, the acceptance of the condition and the application by the institution of the money in accordance therewith did not of itself result in the giving of consideration by the institution so as to entitle it to be regarded as being in the position of a purchaser for value without notice. The transaction amounted to no more than a gift of money subject to a condition as to its disposal, even though the condition involved that the institution should use part of its own property in a certain way, e.g., by the erection of a building on its land or by the alteration of an existing building belonging to it.

E Dillwyn v. Llewelyn (1862) (4 De G. F. & J. 517), and Taylor v. Blakelock (1886) (32 Ch. D. 560), distinguished.

F (vii) the defendant institutions were not fixed with notice to prevent them from relying on the plea of purchase for value without notice merely because they knew that they were dealing with executors who were proposing to make payments under a discretionary power in the will, and, therefore, they (the institutions) were put on inquiry as to the validity of the power given to the executors.

(viii) in so far as the plaintiffs had a right to trace, that right existed although the institution held on charitable trusts the property into which it was sought to trace and on which an equitable charge was claimed.

A ACTIONS to recover certain sums of money paid to the defendants, various charitable institutions, by the executors of a testator out of the residuary estate. By his will the testator gave the residue of his estate to his executors on trust "for such charitable institution or institutions or other charitable or benevolent object or objects" as they might "in their absolute discretion select." After the executors had distributed over £200,000, the validity of the directions in the will was challenged by the next of kin and it was held by the House of Lords that the directions in the will were void for uncertainty and that the residuary estate devolved as on an intestacy: Chichester Diocesan Fund v. Simpson, ([1944] 2 All E.R. 60), affirming the decision of the court of Appeal, sub. nom. Re Diplock, ([1941] 1 All E.R. 193). The plaintiffs in each of the present 19 actions were the persons entitled under the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, to share in such part of the estate as to which the testator died intestate. The facts and the arguments appear in the judgment.

Mar. 11. WYNN-PARRY, J., read the following judgment. The plaintiffs in each of these actions are among the persons entitled under the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, to share in such part of the estate of Caleb Diplock deceased (to whom I will refer as "the testator") as to which he died intestate. These actions, nineteen in number, are brought by the plaintiffs as such next of kin to recover from such of the respective defendants as received them sums forming part of the residuary estate of the testator, paid to such defendants by the executors of the testator in circumstances which will be detailed later in this judgment. These actions are part of a larger number of actions totalling in all 120 which raise claims substantially similar to the various claims raised in these actions. These nineteen actions are regarded as typical or representative of the claims which can be put forward by or on behalf of the next of kin of the testator in the circumstances detailed later, and on the ultimate decisions in these actions will probably depend the fate of the claims in the other larger number of actions.

E In the present actions, the plaintiffs and the defendants have put forward certain points by way of claim and defence, each of which raises a question of principle. All the relevant facts have been agreed between the plaintiffs and the respective defendants, a course which has had the result of saving considerable time and expense, and the whole of the facts were opened before me. In the course of the hearing, however, it was agreed that the convenient course to follow, and the course which I propose to follow in this judgment, is as follows. I shall state only those facts which, in my view, are necessary to raise the questions of principle which have been argued. I shall then state those questions of principle and decide them. I shall then adjourn this case F to give the parties an opportunity to agree, so far as they can, the order which should be made in each action having regard to the special facts of that action, and my decision on the principle or principles applicable thereto. Finally, the case will be restored before me, when I can deal with any difficulty which may have arisen and direct what order is to be made in each case.

G H By cl. 6 of his will, dated Nov. 3, 1919, the testator gave the residue of his property to his executors on trust to sell or call in the same with power to postpone, and directed that, out of the proceeds of such sale and calling in and out of his ready money, his executors should pay his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and the legacies bequeathed by his will and the duty on any legacies thereinbefore given free of duty, and, subject thereto, should apply the residue for such charitable institution or institutions or other charitable or benevolent object or objects in England as his acting executors or executor might in their absolute discretion select, and to be paid to or for such institutions and objects, if more than one, in such proportions as his executors or executor might think proper. By cl. 7 of the will the testator declared that the receipts of the treasurer or other proper officer for the time being of any hospital, home or other institution should be a sufficient discharge for any legacy bequeathed given or applied thereto.

The testator died on Mar. 23, 1936, without having revoked or altered his will, which was duly proved on May 16, 1936, by three of the executors therein named, the defendants, Leslie Charles Wintle (who died on May 7, 1942), Lionel Edwin Charles Handson (who died on July 14, 1940) and Charles Thomas. During 1936, 1937 and 1938 the executors applied out of the testator's estate the sum of £203,067 10s. or thereabouts by distributing this sum among 139 institutions. Each of these institutions is a charitable institution within the meaning of the phrase "legal charity." It will be convenient to refer collectively to those of the 139 institutions which are defendants in this group of nineteen actions as "the defendant institutions." The distribution was made by cheques sent to the 139 institutions (including the defendant institutions) by the defendant, Wintle, acting as solicitor for the executors. The cheques were enclosed in letters each of which was in the following terms :

Dear Sir, Estate of Caleb Diplock deceased. Grants to London and other charities. The above-named deceased by his will bequeathed his residuary estate for distribution amongst such hospitals and institutions or other charitable or benevolent objects in England as his executors might in their absolute discretion select, and in such proportion as they might think proper. The executors have decided to allocate a grant of £—— to ——. We have pleasure in enclosing you herewith a cheque for this amount. We shall be obliged if you will sign and return us the inclosed form of receipt.

The circumstances in which the distribution was made, and the considerations operating in the minds of the executors, are deposed to in the affidavit of the defendant, Wintle, in proceedings to which I shall later refer. In Sept., 1939, the executors were notified that the validity of the beneficial directions in cl. 6 of the testator's will were challenged by the plaintiff, John Henry Diplock (who died on June 18, 1940), as one of the next of kin of the testator, on the ground that those directions were void for uncertainty, and that, accordingly, there was an intestacy as to his residuary estate. In October, 1939, the executors' solicitors wrote to each of the defendant institutions a letter informing it that the validity of the payment to it was challenged on the ground that the gift of the residue was void for uncertainty and calling on each of the defendant institutions not to deal in any way with any part of the sum so paid to it or with the income thereof until such institution had heard further from the executors' solicitors, and asking to be informed whether the sum so paid to it and the income thereof was still in its hands.

On June 10, 1940, an originating summons was issued by the executors as plaintiffs against the plaintiff, John Henry Diplock; the present plaintiffs; the defendants, the Chichester Diocesan Fund and Board of Finance (Incorporated); the defendant, Raymond Henry Johnson; and His Majesty's Attorney-General; as defendants, raising the question of the validity of the trust of residue contained in cl. 6 of the testator's will. This summons came before FARWELL, J., on July 18, 1940, when he upheld the validity of the trust of residue. On appeal by the plaintiffs, the Court of Appeal, on Jan. 15, 1941, reversed the decision of FARWELL, J., declaring that, on the true construction of the testator's will, the trust of residue contained in cl. 6 of the will was void for uncertainty, and that the residuary estate devolved as on an intestacy. The defendants the Chichester Diocesan Fund and Board of Finance (Incorporated) appealed to the House of Lords against the order of the Court of Appeal, and by a judgment of the House of Lords dated June 21, 1944, it was ordered and adjudged that the order of the Court of Appeal be affirmed: see [1944] 2 All E.R. 60.

These are all the facts to which it is necessary to refer for the purpose of considering and adjudicating on the questions of principle raised by the plaintiffs and defendants respectively. The first three propositions put forward on behalf of the plaintiffs are propositions which, if well founded, are applicable in all the nineteen actions, subject to any special defences. I propose, therefore, to deal first with these three points.

The first proposition on behalf of the plaintiffs was put forward by leading counsel on their behalf in these terms. If a person is entitled in equity to property, or to a sum of money, and if that property or sum is transferred or paid to

A another person who is not a purchaser for value without notice, the person entitled in equity has a personal claim in equity against the recipient for the value of the property transferred or the amount of the sum paid. The same point was put forward by junior counsel for the plaintiffs in these terms. Where A., without giving adequate consideration in equity, receives from B. money which belongs to C., A. is under an equitable obligation to account to C. The second proposition on behalf of the plaintiffs was that each of the defendant institutions took with notice of the trust in favour of the plaintiffs. The third proposition on behalf of the plaintiffs was that they have a personal claim at law against the defendant institutions for money had and received.

B It will be convenient to deal with the second proposition first. This proposition was not argued. Counsel for the plaintiffs stated in his opening that he was constrained to admit that, in the present state of the authorities on the subject, it was not open to the plaintiffs to maintain this proposition in a court of first instance, though they desired to keep the point open in case the matter should go further. I must, therefore, proceed on the basis that the letter written to each of the defendant institutions in the terms which I have already indicated did not operate to give them notice of the trust in favour of the plaintiffs.

C I propose now to consider the plaintiffs' third proposition, because, in my view, the nature and extent of any personal claim which the plaintiffs may have in equity can only properly be appreciated after an examination of the nature and extent of the common law action for money had and received. The action for money had and received is a common law action on the case founded on an implied promise to pay which the law implies where A. has paid money to B. under a mistake of fact, the law setting up for the purpose of the claim the relationship of debtor and creditor between the parties. It is now settled beyond dispute that the action is only available where the plaintiff has paid under a mistake of fact. It is not available where he has paid under a mistake of law. Reference for this proposition can be made to a multitude of authorities, but it will be sufficient to refer to Kelly v. Solari (1), Maskell v. Horner (2), Holt v. Markham (3) and Anglo-Scottish Beet Sugar Corpn. v. Spalding (4).

D It was argued on behalf of the plaintiffs that all the cases where mistake of law has been held to preclude recovery were cases where there was a contractual nexus between the parties. It was, it was said, because of that nexus that the recipient of money was held not liable to pay. It was, however, admitted that where two parties are in legal relationship arising from contract, it is impossible to deny that the construction of any document defining their relationship must be a matter of law. It was then urged that here there was no nexus between the next of kin and the defendant institutions or between the executors and the defendant institutions.

E F G H It appears to me, however, that in view of the circumstances already referred to—that the action for money had and received is based on an implied promise to repay, and that for the purpose of the claim the relationship of debtor and creditor subsists between the parties—this argument necessarily breaks down, and that it is immaterial whether or not there was a contractual nexus in fact. The rule that the mistake on which an action for money had and received must be a mistake of fact is, in my view, of completely general application and in no way depends on the pre-existence in fact of a contract, written or oral, between the parties. The plaintiff in any action for money had and received must, as an essential condition of success, be able to show that he paid the money claimed under a mistake of fact. It was, indeed, pleaded that the mistake in this case was a mistake of fact. Para. 31 of the statement of claim reads as follows :

The several sums so paid to the defendant institutions as aforesaid were paid by the defendant executors as a result of a mistake of fact that is to say a mistake as to the class of beneficiaries interested in the testator's residuary estate.

It was argued that the mistake was a mistake as to the persons entitled in equity to the fund. It was said that all mistakes of that nature—i.e., all mistakes of title—are fundamentally mistakes of fact, though such a mistake may arise from a mistake of law, and Anglo-Scottish Beet Sugar Corpn. v. Spalding (4) was relied on in support of this argument.

Thus, the crucial question arises: What was the nature of the mistake in this case. In my judgment, it was a mistake as to part of the general law of England, but, if I am wrong in that view, then, in my judgment, it was a mistake as to the construction of the testator's will. It may be that in certain cases of payment of money there is involved a mistake of fact and a mistake of law, or there may be a mistake partly of fact and partly of law. The vital consideration in each case is what was the mistake which occasioned the payment: Holt v. Markham (3) and Anglo-Scottish Sugar Beet Corpn. v. Spalding (4). The mistake which was actually made here is concisely stated in para. 5 of the affidavit of the late defendant, Wintle, sworn by him in support of the originating summons taken out to test the validity of the residuary gift. Para. 5, so far as material, reads as follows:

In the belief that the trust contained in cl. 6 of the testator's will with regard to the disposition of the testator's residuary estate was a valid charitable trust my co-plaintiffs and I paid to the societies and institutions . . . the several sums [in question].

In my view, that means that the mistake on which the executors acted was the mistaken belief that a gift for charitable or benevolent purposes was a valid charitable gift in English law, whereas, in truth, it is a gift which in English law is void for uncertainty. It was a mistake as to the complicated technical requisites for the creation of a valid charitable trust. [The judge referred to the observations of LORD SIMONDS ([1944] 2 All E.R. 73) in Chichester Diocesan Fund v. Simpson (5) and to the judgment of STIRLING, J. ([1896] 2 Ch. 455, 456) in Re Macduff (6) and continued:] If, however, I am wrong in that view, then, in my judgment, the essential mistake was one of construction of the will. On no view can I see that any mistake of fact was involved at all. At the least it was a mistake as to the construction of the will as a whole, and the application to it of the decided cases. The only fact which the executors took into consideration was the actual wording of the will. As to this, there was no dispute, and, therefore, there could be no mistake of fact. It is plain that an action for money had and received cannot be founded on a mistake of law. It is equally clear that such an action cannot be founded on a mistake of construction: see per ATKINSON, J. ([1937] 2 K.B. 615), in Anglo-Scottish Beet Sugar Corpn. v. Spalding (4). See also Rogers v. Ingham (7), where it is assumed that the construction of a will is a question of law, and Re Hatch (8), where the construction of a deed is treated as a question of law. Against this weight of authority is urged the dictum of LORD WESTBURY (L.R. 2 H.L. 170) in Cooper v. Phibbs (9), but this dictum has given rise to much subsequent discussion and also to criticism, a recent example being the remarks of LORD ATKIN ([1932] A.C. 218) in Bell v. Lever Brothers (10). I think the true view is that the dictum must be read in its proper context, that is, in regard to an equitable claim for equitable relief, for example, setting aside a contract as part of which relief repayment of money may be directed, in which case no difficulty arises, because, in certain cases where equitable relief is sought, a mistake of law is not necessarily fatal. In the light of the modern authorities, however, it cannot be prayed in aid for the proposition that a mistake of construction is a mistake of private rights, and is, therefore, a mistake of fact which will found a claim for the repayment of money, and, in my respectful view, LORD WESTBURY never intended to say any such thing. For these reasons, therefore, the plaintiffs' claim for the return of the money paid to the defendant institutions, in so far as it is based on a claim for money had and received, fails.

I now turn to the first proposition put forward on behalf of the plaintiffs to which I have already referred. I must proceed to examine this proposition on the basis that the recipient postulated by counsel for the plaintiffs receives without such notice as would make him an express trustee. Counsel for the plaintiffs were unable to cite any reported case or to point to any accepted text book on equity in which the proposition as enunciated, or substantially as enunciated by them, was stated. In his reply, leading counsel for the plaintiffs disclaimed that he was putting forward a wide proposition. He disclaimed any attempt to put forward a proposition based merely on what must be regarded as ex aequo et bono, or what has been conveniently referred to as "justice between man and man." He was constrained to accept (and, in my view, rightly) that the existence of any general head of equity based on those unsatisfactorily vague principles has been exploded. In this regard I need only refer to the judgment of HAMILTON, L.J., ([1913] 1 Ch. 140), in Baylis v. Bishop of London (11). His remarks, in my judgment, are applicable to equity in general, and not merely to those equitable considerations imported by the common law courts into the action for money had and received, on which it has been developed.

A For myself, I am unable to agree that the proposition put forward by the plaintiffs is a narrow, or comparatively narrow, proposition. It appears to me to be of wide import, but that, of course, is not a circumstance which of itself precludes its existence. The plaintiffs maintain that it is to be extracted from a perusal of the authorities, not from any one authority, but as the result of the cumulative effect of a number of the authorities. I proceed, therefore, to a consideration of the authorities on which the plaintiffs rely. In considering these cases it is, I think, necessary to bear in mind, for reasons which will appear later, that it is an essential part of the plaintiffs' proposition that mistake, whether of law or fact, is an irrelevant consideration. They postulated the example of a distribution by executors of a will similar in terms to the will under consideration in this case where the executors, being under no misapprehension as to the invalidity of their testator's directions, yet insisted in making the distribution among bodies similar in character to the defendant institutions. This example was characterised by counsel for the defendants as highly improbable. Be it so. Nevertheless, the plaintiffs' counsel clearly had to put their case as high as this.

D The first five cases relied on were Gillespie v. Alexander (12), Greig v. Somerville (13), David v. Frowd (14), Sawyer v. Birchmore (15) and Thomas v. Griffith (16). An analysis of these cases discloses two points of significance. In the first place, the distribution had in each case been made pursuant to an order of the court in an administration action, and, in the second place, the mistake, pursuant to which in each case the money had been paid, was a mistake of fact. As regards the first point, the basis on which the distribution was ordered is explained, first, by a reference to the judgment of SIR JOHN LEACH, M.R. (1 My. & K. 211), in David v. Frowd (14). Secondly, reference may be made to the exposition of the practice of the old Court of Chancery, and now of the Chancery Division, in administration actions to be found in the opinion of LORD DAVEY ([1904] A.C. 5), in Harrison v. Kirk (17). As regards the second point, namely, that the mistake in each case was a mistake of fact, that necessarily follows from an examination of the facts. It was in each case a question whether a person was a creditor, or whether a person was one of the next of kin of the deceased, in either case clearly a question of fact. In my view, therefore, these cases, properly considered, do not support the wide proposition for which the plaintiffs contend.

F The next case relied on was Harris v. Harris (18). Having regard, however, to the exhaustive and searching examination and criticism to which this case was subjected by WARRINGTON, J., in Re Robinson (19), counsel for the plaintiffs was constrained to admit that he could not place much reliance on it. The plaintiffs relied strongly on passages from the judgments of MELLISH, L.J. and BAGGALLAY, J.A. in Rogers v. Ingham (7). That was a case in which an executor, acting on the advice of counsel on the construction of a will, proposed to divide in certain proportions a fund between two legatees. One of the legatees, being dissatisfied, took the opinion of counsel, which agreed with the former opinion. The executor then divided and paid over the fund in accordance with the opinions. Two years afterwards the dissatisfied legatee filed a bill against the executor and the other legatee, alleging that the will had been wrongly construed, and claiming repayment from the other legatee, and it was held that the suit could not be maintained. MELLISH, L.J., having stated (3 Ch.D. 357) the established rule of law that money paid under a mutual mistake of law cannot be recovered back, said that as a general rule the court of equity did not in such a case interfere with the court of law. It was only after making this observation that he referred to the power of the court of equity, in granting equitable relief, to order repayment of money where the mistake in question was a mistake of law. The passage in question is no authority for the proposition that there is a general rule of equity that a court of equity will entertain a mere money claim where the payment was made under a mistake of law. BAGGALLAY, J.A. made a most guarded statement (ibid., 358) not referring to any specific case in which equity would relieve on a mistake of law, and couched in the subjunctive mood. The plaintiffs can gain little or no support from this passage, but their difficulty in relying on this case appears to me to be manifestly increased when reference is made to what JAMES, L.J., said (ibid., 355):

I have no doubt that there are some cases which have been relied on, in which this court has not adhered strictly to the rule that a mistake in law is not always incapable of being remedied in this court; but relief has never been given in the case of a simple money demand by one person against another, there being between those two persons no fiduciary relation whatever, and no equity to supervene by reason of the conduct of the parties.

Those words seem to me to apply with full force to the claim in this case which I am now considering.

The plaintiffs then relied on Re Robinson (19). They admit, as they must, that it is not an express decision in their favour, but they point out that the decision turned on the application of the Statutes of Limitation, and contend that by implication the case recognises a special principle of equity relating to the recovery of a trust fund by one cestui que trust from another where it has been wrongly dealt with by the trustee. The headnote in this case, which, in my view, is amply borne out by the judgment, is as follows:

An action brought in the Chancery Division by one cestui que trust against another cestui que trust to recover money wrongly paid by the trustee to the latter under a common mistake of fact is in the nature of a common law action for money had and received, and the court, acting on the analogy of the Limitation Act, 1623, will hold the claim to be barred after the lapse of six years. The case would be different if the claim were made in an action in which the court was administering the trust estate. There, if there were assets to which the overpaid cestui que trust was entitled, the court would adjust the accounts as between the parties entitled, and lapse of time would be no bar.

So that, at first sight, the case does not appear very helpful to the plaintiffs. WARRINGTON, J., pointed out ([1911] 1 Ch. 507) that the claim was a mere money demand. Having adverted to the fact that the claim was not by the person who paid it, but by the person whose money was paid away, he treated the claim (ibid., 508) as being either a strict claim in law for money had and received, or as an analogous claim in equity to which, therefore, equity by analogy would apply the Statutes of Limitation. He examined the contention of the plaintiff that in regard to a mere money demand there was a claim in equity other than a claim analogous to the common law action of money had and received, and, in my judgment, so far from having, by implication, admitted the existence of such a claim in equity, the judge, when his judgment is considered as a whole, negatived it.

The plaintiffs also relied on Re Mason (20). The facts in this case were that a lunatic, at the date of her death in 1798, was entitled to certain funds in court representing the residuary estate of her father. In 1794 the master had reported that the lunatic had no heir at law or next of kin. In 1798 and 1801 the Crown made ex gratia grants of these funds to certain persons and obtained an indemnity in respect of these grants. In 1926 a petition was presented by persons claiming to be the next of kin of the lunatic for the payment to them of the whole of her personal estate. The case was decided against the suppliants on the ground that the claim was barred by the Limitation Act, 1623. Counsel for the plaintiffs, however, contended that, by implication, the case shows that the equitable principle for which he contends exists. His argument is that, if this principle did not exist, then logically that point should have been taken, and would have been taken, as the first point on behalf of the Crown. I cannot accept this reasoning either as conclusive, or, indeed, as satisfactory. In the first place, no such proposition as that for which the plaintiffs contend was put forward by counsel for the suppliants. Their case, so far as relevant, proceeded on the basis that all parties knew the property was subject to a trust, and that where such knowledge exists the statute can have no application. This contention was countered on behalf of the Crown by the argument that the claim was like that in Re Robinson (19), i.e., an action for money paid under a mistake of fact, and was, therefore, barred after six years. It is plain that ROMER, J., treated the claim by the suppliants as a money demand maintainable only by an action for money had and received at common law, or by an analogous claim in equity. I cannot, therefore, regard this case as supporting the plaintiffs' first proposition.

A I now turn to Re Rivers (21) which was strongly relied on by the plaintiffs. They prayed this case in aid as showing, first, that the earlier five cases to which I have referred—Gillespie v. Alexander (12), Greig v. Somerville (13), David v. Frowd (14), Sawyer v. Birchmore (15), and Thomas v. Griffith (16)—are all still good law, a proposition which no one doubts, and, secondly, to show that Re Rivers (21) affords an example in modern times of the application of the principle of equity for which the plaintiffs contend and which they say is to be extracted from the cases. This case, they say, is clear authority for the proposition which they advance, that it is a case in which repayment of money was ordered although it had not been paid and received under a mistake of fact. In my judgment, Re Rivers (21), when examined, does not help the plaintiffs. It is, I think, a simple example of a person receiving a payment otherwise than in due course of administration and being compelled to submit to an adjustment.

C It was for that reason, I think, that counsel for the defendants in that case was constrained to admit that he could not rely on the Statutes of Limitation. So regarded, the case falls within, and is but a further illustration of the principle emerging from, the five cases to which I have referred. I would add that, in so far as it may be necessary to do so, I take the view that in this case a mistake of fact was involved.

D The defendants, for reasons which I think sufficiently appear from my analysis of the cases in question, in seeking to deny the existence of any such equity as that for which the plaintiffs contend, relied on Rogers v. Ingham (7), Re Mason (20) and Re Robinson (19). In addition, they relied on a number of cases to which I must refer. The first is Hilliard v. Fulford (22). The relevant part of the headnote in the case reads as follows :

E . . . where, after executors had made a partial distribution of the residue, an administration action was instituted by the residuary legatees who had not received their shares, and it then turned out that the executors had made two mistakes, first, in making their distribution upon an erroneous assumption that the residue was divisible among five persons instead of six ; and, secondly, in expending part of the general personal estate in repairs of property specifically devised : Held, that the overpaid residuary legatees could not be made to refund, that the executors must stand in the same position as if no distribution had taken place, and that the costs of the action should be paid as out of the entire residuary estate, so as to charge the executors with the share of costs attributable to each of the distributed shares ; and then that the executors should pay the balance necessary to make up to the unpaid legatees one-sixth of the residue each.

F SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., said (4 Ch.D. 392) :

G The suit now comes on for hearing on further consideration ; and it seems that, after paying all the costs of the suit, the result will be that the executors will have paid probably more than their shares to the adult residuary legatees ; that is, if the estate were now to be distributed, they would not get as much as £750 each. The question is, who is to make good the difference ? That is really what it comes to.

It is important to bear that statement in mind in view of a later observation in the judgment. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., said (ibid., 393, 394) :

H But where, as in this case, the accounts are substantially incorrect, and where the executors have made two most serious mistakes, one in choosing to take upon themselves the office of the court in construing an obscure will, and construing it wrongly, and secondly, making so serious an error as laying out as much as £1,095 in repairing a freehold which did not belong to their cestuis que trust, I think the executors cannot be allowed to say that the distribution is a proper distribution, and that it ought to avail them when the accounts come to be subsequently taken. I think they must stand in the same position as if there had been no distribution at all. Therefore, I think the right order is that the whole costs of the administration suit should be taken out of the estate as if they had never divided it, so that the plaintiff and the infant defendant will be entitled to exactly the same shares out of the residuary estate as if no distribution had taken place and the other residuary legatees had been made defendants. Of course you cannot make those other residuary legatees pay back anything. There is no pretence for saying that they can be compelled to come in and contribute. Therefore, the difference, which I think cannot be very large, will in substance have to be made good by the executors who wrongly distributed the estate : they who have made the error will have to pay for it.

It was strongly contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that the words which I have read : "Of course you cannot make those other residuary legatees pay back anything. There is no pretence for saying that they can be compelled to come in and contribute " must be taken to relate only to a contribution to costs, and that they cannot be regarded as indicating that SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., entertained the view that, had it not been merely a deficiency as regards costs, contribution could not have been claimed from the other residuary legatees. I do not share this view. It is true that, in the result, the matter was reduced to a question of contributing towards the costs, but, in my opinion, the whole of the reasoning in the judgment shows that SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., considered that no repayment for costs or otherwise could be claimed from the other residuary legatees. When he said (ibid., 392) : "The question is, who is to make good the difference ? That is really what it comes to," he was referring to a deficiency in shares and not to costs. Again, when he said (ibid., 394) : "There is no pretence for saying that they can be compelled to come in and contribute," he did so because of what he had said in the preceding sentence : "Of course you cannot make those other residuary legatees pay back anything," a statement of general application, and certainly not limited to a contribution to costs. In my view, therefore, Hilliard v. Fulford (22) tends strongly to negative the existence of the equitable principle for which the plaintiffs contend, and it is of considerable importance in this matter because, as I interpret it, it is authority for the proposition that a mistake of construction in regard to a will is a mistake of law, and that a payment by executors to a legatee under such a mistake of law will be a bar to a personal claim by other persons entitled under the will, who have either been under-paid or not been paid, to recover from the recipients.

In Re Hatch (8) the court had to consider a deed made in 1885 under which a husband covenanted to pay to his wife £200 per annum during her life. The husband died in 1907 having by his will bequeathed his residuary estate to his executors and trustees upon certain trusts in favour of his four sons, one of whom subsequently died, having bequeathed his one-fourth share to the wife absolutely. The husband during his life-time, and his executors and trustees after his death, had paid the wife's annuity in full without deducting income tax. It was held by SARGANT, J., that, on the true construction of the deed, the wife's annuity was payable subject to, and not free from, income tax, and that past over-payments in respect of income tax having been made under a mistake of law were not recoverable as a debt from the wife, and could not be deducted either from future payments of the annuity or from the wife's share in the residuary estate of the husband. The basis of the decision of SARGANT, J. ([1919] 1 Ch. 356) was that, in the case of payment of money under a mistake of fact, recoupment could have been ordered, because in that case the estate would have been a creditor of the annuitant, but that, the mistake being one of construction, and, therefore, one of law, the relationship of debtor and creditor between the annuitant and the estate could not be implied, and, therefore, no debt could be implied in respect of which recoupment could be ordered. The claim was treated as one which, if it were to achieve success, must fulfil the conditions required for the successful prosecution of a claim for money had and received at common law, or the analogous claim entertained in equity, an essential condition of which was, of course, that the money in respect of which recoupment was sought should have been paid under a mistake of fact. SARGANT, J., rejected the contention that there was an equity, arising out of the circumstances existing at the date of the testator's death, entitling the trustees to recoup to the estate the amount of the overpayments—though made under a mistake of law and not constituting a legal debt—out of the share to which the annuitant became beneficially entitled. Re Hatch (8), therefore, strongly militates against the existence of the principle for which the plaintiffs contend, unless there be any foundation for their submission that, as regards the quality of the mistake, cases of misconstruction of deeds and contracts are to be distinguished from cases of misconstruction of wills in the consideration of claims based on more money demands. I am unable to see any distinction in principle, and, in my view, the weight of authority is directly against the existence of any such distinction. I need only refer again to Hilliard v. Fulford (22) and Rogers v. Ingham (7).

In Re Blake (23) the facts, as they appear from the headnote, were as follows :

- A The suppliant on a petition of right claimed to be entitled to the estate of an intestate who died on September 23, 1876. The petition stated that the suppliant was the legal personal representative of the grandchild of a paternal aunt of the intestate who died in 1886; that by an order dated June 23, 1883, it was declared that Queen Victoria was in right of her Royal Prerogative entitled to the intestate's personal estate, that it was ordered that the residue be paid by the Treasury Solicitor to such persons as Her Majesty or the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury should direct; that, pursuant to that order, the residue was transferred to the Paymaster-General; and that, at the date of the petition, the money, stocks and funds in question formed part of the Consolidated Fund and were held in trust for the intestate's next of kin. The petition submitted that an inquiry ought to be directed to ascertain who were the persons entitled to the estate and to what extent, and that the amount should be paid over to them. The Crown by demurrer pleaded that the claim was barred by the Limitation Act, 1623, and that the petition was bad in substance and in law on the ground that, on the facts therein alleged, no part of the money, stocks and funds constituting or representing the personal estate of the intestate, or forming part of the Consolidated Fund, was held in trust for the next of kin. Held, that the Crown succeeded on the point taken by the demurrer and that the petition must be dismissed.

- D The suppliant's case was rested on a right to follow the residue into the Consolidated Fund (and for the purpose of considering the extent of the doctrine of following assets I shall have occasion to return to this case later) which, if established, would, according to the contention on behalf of the suppliant, have avoided the application of the Statutes of Limitation. MAUGHAM, J., having discussed the nature of the Consolidated Fund ([1932] 1 Ch. 61), disposed of the suppliant's claim to follow the residue into that fund. On the previous page (ibid., 60), after a reference by MAUGHAM, J., to the Intestates Estates Act, 1884, there is a passage which throws much light on the question which I am considering. It is quite true, as was emphasised by counsel for the plaintiffs, that the only question decided was that the suppliant's claim was barred by lapse of time, but I am entitled, and, indeed, bound, to have regard to the reasoning by which that result was arrived at. It is worthy of remark that the principle for which the plaintiffs contend, not depending on the existence of any mistake, was not adumbrated by any of the counsel engaged in the case, for the purpose of either asserting or demolishing the principle. Nor is the existence of the principle referred to by the judge. As I read his judgment, MAUGHAM, J., was postulating that, apart from any right to follow assets, if capable of being traced, the only other remedy open to a next of kin of a deceased person making a money demand in respect of money or property paid or transferred to the wrong person is by a claim for money had and received at common law or by an analogous claim in equity.

- G On this review of the authorities, I have come to the conclusion that the principle for which the plaintiffs contend is unsupported by the authorities, is against the weight of the authorities, and, as a head of equity, does not exist. In my judgment, the authorities establish that, so far as a mere money demand is concerned (and I am, as regards this part of the matter, dealing only with a money demand), where the executor or administrator has paid money or transferred property, part of the estate of the deceased, to a person not entitled thereto in such circumstances as not to make the recipient an express trustee, the only remedy open to the legatee or next of kin rightfully entitled against the recipient is either to pursue a common law claim for money had and received in the name of the executor or administrator or to pursue in equity a claim analogous to the common law action for money had and received in which it would be unnecessary to join the executor or administrator as plaintiff. In either case, however, as I have shown, it would be essential to demonstrate that the money was paid under a mistake of fact and not a mistake of law, a mistake in construing a will being regarded for this purpose as a mistake of law. There are, of course, cases in which equity, in the exercise of its remedial jurisdiction, will intervene to grant relief such as rescission, which may involve the repayment of money, and for the purpose of granting such relief will not treat as fatal a mistake of law. I am not concerned to state the ambit of this jurisdiction. It is sufficient to say that this case, being a claim based on a mere money demand, is outside that class of case. In my judgment, the words of JAMES, L.J. (3 Ch. D. 355), in Rogers v. Ingham (7), are as true today as they were when spoken in 1876, and the subsequent authorities only serve to emphasise their correctness.

The next point advanced on behalf of the plaintiffs was that on the undisputed facts, to which I have already referred, they were entitled to follow the moneys paid by the executors to the respective defendant institutions into the hands of those institutions, and that, as in each case the money received had been paid into a banking account kept by the recipient with its bankers, the plaintiffs, on the principles laid down in Re Hallett's Estate (24), were entitled to trace the money into the banking account, and also out of the account, and further, that where, on such tracing out of the account, assets could be discovered in the hands of the recipient, representing wholly or in part the application of the money so received, the plaintiffs were entitled to an equitable charge on such assets to secure the amount of the money so traced into the assets.

For the purposes of the argument on this part of the case, the plaintiffs' counsel admitted that, on the receipt by the defendant institutions respectively of the payments made to them by the executors, the defendant institutions became neither trustees nor clothed with any fiduciary character, and that this position obtained until the receipt in October or November, 1939, by the respective defendant institutions of the warning letters from Mr. Wintle, to which I have referred earlier in this judgment. The plaintiffs' counsel were clearly constrained to make this admission in view of their admission on their second point, namely, that they could not maintain in this court that any of the defendant institutions took with notice of the trust in favour of the plaintiffs. In view of this admission, it becomes desirable to advert shortly to the right of following an asset at common law, and to the equitable doctrine of tracing (which is more extensive in its scope than the common law right), and to the principles on which the respective rights are based.

At common law there is a right in the owner of an asset who is deprived of the possession thereof to follow that asset into whosoever hands it may come, and notwithstanding that it may change its form, so long as he retains the property in the asset in its original or converted form: Miller v. Race (25) and Banque Belge v. Hambrouck (26) ([1921] 1 K.B. 329); and so long as the means of identifying the asset (in its original or converted form) continue to exist. The right is essentially a right in rem, and the difficulty which is usually encountered is the difficulty of continued identification where the asset sought to be followed is money or has at some stage of the chain of events been converted into money: see per LORD HALDANE in Sinclair v. Brougham (27) ([1914] A.C. 418, 419) where, commenting on a passage from the judgment of LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J. (3 M. & S. 575) in Taylor v. Plumer (28), LORD HALDANE said:

But LORD ELLENBOROUGH laid down . . . that if the money had become incapable of being traced, as, for instance, when it had been paid into the broker's general account with his banker, the principal had no remedy excepting to prove as a creditor for money had and received. The explanation was, of course, that a relation of debtor and creditor had arisen between the banker and his client . . . which precluded the notion of following the money.

The last sentence which I have read, if taken literally, would appear to support the conclusion that the payment of money by a holder thereof into his banking account in any circumstances would destroy the right of the true owner to follow the money at common law. I do not, with respect, think that LORD HALDANE intended his words to have such a far-reaching effect, and I do not think that he intended them to have the effect of denying to the true owner the right to follow his money when it has been paid by the person against whom it is sought to follow it into a separate account at his bankers into which no other moneys are paid. It is true that the result of such payment in is, as regards that money, to create the relationship of debtor and creditor and to substitute for the money a chose in action, but there has been no "mixing and confounding" of the money in a "general mass of the same description," to use the words of LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Taylor v. Plumer (28).

A That that is the true view is, I think, borne out by the language of LORD ELLENBOROUGH (3 M. & S. 575) in Taylor v. Plumer (28), and from the judgments of the Court of Appeal in Banque Belge v. Hambrouck (26), particularly that of BANKES, L.J. ([1921] 1 K.B. 328), and that of ATKIN, L.J. (ibid., 335). I, therefore, hold that where a person other than the true owner thereof pays money into an account at his bank, and does not mix with that money any other money, either his own, or that of any other person, the true owner of the money can, at common law, follow it into that account, and, further, can follow it out of the account into any asset or assets which can be shown to have been purchased wholly with it.

B The common law right of following property depends in no degree on the existence of any fiduciary relationship. This is conclusively demonstrated by LORD HALDANE ([1914] A.C. 420) in Sinclair v. Brougham (27). The common law right of following thus had the advantage that the person seeking to exercise it need not assert and prove any fiduciary relationship, but at the same time it had the disadvantage that, whenever the identity of the res ceased in fact, the remedy was gone. In the case of money, as I have already shown, whenever money, the res, is mixed with other money, the identity of the res is gone and the right to follow is at an end, a result which led LORD HALDANE to say (ibid., 418): "In most cases money cannot be followed." It will thus be seen that as regards money the common law right of following property is distinctly limited in scope. It was because of this limitation of the scope of the common law right that equity—which, as pointed out by LORD HALDANE, had so far exercised a concurrent remedy based on trust—gave a further remedy, namely, what is conveniently called a right to trace. For the purposes of this case D it is essential, for reasons which will appear later in this judgment, to have clearly in mind not only what is the nature and extent of the right of tracing in equity, but also, and, indeed, primarily, what are the principles on which that right is rested.

E The leading case on this matter is Re Hallett's Estate (24) to which I must refer in some little detail. The principles enunciated in this case are frequently referred to as the rule in Hallett's case, but it is important to observe at the outset that two distinct points emerge from the case: (i) that in certain circumstances, which I shall deal with, money which has been paid into a banking account and there mixed with other money, can be followed into that account notwithstanding that mixing; and (ii) after the entry into the account has been made, how the account is to be unravelled for the purpose of tracing the money through and out of the account.

F The first of these two points is dealt with under the heading of "Claim of Mrs. Cotterill" (13 Ch.D. 707). Mr. Hallett, a solicitor, held certain bonds on behalf of Mrs. Cotterill, a client of his, and, therefore, stood in a fiduciary position towards her. He improperly sold these bonds and put the money, the proceeds of such sale, to his general account at his bankers. The money remained at his bankers mixed with his own money at the time of his death, i.e., he had not drawn out that money from his bankers. In that position of matters, Mrs. G Cotterill claimed to be entitled to receive the proceeds, or the amount of the proceeds, of the bonds out of the money in the hands of Mr. Hallett's bankers at the time of his death, and the claim was allowed. The basis on which the claim was allowed, involving, as it did, entering the mixed account, was that Mr. Hallett stood in a fiduciary position towards Mrs. Cotterill: see per SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R. (ibid., 708, 709). SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., dealt with the suggestion that there was a distinction in this regard between "an express H trustee, or an agent, or a bailee, or a collector of rents, or anybody else in a fiduciary position," and stated in emphatic terms that there was no such distinction. He concluded (ibid., 710):

Therefore, the moment you establish the fiduciary relation, the modern rules of equity, as regards following trust money, apply.

Later in his judgment (ibid., 719) SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., quoted from the judgment of WOOD, V.-C. (2 H. & M. 420), in Frith v. Cartland (29). Both BAGGALLAY and THESIGER, L.JJ., in agreeing with the conclusion of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., based their judgments on the existence of the fiduciary duty owed by Mr. Hallett to Mrs. Cotterill.

Pausing here, it appears to me to follow from a perusal of the judgments in Re Hallett's Estate (24) on the claim of Mrs. Cotterill that, so far as the authority of that case goes, the equitable doctrine of allowing tracing into a mixed mass, particularly into a banking account where the tracer's money has been mixed with other money, is rested on the existence of a fiduciary relationship between the person into whose banking account the money has been paid and the true owner; that the existence of that fiduciary relationship is a condition precedent to entering the banking account where the moneys have been mixed; and, therefore, that where that fiduciary relationship does not exist, there is no right in equity to trace into the mixed account. In other words, it is the existence of the fiduciary relationship which enables equity to give that further remedy to which LORD HALDANE ([1914] A.C. 420) referred in Sinclair v. Brougham (27).

The second point which was decided in Re Hallett's Estate (24) arose in this way. Mr. Hallett, being the trustee of some bonds, improperly sold them, and by his direction the proceeds were paid to his credit at his bankers and there mixed with moneys belonging to himself in the same banking account, and he also drew by ordinary cheques moneys from the banking account which he used for his own purposes. At his death in 1878 there was more money to the credit of the account than the sum of trust moneys paid into it, but if, applying the rule in Clayton's case (30), every payment made after the payment in of the trust moneys was applied to the first items on the credit side in order of date, a large portion of the trust moneys would have been paid out. The question was whether or not, in these circumstances, the moneys drawn out by Mr. Hallett after the payment in of the trust moneys were to be treated as the repayment of his own moneys, or whether they were to be treated as appropriated so as to diminish the amount applicable to the trust funds. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., first considered the matter on principle and observed (13 Ch.D. 727):

Now, first upon principle, nothing can be better settled, either in our own law, or, I suppose, the law of all civilised countries, than this, that where a man does an act which may be rightfully performed, he cannot say that that act was intentionally and in fact done wrongly.

Having then given a series of examples, he observed:

That is the universal law. When we come to apply that principle to the case of a trustee who has blended trust moneys with his own, it seems to me perfectly plain that he cannot be heard to say that he took away the trust money when he had a right to take away his own money.

Having dealt with what he describes as the simplest case of the mingling of trust moneys in a bag with the trustee's own, he said (ibid., 727, 728):

What difference does it make if, instead of being in a bag, he deposits it with his banker, and then pays in other money of his own, and draws out some money for his own purposes? Could he say that he had actually drawn out anything but his own money? His money was there, and he had a right to draw it out, and why should the natural act of simply drawing out the money be attributed to anything except to his ownership of money which was at his bankers.

SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., then proceeded (ibid., 728) to demonstrate that, wherever the fiduciary position exists, then, in unravelling the banking account where the trust and other moneys have been mixed, the rule in Clayton's case (30), which is a rule of convenience based on a presumed intention, must give way to the application of the principle in respect of which I have quoted him. Having dealt with a difficulty with which FRY, J., supposed himself to be faced by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Pennell v. Deffell (31), he said (13 Ch.D. 730):

No human being ever gave credit, even beyond that theory, that he should not only misappropriate trust moneys to increase his assets, but that he should pay the trust moneys so misappropriated to his own banking account with his own moneys, and draw out after that a larger sum than the first sums paid in for the trust moneys.

BAGGALLAY, L.J., based his judgment on the same considerations (ibid., 743), but THESIGER, L.J., dissented from the majority, taking the view (ibid., 752) that the Court of Appeal was bound by the previous decision of that court in Pennell v. Deffell (31).

The effect of this second part of the judgment in Re Hallett's Estate (24) is that, once the banking account into which the money sought to be traced has been paid has been entered, the application of the rule in Clayton's case (30) is displaced for the same reason as that by reason of the existence of which equity allows the account to be entered, namely, the fiduciary relationship between the person who has paid in the money sought to be traced and the true owner. The fiduciary position is treated as a circumstance which displaces
A the presumed intention on which the application of the rule in Clayton's case (30) depends, because as between the trustee or the person owing a fiduciary duty, on the one hand, and the beneficiary or person owed the fiduciary duty, on the other hand, it must be presumed that the trustee or fiduciary agent intended to act honestly, and effect can only be given to that intention by treating drawings out of the account as drawings by the trustee or fiduciary agent of his own moneys. It may well be, as is suggested by BAGGALLAY, L.J., that the
B rule in Clayton's case (30) will obtain as between respective beneficiaries whose moneys have been mixed by their trustee in one banking account.

Now, it is to be observed that the doctrine is artificial in that it is based on a presumed intention, namely, that the trustee or fiduciary agent intended to act honestly, when in most cases, of which Re Hallett's Estate (24) itself forms an example, the contrary is the fact. In the usual case there is a deficiency. The competition
C is between the beneficiary and the creditors of the trustee or fiduciary agent, and the position has been brought about by the improper and generally dishonest motive of the trustee or fiduciary agent. This improper or dishonest motive neither he nor those who claim under him are allowed to set up, and it is presumed (usually quite contrary to the fact) that all along he was filled with a proper and honest intent. Here I may observe in passing that I place
D no weight on the circumstance on which the plaintiffs' counsel relied strongly, namely, that all the reported cases relating to tracing deal with a deficiency, because, as was pointed out by KINDERSLEY, V.-C., (L.R. 2 Eq. 552) in Hopper v. Conyers (32) the test must always be as between the trustee or fiduciary agent and the person seeking to follow or trace. The creditors of the trustee or fiduciary agent cannot stand in a better position than he could. I have been at pains to emphasise the artificial element in the equitable doctrine of tracing
E because, in my view, it serves to underline the truth that, in the evolution of this doctrine, equity did no more, and at the same time did no less, than have recourse to its age-old expedient of fastening on the conscience of the person against whom it intended to extend the remedy. The decision in Re Hallett's Estate (24), if I may so put it, reeks of trust and fiduciary relationship, and the two points, which emerge from the judgments and with which I have dealt above, are, as I have shown, based by the express language of the court upon the existence of trust or fiduciary relationship.

On the doctrine of tracing in equity as enunciated in Re Hallett's Estate (24) certain refinements have been engrafted, which, however, in no way affect the principles on which the decision is rested, but which, indeed, are wholly consistent with the logical working out of those principles. In Re Oatway (33) it was held that where a trustee pays trust money into his banking account whereby it becomes mixed with his own money and out of moneys drawn from the account
G purchases an investment in his own name, but subsequently applies the balance to his own purposes, his representatives cannot successfully maintain that the investment is purchased out of the trustee's own money, and that what has been spent, and can no longer be traced and recovered, is the money belonging to the trust. In Roscoe v. Winder (34) it was held that payment into a general account cannot, without proof of express intention, be appropriated to the replacement of trust money which has been improperly mixed with that account
H and drawn out: see per SARGANT, J., ([1915] 1 Ch. 69). It is significant to observe that the decision in this case was given after the decision of the House of Lords in Sinclair v. Brougham (27), and that SARGANT, J., neither showed any inclination to extend the doctrine of tracing as laid down in Re Hallett's Estate (24), nor regarded that doctrine as having been affected by the decision in Sinclair v. Brougham (27).

Many cases involving the equitable doctrine of tracing have come before the courts of equity since the decisions in Re Hallett's Estate (24) in 1879 and 1880, but (apart from Sinclair v. Brougham (27)) I do not consider it necessary to refer to more than the authorities to which I have already referred. The difficulties which have occurred have arisen, not on any doubt as to the principles underlying the decision in Re Hallett's Estate (24), but in the application of those principles to the facts of particular cases. One conclusion appears to me to be clear, namely, that, putting aside for the moment Sinclair v. Brougham (27), there is no case in the books (and in this regard I do not omit from account Buckeridge v. Glasse (35) and Thompson v. Finch (36)) from which it could be asserted that the equitable right of tracing is available against a person who, at the time of receiving the money sought to be traced and which he has mixed with his own in his banking account, owed no fiduciary duty to the true owner, while, on the other hand, the whole weight of the authority of Re Hallett's Estate (24) and the cases which have followed it is without exception to the contrary. It is no part of the defendants' case to dispute that, if a volunteer receives trust money or property without knowledge that it is subject to a trust, but subsequently receives such notice and is still in possession of the trust money or property, he, being a volunteer, cannot maintain his title against those entitled under the trust. On the other hand, it is no part of the plaintiffs' case that the notice given to the defendant institutions by the respective warning letters could in any sense be related back to the respective dates of receipt by them of the moneys paid to them by the executors or that the defendant institutions could be clothed with any fiduciary character prior to the receipt of the warning letters. I have, however, considered it necessary to examine at some length the decision in Re Hallett's Estate (24) because of the way in which the plaintiffs' case has been put.

If I have rightly understood the arguments of the plaintiffs' counsel, they involve that the question of the defendants' conscience is not material at the start of the tracing as a condition precedent to equity allowing the tracing to be undertaken, but, at the most, at the end of the inquiry, if, as a result thereof, a superfluity should be found in the defendants' hands. They maintain that the right to the machinery of tracing for which they contend is supported by authority, or, if not, is justified on principle, and in so far as acceding to their contention would represent an extension of the equitable doctrine of tracing, that extension should be made.

I must, therefore, proceed to consider, first, whether the plaintiffs' counsel are right in their contention that the proposition for which they contend is supported by authority. Virtually speaking, the only authority on which they rely is confined to one case, but one of the greatest importance, namely, the decision of the House of Lords in Sinclair v. Brougham (27). The plaintiffs contend that, on a true view, this case is authority for the proposition that the machinery of a tracing order can be applied to a case where the person against whom the tracing order is sought did not stand in a fiduciary relationship to the person seeking the order at the time of receipt of the property or money sought to be traced. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that, properly understood, Sinclair v. Brougham (27) is no more than an application of the first point decided in Re Hallett's Estate (24), i.e., that it predicated, for the purpose of getting into the mixed mass of money dealt with in that case, that there was a fiduciary relationship, and that in so far as there could be said to have been any departure from the strict application of the second part of the decision in Re Hallett's Estate (24), that departure lay in the decision to divide the mixed mass between the two competing sets of claimants in proportion to their respective contributions to what the mass represented, because the machinery for unravelling the mass laid down in the second part of the decision in Re Hallett's Estate (24) could not, in the circumstances, be applied. The immediate question, therefore, is: Which of these views is correct?

For this purpose I must embark on a detailed consideration of the facts in Sinclair v. Brougham (27), and of what was decided in that case. The relevant facts were that a building society, formed in 1851 and empowered by its rules to borrow to an unlimited extent, started and developed a banking business. In 1911 the society was ordered to be wound up and questions of priority arose between the outside creditors, the unadvanced shareholders and the bank customers on current and deposit account (to whom I will refer as "the depositors.") The assets were insufficient for payment of all the claimants in full, but were more than sufficient for the payment of the outside creditors (who were subsequently paid by arrangement) and the shareholders. It was held that the power to borrow must be limited to the proper objects of the society and that the carrying on of the banking business was ultra vires. Secondly, it was held that the depositors were not entitled to recover moneys paid by them on an ultra vires contract of loan on the footing of money had and received by the society to their use. It was, however, held thirdly (as stated in the headnote) :

A Applying the principle of Re Hallett's Estate (24) that the assets remaining after payment of the outside creditors must be taken to represent in part moneys which the depositors could follow, as having been invalidly borrowed, and in part moneys which the society could follow, as having been wrongfully employed by its agents in the banking business, and (subject to any application by any individual depositor or shareholder with a view to tracing his own money into any particular asset, and to the costs of the liquidation) ought to be distributed pari passu between the depositors and the unadvanced shareholders according to the amounts respectively credited to them in the books of the society at the commencement of the winding-up.

B Now, as I shall show, at the root of the decision lie the circumstances that, as the carrying on of the banking business was ultra vires the society, the directors of the society, and not the society itself, must be deemed to have carried on that business, and the moneys constituting the mass in the hands of the liquidators must be deemed to represent moneys received from the society and the depositors by the directors; that the directors so receiving such moneys stood in a fiduciary relationship to the society and the depositors; that in expending the moneys so received the directors had acted wrongfully and in breach of trust; that they had done so to the knowledge of both the society and the depositors; and that as between the society and the depositors the equities were equal.

D If this be a correct view of the matter, then it appears to me that, so far as the first part of Re Hallett's Estate (24) is concerned, this case represents a strict application of the principle there enunciated for the purpose of effecting entry into the mass in the hands of the liquidator, and that the only departure (if it be one) from Re Hallett's Estate (24) occurs as regards the second point, in the division of the mass between the two competing classes, because of the practical impossibilities of tracing. The departure would appear to be more apparent than real, because, if (as, in my view, was the position) it was a case of a fund held on behalf of two sets of beneficiaries, the machinery of tracing dealt with in the second part of Re Hallett's Estate (24) would not have been applicable even if it could have applied. It appears to me, therefore, that the only relevance of Re Hallett's Estate (24) in Sinclair v. Brougham (27) was to effect entry into the mass. LORD HALDANE, having dealt with the claim for money had and received, said ([1914] A.C. 420, 421) :

E But while the common law gave the remedy I have stated, it gave no remedy when the money had been paid by the wrong-doer into his account with his banker, who simply owed him a debt, so that no money was or could be, in the contemplation of a court of law, earmarked. Here equity, which had so far exercised a concurrent jurisdiction based upon trust, gave a further remedy. The Court of Chancery could and would declare, even as against the general creditors of the wrong-doer, that there was what it called a charge on the banker's debt to the person whose money had been paid into the latter's bank account in favour of the person whose money it really was. And, as JESSEL, M.R., pointed out in Hallett's case (24), this equity was not confined to cases of trust in the strict sense, but applied at all events to every case where there was a fiduciary relationship. It was, as I think, merely an additional right, which could be enforced by the Court of Chancery in the exercise of its auxiliary jurisdiction, wherever money was held to belong in equity to the plaintiff. If so, subject to certain qualifications which I shall presently make, I see no reason why the remedy explained by JESSEL, M.R., in Hallett's case (24), of declaring a charge on the investment in a debt due from bankers on balance, or on any mass of money or securities with which the plaintiff's money had been mixed, should not apply in the case of a transaction that is ultra vires. The property was never converted into a debt, in equity at all events, and there has been throughout a resulting trust, not of an active character, but sufficient, in my opinion, to bring the transaction within the general principle.

H The object of that passage was to lead to the conclusion that there was no reason why the remedy explained by JESSEL, M.R., in Re Hallett's Estate (24) of declaring a charge should not apply in an ultra vires transaction. LORD HALDANE was only seeking to apply a known principle of equity and not to extend such principle or to make a new head of equity. In referring to the principle, he refers to the condition on which its applicability depends, namely, the existence of a fiduciary relationship, and underlines this aspect of the matter in the last sentence of the paragraph. He says "there has been throughout a resulting trust." The word "throughout" is vital. There could not be a resulting trust, however dormant, over a period during which the recipient of the money sought to be traced was not in any sense a fiduciary agent. LORD HALDANE said (ibid., 422, 423):

For the purpose of the question before us the really relevant part of the judgment in Hallett's case (24) is that which shows how the difficulty of following money into a debtor and creditor account like a banker's is got over in equity. The loan to the banker was regarded as an investment pro tanto of the principal's money, and the latter was treated as entitled to waive the breach of duty by his agent, and to claim the investment to the extent of the amount due to him as made on his behalf. The agent could not set up that any part of the money in the bank was his until he had made good his breach of duty, and in that sense there was a charge.

In the present case the investment was not made in breach of a fiduciary duty on the part of the society, and it was actually made with the authority of the depositors. What was a material point in Hallett's case (24), therefore, does not occur here. No doubt it was ultra vires of the society to undertake to repay the money. But it was none the less intended that in consideration of giving such an undertaking the society should be entitled to deal with it freely as its own. The consideration failed and the depositors had the right to follow the money so far as invalidly borrowed into the assets in which it had been invested, whether these assets were mere debts due to the society or ordinary securities, but that was their only right.

It was sought to be argued that that passage was authority for the proposition that, for the purpose of effecting entry into a banking account, the person seeking to trace need not show that the recipient of the money into whose account it was paid stood in any fiduciary relationship at the time of receipt or payment in. For myself, I do not consider that any such far reaching proposition can be deduced from this or any other passage of LORD HALDANE's speech. In the first of the two paragraphs which I have just read LORD HALDANE demonstrates conclusively that, in order to pray in aid the first rule in Re Hallett's Estate (24) for the purpose of following money into a banking account, it is necessary to show that the person into whose account the money was paid was a fiduciary agent. In the second paragraph what LORD HALDANE is explaining is that both the society and the depositors were tracers. The society did not owe the depositors any fiduciary duty and in that sense the case was different from Re Hallett's Estate (24). None the less, it is not right to say that Sinclair v. Brougham (27) is not a case in which any question of fiduciary relationship was involved. As is pointed out by LORD HALDANE in the passage on which I have commented and again (ibid., 425) and even more clearly and expressly by LORD PARKER, as the business was ultra vires the society, it had to be regarded as carried on improperly by the directors, the agents of the society and necessarily fiduciary agents. I am, therefore, unable to regard LORD HALDANE's speech in Sinclair v. Brougham (27) as authority supporting the plaintiffs' proposition to which I have already referred.

LORD DUNEDIN said (ibid., 431):

Now I think it is clear that all ideas of natural justice are against allowing A. to keep the property of B., which has somehow got into A.'s possession without any intention on the part of B. to make a gift.

The plaintiff's counsel relied very strongly on this passage, and sought to put it forward as authority for their proposition that the receipt of the property of B. by A., without any intention on the part of B. to make a gift, constituted an equity in B. entitling him to enter and investigate the banking account of A. to discover whether A. still retained the money or held an asset wholly or in part representing that money. In my judgment, to take this view would be to extract from the passage in question more than it contains. It is, in my view, essential to bear in mind the concrete problem to which LORD DUNEDIN was addressing himself, and which he states (ibid., 438) in these words:

What has happened is truly this. The directors of the society have taken the moneys of the shareholders which they had a right to receive, and the moneys of the depositors which they had not, and mixed them so that they cannot be discriminated from each other, and have put them, so to speak, in the society's strong-box, where the mixed mass is found by the liquidator.

It is clear from this passage that what LORD DUNEDIN was dealing with throughout his speech was a real superfluity existing in specie and not a mere superfluity in account. In the case before him the facts established that the mass in the hands of the liquidator represented in fact the moneys of the depositors and the society. No question, therefore, such as that before me, arose for consideration in Sinclair v. Brougham (27), but it is to be observed that, on the footing of the statement of the facts by LORD DUNEDIN, the fiduciary element was present, namely, the fiduciary duty owed by the directors to the society and the depositors, which would entitle either set of tracers to enter the mixed mass on the authority of the first part of the rule in Re Hallett's Estate (24). I can find no suggestion in the language used by LORD DUNEDIN to effect any extension of the equitable doctrine of tracing or to enunciate any new head of equity, or, indeed, to do anything more than to apply existing and well-known principles to the particular facts before him. It is true that LORD DUNEDIN said (ibid., 435, 436):

I have made these citations to show that other great systems of law have not been unable to solve the problem arising where the equity of restitution comes in contact with the doctrine of nullity of contract. Is English equity to retire defeated from the task which other systems of equity have conquered? Let us for a moment examine what the argument on the other side is. There being no contract, it is impossible, it is said, to have any obligation on the part of the society to restore what it has taken from the depositors. The only right of the depositors is a right to vindicate property; or, in other words, when you have a jus in re you can enforce it; but if the thing has so disappeared that a jus in re is no longer to be found (and this must practically always be so in the case of money), then your remedy is gone. The sole relief which equity can give is that if you can show that your money has paid a just debt, in that case you shall have action. This comes to this, that having got hold of property which does not belong to you, if only you are wise or lucky enough to change its form you may enjoy the proceeds unmolested. Such a plea on the face of it seems only worthy of the Pharisee who shook himself free of his natural obligations by saying Corban. In the words of technical equity it is unconscionable.

The words "In the words of technical equity" appear to me to supply the key to the whole passage. In the eye of equity (technical equity) it could only be unconscionable to retain the property if, after the application of the relevant rules of equity, the retention could still be said to be unconscionable. If it be still true, as I think it is, that the application of the two rules in Re Hallett's Estate (24) depend on the existence of a fiduciary relationship, it cannot be unconscionable in the eye of equity to retain money in circumstances where the identity of the money has, in fact, been lost, and where the rules of equity cannot be prayed in aid to preserve that identity.

I think that counsel for the defendants was right in his submission that LORD DUNEDIN was presupposing on the part of the recipient knowledge that the money belonged to some one else in equity, in other words, that there existed that fiduciary relationship which would admit the application of the rules in Re Hallett's Estate (24). LORD DUNEDIN nowhere sought to quarrel with, or to cast doubt on, those rules. He recognised the correctness of the first rule by his silence, and only referred to the case at all to point out that on the facts before him the second part of Re Hallett's Estate (24) had no application. I am, therefore, of opinion that the plaintiffs do not find support for their proposition in the speech of LORD DUNEDIN.

I now turn to the speech of LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON. In the first place, I desire to refer to certain passages which, in my judgment, establish beyond doubt that LORD PARKER's reasoning proceeded on the basis that on the facts of the case before him the ultra vires business must be deemed to have been carried on by the directors who thus stood in a fiduciary relationship both to the depositors and to the society. LORD PARKER said ([1914] A.C. 441, 442):

Secondly, it appears to be also well settled that the lender in an ultra vires loan transaction has a right to what is known as a tracing order. A company or other statutory association cannot by itself or through an agent be party to an ultra vires act. If its directors or agents affecting to act on its behalf borrow money which it has no power to borrow, the money borrowed is in their hands the property of the lender. At law, therefore, the lender can recover the money, so long as he can identify it, and even if it has been employed in purchasing property, there may be cases in which, by ratifying the action of those who have so employed it, he may recover the property purchased. Equity, however, treated the matter from a different standpoint. It considered that the relationship between the directors or agents and the lender was a fiduciary relationship, and that the money in their hands was for all practical purposes trust money. Starting from a personal equity, based on the consideration that it would be unconscionable for any one who could not plead purchase for value without notice to retain an advantage derived from the misapplication of trust money, it ended, as was so often the case, in creating what were in effect rights of property, though not recognised as such by the common law.

That means that the basis of the right of tracing in such a case is the wrongdoing of the fiduciary agents, which makes applicable the first part of the rule in Re Hallett's Estate (24). After referring to Re Guardian Permanent Benefit Building Society (Crace-Calvert's Case) (37) LORD PARKER said (ibid., 443, 444):

No doubt at first sight it is difficult to be certain as to the principles of equity to which SIR GEORGE JESSEL referred. But I think the difficulty may be solved by disentangling the equity itself from the directions by means of which the court endeavoured to give effect to it. The equity lay in this, that it would be unconscionable for the society to retain the amount by which its assets had been increased by, and in fact still represented, the borrowed money. It would be inequitable for the society to take advantage of the misapplication by its agents of money belonging to others and held by them in a fiduciary capacity. In other words, it was the same equity as that on which a tracing order is based.

LORD PARKER stated the particular case before him in these words (ibid. 448, 449):

The case, therefore, presents itself in this way. Here is a mass of assets arising in the course of an ultra vires business carried on by the directors and agents of the society. There are, on the other hand, liabilities, how or for what purpose incurred is not in evidence. No one claims any interest in the assets except the ultra vires lenders, the members of the society and the creditors, in respect of the liabilities to which I have referred. The ultra vires lenders and the members are willing that these liabilities and the costs of the liquidation, which are in effect costs of administering the fund, shall be first paid. If this is done, what is left may be taken to represent in part the moneys of the ultra vires lenders and in part the moneys of the society wrongfully employed in the business. The equities of the ultra vires lenders and of the society are equal, and it follows that the remainder of the assets ought to be divided between the ultra vires lenders and the society rateably, according to the capital amount contributed by such lenders and the society respectively. This mode of distribution gives effect to all the equities of the parties, and there is in it nothing necessarily inconsistent with the decision in the Crace-Calvert case (37), for there the business actually carried on was intra vires, and thus belonged to the society, except in so far as the ultra vires lenders could establish any equitable claim. It depends solely on the fact that the assets for distribution being assets not of a legitimate but an ultra vires business are not the assets of the society, except in so far as they can substantiate some equity to them, and that such equity as they have can arise only from an application of the same principles to which the ultra vires lenders are themselves entitled to have recourse.

These passages also appear to me to establish that LORD PARKER treated the matter as one in which, because of the fiduciary position of the directors who carried on the ultra vires business, it was open both to the depositors and to the society to make entry into the mass of assets in the hands of the liquidator by invoking the first part of the rule in Re Hallett's Estate (24).

The following passage from the speech of LORD PARKER (ibid., 442), particularly the latter part, was strongly relied on both by the plaintiffs and the defendants:

The principle on which, and the extent to which, trust money can be followed in equity is discussed at length in Re Hallett's Estate (24) by SIR GEORGE JESSEL. He gives two instances. First, he supposes the case of property being purchased by means of the trust money alone. In such a case the beneficiary may either take the property itself or claim a lien on it for the amount of the money expended in the purchase. Secondly, he supposes the case of the purchase having been made partly with the trust money and partly with money of the trustee. In such a case the beneficiary can only claim a charge on the property for the amount of the trust money expended in the purchase. The trustee is precluded by his own misconduct from asserting any interest in the property until such amount has been refunded. By the actual decision in the case, this principle was held applicable when the trust money had been paid into the trustee's banking account. I will add two further illustrations which have some bearing on the present case. Suppose the property is acquired by means of money, part of which belongs to one owner and part to another, the purchaser being

A in a fiduciary relationship to both. Clearly each owner has an equal equity. Each is entitled to a charge on the property for his own money, and neither can claim priority over the other. It follows that their charges must rank pari passu according to their respective amounts. Further, I think that as against the fiduciary agent they could by agreement claim to take the property itself, in which case they would become tenants in common in shares proportioned to amounts for which either could claim a charge.

B Suppose, again, that the fiduciary agent parts with the money to a third party who cannot plead purchase for value without notice, and that the third party invests it with money of his own in the purchase of property. If the third party had notice that the money was held in a fiduciary capacity, he would be in exactly the same position as the fiduciary agent, and could not, therefore, assert any interest in the property until the money misapplied had been refunded. But if he had no such notice this would not be the case. There would on his part be no misconduct at all. On the other hand, I cannot at present see why he should have any priority as against the property over the owner of the money which had, in fact, been misapplied.

In my judgment, this paragraph, when carefully analysed and considered in its context, admits of no ambiguity. In the first place, it is clear that LORD PARKER was not seeking in this passage to make any exhaustive statement of the principle on which, and the extent to which, trust money can be followed in equity. In the immediately preceding paragraph he is confining himself to the impact of equity on an ultra vires transaction of lending, leading

D up to the conclusion that equity considered that the relationship between the directors or agents and the lender was a fiduciary relationship, and that the money in their hands was for all practical purposes trust moneys. He then contents himself with observing that the principle on which, and the extent to which, trust money can be followed in equity is discussed at length in Re Hallett's Estate (24) by SIR GEORGE JESSEL. Then he refers to two instances given by SIR GEORGE JESSEL. In both of those instances the existence of the fiduciary relationship at the time of dealing with the trust money is postulated. LORD PARKER then adds two illustrations of his own. The first, in effect, was the case before him. In that case also the existence of the fiduciary relationship would enable either party to invoke the first rule in Re Hallett's Estate (24) and enter the mass, whether it consisted of specific property or a chose in action owed by his bankers to the person under the E fiduciary duty, though, when entry into the mass had been made, then, as between the two owners of the money, the equities would be equal. His second illustration is introduced in these words :

Suppose, again, that the fiduciary agent parts with the money to a third party who cannot plead purchase for value without notice, and the third party invests it with money of his own in the purchase of property.

G It is, I think, important to consider the scope of that illustration. In the discussion of the elements of a principle or the extent of its application, a hypothetical example is frequently of the greatest help, but only if its scope is clearly understood. In the illustration which he gives, is LORD PARKER postulating the mixing by the third party in his banking account of the money paid to him by the fiduciary agent with his own money before the investment is effected, or not ? Both views were urged before me. In favour of the view

H that LORD PARKER did postulate such mixing is the undoubted circumstance that in practice the normal course which would be followed by the recipient, particularly if he took without notice of the trust, would be to pay the money into his banking account. Against this consideration, however, must be set these considerations : (i) that LORD PARKER's statement of his illustration does not in terms involve any such mixing ; (ii) that it was unnecessary for the purposes of the case before him to consider the effect of such mixing ; (iii) that the second variation of this second illustration militates strongly, and, as I think, conclusively, against any such postulation.

Having stated the illustration, LORD PARKER gives two variations of it. In the first place, he postulates that the third party receiving the money has notice that it was held in a fiduciary capacity. In such an event it would clearly be immaterial whether or not the money was mixed by the third party with money of his own, because in the language of LORD PARKER, "he would be in exactly the same position as the fiduciary agent and could not, therefore, assert any interest in the property until the money misapplied had been refunded," i.e., that both parts of the rule in Re Hallett's Estate (24) would be applied against him. In the second place, LORD PARKER says: "But if he had no such notice this would not be the case. There would on his part be no misconduct at all." That is, in such circumstances he could not be deprived of the right to assert an interest in the property except on the terms of first refunding the money received from the fiduciary agent. As between the third party and the true owner of the money paid by the fiduciary agent the equities would be equal, and for that reason LORD PARKER concluded his observations on this part of the matter with this sentence:

On the other hand, I cannot at present see why he should have any priority as against the property over the owner of the money which had, in fact, been misapplied.

If LORD PARKER, as I think was the case, did not have in mind any mixing of the two sets of moneys in the banking account of the third party prior to the investment, then the whole matter is plain, and the illustration amounts to this, that, as regards the first variation, it is a simple case of the application of both parts of the rule in Re Hallett's Estate (24), while, as regards the second illustration, it shows that, on the third party in fact receiving notice that the money paid to him was held in a fiduciary capacity and on proof that he still possesses an asset in part representing that money, the true owner can effect entry into the asset, so to speak, but not on the terms of having any priority over the third party. If, on the other hand, it were to be predicated that the money received from the fiduciary agent was first mixed by the third party with his own before the investment was made, he not then knowing that it was held in a fiduciary capacity, it appears to me that the second illustration put forward by LORD PARKER should be regarded, not as a true illustration of the application of the rule in Re Hallett's Estate (24), but as being a statement of the law either in extension of or in addition to that rule. I am clear that in neither of the paragraphs which I have been considering, nor in any other part of his speech, did LORD PARKER intend to do anything except apply the existing rules of equity, and certainly did not intend by means of a hypothetical example to cast any doubt on the rule of equity that the identity of trust money paid by a recipient thereof into his banking account and there mixed with his own moneys can be preserved (and, as I think, can only be preserved), if it be shown that at the time of payment in that recipient was clothed with a fiduciary character. I think that the correctness of this conclusion is illustrated by reference to a subsequent passage in LORD PARKER's speech, namely, his statement ([1914] A.C. 444) of the equity involved in the Crace-Calvert Case (37).

I can find nothing in the speech of LORD SUMNER which would support the plaintiffs' contention. The effect of the last paragraph of his speech ([1914] A.C. 459, 460), as I understand it, is that on the facts of the case LORD SUMNER was of opinion that the first part of the rule in Re Hallett's Estate (24) applied so as to allow entry into the mass, namely, because of the existence of the fiduciary relationship in which the directors of the society stood, but that in the special circumstances of the case the second part of the rule did not apply. This is entirely consistent with his previous observation (ibid., 458):

In my opinion, if precedent fails, the most just distribution of the whole must be directed, so only that no recognised rule of law or equity be disregarded.

LORD SUMNER was not concerned, and it is, I think, plain that he was not dealing with, the effect on the continued identity of trust moneys of an innocent recipient paying them into his banking account and there mixing them with his own. In my judgment, therefore, Sinclair v. Brougham (27) cannot be regarded as an authority which casts any doubt on the rule of equity that, where trust moneys are paid by a recipient thereof into his banking account and there mixed with his own moneys (in which event the identity of the trust moneys is lost in fact), their identity will be preserved in the eye of equity, if, at the time of payment in, the recipient can be said to be a fiduciary agent. It was urged on me by counsel for the plaintiffs that, if I should come to the conclusion to which I have come, that the authorities do not support their claim to trace the trust moneys into the banking accounts of the defendant institutions in cases where the trust moneys have been mixed in such accounts

A with the moneys of the respective defendant institutions, yet on principle I should allow their claim to trace. I cannot see how I can accede to that submission. I regard the decision in Re Hallett's Estate (24) as extended and refined by the decided cases to which I have referred, as laying down the extent to which equity will allow the tracing of trust money into a banking account where it is mixed with other moneys, and as requiring, as an essential condition precedent to allowing entry into the banking account, that it be shown that the person into whose account the trust moneys have been paid was, at the date of payment in, a fiduciary agent. If that be correct, then it follows that to allow tracing into that account when it cannot be shown that at the date of payment in the payer was a fiduciary agent, would involve disregarding altogether an essential element on which the reasoning of the judgments in Re Hallett's Estate (24) proceeded. But the decision in that case is a decision of the Court of Appeal and is binding on me.

C I have not failed to have regard to the well known passage from the judgment of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., (13 Ch. D. 710), in Re Hallett's Estate (24), where he refers to the modern rules of equity. The authorities following on Re Hallett's Estate (24) were exhaustively canvassed before me, and I have referred to them, so far as I have considered necessary, earlier in this judgment. They appear to me to bear out this, that it is still as necessary to-day as it was in 1879 to establish the fiduciary relation before the modern rules of equity, as regards following trust money, apply. From this it appears to me to follow that if, before the time the fiduciary relation is established, the trust money has been mixed in a banking account with other moneys, it would be wholly at variance with the reasoning of the judgments in Re Hallett's Estate (24) to hold that anything remained which could be the subject of tracing.

D Taking that view of the matter, I cannot discover any principle helpful to the plaintiffs which I could apply which would represent a legitimate extension of, as opposed to a departure from, the basic principle on which the decision in Re Hallett's Estate (24) is founded. The principle for which the plaintiffs' counsel contend is a perfectly simple and intelligible one, but in the view which I take of the authorities it is one which, if it is to be established, must (if I may say so with respect) be established by a higher court. I, therefore, hold that the plaintiffs are not entitled to trace into any banking account of any of the defendant institutions into which the moneys paid to such defendant institution by the executors were paid and there mixed with moneys of that defendant institution. In coming to this conclusion, I am fortified by the observations of MAUGHAM, J. ([1932] 1 Ch. 63, 64), in his considered judgment in Re Blake (23).

E The question was canvassed before me how the banking accounts should be unravelled, and how the moneys paid by the executors should be traced through and out of the accounts. In view, however, of the conclusion to which I have arrived, that the plaintiffs are not entitled to enter the accounts, this further question does not arise. I would only observe that, even if the plaintiffs had succeeded in establishing a right to trace into the accounts, I cannot see on what principle they would have been entitled to invoke the second part of the rule in Re Hallett's Estate (24), which, equally with the first part of the rule, depends on the existence of a fiduciary relationship at the time of payment in of the moneys sought to be traced—for without the existence of that fiduciary relationship there would be no ground on which there could be imputed to the person effecting the payment in that intention at the time of payment in and thereafter on which the machinery of tracing established by the second part of the rule essentially depends. Further, it appears to me, as at present advised, that to apply the second part of the rule in Re Hallett's Estate (24) against a person, who, when he received the money sought to be traced, was not a fiduciary agent, would be to go against the whole weight of the reasoning in the speeches in Sinclair v. Brougham (27), and to give the tracer that priority which, as I understand his language ([1914] A.C. 442, 443), LORD PARKER would have denied him. How far the view expressed by BAGGALLAY, L.J. (13 Ch. D. 743) in Re Hallett's Estate (24) can be reconciled with the reasoning of the House of Lords in Sinclair v. Brougham (27), is a question which may one day have to be decided. It may be that the answer is that, in a case involving a banking account in which more than one trust fund has been mixed, and where the facts make it practicable to do so, the rule in Clayton's Case (30) would be applied, while, on the other hand, in a case of which Sinclair v. Brougham (27) is an example, where it is not on the facts practicable to apply the rule in Clayton's Case (30), the principle of division on which the House of Lords proceeded in Sinclair v. Brougham (27) would be applied instead. On this aspect of the matter, however, I do not desire to express any concluded view.

There are two further points advanced on behalf of the plaintiffs to which I should refer. It was contended on their behalf that, wherever it could be shown that the money paid by the executors to the respective defendant institutions had been applied in the discharge of a just debt then owing by such institution, the plaintiffs were entitled to be recouped the amount so applied. This proposition was sought to be rested on the authority of Trevillian v. Exeter Corp. (38), the headnote of which is as follows :

A corporation raised money under an Act of Parliament on mortgages of the tolls and additional works of a canal, and, acting on what the Court of Appeal (differing from the court below) decided to be an erroneous construction of the Act, applied part of the money so raised in paying off old mortgages affecting other property of the corporation. On the tolls and additional works proving an insufficient security : Held, that the new mortgagees were entitled to follow their money so far as it had been erroneously applied, and to stand in the place of the old paid-off mortgagees as against the other property of the corporation.

His Lordship referred to the judgment of TURNER, L.J. (5 De G.M. & G. 834). This case appears to me to be no more than a simple instance of the application of the equitable doctrine of tracing and to establish that, where a trustee in breach of trust applies trust moneys in paying off a mortgage on his own property, equity will not allow him to assert any interest in the property so freed from the mortgage until the trust moneys have been recouped, and for that purpose will regard the property as charged in favour of the person entitled to the trust moneys to the extent thereof in place of the mortgagee. It does not appear to me to be an authority for the proposition that where an unsecured debt is discharged out of trust moneys, equity, as part of the doctrine of tracing, will order recoupment. The fact is that the debt is extinguished and the trust fund to that extent dissipated, and to order recoupment by the trustee would involve the imposition of a personal liability, and not the enforcement of a right in rem. The right in rem can only exist where property continues to exist into which the trust moneys can be shown to have gone, as in Trevillian v. Exeter Corp. (38). Again, the decision was one involving an express trustee, and is no authority against a person who is in no sense a fiduciary agent at the time of expenditure of the trust moneys. His liability must be confined to what can be followed into and shown to remain in his hands at the time he first becomes clothed with a fiduciary character. But apart from the above objections there is a fatal difficulty which prevents the plaintiffs from relying on Trevillian v. Exeter Corp. (38), if the conclusions to which I have arrived on the question of tracing are correct. Trevillian v. Exeter Corp. (38), is, as I have pointed out, a case of tracing. Even if the view of the case put forward by the plaintiffs were right, they could only pray it in aid if they first established not only the right to trace into, but through and out of, the various banking accounts. This right they have not, in my judgment, succeeded in establishing, and, therefore, Trevillian v. Exeter Corp. (38) can have no application.

In their argument on this part of the case counsel for the plaintiffs sought to rely on three passages in Sinclair v. Brougham (27). The first passage is from the speech of LORD DUNEDIN ([1914] A.C. 435) :

... but if the thing has so disappeared that a ius in re is no longer to be found (and this must practically always be so in the case of money) then your remedy is gone.

The sole relief which equity can give is that if you can show that your money has paid a just debt, in that case you shall have action.

The second passage is from the same speech (ibid., 436) :

Equity—I am now speaking of technical equity—has already found itself able, in the exercise of its auxiliary jurisdiction, as the respondents admit, to deal with the situation when the money has gone to pay a just debt. Is its action limited to that situation ? I think not. I think it can always, in the exercise of the same jurisdiction, help the common law by tracing . . .

The third passage is from the speech of LORD PARKER (ibid., 440, 441) :

Accepting the principle that no action or suit lies at law or in equity to recover money lent to a company or association which has no power to borrow, the question remains whether the lender has any other remedies. On this point the result of the authorities may be stated as follows : First, it appears to be well settled that if the borrowed money be applied in paying off legitimate indebtedness of the company or association (whether the indebtedness be incurred before or after the money was borrowed), the lenders are entitled to rank as creditors of the company or association to the extent to which the money has been so applied. There appears to be some doubt as to whether this result is arrived at by treating the contract of loan as validated to the extent to which the borrowed money is so applied, on the ground that to this extent there is no increase in the indebtedness of the company or association, in which case, if the contract of loan involves a security for the money borrowed, the security would be validated to a like extent ; or whether the better view is that the lenders are subrogated to the rights of the legitimate creditors who have been paid off. See the case of Blackburn and District Benefit Building Society v. Cunliffe Brooks & Co. (39), the case of Wenlock v. River Dee Co. (40), and the case of Re Wrexham, Mold and Connah's Quay Ry. Co. (41). It is still open to your Lordship's House to adopt either view, should the question actually come up for determination. Secondly, it appears to be also well settled that the lender in an ultra vires loan transaction has a right to what is known as a tracing order.

In my view, these passages make it clear, first, that LORD DUNEDIN and LORD PARKER were treating the right which they were discussing as something, which was alternative to and not part of the remedy of a tracing order, and, secondly, that they were considering this right solely in relation to a transaction of ultra vires borrowing. These passages, therefore, do not appear to me to assist the plaintiff's case. Further it is to be observed that although, as LORD PARKER points out, it is still open to the House of Lords to adopt the view that the right is based on subrogation, the weight of present authority is the other way and binds me. In addition to the cases cited by LORD PARKER reference may be made to WHITE & TUDOR'S LEADING CASES IN EQUITY, 9th ed., vol. 1, pp. 148, 149.

The second matter to which I must refer is the argument advanced by the plaintiffs that where, as happened in more than one of the cases before me, the recipient defendant institution treated in its accounts money or securities as representing the moneys received by it from the executors, that circumstance amounted to an earmarking of such moneys so as to preserve their identity and thus to allow the plaintiffs to claim the money or assets so said to be earmarked. The alleged right was and must be rested on the common law right of following assets and not on the equitable doctrine of tracing, for the alleged earmarking took place at a time when the defendant institutions concerned were not fiduciary agents. In each of the cases involved, however, the money received from the executors was first mixed in the banking account of the defendant institution before the alleged earmarking took place, and this circumstance appears to me to preclude the plaintiffs from asserting that what the defendant institution treated in its books as representing the money received from the executors was, in fact, such money or was, in fact, an asset into which that money had been converted. In fact, the money received from the executors lost its identity for ever on being mixed in the banking account with other moneys of the defendant institution. There was no duty on the defendant institution to preserve the identity ; there could be no obligation on it to revive the identity, because that would be impossible ; and, finally, no question of estoppel is involved. All that happened was that for its own internal purposes the defendant institution treated as representing the moneys received from the executors an aliquot part of its financial resources with which those moneys had already been mixed.

It may be convenient if at this point I pause to sum up the position in law as regards the claims to follow and to trace. (i) In every case where a defendant institution paid the money received by it from the executors into an account at its bankers where it was mixed with other moneys of that defendant institution, the right to follow the money at law ceased, because the means of identification failed. (ii) In no such case can the plaintiffs invoke the equitable doctrine of tracing and enter the account, because at the time of payment in there was not that fiduciary relationship in existence which would otherwise have given the plaintiffs the right, first, to maintain that the defendant institution could not claim any interest in the mixed moneys standing to the account after payment in of the moneys received from the executors until those latter moneys had been recouped to the estate of the testator, and, therefore, secondly, to claim a charge on the whole of the mixed moneys to secure such recoupment. (iii) For the same reason, namely, the absence of any fiduciary relationship prior to the receipt of the warning letters, the plaintiffs are not entitled to trace through the account, because there cannot be imputed to the defendant institution that intent by means only of which the identification of the moneys received from the executors could be artificially preserved in equity. (iv) For the same reason the plaintiffs cannot trace the moneys received from the executors out of the account with a view to showing that an asset still held by the defendant institution was acquired in whole or in part out of the moneys received from the executors. (v) Where a defendant institution paid the money into a separate account and that money was never mixed with any moneys of the defendant institution, the plaintiffs can follow into that account. Where there are still moneys standing to the credit of the account, they can claim to have such moneys paid over to them, and where assets can be shown to have been purchased wholly with moneys from that account, they can claim the transfer to them of those assets. But where identification in fact is impossible, as where, for example, the asset into which the money sought to be followed was purchased partly with the moneys in the separate account and partly with other moneys of the defendant institution, or as where, for example, the money has been expended in erecting buildings on land owned by the defendant institution or altering an existing building, the right to follow is lost. (vi) Where a defendant institution paid money into a separate account and that money was never mixed with any money of the defendant institution, then, as from the date of the warning letter in question, the defendant institution became a trustee of any money then standing to the credit of that special account, and as an alternative to the common law right of following into the account, the plaintiffs, as from the date of the warning letter, can claim to trace into and through and out of the account in accordance with the principles to which I have already referred. In such a case, therefore, they can claim a charge on any moneys still standing to the credit of the separate account and on any assets still held by the defendant institution into which moneys paid out of the separate account since the date of the warning letter can be shown to have gone in accordance with the principles to which I have already referred. On the other hand, however, where, after the date of the warning letter, moneys have been paid out of the separate account in discharging unsecured debts of the defendant institution, the trust moneys must be considered to that extent to have been dissipated, except that where a defendant institution agreed with the executors to expend money for a particular purpose—for example, for altering an existing building or erecting a new one—all moneys expended after the date of the warning letter in discharging liabilities incurred in connection with such alteration or erection, whether such liabilities were incurred before or after that date, must be considered as represented in and traceable into the building, and the plaintiffs are entitled to a charge thereon to the amount of such moneys.

A special defence to which I must refer is that which is put forward on behalf of a number of the defendant institutions, who claim that, on the particular facts of their respective cases, they are entitled to be regarded not as volunteers, but as being in the position of purchasers for value without notice. The cases concerned are those in which Leaf Homoeopathic Hospital, Queen Alexandra's Cottage Homes and Guys Hospital are involved. The defendants relied on a number of authorities to two of which I propose to refer. In Dilwyn v.

Llewelyn (42) the facts were that a father placed one of his sons in possession of land belonging to the father, and at the same time signed a memorandum that he had presented the land to the son for the purpose of furnishing him with a dwelling-house. The son, with the assent and approbation of the father, built at his own expense a house on the land and resided there. It was held that this was not a mere incomplete gift, but that the son was entitled to call for a legal conveyance, and not merely of a life-estate, but of the whole fee-

A simple. In Taylor v. Blakelock (43) the facts were that C., the trustee with the plaintiff of a will and also trustee with the defendant of a settlement, having misappropriated a portion of the settlement fund, applied an equal portion of the will fund in the purchase of stock which he transferred into the names of himself and the defendant. The plaintiff and the defendant were both innocent of C.'s fraud, and the defendant and the cestuis que trust under the settlement had no notice that the stock was purchased with part of the will fund. C. died insolvent. In an action by the plaintiff to compel the defendant to transfer the stock to him, it was held by the Court of Appeal (affirming the judgment of BACON, V.-C.) that the defendant, having, by accepting the transfer of the stock, given up his right to sue C. for his debt to the trust, was entitled to be treated as a purchaser for value without notice, and consequently to retain the stock as part of the settlement fund.

C [His Lordship referred to the judgments of COTTON, L.J. (32 Ch. D. 568) and BOWEN, L.J. (ibid., 569), in which FRY, L.J., concurred.] Those two authorities appear to me to establish that to enable a defendant to set up the plea of purchaser for value, it is unnecessary for him to assert and prove that the transaction in regard to which he desires to set up the plea was a contract of sale and purchase in the strict sense. It is, in my judgment, sufficient if he can show that the transaction consisted in the transfer or handing over to him of property by the plaintiff or some person through whom the plaintiff claims, and that there should move from the defendant (not necessarily to the plaintiff) some consideration valuable in the eye of the law, for example, the suffering by the defendant of some detriment. In neither of the cases referred to was there involved a sale and purchase within the strict meaning of the term. Further, it does not appear to me to matter, for the purposes of the plea, what is the nature of that which is transferred to the defendant.

D In Dillwyn v. Llewelyn (42) that which was transferred was land; in Taylor v. Blakelock (43), it was debenture stock. I can see no reason in principle, however, why that which is transferred to the person seeking to set up the plea should not be money, as in the present case.

The crux of the matter in each case is the question: Did valuable consideration move from the defendant institution concerned? In each of the cases with which I am concerned the executors imposed a condition as to how the money was to be applied by the defendant institution. The acceptance of this condition and the act of the defendant institution in applying the money in accordance with the condition does not of itself appear to me to result in the giving of consideration by the defendant institution. In the case of Leaf Homoeopathic Hospital, the condition was that the money should be applied in paying off a building debt and for general purposes. The money was received and applied for these two purposes. This involved no dealing by Leaf Homoeopathic Hospital with its own moneys or other property and the suffering of no detriment. The transaction appears to me to have amounted to no more than a gift of money subject to a condition as to the disposal of the money, and in that case I am of opinion that the plea of purchaser for value is not established. The other two cases stand on a different footing in one respect. In the case of Queen Alexandra Cottage Homes, it was the intention of all parties that the new homes should be erected on land already belonging to the charity and this was done. Thus, as was urged on behalf of this defendant, it was an essential part of the transaction that the defendant institution in question should use in a particular way not only the money to be received from the executors but its own property. Again, in the case of Guys Hospital, it was urged that it was an essential part of the transaction under which the money was received from the executors that Guys Hospital should devote part of its property to the accomplishment of the object, the attainment of which was made by the executors a condition of the payment of the money in question. That is true, but in each case that which was to be done to or in regard to the property of those respective defendants was to be done wholly with the money to be paid by the executors, and must result wholly to the advantage of those respective defendants. In those circumstances the acts of those defendants, in subjecting their properties, in the one case, to the erection of a building and, in the other case, to the alteration of a building, do not appear to me to involve in either case the suffering of a detriment. In my judgment, therefore, neither of those defendants is in the position of a purchaser for value. A

On this view it becomes unnecessary for me to consider the question of notice. Nevertheless, I think that I ought shortly to advert to the argument put forward on behalf of the plaintiffs on this point. It was submitted by the plaintiffs that, notwithstanding their admission that for the purposes of the application of the doctrine of tracing they could not assert that the defendant institutions became trustees or in any degree fiduciary agents prior to the receipt of the warning letters, nevertheless they were sufficiently fixed with notice to prevent them from relying on the plea of purchase for value without notice. This was said to be the case because the defendant institutions, knowing that they were dealing with executors who were proposing to make payments under a discretionary power in their testator's will, the substance and effect of which was communicated to them, were put on inquiry as to the validity of the power given to the executors by the will. I am unable to follow this reasoning. In the first place, it is necessary to remember that that which the executors handed over was money, and, as LORD HALDANE ([1914] A.C. 418) said in Sinclair v. Brougham (27): B

When sovereigns or bank notes are paid over as currency, so far as the payer is concerned, they cease ipso facto to be the subjects of specific title as chattels. If a sovereign or bank note be offered in payment it is, under ordinary circumstances, no part of the duty of the person receiving it to inquire into title. The reason of this is that chattels of such a kind form part of what the law recognizes as currency, and treats as passing from hand to hand in point, not merely of possession, but of property. D

In the second place, it must be remembered that the plea of purchase for value without notice is one which, if established, is effective to halt the operation of the equitable doctrine of tracing: see Collins v. Stimson (44). It follows that if, at the time of the transaction in regard to which the plea is raised, the defendant can show that he had not such notice as would make him a trustee or a fiduciary agent for the purpose of the doctrine of tracing in equity, it necessarily follows that he was also sufficiently without notice to allow him to rely on the plea of purchase for value without notice. Apart from this consideration, which appears to me to conclude the matter, I cannot see that anything other than confusion would result, if there were as regards notice two different tests, one which would decide whether a man was a trustee or fiduciary agent for the purposes of the equitable doctrine of tracing, and another for the purposes of the plea of purchase for value without notice. E

A further defence raised by certain of the defendant institutions, of which the case of Guys Hospital forms an example, was that where a defendant institution held the property into which it was sought to trace and on which an equitable charge was claimed on charitable trusts, there was nothing held by such defendant institution which could be the subject of such a charge. I do not accept the proposition. In so far as under this judgment the plaintiffs have a right of tracing, that right exists because the body in which the property is vested, or by whom the property is held into which it is sought to trace, is to be treated as standing in a fiduciary relationship to the plaintiffs and cannot assert any interest in the property until the burden cast on it by reason of such fiduciary relationship has been discharged. No one claiming through the body in question can be in a better position in this regard than the body itself, and, therefore, no one can assert an equity competing with the plaintiffs' equity. F

The last matter to which I must refer is the plea raised by a number of the defendants of the statutes of limitation. When this question came to be argued, it was made plain on behalf of all the defendants concerned that they only desired to rely on this plea so far as concerned the plaintiffs' claims in personam, and that, in so far as it should be held that any claim against them in rem—that is, to follow at common law or to trace in equity—succeeded, G H they did not desire to rely on any statute of limitation. I have already earlier in this judgment expressed the conclusion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to succeed on either of their claims in personam. In these circumstances it becomes unnecessary for me to express any view on the applicability of the statutes of limitation in the present proceedings, and I refrain from doing so.

WILDS v. AMALGAMATED ANTHRACITE COLLIERIES, LTD. SAME v. SAME.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Scott, Morton and Somervell, L.JJ.), February 3, 4, 27, 1947.]

C Workmen's Compensation—Industrial disease—"Notional accident"—Total incapacity—Further "notional accident" during incapacity caused by first "accident"—Partial capacity recovered—Right to compensation in respect of second "notional accident"—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (c. 84), ss. 1, 9, 43, 47—Coal Mining Industry (Pneumoconiosis) Compensation Scheme, 1943, (S.R. & O. 885 of 1943), para. 9 (3).

D On June 14, 1944, a workman, who had been working underground for the employers as a miner, was certified as suffering from miners' nystagmus, in respect of which the employers paid compensation on the basis of total incapacity at the rate of £1 10s. 0d. per week until Nov. 11, 1945, when they reduced the payment to £1 5s. 6d. per week. On Dec. 18, 1944, the workman was certified as suffering from pneumoconiosis, and in respect of this disease the employers paid no compensation. On Jan. 10, 1945, the workman was examined and it was found that he had sufficiently recovered from the nystagmus to undertake light work. The workman's average weekly earnings before the first accident were £7 10s. 0d. per week, and from Jan. 11, 1945, he was able to earn £4 3s. 0d. per week notwithstanding his partial incapacity from nystagmus and his partial incapacity from pneumoconiosis. On Apr. 30, 1946, the workman lodged two requests for arbitration, claiming in respect of the nystagmus £1 10s. 0d. per week beginning on Nov. 11, 1945, and to continue, and in respect of the pneumoconiosis £1 10s. 0d. per week from Jan. 11, 1945.

E HELD : (i) from Jan. 11, 1945, the workman was partially incapacitated by both diseases, and compensation must be calculated according to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 43 (1) (d), in respect of the nystagmus, and according to s. 47 of that Act and the Coal Mining Industry (Pneumoconiosis) Compensation Scheme, 1943, para. 9 (3), in respect of the pneumoconiosis.

F (ii) "the earnings of the workman under the employers from whom the compensation [was] recoverable" were in each case those immediately preceding the first notional accident, and the court had no alternative but to adopt that criterion for the purpose of assessing the compensation in respect of the second notional accident as well as the first, and, accordingly, both claims should be allowed.

APPEAL by the employers from an award of His Honour Judge MORRIS, K.C., Llanelly County Court, dated Sept. 4, 1946. The county court judge held that the workman was entitled to £1 10s. 0d. a week compensation from the dates named, both in respect of the miner's nystagmus and also in respect of the pneumoconiosis. The facts appear in the judgment of SCOTT, L.J. and are summarised in the headnote. D

Cur. adv. vult.

SCOTT, L.J.: Each of these appeals raises the same type of problem depending for its elucidation on the right interpretation of the statutory provisions about industrial diseases contained in the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 43, or the schemes made under s. 47 by the Secretary of State. The workman suffered from and claimed in respect of two such diseases. He suffered from no injury by physical accident. In the first arbitration the workman, a coal miner, claims from Nov. 11, 1945, 30s. a week compensation plus supplementary allowances, which I shall for brevity call "30s. plus," in respect of partial incapacity resulting from miners' nystagmus. In his other arbitration, the same workman claims from Jan. 11, 1945, the same amount but in respect of partial incapacity by pneumoconiosis. Both claims were made on Apr. 30, 1946, on the usual form of request for arbitration. In neither request does the applicant make any reference to his other request or to the other disease. F

The relevant facts can be stated shortly. On June 14, 1944, the workman was duly certified as suffering from miners' nystagmus and disabled thereby from earning full wages at his old work as from the previous day. He was paid compensation up to the maximum limit of 30s. plus on the basis of total incapacity till Nov. 10, 1945. In the meantime, on Jan. 10, 1945, he had been examined by his own doctor and found partially recovered and fit for light work on the surface as from Jan. 11, 1945. On Nov. 11, 1945, his compensation was reduced from 30s. plus to 25s. 6d. plus, presumably because of increased earning power. It may have been by agreement. The gaps in this rather incomplete story are to some extent filled by the events relating to his other disease, pneumoconiosis. On Dec. 18, 1944, the Pneumoconiosis Medical Board, acting pursuant to the provisions of the Pneumoconiosis Scheme, made by the Secretary of State under s. 47 of the Act (see WILLIS, 37th edn., pp. 1064, G et. seq.) had suspended him from his work as a miner as from Dec. 8, while certifying him as fit for light work, but he made no claim for payment of compensation in respect of pneumoconiosis until Apr. 30, 1946, when he launched both his claims for arbitration. His average weekly earnings in the "process" of employment, in which he had contracted both diseases, namely, mining underground, were agreed at £7 10s. 0d. At the time of the arbitrations he was earning nothing, but it was argued that his miners'

A nystagmus left him capable by light work on the surface of earning £4 3s. 0d. and (whether agreed or not) the judge held that, taking into account the disablement due to both diseases, he was still capable of earning £4 3s. 0d. by such work. If the measure of s. 9 (3) of the Act is applicable to those figures, half of the difference—£3 7s. 0d.—would exceed the 30s. limit imposed by the section, so that that figure would correctly represent the workman's claim for partial incapacity in either arbitration.

B The judge held that the workman was entitled to 30s. plus in each arbitration from the dates claimed, namely, from Nov. 11, 1945, for miners' nystagmus, but from Jan. 11 of that year for pneumoconiosis. The possible questions for us would seem to be :—(1) Whether the workman is entitled to an award for each disease ? (2) If for only one, for which ? (3) Whether in one award or both should there be any and what alteration in respect of

C (a) the starting date, (b) the money figure of 30s. plus ? (4) Can this court dispose of question 3 or must we (in default of agreement between counsel) send those issues back for re-hearing ? It was suggested in argument that there is or may be a fundamental difference in the rights conferred on the workman by the legislation between the case of injury by accident resulting in disablement and incapacity and similar disablement and incapacity resulting from disease, or, shortly, "between physical and notional accidents." The

D answer to that enquiry depends on a close consideration of the language of the Act, but the shorter form of the question diverts attention from the true character of the problem which is solely one of interpretation.

Before considering the numerous decisions cited to us in argument I think it will be useful to make some preliminary analysis of the legislative structure. If we can see clearly what its fundamental basis was for accidents in 1897 and for industrial diseases in 1906, a basis which thereafter remained until

E the legislation was replaced for the future by the new Act of 1946, the problems of these appeals will, I believe, almost solve themselves. At any rate, we shall see more clearly to what extent they are governed by authority, When Parliament passed the Act of 1897, the scope of the new system of compensation for the loss by a workman of his earning power was limited to incapacity resulting from injury by accident. By s. 8 of the Act of 1906 that

F scope was extended to include the results of certain industrial diseases, and that extension necessarily involved the creation of a second new "right of action." But, although it was a new right, Parliament was moved by the same economic motive as for the 1897 right of action, namely, loss of earning power, now resulting from disease as previously from accident, and, in order the more conveniently to assimilate the administration of the new right to that of the old, and to graft it on to the existing system of procedure,

G Parliament treated the event of disablement by or suspension because of the disease notionally as the happening of an "accident in the course and out of the employment." It being impossible also to predicate in the case of disease the particular moment of time when the loss of earning-power happens, that difficulty also had to be dealt with. Parliament did so by instituting two practical tests for the new cause of action : (1) prior medical certification as conclusive proof of the disease and its effect on earning power ; and (2) the

H date of the disablement or suspension, so certified, as the happening of the incapacity resulting from the disease. Broadly speaking, subject to the above differences, the fundamental nature of the cause of action for disease—i.e., of the legal right of the workman to recover compensation from the employer—was the same for disease as for accident.

The very kernel of the legislation is that the evil for the suffering of which the workman was given his "compensation" (whether it resulted from accident or from disease) was loss of earning power caused by disablement or incapacity for work. It is in that kernel that we shall find the key to these appeals. It is not without interest to note that those terms "disablement" and "incapacity" were used—it would seem unconsciously—by Parliament as interchangeable synonyms. "Disability" appears (in the form of the verb "disable") in proviso (a) to s. 1 (2) of the Act of 1897, from which, in an identical sentence, it was repeated by Parliament in 1906 and 1925; and in sched. I to the Act of 1897, dealing with the "amount and conditions of compensation," para. 1 (b) begins: "Where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury" as if that very phraseology had already appeared in s. 1 of the Act. In 1906 the allocation to s. 1 and schedule of their subject-matters was identical with 1897. In 1925 there was a distinction without a difference. The "amount of compensation for total or partial incapacity" was promoted from the schedule into s. 9 of the Act itself, but the relevant point of the present appeals is that loss of earning power through disability or incapacity, whichever one calls it, is the basis on which, and on which alone, rests the right to compensation, and, as the presence of that factor gives rise to the right, so also its cessation brings the right to an end. The incapacity is necessarily a condition of its continuance. Cessante ratione cessat et ipsa lex. The inescapable corollary is that without incapacity the right to compensation is non-existent, and it is worth noting that that fundamental condition of the right found in the Act of 1897 its natural recognition in the schedule which was appropriately entitled "Scale and conditions of compensation." "A weekly payment during the incapacity" is the language used in 1906.

From the start of the legislation, provisions for the measurement and conditions of compensation were, and still are, kept separate from those which create the right. In the 1897 and 1906 Acts the former were relegated to a schedule. In Lysons v. Knowles (1), the House of Lords drew attention to the contrast. As LORD HALSBURY said in effect, ([1901] A.C. 85) and LORD DAVEY (at pp. 94-96), you must not resort to the schedule that is the measurement of the compensation for the purpose of cutting down the right to compensation. The Act of 1925 put the measurement and conditions of compensation into the body of the Act (s. 9), but that change did not alter the character of the contents. McCann v. Scottish Co-operative Laundry Association, Ltd. (2) in the House of Lords, was a case in which a workman had suffered injury to a hand, and received compensation for total incapacity for a time. Then she recovered sufficiently to do light work and did it for her old employers who paid her for it at her full pre-accident rate of earning. Then she again became incapacitated, but by illness which had nothing to do with her injury. The light work at the same pay remained open to her throughout her illness, but the employers paid her no compensation. The arbitrator awarded it. The Court of Session set the award aside and gave her nothing. The House of Lords restored the award. The essence of that case was that the right of compensation had already vested in the workman, and, as nothing had happened to divest it, the award was right. LORD THANKERTON said ([1936] 1 All E.R. 478):

My Lords, it seems to me that the learned judges who formed the majority in the Court of Session have fallen into an error similar to that of the Court of Appeal in the well-known case of Ball v. William Hunt & Sons (3), and I may be pardoned in recalling the observations of LORD MACNAGHTEN in that case (p. 500) where he said: "Now 'incapacity for work' as the phrase is used in the schedule seems to me to be a compendious expression meaning inability to earn wages or full wages as the case may be at the work in which the injured workman was employed at the time of the accident. But whether that be so or not, it is laid down most distinctly in this House (Lysons v. Andrew Knowles & Sons, Ltd. (1)), that you must not resort to the schedule for the purpose of cutting down the right to compensation. The right to compensation is given by the Act. The Act is the workman's charter. The schedule prescribes the scale of compensation and the mode and conditions of its enjoyment. That is the office of the schedule. The key to the meaning of the legislature is not to be looked for there." The transference of the provisions of the first schedule of the Act of 1906, to which LORD MACNAGHTEN referred, into the body of the Act of 1923, and of the Act of 1925, where they are found in ss. 8 and 9, does not alter the validity of these observations.

But, just as s. 9 of the Act of 1925, cannot, any more than the schedule to the Acts of 1897 and 1906, be construed as cutting down the right conferred by s. 1, so also it must not be construed as enlarging that right or creating

- a new right outside the limits of s. 1. If, for instance, s. 1 imposes a limit on the right or a condition of its exercise, s. 9 should not be construed as intended to remove that limit or modify that condition, unless the language is unequivocally clear to that effect, which no one can contend. I concede that the general words of s. 1 (1) "subject as hereinafter mentioned" potentially extend to all and any of the provisions which follow, including both the group of sections entitled "Amount of Compensation," and that entitled
- A "Conditions of Compensation," as well as the remaining groups—"Procedure for determining Compensation and settling Questions," "Alternative Remedies," and so on. If the wording of s. 1 (1) were ambiguous, reference to the other groups would be theoretically legitimate for the purpose of resolving the ambiguity, but not either to cut down or to extend the basic right already created by s. 1. Anyhow, that reflection is, in my view, academic as I see nothing in the other groups germane to the question of fundamental right.
- B My interpretation of the Act, so far as relevant to these appeals may be put into nine propositions. (1) It creates a right of action for compensation at the instance and for the benefit of the workman. That right vests in him automatically on the happening of the events which give rise to it. (2) The Act contemplates agreement between workman and employer as the primary method for compliance with the law imposed by the Act (s. 31 (1), and
- C cf. s. 12). (3) The procedural rights conferred on both parties are (a) to register in the county court a memorandum of their agreement with a view to its judicial enforcement, if necessary, and (b) in default of agreement, arbitration and award, which in practice has always meant decision by the county court. (4) That the right of action for compensation, once vested in the workman, cannot, without his consent, be divested, follows by necessary implication from s. 1, but that inherent right of property is also expressly recognised by
- D the Act itself: see s. 40 (veto on alienation), s. 11 (review of weekly payments when pursuant to an award or a registered recorded agreement), s. 12 (weekly payments unprotected by an award or registered agreement), and ss. 13, 24 and 25 which require the approval of the court to validate lump sum settlements and protect the workman's vested right to a weekly payment. (5) The nature of the right vested in the workman is by legal process to compel weekly payments by the employer of money to the statutory amount
- E in order to that extent to compensate the workman for the loss of earning power during his incapacity, but only in proportion to the continuing degree of that incapacity and no longer and no further. (6) The Act keeps in existence the vested right for the protection of the workman, unless and until the workman agrees to reduce or end it, or the employer takes procedural action in the county court under ss. 11, 12, or 13 to obtain legal sanction, which to the extent granted will divest the right of compensation. By the
- F words "during the incapacity" in sched. I to the Acts of 1897 and 1906 and s. 9 of the 1925 Act, the continuance of the vested right is recognised, and all questions of "duration" were expressly left to the arbitrator: s. 1 (3) of 1897 and 1906 and s. 21 of 1925. (7) As loss by the workman of his earning power is both the cause of his right to compensation and the condition of its "continuance," so if at any time the workman has no earning power, that is,
- G is in a state of total incapacity, no new accident or disease then affecting him physically can give rise to any right of compensation, for neither accident nor disease occurring to him can take away an earning capacity which is not there. (8) On the other hand, if the workman at that moment still possesses partial capacity for work, whatever be the cause which reduced him from full to partial capacity, and whether it be a cause within the Act or wholly independent of it, it follows inevitably that (to use a phrase of LORD GREENE's)
- H "there is some capacity upon which the Act can 'operate'": Allen v. Tinsley Park Collieries Ltd. (4). (9) It is at this point in the analysis of the legislative system, (including the delegated legislation made pursuant to powers conferred on the Secretary of State by the Act of 1925), that there may be a material difference between its operation on "partial incapacity" in a case of accident under s. 9 (3) of the Act, on the one hand, and its operation on "partial disability" in a case of disease, whether under s. 43 "modification" (d), or under s. 47 (2) ("any other case" than death or total disablement) and the Coal Mining Industry (Pneumoconiosis) Compensation Scheme, 1943, para. 9 (3). My proposition (9), in effect, poses the only question of law which, I think, we have to determine in these appeals, although in regard to the problems of interpretation thus raised there are some decisions which we must consider, and, so far as these judgments are based on particular solutions of those problems, they may be binding on us.

The Act and its predecessors have not in express terms dealt with the problem of partial disability or incapacity from any other angle than the quantitative assessment of the weekly compensation, although the main purpose of the legislation has always been to make the right to compensation roughly equivalent to half the loss of normal earning power whether the incapacity results from accident or disease. The difference in result between the method of measuring that power for accidents and for disease is obviously caused by the contrast between the suddenness of the former and the gradualness of the latter in its effect on the workman. I can see no provision in the legislation to make this difference in measuring the quantum of compensation affect the workman's right to receive compensation when a disease supervenes and destroys or reduces such capacity as he still has, any more than, in the case of his having no earning capacity, the court can create it in order to give him compensation.

For disability by accident the starting point for ascertaining the pre-accident earnings was, in 1897 and always has been since, the date of the accident. Consequently, the problem we have to face in these appeals did not, and could not, arise so long as the legislation was limited to accidents. The theory was simple. Whatever capacity the workman had at the moment of the accident, that was the arithmetical starting point. If before the accident he had full capacity for his work, he was obviously entitled to the benefit of that fact in calculating compensation for total incapacity. That was equally the first line of the subtraction sum for partial incapacity. If, on the other hand, the workman was already from any cause whatsoever partially disabled or "incapacitated" (the two words in the legislation are, at least in this context, absolutely synonymous), the top line of the sum would obviously show a lower earnings figure and the half-difference predicated by s. 9 (3) would ipso facto be proportionately lower. Thus, no unfair or disproportionate burden would be thrown on the employer. But when disablement by industrial disease was introduced by s. 8 of the Act of 1906 and continued by s. 43 of the Act of 1925, Parliament, perhaps, did not realise, (and I am not sure that the courts have fully realised) that, by adopting in s. 8 (1) (d) of 1906 and s. 43 (1) (d) of 1925 as the criterion for "pre-accident" earnings the workman's period of employment with the last employer for whom he was working in the disease-causing industry, they were interposing what would sometimes be a substantial lapse of time, and often quite a long one, between the date when the workman left that employment and the date of his disablement or suspension pursuant to medical certificate. For the mere purpose of assessing the quantum of weekly compensation for that incapacity the lapse of time would make little difficulty. The compensation would for total incapacity be half the average weekly earnings of the earlier period, and half the difference between the average weekly earnings in the same period and the workman's actual or potential average weekly earnings after the disablement for partial incapacity. If, however, the workman, while only partially incapacitated by the disease, was earning money in work of a kind not prevented by his disease, and when doing that new work was (a) disabled by a statutory accident, or (b) certified for disablement or suspension by another statutory disease causing some further incapacity short of total, the difference in the measure of resultant compensation between the two new causes (a) and (b) at once becomes apparent, and is startling. Under (a) (accident) the upper line of the subtraction sum is the average weekly earnings of the partially incapacitated man at the time of the accident—say 40s. a week. If total incapacity has resulted from the new accident he gets 20s. weekly compensation under s. 9 (2). If only aggravated partial incapacity has resulted he gets half of 40s. minus 20s., that is 10s. On the other hand, under (b) (disease) the upper line of the subtraction sum may be a very much higher figure, say £7, because that is what he had been earning from his last employer in the industry which gave rise to the disease. The effect of the legislation is, then, that for total incapacity the measure is half of £7 = £3 10s. 0d., limited to 30s. under s. 9 (1) (c), while for partial incapacity the lower line remains the same as under (a) namely, 20s., difference £6, half of that is £3, or 30s. permitted maximum as against 10s.

Exactly the same reasoning applies to s. 47 of the Act of 1925 which was first introduced in July, 1918, by the Workmen's Compensation (Silicosis) Act, 1918, s. 1. An exactly similar position to the above was at once created by the schemes then introduced, with which the schemes under the Act of 1925 are for present purposes identical. Under both Acts these schemes have full statutory force. The practical result under ss. 43 and 47 is, of course, in many cases that the test for the top line of the subtraction sum is an earning period when the workman was still getting his full scale wages for full time work. The corollary is likely in some cases, at least, to be that, some time having elapsed since the workman ceased work for that employer, he may, in fact, have become partially or even almost totally disabled by the disease, and if at that moment he suffers an accident within the Act or is certified for another disease within the Act he still has "some capacity upon which the Act can operate," and, however small his earning power then is, no regard can be paid to it for "top-line" purposes in assessing his compensation for his new disability, and he gets a large award out of all proportion to his earning power at the time of certification or award. That is what the Act says, and there is nothing in the Act to allow us to take any other view of it. It follows that, as the workman had some capacity when he got his second disease, we cannot interfere with either award, unless there is authority binding us to decide otherwise.

It has been unequivocally decided that the existence of partial incapacity at the time of an accident is no reason for refusing an award for total incapacity induced by that accident. If the workman had any capacity left which could be taken away or reduced by the accident, it is irrelevant to enquire how he lost what capacity he had lost: Doubie v. Kinneil (5) and McCann v. Scottish Co-operative Laundry Association, Ltd. (2), both in the House of Lords. That the workman had ceased to work in the industry that caused the disease long before he was certified and still longer before he asked for arbitration was held irrelevant by this court in Bacon v. Wills (A. W.) & Sons, Ltd. (6) and Cole v. Amalgamated Anthracite Collieries (7), and in the latter case it was held that earnings subsequent to the workman's leaving the disease-causing employment must also be disregarded as a criterion of his pre-accident earnings. In Thompson v. London and North Eastern Railway (8), it was held by this court that an award for total incapacity did not divest or reduce the workman's already vested right to compensation for an earlier injury by accident causing partial incapacity for work. Similarly, in Evans v. Oakdale (No. 1) (9), it was held that a workman did not lose his right under an award for partial incapacity by an accident to continue in receipt of that compensation by reason of the fact that total incapacity supervened as a result of silicosis for which the workman was in receipt of the maximum compensation of 30s. plus. In Evans v. Oakdale (No. 2) (10), the same workman, while in receipt of compensation for his partial incapacity caused by the accident and in consequence of that accident having a reduced earning capacity, was none the less entitled to the maximum compensation of 30s. plus for a new partial incapacity caused by a supervening disease, because in the relevant period when he was still working in the disease-causing industry his average weekly earnings had been high enough to make the half difference exceed the maximum of s. 9 (1) (c).

I can see nothing in the above cases inconsistent with the conclusion to which my analysis of the legislation has led me, and the last case seems to me to be direct authority, binding this court, for that conclusion. The two appeals should, in my opinion, be dismissed with costs.

MORTON, L.J.: These appeals were heard together and raise the same important question of principle. It will be convenient if I refer to an accident which comes within the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 1, as "a physical accident" and to a disease which comes within sched. III to the same Act, or is the subject of a scheme under s. 47 of the Act, as "a notional accident.” [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts leading up to the arbitrations, and continued]: These two arbitrations were taken together by consent, and the arbitrator records an agreement between the parties as follows: “Agreed pre-accident earnings £7 10s. 0d. as regards each notional accident. Agreed light work figure £4 3s. 0d. as regards each notional accident.”

There is no dispute before us that the position is as follows. The workman's average weekly earnings before the first of the two notional accidents must be taken as being £7 10s. 0d. From June 14, 1944, to Jan. 10, 1945, the workman was totally incapacitated. From Jan. 11, 1945, onwards the average weekly amount which the workman was able to earn was £4 3s. 0d. notwithstanding that he was partially incapacitated by nystagmus and also partially incapacitated by pneumoconiosis. By his award in the arbitration relating to partial incapacity from nystagmus the arbitrator awarded £1 10s. 0d. per week (plus supplementary allowances) as from Nov. 11, 1945. In the arbitration relating to partial incapacity from pneumoconiosis he awarded the weekly sum of £1 10s. 0d. (plus supplementary allowances) as from Jan. 11, 1945. Each of these figures represents half the difference between £7 10s. 0d. and £4 3s. 0d.: (see the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 9 (3)), reduced to 30s. by reason of the limit imposed by s. 9 (1) (c) of the same Act. Both awards would have begun from Jan. 11, 1945, but for the fact that the employers had already paid compensation at the full rate in respect of the nystagmus up to Nov. 10, 1945. It is obvious that these awards have a curious result. From Dec. 8, 1944, to Jan. 10, 1945, the workman was totally incapacitated by reason of nystagmus and was also suffering from pneumoconiosis. During that period he was clearly only entitled to one weekly payment of £1 10s. 0d. (plus supplementary allowances). The development of pneumoconiosis did not entitle him to any further compensation. This notional accident did not and could not result in any loss of earning capacity since earning capacity was nil when it occurred. It was common ground that this is the effect of the decision in Wheatley v. Lambton, Hetton & Joicey Collieries, Ltd. (11). From Jan. 11, 1945, onwards he was only partially incapacitated by the nystagmus and he still continued to be partially incapacitated by pneumoconiosis, but he was able to earn £4 3s. 0d. per week in suitable light employment. Yet, as a result of the two awards, he was entitled, as from Jan. 11, 1945, to two separate sums of £1 10s. 0d. (plus supplementary allowances). Although this result seems surprising, it may be the effect of the language used in the relevant statutory enactments. It is convenient now to refer to the relevant portions of the 1925 Act, which are ss. 9 (1) (c), (2) (i) and (3) (i); s. 43 (1) (i) (a) (c) (omitting the provisos) and (d); ss. 47 (1), (2) and (3) (f); also the scheme, set out on p. 1,065 of WILLIS, paras. 4 (omitting the provisos), 6 and 9, sub-cl. (2) (a) and 9, sub-cl. (3). The employers admit that as from Jan. 11, 1945, the workman was entitled to one sum of £1 10s. 0d. per week (plus supplementary allowances), but they say that he was entitled to no more. They point out that on Jan. 10, 1945, when the total incapacity from nystagmus ceased, the workman was still suffering from a partial incapacity from nystagmus which reduced the amount which he was able to earn from £7 10s. 0d. to £4 3s. 0d. There was no further reduction of earning capacity by reason of the pneumoconiosis, and, therefore, they say that no additional compensation was payable in respect of the pneumoconiosis.

The following proposition seems to be well settled by authority. Where a physical accident causing partial incapacity is followed by another physical accident causing either partial incapacity which further reduces the workman's earning capacity or total incapacity, then (a) two sums are payable by way of compensation even though the limit of 30s. laid down by s. (9) (1) (c) is exceeded; (b) the compensation payable in respect of the second physical accident is to be based on the difference between the reduced weekly sum which the workman was earning after the first accident and the weekly sum which he is earning or is able to earn after the second accident: see Thompson v. London & North Eastern Railway (8), approved by the House of Lords in Doudie v. Kinneil Cannell & Coking Coal Co., Ltd. (5). There are four cases in which the problems dealt with in Thompson's case (8) may arise: Case “A”: where a physical accident is followed by another physical accident;

Case "B": where a physical accident is followed by a notional accident;
 Case "C": where a notional accident is followed by another notional accident;
 Case "D": where a notional accident is followed by a physical accident.
 Case "A" is Thompson's case (8). The present case is Case "C." I can see no logical reason why the principles applied by this court in Thompson's case (8) and approved by the House of Lords in Doudie's case (5) should not also apply to Cases "B," "C" and "D." It is clear that in each of the four cases

- A the compensation payable in respect of the first accident, be that accident physical or notional, must be based on the difference between the pre-accident earnings and the post-accident earnings. It would seem equally clear, logically, that in each of the four cases the compensation payable in respect of the second accident, be that accident physical or notional, should be based on the difference between the post-first-accident earnings and the post-second-accident earnings. The intention of the Acts is to compensate a workman in
- B respect of loss of earning capacity, and, if the first accident has already reduced the workman's earning capacity, the relevant question is surely: "How much further has his earning capacity been reduced by the second accident?" That is the measure of the earning capacity lost as a result of the second accident. To take an example, assume pre-first-accident earnings of £10 a week. After the first accident (physical or notional) the earnings are £8 a week. Compensation is £1 a week, being half the difference, under the Act of 1925, s. 9 (3).
- C A second accident (physical or notional) occurs. After it the earnings are £6 a week. Compensation for the second accident should logically again be £1 a week. Thus, the workman gets a total of £2 a week compensation, in accordance with the principles laid down in Thompson's case (8). Assume, however, that he is still earning, or able to earn, £8 a week after the second accident. In that event he has suffered no loss of earning capacity as the result of the second accident. Why, then, should he have any further compensation?
- D The same principle could be applied in the case of a third and fourth accident. In each case the compensation should logically be based on the difference between the sum which the workman was earning, or was able to earn, before that particular accident and the sum which he is earning, or is able to earn, after it. The principle set out above seems to me to be in accordance not only with Thompson's case (8), but with Wheatley's case (11) already cited, and with the observations of LORD THANKERTON in Jones v. Amalgamated Anthracite Collieries, Ltd. (12), where he says ([1944] A.C. 23):
- E

I am unable to distinguish this case from, for instance, the case of the workman sustaining injury from two successive accidents, the first of which leaves him subject to partial incapacity for work, and the second of which increases the partial incapacity. The wage which he may be, in fact, earning after the second accident would be accepted as the amount of his earnings, but there would necessarily remain an inquiry with a view to allocating the parts of the total reduction which resulted respectively from the injury caused in each accident, so as to ascertain the compensation due by the particular employer against whom the claim was made.

- F
- G It is only fair to add, however, that I doubt if LORD THANKERTON had "notional" accidents in his mind when he made these observations. I have not overlooked the fact that, when the accident is a notional one, "the amount of the compensation shall be calculated with reference to the earnings of the workman under the employer from whom the compensation is recoverable": see, as to miners' nystagmus, s. 43 (1) (d) of the Act of 1925, and as to pneumoconiosis, s. 47 of the same Act, and para. 9 (3) of the Pneumoconiosis Compensation Scheme, 1943. Apart from authority, however, I should not have thought that the words "with reference to," etc., prevented the employers from succeeding on the present appeal. Bearing in mind the
- H fact that the Acts are intended to compensate the workman for loss of earning capacity, I should not have thought that those words prohibited the arbitrator from taking into account the facts (a) that by his first award compensation was payable in respect of a drop in earning capacity from £7 10s. 0d. to £4 3s. 0d., and (b) that the workman was unable to show any further drop in his earning capacity. Applying the principle already stated to the present case, and disregarding, for brevity, the supplementary allowances, I get the following result: Earnings before June 14, 1944, £7 10s. 0d. On June 14, 1944, the first notional accident (nystagmus) happens. Earnings are reduced to nil, owing to total incapacity. Compensation is £1 10s. 0d., that being the maximum sum. On Dec. 8, 1944, the second notional accident (pneumoconiosis) happens. No additional compensation is payable at that time, because no earning capacity existed at the time of the second accident, and, therefore, no capacity has been taken away by the second accident. On Jan. 11, 1945, the workman partially recovers from nystagmus, and, so far as that disease is concerned, he is able to earn £4 3s. 0d. a week. Compensation is still £1 10s. 0d. by reason of s. 9 (3) and the limiting proviso (c) to s. 9 (1) of the 1925 Act. If the effect of the pneumoconiosis had been that he was only able to earn, say, £3 a week, he would have been entitled to further compensation at the rate of 11s. 6d. (half the difference between £4 3s. 0d. and £3) as from Jan. 11, 1945, but as he was still able to earn £4 3s. 0d. a week, in spite of the pneumoconiosis, he is entitled to no further compensation. But for Evans' case (No. 2) (10), already mentioned, I should have dismissed the employers' appeal which relates to the award of £1 10s. 0d. in respect of nystagmus, and should have allowed the appeal which relates to the award of £1 10s. 0d. in respect of pneumoconiosis for the reasons stated. It is necessary, however, to consider Evans' case (9) and (10) with some care. The first decision given in that case is reported in 32 B.W.C.C., p. 51, and I take the facts from that report. The workman, Evans, was a collier earning an average weekly wage of £3 11s. 0d. On Aug. 12, 1935, he sustained an accident and several ribs were fractured. The employers admitted liability and paid compensation at the rate of £1 10s. 0d. a week. He was examined by the employers' doctor on Dec. 7, 1936. On Dec. 19, 1936, the compensation was reduced to 16s. 9d. a week after service of a notice under s. 12. The employers assessed his earning capacity at £1 17s. 6d. a week. On Feb. 22, 1937, Evans was given a certificate by the Silicosis Medical Board that he was totally disabled by silicosis, the date of disablement being certified as Nov. 18, 1936. On receipt of this certificate the employers restored the compensation to £1 10s. 0d. a week, but attributed 16s. 9d. of that sum to the injury and 13s. 3d. to the silicosis. The workman did not protest against the allocation and in fact signed two receipts each week. On July 15, 1937, the employers served a notice under s. 12 of their intention to terminate the weekly payment of 16s. 9d. No counter-notice was served and the workman still continued to receive £1 10s. 0d. a week thereafter, only signing one receipt each week. On Aug. 22, 1938, the workman filed an application for arbitration, claiming the restoration of the payment of 16s. 9d. and ignoring the £1 10s. 0d. paid for silicosis. In their answer the employers pleaded that they were already paying £1 10s. 0d. a week and submitted to a declaration of liability in respect of the rib injury. The county court judge, as arbitrator, found that the workman was still partially incapacitated by the rib injury and awarded 16s. 9d. a week to the workman, to date from July 15, 1937, ignoring the payment of £1 10s. 0d. made by the employers since that date in respect of the silicosis. The employers appealed to the Court of Appeal. This court held that there was evidence to support the arbitrator's finding of fact and no misdirection. The fact that the employers had for a time been paying compensation at the full rate for the supervening total disablement by silicosis was irrelevant and could not affect the workman's right to compensation at the appropriate rate in respect of his partial incapacity from the rib injury. It is clear from the judgment of SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., that he thought the employers might be found to have been overpaying the workman in respect of the silicosis, but he naturally refused to express an opinion on the point, saying (32 B.W.C.C. 57):

The only question before us is: What is the workman's right in view of the finding of fact of the learned county court judge in respect of the man's compensation for the first accident, as from the time in July, 1937, when the employers ceased to pay him compensation for that accident? To that question it seems to me that there is one answer and one answer only—to pay compensation for that accident on the basis of the partial incapacity existing during that period. The actual figure of 16s. 9d. a week is not contested.

This decision gives rise to no difficulty in the present case, but in July, 1939, the workman instituted arbitration proceedings, claiming compensation for his total incapacity from silicosis at the rate of £1 10s. 0d. a week from Dec., 1936. He based that claim on the contention that his compensation should be based on his average weekly earnings of £3 10s. 0d. when he was employed in the process of working underground in the coal mine and had not yet sustained the accident to his rib on Aug. 12, 1935. The county court judge upheld the workman's claim and the employers appealed. The appeal came before a Court of Appeal which did not include any member of the court which decided Evans' case (No. 1) (9). This court upheld the decision of the county court judge, distinguishing Thompson's case (8) and relying on Cole v. Amalgamated Anthracite Collieries, Ltd. (7) and Bacon v. Wills & Sons, Ltd. (6). In the course of his judgment in Evans' case (No. 2) (10), SLESSER, L.J., said ([1940] 1 K.B. 709):

Thus the workman in the present case notionally met with his silicosis accident on Nov. 18, 1936, and during the year of his notional injury preceding the accident—the disease—he is to be deemed to be physically capable of earning £3 11s. 0d., his full wage. The case is taken out of the category of a second physical accident acting on an already limited capacity, as in Harwood's case (13) and Thompson's case (8), and must be deemed to be one where, notwithstanding the actual partial incapacity due to the rib accident, the Silicosis Scheme requires the workman in the circumstances to be assumed to be of full capacity and capable of earning £3 11s. 0d. a week at the date when he was certified in Nov., 1936, to be totally incapacitated by silicosis.

LUXMOORE, L.J., said (713-714):

... there is a material difference between the case where a workman is, in the first instance, partially incapacitated by an injury by accident as distinct from a notional accident by disease and is then rendered totally incapable by reason of a second accident which is also not a notional one, and the case where the original partial incapacity is followed by total incapacity arising from a notional accident caused by industrial disease. In the former case the compensation in respect of the second accident, which resulted in the partial incapacity from the first accident becoming total incapacity, must on the true construction of the Act, be calculated with reference to the average weekly earnings immediately preceding the second accident.

He then cited Harwood v. Wyken Colliery Co., Ltd. (13), and Thompson's case (8). The case of Evans (No. 2) (10) was Case "B," mentioned above, while the present case is Case "C," but I can see no good ground for distinguishing that case from the present case. It is, I think, a decision that whenever the second accident is a notional accident the compensation must be calculated with reference to the average weekly earnings immediately preceding the first accident, and not with reference to the reduced earnings immediately preceding the second accident. There are the following possible grounds of distinction between the present case and Evans' case (No. 2) (10): (1): In the present case both accidents are notional, while in Evans' case a physical accident was followed by a notional accident. In my view, this is a distinction without a difference. No difficulty arises in regard to the first accident and Evans' case decides the point which arises in the present case in regard to the second accident. (2): In the present case the workman was totally incapacitated by nystagmus at the date—Dec. 8, 1944—when the suspension from silicosis began. In my view, this, again, is a distinction without a difference, as there was a subsequent period, from Jan. 11, 1945, onwards, when the workman was partially incapacitated as a result of the first accident and was also partially incapacitated as a result of the second accident. I do not think he could be permanently excluded from all compensation in respect of the second accident because he happened to be totally incapacitated by the first accident for a few weeks from Dec. 8, 1944. (3): In the present case the second (notional) accident only partially incapacitated the workman, while in Evans' case (No. 2), the second (notional) accident totally incapacitated the workman. The result is that in the one case the weekly payment is to be calculated having regard to the provisions of s. 9 (3) of the Act of 1925, while in the other case it is to be calculated having regard to s. 9 (2) of that Act. It was not, however, contended before us that this fact constituted a material distinction between Evans' case (No. 2) and the present case.

I think, therefore, that Evans' case (No. 2) concludes the present appeal against the employers. It is worthy of note that in that case counsel for the employers put forward the same argument, in substance, as that put forward now on behalf of the employers, which I have already stated, and it was rejected by the court. I ought, however, to mention another argument which was put forward by counsel for the employers. He relied on the passage which I have already quoted from the judgment of SLESSER, L.J., and, in particular, on the observations :

... the Silicosis Scheme requires the workman in the circumstances to be assumed to be of full capacity and capable of earning £3 11s. 0d. a week at the date when he was certified, in Nov., 1936, to be totally incapacitated by silicosis.

Relying on these observations, counsel for the employers suggests that the earning capacity of the workman in the present case must be regarded as notionally unimpaired by reason of the nystagmus and that he is entitled to no compensation in respect of the nystagmus. With all respect, I have difficulty in following the reasoning of SLESSER, L.J. on this point, but, whether that reasoning can be wholly supported or not, I think that counsel's contention is contrary to the actual decision in Evans' case (No. 1) (9), and cannot succeed.

For the reasons already stated I think that both awards must stand. I am conscious that these reasons differ somewhat from the reasons just given by SCOTT, L.J., although we arrive at the same conclusion. I have arrived at this conclusion with some misgiving, because, as I have already pointed out, it leads to a curious result in the present case. Counsel for the employers submitted formally that Cole v. Amalgamated Anthracite Collieries, Ltd. (7), Bacon v. Wills & Sons, Ltd. (6), and Evans' case (No. 2) (10), were all wrongly decided, in order to keep this point open in the House of Lords, but that argument is not, of course, open to him in this court. The result is that, in my opinion, the appeals should be dismissed, with costs.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree that these appeals should be dismissed. I agree with MORTON, L.J. that Evans v. Oakdale (No. 2) (10), which is binding on us, covers this case. I am not satisfied that, apart from that decision, I should have come to the same conclusion on the construction of the relevant words of the statute and Scheme, which have already been cited, for reasons which I can state shortly. Neither the Act nor the Scheme deal expressly with successive accidents. In principle, it is clear that where a workman has two successive accidents each causing partial incapacity there ought, as LORD THANKERTON said in Jones v. Amalgamated Anthracite Collieries, Ltd. (12), to be ([1944] A.C. 23) :

... an inquiry with a view to allocating the parts of the total reduction [in earning capacity] which resulted respectively from the injury caused in each accident, so as to ascertain the compensation due by the particular employer against whom the claim was made.

Where the claims are against the same employer it seems to me to follow in principle that in assessing compensation for the second accident compensation should be based on the further loss of earning capacity caused by that accident. There is no dispute that that is the result under the Act in cases where the two accidents are actual accidents. It is also clear that it would, at any rate ordinarily, be attained if the first accident is a notional accident and the second an actual accident. In that case the partial incapacity caused by the notional accident will be reflected in the pre-actual accident earnings. It is when the second accident is notional that the difficulty arises, though in this case the result may be attained. If, for example, a miner has an actual accident, but, being partially incapacitated, is able to return to work as a miner though earning less. Later, he develops an industrial disease due to his employment as a miner. As I read the Act and Schemes as construed by the authorities, including Evans' case (No. 2) (10), his compensation for the industrial disease, the notional accident, would be based on his earnings as reduced by the first accident. The present problem arises when as the result of the first accident, whether actual or notional, he ceases to be employed in the employment to the nature of which the disease is due. In such a case in assessing the compensation you must go back to his earnings when he was employed by the employer in the process which gave rise to the disease. If he has left that employment, earnings ex hypothesi reduced by the first accident do not come in as pre-accident earnings under s. 9 (3).

The question, however, which seems to me to remain and is raised by these appeals can be, I think, shortly stated. When an arbitrator has to make an award in respect of a second accident which is notional, can he have regard to the fact that the workman has already been awarded compensation in respect of a former accident reducing his earning capacity below the prima facie datum line as laid down in the Act or the relevant Scheme? In the present case under the first award the workman had been awarded compensation on the basis that his earning capacity was reduced by miners' nystagmus from £7 10s. 0d. to £4 3s. 0d. When he came to the second award, was the arbitrator entitled to deal with the claim on the basis that the workman was able to show no further reduction of earning capacity owing to pneumoconiosis. I am myself doubtful, and here I think I differ from SCOTT, L.J., whether the words of the Scheme preclude his doing this which would seem to me to be in accordance with principle and common sense. Evans' case (No. 2) (10), for reasons which have been stated by MORTON, L.J., decided that he cannot, and on that authority I think the decisions appealed from were right.

Appeals dismissed with costs.

WEATHERLEY v. WEATHERLEY

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Jowitt, L.C., Lord Wright, Lord Simonds, Lord Uthwatt and Lord Normand), March 14, 31, 1947.]

D Divorce—Desertion—Wilful and unjustifiable refusal to continue sexual relations—Parties continuing to reside in matrimonial home—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (c. 57), s. 2.

The parties were married on May 17, 1941, the husband being then a sergeant in the Royal Air Force, aged 22, and the wife a spinster of 30. After the marriage sexual intercourse took place every week-end in May and June of that year and during the husband's periods of six days' leave in each of the months of July, August and October. When the husband came on leave in November, 1941, the wife informed him that she had prepared another bed for him, that she could not sleep if they shared the same bed, and that she had finished with sexual intercourse and did not want any more of it. The parties continued, however, to share the flat which constituted the matrimonial home, the wife prepared the husband's meals for him when he was home on leave, and they had their meals together and visited their social clubs together. They continued on these terms during the husband's various periods of leave until June 1, 1943, when the husband asked the wife to resume normal married relations. The wife refused and the husband had nothing more to do with her. At the hearing of a petition, dated Feb. 22, 1945, alleging desertion from Nov. 24, 1941, the husband stated that when the wife refused intercourse in that month she said she thought it was very hard on him and if he wanted that sort of thing he could have it with some other woman. He also stated that he kept going back to the flat after Nov., 1941, when on leave, in the hope that he might be able to get the wife to alter her opinion:—

Held: so long as cohabitation was continued a mere refusal of sexual intercourse by one of the spouses could not constitute desertion without cause within the meaning of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 2.

APPEAL by the husband from a decision of the Court of Appeal (TUCKER, L.J., and EVERSHED, J. (SCOTT, L.J., dissenting)), dated Apr. 16, 1946, and reported [1946] 2 All E.R. 1, dismissing an appeal from the refusal of BUCKNILL, J., on Oct. 12, 1945, to grant a decree nisi on the ground of the wife's desertion. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD JOWITT, L.C.

G. H. Crispin for the appellant (the husband).

E. Holroyd Pearce, K.C., and William Latey for the King's Proctor.

The respondent (the wife) was not represented.

The House took time for consideration.

Mar. 31. LORD JOWITT, L.C. : My Lords, this was a husband's petition for divorce based on the ground of desertion by the wife. The petition was dated Feb. 22, 1945, and it was, therefore, necessary to show that the desertion had lasted for at least three years, from Feb. 22, 1942. The trial judge, BUCKNILL, J., heard the case in October, 1945, and dismissed the petition. The Court of Appeal (SCOTT and TUCKER, L.J.J., and EVERSHED, J.), dismissed the appeal, SCOTT, L.J., dissenting. From this decision an appeal has been brought to your Lordships' House.

The relevant facts can be shortly stated. The parties were married at the registry office in Bromley, Kent, on May 17, 1941, the husband being then aged 22, a sergeant in the Royal Air Force, and the wife being a spinster of 30 years of age. They lived in a two-roomed flat of which the wife was the tenant. In the early days of the marriage, the husband was in the habit of spending with his wife the time when he was on leave, and her flat became the marital home. In the early days of the marriage normal sexual intercourse took place, and this continued up till October, 1941, whenever the husband got leave. When the husband went home on leave in November, 1941, the wife said that she had prepared another bed for him. She said she did not want any further resumption of marital relations. She said that she knew that she was being awfully selfish, but (I quote from the evidence) "she thought this sex business was horrid and beastly and she did not want any more of it." She added that she realised it was awfully hard on her husband, but, if he wanted that sort of thing, he could have it with some other woman. As a result, the husband had to sleep in another bed and at some later date, which was not specified in the evidence, in another room. In all other respects they continued living together in the flat as a normal married couple. They had their meals, which were prepared by the wife, together, and they went out together to clubs and entertainments. Although from time to time thereafter the husband asked the wife to change her mind and to allow him sexual intercourse, she never consented to do so. They continued, however, to live together at the marital home.

The sole question in this case is whether that state of affairs, which continued, at any rate, for part of the three years preceding the presentation of the petition constitutes desertion.

Under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, adultery, coupled with desertion without reasonable excuse for two years or upwards had been a ground on which a wife could obtain a decree of divorce, and desertion without cause was of itself a ground on which a sentence of judicial separation could be obtained. The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, for the first time, made desertion without cause a ground of divorce if it had continued for three years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition. It is noticeable that in neither of these two Acts was desertion defined. In these circumstances I think we should first consider what was the state of the law as laid down in the decided cases dealing with the subject of desertion up to the date of the passing of the Act of 1937. In the absence of any statutory definition of desertion I should think it right to presume that the legislature, in using that word, used it in the understood and accepted sense.

My Lords, I find it unnecessary, for the reasons I will give presently, to bring the many decided cases into detailed review. In all of them the judges have declined, and, in my view, wisely declined, to attempt any definition of "desertion." In this respect I propose to follow their example. On some future occasion it may be necessary that this House should consider some of these decisions, and, in particular, should consider whether there is sufficient warrant for the doctrine of "constructive desertion" which from time to time seems to have found favour. In the view which I take no such consideration is necessary for the determination of the present appeal, for it is the fact that in none of those cases before Jackson v. Jackson (1) is there anything to suggest that, so long as cohabitation is continued, a mere refusal of sexual intercourse by one of the spouses can constitute desertion.

- A (1). This point actually arose for decision for the first time in Jackson v. Jackson. The actual refusal in that case was a refusal by the husband to sleep with his wife because she insisted on having her little girl with her. The case was argued on the footing that there had been an unqualified refusal of sexual intercourse and the judgment proceeds on this basis. SIR HENRY DUKE, P., in the course of his judgment, states the principle as follows ([1924] P. 23):

- B How does it stand in point of principle? Wanton refusal of one or other of the parties to a marriage to have sexual intercourse is no doubt a wrong thing. It is the intentional breach of one of the ties of marriage, but it does not produce either separation or living apart. It may be a ground upon which the party against whom the refusal is made may decide to go away; and in the case of Synge v. Synge (2) in the Court of Appeal, which has been so much pressed upon us. COLLINS, L.J., said that where, upon a refusal of sexual intercourse by one of the spouses, the other had decided to go away, they were living apart by mutual consent. But reflection upon the manifold duties of the married state must, I think, convince any reasonable mind that this refusal of itself
- C by one of the parties, while the parties remain living together and discharging the other duties of the married state, cannot be said to amount to desertion. It is not abandonment; it is not living apart. If it is a refusal of a duty it does not purport to conclude the matrimonial relationship.

- D That case had been acted on many times between 1924 and the passing of the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1937. I agree with that decision, but, even if I had thought it incorrect, I should still have been of the opinion that, when the legislature in the Act of 1937 for the first time made desertion by itself a ground of divorce, it cannot have intended the word "desertion" to bear a meaning which it does not naturally bear and which judicial authority had so recently denied to it.

- E SCOTT, L.J., in his dissenting judgment, ([1946] 2 All E.R. 4) states that marriage, whether it be in an established church or in a registry office, is to be regarded as a Christian marriage. He, therefore, proceeds to consider the doctrine of marriage as set forth in the Book of Common Prayer. He finds there stated that one of the causes for which matrimony was ordained was the procreation of children, and so reaches the conclusion that where the wife has, after a time, refused further sexual intercourse with the husband, she has "deserted" the husband, because he regards the mutual rights of sexual intercourse for the purpose of the procreation of children as fundamental to the marriage state. I
- F think this a dangerous and fallacious line of argument. It proceeds on the basis that any fundamental breach of the obligations contracted in holy matrimony, as laid down in the Book of Common Prayer, constitutes desertion within the meaning of the Act of 1937. It could not be contended that a marriage which had been duly consummated could be dissolved because one of the spouses was unable, by reason of some physical infirmity, to procreate children.
- G Yet the consideration which prevailed with the learned Lord Justice would appear in such a case to be equally valid. The marriage which is contemplated in the Book of Common Prayer is a lifelong union which imposes an obligation on the one spouse towards the other "to love and to cherish till death us do part." The fact is that the law of the land cannot be co-extensive with the law of morals, nor can the civil consequences of marriage be identical with its religious consequences. What marriage means to different persons will depend on their upbringing, their
- H outlook and their religious belief. We must remember, as SCOTT, L.J., rightly says (ibid), that marriage, whether solemnised in a church or a registry office, whether contracted between Christians or between those who have different or no religious beliefs, must in each case have the same legal consequences, and, remembering those things, we shall, I think, find the solution to the question which arises for determination in this case and in similar cases, not on a consideration of the Christian doctrine of marriage as laid down in the Book of Common Prayer, but on the true construction of the relevant Acts of Parliament.

This further consideration cannot be disregarded. It is, my Lords, most undesirable, save where we are clearly enjoined by statute so to do, to seek to discover or reveal the secret intimacies of the marriage bed. If a question arises whether the marriage has been consummated, no doubt this may be necessary. It is not, I think, right that we should do so in cases such as the present. I find it significant in this connection that the Act of 1937, which provided that a decree of nullity could be pronounced on the ground that the marriage had not been consummated owing to the wilful refusal of the respondent, did not go on to say that a marriage could be dissolved if, when once it had been consummated, further sexual intercourse was withdrawn. If any such doctrine were to be accepted, we might even have to consider, as EVERSLED, J., hinted (ibid 11), whether it could be held that there was desertion if sexual intercourse was only tolerated on rare and exceptional occasions. For these reasons, which are in substance those given by TUCKER, L.J., and EVERSLED, J., I would dismiss the appeal.

I must add that, having had the opportunity of reading the opinion of LORD NORMAND about to be delivered, I concur in his observations on the irrelevance to the present issue of decisions of the Court of Sessions in Scottish cases. Equally, nothing that the House decides on the meaning of the word "desertion" in the English law of divorce should be taken as relevant to the meaning of that word in Scots law.

LORD WRIGHT: My Lords, I agree. LORD UTHWATT has asked me to say that he also agrees with the opinion which has just been delivered.

LORD SIMONDS: I also agree.

LORD NORMAND (read by LORD SIMONDS): My Lords, my reasons for thinking that this appeal fails may be very briefly stated. Jackson v. Jackson (1) is the only case of those cited in which the question arose for decision whether persistent refusal of sexual intercourse, without any other conduct on the part of either spouse making for the disruption of the marriage, is desertion, and the decision was that it was not desertion. Nothing intervened between the date of that decision and the passing of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, to cast any doubt on the soundness of the decision. It must, therefore, be assumed that the legislature, in passing the Act of 1937, used the word "desertion" in a sense consistent with the law as expounded in Jackson v. Jackson (1).

Certain Scottish cases were referred to by counsel for the appellant, but there are differences between the law of England and the law of Scotland on divorce for desertion which have by no means been removed by recent legislation and which are a result of the different history of the law of divorce in the two countries since the Reformation. The recent cases of Bell v. Bell (3) and of Wilkinson v. Wilkinson (4) show how the construction of the Divorce (Scotland) Act, 1938, is influenced by the former law in this very matter of divorce for desertion. It is seldom that it can be profitable to cite Scottish decisions on divorce in an English case or English decisions in a Scottish case. In the present instance the Scottish cases certainly afford no help in such cases.

Appeal dismissed.

CHRISTIE AND ANOTHER v. LEACHINSKY.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Simon, Lord Thankerton, Lord Macmillan, Lord du Parc), December 2, 3, 5, 6, 9, 10, 1946;

Distinguished. TIMS v. JOHN LEWIS & Co., LTD. [1951] 1 All E.R. 814.

Trespass—False imprisonment—Need to make charge known to person arrested—Arrest without warrant—Charge of unlawful possession under local Act—Charge not justifying original arrest or continuing detention under arrest—Reasonable and probable cause for suspecting felony—Dismissal of charge at police court—Re-arrest inside the court—Subsequent charge of larceny—Charge dismissed—Liverpool Corporation Act, 1921 (c. lxxiv), ss. 507, 513.

On Aug. 31, 1942, the respondent was arrested by the appellants, who were police officers, and charged under the Liverpool Corporation Act, 1921, s. 507, with unlawful possession of a bale of cloth. Admittedly, the arrest was not authorised by the section, but the police bona fide and on reasonable grounds believed that he had stolen the cloth. He was detained in custody until the following day when he was brought before the magistrate and remanded in custody until Sept. 8. Thereafter he was remanded on bail until Sept. 15. At the hearing the respondent was discharged, it being stated that the Leicester police had decided to prosecute him for larceny, and before leaving the court he was re-arrested. Later in the day, the Leicester police, charging him with larceny, took him to Leicester with a view to his committal for trial, but the charge was dismissed by the magistrates. The respondent claimed damages for false imprisonment and trespass to the person. Although the offence of unlawful possession under the Act of 1921 was one for which in the circumstances there was no power of arrest without warrant, the appellants pleaded that their action was justified because they had reasonable and probable cause for suspecting, and, in fact, suspected, that the respondent had stolen or feloniously received the bale of cloth.

HELD: (i) an arrest without warrant, either by a policeman or by a private person, can be justified only if it is an arrest on a charge which is made known to the person arrested unless the circumstances are such that the person arrested must know the substance of the alleged offence, (e.g., where the alleged wrongdoer is caught red-handed), or where he forcibly resists arrest; the circumstances of the present case were not covered by any such qualification; and, therefore, the initial arrest and imprisonment were unlawful and constituted false imprisonment.

(ii) as regards the re-arrest on Sept. 15, the respondent knew what was the alleged felony in respect of which he was being detained, and so, although it took place inside the court, this arrest was lawful.

PER VISCOUNT SIMON: The authorities seem to establish the following propositions:—

1. If a policeman arrests without warrant upon reasonable suspicion of felony, or of other crime of a sort which does not require a warrant, he must in ordinary circumstances inform the person arrested of the true ground of arrest. He is not entitled to keep the reason to himself or to give a reason which is not the true reason. In other words, a citizen is entitled to know on what charge or on suspicion of what crime he is seized.

2. If the citizen is not so informed, but is nevertheless seized, the policeman, apart from certain exceptions, is liable for false imprisonment.

3. The requirement that the person arrested should be informed of the reason why he is seized naturally does not exist if the circumstances are such that he must know the general nature of the alleged offence for which he is detained.

4. The requirement that he should be so informed does not mean that technical or precise language need be used. The matter is one of substance, and turns on the elementary proposition that in this country a person is, prima facie, entitled to his freedom and is only required to submit to restraint on his freedom if he knows in substance the reason why it is claimed that restraint should be imposed.

5. The person arrested cannot complain that he has not been supplied with the above information as and when he should be, if he himself produces the situation which makes it practically impossible to inform him, e.g., by immediate counter-attack or by running away.

These propositions equally apply to a private person who arrests on suspicion.

APPEAL by defendants from a decision of the Court of Appeal, reported [1945] 2 All E.R. 395, allowing the appeal of the plaintiff against a decision of STABLE, J., without a jury, at Lancashire Assizes, dated June 20, 1944. The Court of Appeal held that (i) (LAWRENCE, L.J. dissenting) the common law power of arrest was limited to a specific charge and arrest must be made only on that charge, and so a person could not be lawfully arrested for a misdemeanour merely because the constable reasonably suspected him of having committed a felony; and (ii) a re-arrest of the plaintiff after the dismissal of the charge under the Liverpool Corporation Act was not justified and amounted to false imprisonment. The facts appear in the opinions of VISCOUNT SIMON and LORD DU PARCQ, and are summarised in the headnote.

Hemmerde, K.C., Nelson, K.C., and Patrick O'Connor for the appellants.
Laski, K.C., and Rose Heilbron for the respondent.

The House took time for consideration.

Mar. 25. VISCOUNT SIMON: My Lords, the respondent is a "waste" merchant who deals in what are commonly called "rags", with a warehouse in Beaufort Street, Liverpool. The two appellants are respectively a detective constable and a detective sergeant in the Liverpool City Police Force. The respondent has brought an action against the appellants (together with other police officers who have now been dismissed from the suit) for damages for false imprisonment, alleging that he was wrongfully arrested and detained by them on Aug. 31, 1942. The trial judge, STABLE, J. directed judgment to be entered for the defendants (including the present appellants), but the Court of Appeal (SCOTT, LAWRENCE and UTHWATT, L.J.J.) reversed this decision and ordered judgment to be entered for the plaintiff (the present respondent) against the appellants for damages, such damages to be assessed by judge and jury. I agree with SCOTT, L.J., that the main issue raised is of great importance and requires examination, for it concerns the liberty of the subject and the extent of the powers of the police to arrest without warrant.

The facts which raise this issue are as follows. The respondent was in the habit of buying his supplies from various towns and had recently from time to time made purchases from a tailoring firm in Leicester called Michaelson.

On Aug. 26, 1942, he there bought three bales of waste cuttings for £4 6s. 0d., such waste being habitually sold by weight. On Aug. 27 he called with a van to pay for and collect what he had bought and, according to his story, incidentally asked Mr. Michaelson if he had any "remnants" out of which to make a dress for his wife. Mr. Michaelson said he had many, and in the result the respondent bought the lot for £22, and they were packed in a single bale. The contents were pieces of cloth, stockinet, and linings. The bale is referred to in the evidence as "a bale of cloth." The respondent paid cash for the whole purchase. He consigned the four bales, together with 23 other bales of waste bought from other sellers in Leicester, by carrier to his warehouse in Liverpool, describing the whole consignment, for the purpose of the carrier's charges, as "waste." STABLE, J., considered that no sinister inference should be drawn from this misdescription. On Saturday, Aug. 29, the Liverpool police (apparently having already some suspicion on grounds which were not alleged in the pleading or explained at the trial) examined the goods while in the hands of the carrier and so ascertained that one of the bales contained pieces of cloth and not mere "waste." It is possible that the interest of the police was aroused because of war-time restrictions on the sale and purchase of cloth. On the morning of Monday, Aug. 31, the appellants secretly watched the unloading of the bales and their removal into the respondent's warehouse by the back entrance. The respondent was present and assisted in the work. He himself carried the bale of cloth inside and placed it near the door. The other bales, which required to be weighed to check the purchases, were placed in another part of the premises. The appellants now went round to the front door of the warehouse, entered it without any search warrant, and told the respondent they were making enquiries about a bale of cloth which had been delivered to him. The respondent professed to know nothing about any cloth, and the appellants set to work to search the premises. The respondent asked if a search warrant was not necessary, but the appellant Morris told him that he was "not exceeding his powers at all"—an assertion which seems quite contrary to the law. The appellants, not being satisfied with the respondent's explanation, arrested him on a charge of "unlawful possession" under the Liverpool Corporation Act, 1921, and took him in custody to Essex Street Bridewell.

There can be no doubt that the Liverpool Corporation Act did not authorise this arrest at all. The Act does not use the term "unlawful possession," though this is the customary phrase used in connection with an infringement of the Act. The phrase is, in fact, somewhat misleading. The following provisions are included in part II of the Act :

S. 507 (1): Any person brought before any court of summary jurisdiction charged with having in his possession any thing which there is reasonable ground to believe or suspect has been stolen and (sic) who does not account to the satisfaction of the court for his possession of the same shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £5 or in the discretion of the court to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two months with or without hard labour. (2) If any person so brought before any court shall declare that he received such thing from some other person or that he was employed as a carrier agent or servant to convey the same for some other person such court shall cause such other person and also if necessary every former or pretended purchaser or other person through whose possession the same shall have passed to be brought before a court and examined . . . (5) For the purposes of this section . . . the expression "stolen" means stolen or unlawfully acquired or detained.

By s. 573 :

It shall be lawful for any police constable and all such persons as he shall call to his assistance to arrest and detain without warrant—(1) Any person whose name and residence shall be unknown to such constable and cannot then be ascertained by him and who shall commit any offence against . . . the provisions of . . . this part of this Act.

Inasmuch as the appellants knew the respondent's name and also knew his place of residence in Southport where he had lived for the last eighteen years and moreover arrested him in his own warehouse in Beaufort Street, the Act manifestly gave the appellants no right to arrest the respondent for "unlawful possession" without a warrant.

What is surprising, and is a matter for severe comment, is that the appellant, Christie, admitted at the trial that he knew at the time that he had no power to arrest without warrant under the Liverpool Corporation Act in the circumstances and that the arrest was, nevertheless, made on this charge because it was the "most convenient" course. It is much to be hoped that the Liverpool police will be instructed not to disregard the limitations laid down by law in this connection again. In another aspect the Liverpool Act is a curious one, for the misdemeanour created by it only arises if the individual, when brought before the magistrate, fails at that stage to account for what is in his possession. No offence, therefore, can be committed before he is brought before the magistrate and the power of the police to arrest and detain an individual (whether with or without a magistrate's warrant, according to circumstances) is not a power to charge him with having committed the crime of "unlawful possession" (for up to that time he has not committed any breach of the Act), but rather a power to arrest and detain him if his name and residence are unknown to the police so as to bring him before the court to give his explanation. The suspicion that a thing "has been stolen" is, of course, quite different from the suspicion that the individual was a party to stealing it or has received it knowing that it was stolen.

The respondent was brought to Essex Street police station about noon in custody, and later was charged by the appellant, Christie, before Police Sgt. Tindall, who was then the officer on duty, with "unlawful possession" under the Liverpool Act. Christie told Tindall that "bail was not advisable." The respondent was kept a prisoner all night and had an uncomfortable experience when being removed about midnight from one place of detention to another in a police van containing two drunken negroes. The next morning he was brought before the stipendiary on the charge of "unlawful possession" and the prosecuting constable asked for his remand for a week in custody. The stipendiary may not have been told that when the police arrested the respondent they already knew his name and address. At any rate he acquiesced in the police request. About 1.30 p.m., on the day of his arrest, the respondent, after being "cautioned" by Christie, made a signed statement in which he gave a full account of how he acquired the property and gave the name and address of Michaelson, from whom he had bought the four bales and to whom he had paid cash for them. The Liverpool police, however, took no steps to bring Michaelson before the Liverpool magistrate and on Sept. 8 the respondent was brought up again and remanded on bail for a further week until Sept. 15. In the meantime, the Leicester police interviewed Michaelson, who, for some reason, told a pack of lies, asserting that he had never sold the contents of the bale of cloth to the respondent or at all, and that the articles in that bale had been taken from him without his authority. On Sept. 15, as the Leicester police were intending to prosecute the respondent for larceny, the Liverpool police applied to the stipendiary for leave to withdraw the proceedings before him, and this was done. (A further allegation of false imprisonment occurs at this point, which I will deal with later.) When the respondent was subsequently brought before the court at Leicester his solicitor triumphantly exploded the case against him and showed up Michaelson for the liar he was. In the result, therefore, the respondent has not been proved guilty of any offence and he has spent a week in prison, after being arrested on a charge of "unlawful possession" in circumstances where an arrest on this charge was contrary to law. Any liability of the police, however, for the arrest of Aug. 31 ended when the stipendiary ordered the remand in custody, for the remand was the action of the magistrate for which the appellants cannot be held responsible as for false imprisonment.

If there were nothing to add to the above facts, it would be clear that the appellants, by arresting the respondent without a warrant on Aug. 31 on a charge of unlawful possession when they knew his name and residence, were acting illegally and were liable to pay damages for false imprisonment: see Dumbell v. Roberts (1). Indeed, this was admitted at the trial, but by an amendment of their defence it was pleaded that at the time of the arrest they had reasonable and probable cause for suspecting, and, in fact, suspected, that the respondent had stolen or feloniously received the bale of cloth. STABLE, J., found that this was true, but neither the pleading nor the evidence suggested that the respondent was told that he was arrested on this ground. The question to be determined is, therefore, whether, when a policeman arrests X. without a warrant, on reasonable suspicion that he has committed a given felony, but gives X. no notice that he is arrested on suspicion of such felony, he is acting within the law.

There is nothing in the judgment of the trial judge to indicate that this vital question was ever argued out before him at all. STABLE, J., had no difficulty in holding that in the circumstances arrest on the charge of "unlawful possession," standing by itself, was an unlawful imprisonment, but the fact that the police reasonably suspected larceny or felonious receiving appeared to him to provide a complete defence, though they did not arrest for this charge. The judge said :

Of course, if when the police had arrested Mr. Leachinsky, all they had believed was that Mr. Leachinsky was in unlawful possession under the Act of this bale—if that was their state of mind, at the time of the arrest they could not justify the detention—a wrongful arrest—thereafter by setting up the fact, if fact it had been, that Mr. Leachinsky had committed some other felony of which they were wholly unaware at the time of making the arrest. The law, it seems to me, on that point is quite plain. But if they believed he had committed a felony when they arrested him, if there were reasonable grounds for that belief, and they arrested him because they so believed, that act, which was legal and justifiable at that time, does not become illegal thereafter because for convenience a charge of unlawful possession is brought in Liverpool in order that the real charge of larceny may be prosecuted by the police before the court in Leicester, which was really concerned in the matter. The test as I understand it is what was the state of mind of the police at the time of the arrest. Why did they arrest him ? If they arrested him because they believed he had committed a felony and there were reasonable grounds for so believing, they do not lose the protection of the law. And what was not a wrongful act at the time does not become an actionable wrong because thereafter the proceedings in Liverpool are confined to what was really a mere formality, unlawful possession, and the prosecution for felony is relegated to the appropriate court.

The all-important question in this appeal is whether this passage correctly embodies the law. If a policeman arrests without warrant when he entertains a reasonable suspicion of felony, is he under a duty to inform the suspect of the nature of the charge, and if he does not do so, is the detention a false imprisonment ?

In the Court of Appeal SCOTT, L.J., strongly insisted that it was a false imprisonment. Arrest, he pointed out, was the first step in a criminal proceeding against a suspected person on a charge which was intended to be judicially investigated. If the arrest was authorised by magisterial warrant, or if proceedings were instituted by the issue of a summons, it is clear law that the warrant or summons must specify the offence. This rule is now embodied in the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, s. 32, but it is a principle involved in our ancient jurisprudence. Moreover, the warrant must be founded on information in writing and on oath and, except where a particular statute provides otherwise, the information and the warrant must particularise the offence charged. The famous case of Entick v. Carrington (2), dealing with the illegality of "general warrants" is an illustration of the principle. Again, when an arrest is made on warrant, the warrant in normal cases has to be read to the person arrested. All this is for the obvious purpose of securing that a citizen who is prima facie entitled to personal freedom should know why for the time being his personal freedom is interfered with. SCOTT, L.J., argued that, if the law circumscribed the issue of warrants for arrest in this way, it could hardly be that a policeman acting without a warrant was entitled to make an arrest without stating the charge on which the arrest was made, and he contrasted what he took to be the general law on this subject with the exceptional situation created by the well-known reg. 18B of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, according to which during the emergency the Home Secretary could, if satisfied that it was necessary to do so, make an order with respect to a particular person "directing that he be detained" which detention "shall be deemed to be" lawful custody. With the judgment of SCOTT, L.J., his colleague, UTHWATT, J., agreed. He said ([1945] 2 All E.R., at p. 412) :

... a person cannot be lawfully arrested for a misdemeanour by a constable merely because the constable reasonably suspects him of having committed a felony.

And he quoted the passage in HAWKINS' PLEAS OF THE CROWN, 8th ed., vol. 2, ch. 12, p. 120, that if a private person is pleading a justification for arresting a man on suspicion,

It seems to be certain, that . . . regularly he ought expressly to show that the very same crime for which he made the arrest, was actually committed.

The relevance of this quotation becomes clear on examining the decision of Walters v. Smith (W. H.) & Son, Ltd. (3). LAWRENCE, L.J., agreed in the conclusion reached by the Court of Appeal, though he based his view on the previous decision of the Court of Appeal in Dumbell's case (1). The Lord Justice, however, indicated his doubts whether this decision was not open to challenge, basing himself, as I understand, largely on the assumption that a constable, when making an arrest without warrant on reasonable suspicion of felony, may do so "without giving any reason to the person arrested" inasmuch as "the constable is not bound to say anything at all." With all respect to the Lord Justice, I am unable to agree with the propositions quoted, and I take the view that Dumbell's case (1) was rightly decided.

When the appeal came before your Lordships' House the arguments which had prevailed before the Court of Appeal were repeated, but it was not, apparently, realised by counsel on either side that there is direct authority, both in text books of acknowledged weight and in cases actually decided, that in normal circumstances an arrest without warrant either by a policeman or by a private person can be justified only if it is an arrest on a charge made known to the person arrested. I owe most of what follows to the erudition of LORD DU PARCQ, who made a careful investigation of the recorded law after the arguments were concluded.

Take first the text books. BURN'S JUSTICE OF THE PEACE is a work of acknowledged authority which has gone through more than thirty editions. It originally appeared in 1755, and the author, the Rev. Richard Burn, D.C.L. (who also brought out three successive editions of BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES), deals in detail with the law of arrest without warrant. He says (vol. I, p. 302) that "where a constable acts without warrant by virtue of his office of constable, he should, unless the party be previously acquainted with it, notify that he is a constable, or that he arrests in the Queen's name, and for what." HALE'S PLEAS OF THE CROWN, vol. 2, ch. X, p. 82, dealing with arrest by a private person on suspicion says: "note that in all arrests he must acquaint the party with the cause of his arrest." ARCHIBALD'S METROPOLITAN POLICE GUIDE (7th ed., p. 713) is a more modern book which affirms that the general rule is that, in arresting without warrant on suspicion, the person making the arrest, whether constable or private person, should at the time state on what charge the arrest is being made.

The propositions laid down in the text books are supported by judicial decisions to some of which I will briefly refer. What is particularly noteworthy is that in many of these decisions an exception to the general rule is explained and justified, and this indirectly establishes what the general rule is. For example, in Mackalley's case (4), the decision of the Star Chamber in the Duchess of Rutland's case (5) was followed, to the effect that it is not necessary to state the ground of arrest when the party makes resistance before the person arresting him "can speak all his words." Mackalley's case (4) arose out of an arrest based on a plaint of debt which led to the debtor and his friends resisting the official arrester with fatal results, and it was ruled that "an officer making an arrest, ought to show at whose suit, out of what court, and for what cause he made the arrest, when the party arrested submits himself to the arrest, but not when the party resists." In Rex v. Howarth (6), it is laid down that there is no need to tell a man why he is being arrested when he must, in the circumstances of the arrest, know the reason already. Another qualification may be gathered from the decision of Rex v. Ford (7), to the effect that it is not necessary for a person making an arrest to state the charge in technical or precise language.

These citations, and others which are referred to by LORD DU PARCQ, seem to me to establish the following propositions:

1. If a policeman arrests without warrant on reasonable suspicion of felony, or of other crime of a sort which does not require a warrant, he must in ordinary circumstances inform the person arrested of the true ground of arrest. He is not entitled to keep the reason to himself or to give a reason which is not the true reason. In other words, a citizen is entitled to know on what charge or on suspicion of what crime he is seized.
2. If the citizen is not so informed, but is nevertheless seized, the policeman, apart from certain exceptions, is liable for false imprisonment.

3. The requirement that the person arrested should be informed of the reason why he is seized naturally does not exist if the circumstances are such that he must know the general nature of the alleged offence for which he is detained.

4. The requirement that he should be so informed does not mean that technical or precise language need be used. The matter is a matter of substance, and turns on the elementary proposition that in this country a person is, prima facie, entitled to his freedom and is only required to submit to restraint on his freedom if he knows in substance the reason why it is claimed that this restraint should be imposed.

5. The person arrested cannot complain that he has not been supplied with the above information as and when he should be, if he himself produces the situation which makes it practically impossible to inform him, e.g., by immediate counter-attack or by running away.

There may well be other exceptions to the general rule in addition to those I have indicated, and the above propositions are not intended to constitute a formal or complete code, but to indicate the general principles of our law on a very important matter. These principles equally apply to a private person who arrests on suspicion. If a policeman who entertained a reasonable suspicion that X had committed a felony were at liberty to arrest him and march him off to a police station without giving any explanation of why he was doing this, the prima facie right of personal liberty would be gravely infringed. No one, I think, would approve a situation in which, when the person arrested asked for the reason, the policeman replied: "That has nothing to do with you. Come along with me." Such a situation may be tolerated under other systems of law, as, for instance, in the time of lettres de cachet in the eighteenth century in France, or in more recent days when the Gestapo swept people off to confinement under an overriding authority which the executive in this country happily does not in ordinary times possess. This would be quite contrary to our conceptions of individual liberty. If I may introduce a reference to the well known book, DALTON'S COUNTRY JUSTICE, that author, dealing with arrest and imprisonment, says: "The liberty of a man is a thing specially favoured by the common law."

There are practical considerations, as well as theory, to support the view I take. If the charge on suspicion of which the man is arrested is then and there made known to him, he has the opportunity of giving an explanation of any misunderstanding or of calling attention to other persons for whom he may have been mistaken, with the result that further enquiries may save him from the consequences of false accusation. It must be remembered that in former days arrest was practised not only in certain cases of suspected crime, but as a preliminary in civil suits also.

I entertain no doubt that in the present case the appellants are not exonerated from liability for false imprisonment by satisfying the judge that they had a reasonable suspicion that the respondent had been guilty of theft or of receiving stolen goods knowing they had been stolen, when they never told the respondent that this was the ground of his arrest. Instead of doing so, they gave a different ground which, as Christie admitted, was not a good excuse for arresting him at all.

The respondent alleged a second false imprisonment on Sept. 15, 1942, for which the appellant, Christie, was responsible, and the Court of Appeal has held that the claim for damages in respect of this second imprisonment succeeds. The circumstances were that when on that date the respondent, who was on remand, appeared before the stipendiary magistrate, the Liverpool police asked leave to withdraw the charge of "unlawful possession" on the ground that the Leicester police (misled by Michaelson) had decided to prosecute the respondent for larceny and were on their way to arrest him. The magistrate assented to the withdrawal of the only charge that was before him, and, accordingly, discharged the respondent. Instead of coming out from the dock into the body of the court, the respondent was, by Christie's intervention, motioned to descend the steps to the cells below and was detained at Bridewell until the arrival, some hours later, of a Leicester policeman, who charged the respondent with stealing cloth from Michaelson and took him into custody. The difference between the facts of the first detention on Aug. 31 and the second detention on Sept. 15 is that on the second occasion the respondent knew what was the alleged felony in respect of which he was being detained. Christie's action on this second occasion was a detention which, in substance if not in form, amounted to an arrest on suspicion of a felony which the respondent knew to be that of larceny, and the case seems to be covered by the exception contained in proposition 3 above. COMYN'S DIGEST, title, Imprisonment, H.5, indicates that an arrest should not take place "in the face of the court," but, on examining the authorities cited, it seems to me that what is meant is that the proceedings of a court and the part taken by litigants and witnesses are not to be disturbed by the execution of an arrest. The gallery at the Old Bailey is not, I presume, an Alsatia for wanted criminals, but it is certainly a better practice to carry through such detentions as the law authorises outside. This, in substance, is what Christie did and I do not agree with the Court of Appeal that damages should be awarded for what happened to the respondent on Sept. 15. I move that, as regards the first imprisonment, the appeal should be dismissed, but that, as regards the second imprisonment, it should be allowed.

LORD THANKERTON : My Lords, I have had the privilege of considering the opinion just delivered by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack and also the opinions about to be delivered by my noble and learned friends, LORD SIMONDS and LORD DU PARCQ, and I desire to express my concurrence with them.

LORD SIMONDS : My Lords, I agree with SCOTT, L.J., in thinking that this case raises questions of importance affecting the liberty of the subject and for that reason think it right to state in my own words why I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

The admirably clear and accurate statements of the facts by the trial judge relieves me of the necessity of any prolonged examination of them. I proceed on the basis that, when the appellants arrested the respondent at his premises in Liverpool at about noon on Aug. 31, 1942, they, in fact, suspected that he had stolen a bale of cloth, or had received it knowing that it was stolen, and, further, that they had reasonable grounds for that suspicion. I accept the view adopted by the judge and also by LAWRENCE, L.J., in the Court of Appeal that it is not inconsistent with a reasonable suspicion of felony that the possibility of what is colloquially called a "black market" offence should also have been in his mind. I agree further with the judge in the view which he took of the plea of justification in the defence and the course that he consequently followed of allowing an amendment. It appears to me that the plea as originally drawn clearly indicated that the defendants relied on the power of arrest at common law as well as on the provisions of the Liverpool Corporation Act, 1921, and that the plaintiff suffered no prejudice whatever by an amendment at the trial which put that plea in proper form.

If, then, the appellants reasonably suspected that the respondent had committed a felony, was it not their right to arrest him without a warrant? And, if they did so arrest him, how is it that the arrest can be branded as illegal and an action for false imprisonment lie against them? My Lords, it is here that the crux of the matter lies and it is not easy so to state the law as not, on the one hand, to impinge upon the liberty of the subject, or, on the other hand, to make more difficult the duty of every subject of the King to preserve the King's peace. It was, I think, this difficulty that led LAWRENCE, L.J., to the conclusion that the appellants were not precluded from pleading their reasonable suspicion of felony, which would have justified arrest, by the fact that they at no time charged the respondent with anything but a misdemeanour, which in the circumstances did not justify arrest. The learned Lord Justice states his view of the law thus ([1945] 2 All E.R. at p. 411):

It is argued that it is unfair not to let the person arrested know what the charge against him is and no doubt it is desirable that he should be informed as soon as possible of the facts which are said to constitute a crime on his part and ultimately when the indictment is framed what the actual charge is. But the undoubted fact that the charge may be altered seems to me to show that the right to know the charge only comes into existence when the indictment is finally drawn.

My Lords, in my opinion this statement of the law, which the learned Lord Justice proceeds to apply with perfect logic to the present case, cannot be accepted without qualification.

First, I would say that it is the right of every citizen to be free from arrest unless there is in some other citizen, whether a constable or not, the right to arrest him. I would say next that it is the corollary of the right of every citizen to be thus free from arrest that he should be entitled to resist arrest unless that arrest is lawful. How can these rights be reconciled with the proposition that he may be arrested without knowing why he is arrested? It is to be remembered that the right of the constable in or out of uniform is, except for a circumstance irrelevant to the present discussion, the same as that of every other citizen.

- A Is citizen A. bound to submit unresistingly to arrest by citizen B. in ignorance of the charge made against him? I think, my Lords, that cannot be the law of England. Blind, unquestioning obedience is the law of tyrants and of slaves. It does not yet flourish on English soil. I would, therefore, submit the general proposition that it is a condition of lawful arrest that the man arrested should be entitled to know why he is arrested, and then, since the affairs of life seldom admit an absolute standard or an unqualified proposition, see whether any qualification is of necessity imposed on it. This approach to the question has, I think, a double support. In the first place, the law requires that, where arrest proceeds on a warrant, the warrant should state the charge on which the arrest is made. I can see no valid reason why this safeguard for the subject should not equally be his when the arrest is made without a warrant. The exigency of the situation, which justifies or demands arrest without a warrant, cannot, as it appears to me, justify or demand either a refusal to state the reason of arrest or a mis-statement of the reason. Arrested with or without a warrant, the subject is entitled to know why he is deprived of his freedom, if only in order that he may without a moment's delay take such steps as will enable him to regain it. In the second place, I find assistance in the analogous procedure in civil proceedings in olden days and in imprisonment for debt. On the former, the judgment of SCOTT, L.J., in this case is illuminating. The sheriff, who by judicial writ was directed to bring the defendant before the court, was not left, nor did he leave the defendant, in ignorance of the demand that must be met. Common justice and common sense required that the defendant should know why he should on such and such a day be brought before the King's justices at Westminster or wherever it might be. So also in regard to imprisonment for debt. On this subject much information is to be found in Hooper v. Lane (8). I think it necessary only to cite a single passage from the speech of LORD CRANWORTH, C., (6 H.L. Cas. 550):

[The sheriff] is bound, when he executes the writ, to make known the ground of the arrest, in order, among other reasons, that the person arrested may know whether he is or is not bound to submit to the arrest.

Here is a clear illustration of the principle on which I base this opinion that, if a man is to be deprived of his freedom, he is entitled to know the reason why.

- F If, then, this is, as I think it is, the fundamental rule, what qualification, if any, must be imposed upon it? The cogent instances given by LAWRENCE, L.J., are conclusive that an arrest does not become wrongful merely because the constable arrests a man for one felony, say, murder, and he is subsequently charged with another felony, say, manslaughter. It is not enough to say that in such a case the accused man could not recover any damages in an action for false imprisonment. It is more than that. It is clear that the constable has not been guilty of an illegal arrest, if he reasonably suspected that murder had been done. Again, I think it is clear that there is no need for the constable to explain the reason of arrest if the arrested man is caught redhanded and the crime is patent to high Heaven. Nor, obviously, is explanation a necessary prelude to arrest where it is important to secure a possibly violent criminal. Nor, again, can it be wrongful to arrest and detain a man on a charge of which he is reasonably suspected with a view to further investigation of a second
- H charge on which information is incomplete. In all such matters a wide measure of discretion must be left to those whose duty it is to preserve the peace and bring criminals to justice.

These and similar considerations lead me to the view that it is not an essential condition of lawful arrest that the constable should at the time of arrest formulate any charge at all, much less the charge which may ultimately be found in the indictment, but this, and this only, is the qualification which I would impose on the general proposition. It leaves untouched the principle, which lies at the heart of the matter, that the arrested man is entitled to be told what is the act for which he is arrested. The "charge" ultimately made will depend on the view taken by the law of his act. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the same words may be used to define the charge or describe the act, nor is any technical precision necessary—for instance, if the act constituting the crime is the killing of another man, it will be immaterial that the arrest is for murder and at a later hour the charge of manslaughter is substituted. The arrested man is left in no doubt that the arrest is for that killing. This is, I think, the fundamental principle, that a man is entitled to know what, in the apt words of LAWRENCE, L.J., are "the facts alleged to constitute crime on his part." If so, it is manifestly wrong that a constable arresting him for one crime should profess to arrest him for another. Of what avail is the prescribed caution if it is directed to an imaginary crime? And how can the accused take steps to explain away a charge of which he has no inkling?

I turn then to the present case which appears to me to present a strange combination of circumstances. For, while I doubt not that the appellants reasonably suspected the respondent of having committed a felony, yet I must on the evidence conclude that they refrained from bringing home to his mind at the time of arrest that that was their suspicion. Their minds, it is clear, were running on the provisions of the Liverpool Act, that curiosity of penal legislation, about which I need say no more than has already fallen from your Lordships. It is from that Act alone (though the ipsissima verba do not occur in it) that the expression "unlawful possession," with which this case is riddled, is derived. So, when counsel asked the appellant, Christie, in cross-examination: "You made your arrest in the terms that he was arrested for being in unlawful possession of the cloth"? though he may well have wondered what was meant by "in the terms that," he answered: "Yes." And to the next question: "You have always, so far as you were concerned, dealt with him in terms of being in unlawful possession of the cloth...? It has never been, so far as you are concerned, any other charge"? he answered: "No." So, also, in the station charge book the charge was entered as "unlawful possession of a quantity of cloth at the warehouse 196, Beaufort Street on Aug. 31, 1942."

It is clear then that, whatever may have been the secret thought of the constables at the time of the arrest and detention, they allowed the respondent to think that he was being arrested for being "in unlawful possession" of certain goods, an offence, if it be an offence, which was at the most a misdemeanour within the Liverpool Act and could not, except under conditions which did not here obtain, justify an arrest without a warrant, and was described in terms not calculated to bring home to him that he was suspected of stealing or receiving the goods. In these circumstances the initial arrest and detention were wrongful. He was not aware and was not made aware of the act alleged to constitute his crime, but was misled by a statement which was calculated to suggest to his uneasy conscience that he was guilty of a so-called black market offence. It is no answer that the constables had no sinister motive. They had from the administrative point of view a perfectly good motive. It will be found in an answer to a question, which, though it related to a later stage of the proceedings, is equally applicable to the earlier: "Why did you not then charge him with larceny?" To this the revealing answer was: "Because that larceny was committed at Leicester and it would then be a matter of withdrawing one charge and handing him over to Leicester. Unlawful possession was the most convenient charge at the time until he could be handed over to the Leicester City Police."

My Lords, the liberty of the subject and the convenience of the police or any other executive authority are not to be weighed in the scales against each other. This case will have served a useful purpose if it enables your Lordships once more to proclaim that a man is not to be deprived of his liberty except in due course and process of law.

On the second part of the case, viz., the alleged wrongful imprisonment on Sept. 15, I will add only a few words. Here I find myself in complete agreement with the conclusions reached by the trial judge and LAWRENCE, L.J. On that day Christie suspected the respondent of a felony with which the Leicester police proposed to charge him. He had good grounds for his suspicion. For it was the misfortune of the respondent that the doubts engendered by his own equivocation had been strengthened by the false statements of Michaelson, his associate in the transaction, so that his belated candour did not carry the conviction that it otherwise might have done. I see no reason, therefore, why Christie, entertaining the reasonable suspicion, which he had no reason to doubt the Leicester police shared, should not have arrested the respondent and detained him to await their arrival. Here, as it appears to me, there was no question of convenience superseding the law. On the contrary, Christie was acting within the law and in accordance with his duty. It is not necessary to decide the question whether it was unlawful to effect the arrest actually in court. I should

A hesitate to say that such an arrest is necessarily unlawful, but in any case the difference between being arrested on one side of the door of the court or the other is unsubstantial and I agree that the rule of "de minimis" is applicable. Therefore, while concurring in the motion that the appeal should be dismissed, I would add that in the assessment of damage only the first arrest and consequent imprisonment should be considered.

B My Lords, since writing this opinion, I have had the advantage of seeing in print the speeches of LORD SIMON and LORD DU PARCQ. I am fully in agreement with them and am happy to find that the authorities, which are now brought to the attention of the House, amply support the conclusions at which I had arrived.

C LORD DU PARCQ: My Lords, it is common ground between the parties to this appeal, and was admitted by the appellant, Christie, in the witness-box, that the only charge made against the respondent at the time of his arrest and during the period described in the order of the Court of Appeal as the "first imprisonment" was a charge under the Liverpool Corporation Act, s. 507 (1). It is beyond doubt that the appellants had no right to arrest the respondent without a warrant on that charge. There is, I think, equally no doubt that, at common law,

D . . . a constable is justified in arresting a person without a warrant, upon a reasonable suspicion of a felony having been committed, and of the person being guilty of it, although no felony has in fact been committed.

In stating this proposition, I have quoted a passage from BULLEN AND LEAKE'S PRECEDENTS OF PLEADING (3rd ed. 104). I should have said that this proposition was both indisputable and undisputed, but for the fact that I understood counsel for the respondent to tell the House that he was prepared to challenge it if it were thought desirable that he should deal with the point. Certainly it has come to be regarded as a settled principle of our law. It confers on the police one of the few privileges which they enjoy at common law, and it is relevant to the serious question which your Lordships have to decide to observe how gradually, and one may almost say grudgingly, the courts came to grant to the peace officer a right denied to the private citizen, who cannot justify an arrest on reasonable suspicion of felony if the suspected felony has not in fact been committed. The law at first recognised no distinction in this respect between the private citizen and the peace officer, who was thus put into a position of difficulty. If he were called on by a private citizen of repute to arrest a person for felony, he was in duty bound to do so. The oath administered to a High Constable in the seventeenth century contained the words: "You shall do your best endeavour (upon complaint to you made) to apprehend all felons, barretors and rioters," and petty constables were called on to swear that in the presence of the High Constable they should "be aiding and assisting unto him," and in his absence they should "execute his office." (The oaths are set out fully in CAPT. MELVILLE LEE'S HISTORY OF POLICE IN ENGLAND (1901) 111). ABBOTT, C.J., was, therefore, stating a long established rule when he said, in 1827, that "if a reasonable charge of felony is given, a constable is bound to take the offender into custody." (Cowles v. Dunbar (9)). It might turn out that the

F constable's informant was mistaken, and that no felony had been committed, and then the officer would be held liable in an action for false imprisonment. A solution was found in 1780, when it was held that a constable could justify arrest made on a charge preferred by another person, although no felony had in fact been committed. (Samuel v. Payne (10)). This case did not decide, however, that the constable could safely arrest on suspicions of his own, however reasonable they might be, if no felony had been committed. Indeed, it remained the better opinion for many years that in such a case he was not protected. BULLER, J., in 1788, stated the law as it was then understood in these words:

That if a peace officer of his own head takes a person into custody on suspicion, he must prove that there was such a crime committed; but that if he receives a person into custody on a charge preferred by another of felony or a breach of the peace, then he is to be considered as a mere conduit; and if no felony or breach of the peace was committed, the person who preferred the charge alone is answerable.

This ruling of BULLER, J., in Williams v. Dawson (11) was in terms approved by LORD ELLENBOROUGH in 1813 (Hobbs v. Branscomb (12)). In 1827, however, LORD TENTERDEN, C.J., giving the judgment of the Court of King's Bench in Beckwith v. Philby (13), distinguished the case of the constable from that of the private individual, and said that ... a constable having reasonable ground to suspect that a felony has been committed, is authorised to detain the party suspected until inquiry can be made by the proper authorities.

This would seem to conclude the matter, but the old rule died hard, and even in 1869, in DR. BURN'S JUSTICE OF THE PEACE (30th ed. 295), a doubt is expressed whether the constable who acts on his own initiative is in any different position from the private citizen. Save in some exceptional cases, no such doubt can be justified today. The judges of England have long regarded the law on this point as settled—see, for instance, the judgment of BLACKBURN, J., in Hadley v. Perks (14) (L.R. 1 Q.B., 456) and that of SIR RUFUS ISAACS, C.J., in Walters v. Smith (W. H.) & Son, Ltd. (3) ([1914] 1 K.B. 602)—and juries have long been directed as a matter of course in accordance with the rule stated in the passage which I have quoted from BULLEN and LEAKE. Your Lordships, I think, will all agree with STABLE, J., and the Court of Appeal that the generally accepted view is without doubt correct.

The question which gives to this appeal its importance and interest may be stated fairly, I think, as follows. In the circumstances of this case was it open to the appellants, who arrested and imprisoned the respondent without a warrant on a charge, formally made, on which they could not lawfully so arrest him, to justify that arrest and imprisonment by proof that, at and after the time of the arrest, they suspected him, on reasonable grounds, of having committed one or other of certain felonies? In so stating the question I have assumed that the police spoke the truth when they said that they suspected Leachinsky of felony, and that they had reasonable grounds for their suspicion. STABLE, J., so found, and I am not prepared to differ from this finding of fact. The appellants, in para. 17 of their Case, set out the contention, which their counsel sought to maintain at the Bar, ... that where a police constable has reasonable and probable cause to suspect and does suspect that a person has committed a felony he may lawfully arrest that person without specifying any particular felony or even telling that person that he is arresting him on suspicion of felony.

If this contention were accepted, it would not necessarily follow that a constable acts lawfully if he specifies as the ground of arrest some charge (not itself justifying arrest without warrant) other than that for which he is in fact making the arrest. The contention, however, constitutes a necessary step in the appellants' argument, and must be examined. Even if the appellants' proposition be read as referring only to the moment of arrest, it is not an accurate statement of the general rule. My noble and learned friend on the Woolsack has cited authorities which, while they show that circumstances may justify an arrest without a statement of the reason for the arrest, do not invalidate, but rather assume and affirm, the general rule which my noble friend has quoted from BURN'S JUSTICE OF THE PEACE, to which rule they must be regarded as exceptions. The principles established by the authorities are agreeable to common sense, and follow from the governing rule of the common law that a man is entitled to his liberty, and may, if necessary, defend his own freedom by force. If another person has a lawful reason for seeking to deprive him of that liberty, that person must as a general rule tell him what the reason is, for, unless he is told, he cannot be expected to submit to arrest or be blamed for resistance. The right to arrest and the duty to submit are correlative. This principle is applicable both to arrests in execution of civil process and to arrests on a criminal charge. It was stated in this House by LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., in Hooper v. Lane (8) where he said (6 H.L. Cas., 550) that a sheriff in order, among other reasons, that the person arrested may know whether he is or is not bound to submit to the arrest.

... is bound, when he executes the writ, to make known the ground of the arrest,

While this is the general rule, it is certainly true that officers and ministers of public justice, of whom SIR MATTHEW HALE says in his PLEAS OF THE CROWN (Vol. II, c. X) that they are under a greater protection of the law than private persons, are often justified in making an arrest without a preliminary or simultaneous statement of the charge. The law does not encourage the subject to resist the authority of one whom he knows to be an officer of the law. In Mac-kalley's case (4), where it was a serjeant-at-mace who made the arrest, it was said that if the party knows the person arresting him to be an officer he must not offer resistance, "and if he has no lawful warrant he may have his action for false imprisonment." That case, however, plainly recognised that the officer was under a duty to state the ground of the arrest "when the party arrested submits himself to the arrest." The present case was not one of those exceptional (I do not say rare) instances in which no charge need be stated at the time of arrest. Mr. Leachinsky was not so ill-advised as to offer resistance to the police, who had no excuse at all to offer for not performing their duty to acquaint him with the ground of arrest except, it would seem, ignorance of the law. I am glad to think that this ignorance is exceptional, and in this regard some of the answers given by Detective-Sgt. Moorhouse, of the Leicester city police, when under cross-examination, are significant and reassuring. It must be admitted that the form of the questions which he was answering is not to be commended, and that objection might well have been taken to them, but his answers are of value as showing what the witness, as an experienced police officer, understood his duty to be. I will quote four questions and answers :—

(Q) When a man is arrested, immediately on arrest he is told what he is arrested for, is he not ?—By me. I always tell him what he is arrested for.

(Q) The law is, even if you be a police officer of the highest rank, you cannot detain a man without telling him why he is detained, can you ?—He should be told why he is detained.

(Q) At once ?—Yes.

(Q) Meaning by "at once" the earliest reasonable moment ?—The earliest reasonable moment.

In my opinion, those answers correctly state the policeman's duty. In cases where a statement of the charge at the moment of arrest is, in the circumstances, excused, there is still a duty to acquaint him with it at the first reasonable opportunity. Arrest (as is said in DALTON'S "COUNTRY JUSTICE," 1727 ed., 580) "may be called the beginning of imprisonment," and these appellants were called on to justify the whole imprisonment and not its beginning alone.

I find it difficult to believe that the appellants would have sought to defend their conduct if the fact had been that Leachinsky had been arrested and taken to prison without ever being given a reason for his arrest until he came before the magistrate. It is a curious feature of this case that the arrest and the subsequent proceedings were carried out with what must have seemed to any man unskilled in the law to be a careful attention to all the requisite formalities. The appellants did not omit to charge the respondent at the time of his arrest.

They charged him, in due form, with an offence which, as the appellant, Christie, admittedly knew, did not justify the arrest. They cautioned him when he was arrested, and I must assume, in the absence of evidence as to the words used, that the form prescribed by the Judges' Rules was followed, and that he was asked the question: "Do you wish to say anything in answer to the charge?"

The caution was twice repeated—when the police arrived with the prisoner at the police station, and again when he was taken before Sgt. Tindall, the "Bridewell sergeant." He was thus, with impressive solemnity, invited on three separate occasions to defend himself on a charge which was not the charge for which he was arrested. This repetition of a deceptive formula does not disguise the fact that the appellants wholly failed in their duty to tell him what that charge was.

The omission to tell a person who is arrested at, or within a reasonable time of, the arrest with what offence he is charged cannot be regarded as a mere irregularity. Arrest and imprisonment, without a warrant, on a charge which does not justify arrest, are unlawful and, therefore, constitute false imprisonment, whether the person making the arrest is a policeman or a private individual.

This follows in my opinion from the decision of the judges in Rex v. Curvan (15). Curvan had been arrested by a constable, without a warrant, for "insulting a man on a road." The constable was acting on a complaint which had been made to him, but the alleged offence did not, of course, justify Curvan's arrest without a warrant. He escaped, and later, one Walby, a private person, on whom the constable had called for assistance, stopped him and attempted to arrest him, threatening him with a stick. Curvan, after telling Walby that he would stab him if he did not let him go, cut him in the face with a knife. He was subsequently tried on an indictment, one count of which charged him with feloniously cutting Walby "with intent to obstruct, resist, and prevent the lawful apprehension and detainer for a certain offence, for which he was then liable by law to be apprehended and detained." He was convicted on this count. HOLROYD, J., who tried the case, reserved it for the opinion of the judges, who held "that the original arrest was illegal, and that the recaption would also have been illegal; and therefore the case would not have been murder if death had ensued, and consequently the prisoner was entitled to an acquittal." The importance of this decision for the present purpose is not so much that it strikingly demonstrates to what lengths a man may go in the defence of his liberty as that it emphasises the illegality of an arrest without a warrant on a specified charge which does not justify such an arrest. If, when a charge which does not justify arrest has been expressly made, the person charged is entitled to resist apprehension, I find it impossible to suppose that the law will hold the arrest good if it subsequently appears that the officer had in his own mind an unexpressed suspicion that a felony had been committed. The right to resist is, as I have tried to show, always limited by the duty to submit to arrest by an officer of the law even though the reason for arrest is not at once stated. Rex v. Woolmer (16) was a case in which a man's failure to observe this distinction led to his conviction and punishment for a violent attack on the watchman who was seeking to apprehend him, but, if a reason has been stated which is on the face of it insufficient to justify arrest without warrant, no man could safely defend his liberty if some other ground for the arrest, which the officer had deliberately chosen to conceal from him, could subsequently be brought forward by way of justification. The prisoner in Rex v. Curvan (15) could not properly have been convicted even if it had been proved at his trial that the constable had in his mind a reasonable suspicion that he had committed a felony.

I have already reminded your Lordships of the reluctance of the courts to accord to the officer of the law any rights or privileges which are denied to private citizens. SIR JAMES FITZJAMES STEPHEN wrote in a passage which was cited by SCOTT, L.J. ([1945] 2 All E.R. 402):

... with some few exceptions, he may be described as a private person paid to perform as a matter of duty acts which, if so minded, he might have done voluntarily: HISTORY OF THE CRIMINAL LAW, Vol. I, 494.

The learned author said further that when the police constable had made an arrest he was under precisely the same obligations as a private person, and I believe this to be a correct statement of the common law. It can hardly be maintained that it would be a mere irregularity, against which the law provides no sanction, if a private person were to arrest and detain a fellow subject without intimating to him the reason for his imprisonment, or that such a person could strengthen his position in the eye of the law by stating an inadequate reason and keeping a better one in reserve. I know of no previous case in which the police, to say nothing of private persons, have claimed a right to keep their prisoner in ignorance of the charge which he has to meet. It is worthy of note that when one Bentley was tried and convicted at the Central Criminal Court in 1850 in consequence of violent resistance which, being drunk at the time, he had offered to the constable arresting him, and it was part of his defence that the constable had not told him for what he was being arrested, TALFOURD, J., in his charge to the jury laid stress on the fact that the constable had told the prisoner "that if he went to the station he should know the charge against him": see R. v. Bentley (17).

Finally, the duty to make a definite charge against a person who has been arrested without a warrant has been impliedly affirmed by the legislature. The Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, s. 22, which replaced the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 38, provides:

(1) On a person being taken into custody for an offence without a warrant, a superintendent . . . may in any case, and shall, if it will not be practicable to bring such person before a court of summary jurisdiction within 24 hours after he was so taken into custody, inquire into the case, and, unless the offence appears to such superintendent . . . to be of a serious nature, discharge the person upon his entering into a recognisance . . .

A The offence to be inquired into is the offence for which the person has been arrested.

For these reasons I take the same view of the law as that which has been more concisely expressed by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, and I agree with him that the arrest of the respondent and his detention down to the time when he was first brought before a magistrate were unlawful, and that he is entitled to recover damages for false imprisonment in respect of them.

B I have not so far dealt with the "second imprisonment" referred to in the order of the Court of Appeal. In my opinion, the appellant, Christie, was justified in detaining the respondent from the time of his acquittal on the charge under the Liverpool Corporation Act until the Leicester police took him into custody. This seems to me to be plain, in the light of the admitted facts, on the principle stated in Beckwith v. Philby (13) which I have already cited. Christie said in his evidence that he had almost immediately told the respondent the true ground of this detention. The respondent was not asked whether he had been so informed, partly because of the state of the unamended pleadings when he first went into the witness-box, and partly, no doubt, because STABLE, J., expressed the view that the matter was irrelevant. I think, however, that there is no reason to doubt that Christie's evidence on this point was true, and I did not understand counsel for the respondent to challenge its accuracy. The only question which remains is whether Mr. Leachinsky ought to have been allowed to leave the court by another exit, and not directed to go immediately into confinement, and it is suggested that what was done was tantamount to an arrest in the face of the court, and was thus unlawful on the authority of COMYN'S DIGEST (Imprisonment, H. 5). If Mr. Leachinsky had gone out by the door of the court he would, and could lawfully, have been at once arrested, so that on any view he could not be said to have suffered serious damage by the alleged irregularity. I am of opinion, however, that, although it is, no doubt, undesirable, speaking generally, that an arrest should be made in court, such an arrest, while it might well be a contempt of court in certain circumstances, will not, if in other respects justified, give rise to an action for damages unless, indeed, the person arrested is one who has a duty to be in court (as, for instance counsel, solicitor, or witness) when different considerations may apply. The authorities cited in COMYN'S DIGEST all deal with arrest in execution of civil process, and, even if it be right to regard this as an immaterial distinction they do not seem to me to assist the respondent.

F In the result, I think that this appeal fails on the main issue, although the order of the Court of Appeal will require modification in respect of the "second imprisonment." I must add, however, that, although I agree in the result with the judgment of SCOTT, L.J., on the main issue, I must not be taken to approve all the statements of the law which it contains. Some of these statements will be seen, I think, to be inconsistent with the view of the law which I have stated, but it is right that I should deal particularly with two of them. First, if, as I think, the Lord Justice intended to lay down that the charge must be specifically and precisely formulated, without "duplicity" in the technical sense of that word, at the time of arrest, I think that his view is contrary to authority and much too strict. If it were right, it would put great difficulties in the way not only of the police but of private persons who felt it to be their duty to make an arrest on suspicion. It is, moreover, manifestly contrary to what was decided by the judges in Rex v. Ford (7), a case in which the charge was most inaptly stated at the time of arrest. Ford violently resisted arrest, and his defence that he was not charged with any legal offence did not avail him. The judges held that, although the charge was defective, this defect was immaterial, and "that it was not necessary the charge should contain the same accurate description of the offence as an indictment." Secondly, I think that the observations of the Lord Justice as to the impropriety of arresting on a minor charge a man suspected of murder may be understood in a sense which the Lord Justice cannot, I think, have intended them to bear. If all that the Lord Justice means is that the police have no right to arrest a man suspected of murder on a minor charge solely in order to prevent his escape, and with no belief in or reasonable suspicion of his guilt on that minor charge, then I think that his opinion is plainly right. If, however, his words are to be taken to mean that it is wrong to arrest such a suspect on a minor charge, itself of such a nature as to justify arrest without a warrant, of which the police believe him to be guilty, when their real or principal motive is to prevent his escape from justice, and that in such a case arrest and detention on the minor charge would constitute false imprisonment, I must say, with great respect, that this seems to me to be a highly questionable proposition. I concur in the motion which is about to be proposed from the Woolsack.

VISCOUNT SIMON: My Lords, LORD MACMILLAN, who is not able to be present today, authorises me to say that he concurs in the opinions which have been expressed in this case.

WATT (OR THOMAS) v. THOMAS

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Simon, Lord Thankerton, Lord Macmillan, Lord Simonds and Lord du Parcq), November 18, 19, 21, 22, 25, 26, 1946, March 25, 1947.]

Practice—Appeal—Judge without jury—Question of fact—Principles on which court acts.

Where a question of fact has been tried by a judge without a jury, and there is no question of misdirection of himself by the judge, an appellate court which is disposed to come to a different conclusion on the evidence should not do so unless it is satisfied that any advantage enjoyed by the trial judge by reason of having seen and heard the witnesses could not be sufficient to explain or justify the judge's conclusion. The appellate court may take the view that, without having seen or heard the witnesses, it is not in a position to come to any satisfactory conclusion on the printed evidence. The appellate court, either because the reasons given by the trial judge are not satisfactory, or because it unmistakably so appears from the evidence, may be satisfied that he has not taken proper advantage of his having seen and heard the witnesses, and the matter will then become at large for the appellate court.

On a petition for divorce by the husband on the ground of his wife's cruelty the Lord Ordinary refused to grant a decree. The Second Division of the Court of Session reversed the decision of the Lord Ordinary, the judge whose opinion formed the judgment of the court repeatedly refusing to accept the opinion of the Lord Ordinary on the evidence, resulting from an assessment of its value which must have been materially affected by the appearance of the witnesses and the way in which they gave their evidence. On appeal to the House of Lords:—

HELD (VISCOUNT SIMON dissenting): without having seen or heard the witnesses the House was not in a position to come to any satisfactory conclusion on the printed evidence; there was no justification for rejecting the views of the Lord Ordinary, and the duty of an appellate court in regard to the decision of a judge sitting without a jury on a question of fact, when there was no misdirection, had been misconceived or disregarded; and the appeal should, therefore, be allowed.

Qu.: how far the risk of retaliation by the injured spouse is a relevant consideration in proceedings for divorce founded on cruelty.

D APPEAL by the wife from a judgment of the Second Division of the Court of Session (the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK (COOPER), LORD MACKAY and LORD STEVENSON), dated Dec. 5, 1945, and reported 1946 S.C. 81, reversing the decision of the Lord Ordinary (LORD PATRICK), dated Aug. 17, 1945, who refused to grant to the husband a decree of divorce on the ground of the wife's cruelty. The facts appear in the opinion of VISCOUNT SIMON.

L. Hill Watson, K.C., and J. A. Crawford (both of the Scottish Bar) for the wife.

E Hector McKechnie, K.C., and W. E. R. Hendry (both of the Scottish Bar) for the husband.

The House took time for consideration.

Mar. 25. VISCOUNT SIMON: My Lords, this is the wife's appeal from a judgment of the Second Division of the Court of Session (LORD JUSTICE-CLERK COOPER, LORD MACKAY, and LORD STEVENSON), reversing the decision of the LORD ORDINARY (LORD PATRICK), who refused to grant to the husband a decree of divorce on the ground of his wife's cruelty. The main ground for this reversal was that the members of the Court of Session took a different view from that of the Lord Ordinary of the facts as disclosed by the evidence given at the original hearing, and of the inferences properly to be drawn therefrom. The reasons for taking this different view are set out in an elaborate opinion delivered by LORD MACKAY. The main question, therefore, which the House has to determine is whether there is sufficient justification for reversing the conclusion reached by the Lord Ordinary.

G Before entering on an examination of the testimony at the trial, I desire to make some observations as to the circumstances in which an appellate court may be justified in taking a different view on facts from that of a trial judge. For convenience, I use English terms, but the same principles apply to appeals in Scotland. H Apart from the classes of case in which the powers of the Court of Appeal are limited to deciding a question of law (e.g., on a Case Stated or on an appeal under the County Courts Acts) an appellate court has, of course, jurisdiction to review the record of the evidence in order to determine whether the conclusion originally reached on that evidence should stand, but this jurisdiction has to be exercised with caution. If there is no evidence to support a particular conclusion (and this is really a question of law), the appellate court will not hesitate so to decide, but if the evidence as a whole can reasonably be regarded as justifying the conclusion arrived at at the trial, and especially if that conclusion has been arrived at on conflicting testimony by a tribunal which saw and heard the witnesses, the appellate court will bear in mind that it has not enjoyed this opportunity and that the view of the trial judge as to where credibility lies is entitled to great weight. This is not to say that the judge of first instance can be treated as infallible in determining which side is telling the truth or is refraining from exaggeration. Like other tribunals, he may go wrong on a question of fact, but it is a cogent circumstance that a judge of first instance, when estimating the value of verbal testimony, has the advantage (which is denied to courts of appeal) of having the witnesses before him and observing the manner in which their evidence is given. What I have just said reproduces in effect the view previously expressed in this House, e.g., by VISCOUNT SANKEY in Powell and Wife v. Streatham Manor Nursing Home (1) ([1935] A.C. 250), and in earlier cases there quoted. LORD GREENE, M.R., admirably states the limitations to be observed in the course of his judgment in Yuill v. Yuill (2) ([1945] 1 All E.R. 184). LORD PRESIDENT CLYDE, in Dunn v. Dunn (3) (1930 S.C. 144) summarised the scope of appellate correction, with copious citation of earlier authority, and I agree with him that the true rule is that expounded by LORD PRESIDENT INGLIS in Kinnell v. Peebles (4) (R. (Ct. of Sess.) 423), that a court of appeal should "attach the greatest weight to the opinion of the judge who saw the witnesses and heard their evidence," and, consequently, should not disturb a judgment of fact unless they are satisfied that it is unsound. It not infrequently happens that a preference for A.'s evidence over the contrasted evidence of B. is due to inferences from other conclusions reached in the judge's mind rather than from an unfavourable view of B.'s veracity as such. In such cases it is legitimate for an appellate tribunal to examine the grounds of these other conclusions and the inferences drawn from them, if the materials admit of this, and, if the appellate tribunal is convinced that these inferences are erroneous and that the rejection of B.'s evidence was due to the error, it will be justified in taking a different view of the value of B.'s evidence. I would only add that the decision of an appellate court whether or not to reverse conclusions of fact reached by the judge at the trial must naturally be affected by the nature and circumstances of the case under consideration.

What I have said applies to appeals from a judge sitting alone. Conclusions of fact embodied in the verdict of a jury cannot be subjected to the same degree of re-examination, for the course of reasoning by which the verdict has been reached is not disclosed, and, consequently, the verdict of a jury on fact must stand if there was any evidence to support it and if the conclusion is one at which a reasonable jury, when properly directed, might reasonably arrive.

I now turn to the evidence in the present case. The parties were married on Feb. 27, 1927, and have two children—Lornie born in Mar., 1928, and Maurice born in August, 1931. It is an important fact that the family home was a house at Alyth which belonged to the wife. There husband and wife lived together with a fair degree of happiness till the latter half of 1939, when relations began to deteriorate—the wife says because her husband showed too much attention to a lady employed in his business and named Miss Margaret Stewart. By Sept., 1939, the situation was that the wife deeply resented this friendship and insisted that it should cease, while the husband valued Miss Stewart's services to his business and regarded his wife's attitude as quite unreasonable.

[HIS LORDSHIP said that the wife's jealousy developed into an obsession. Scenes occurred during one of which she kicked her husband. When he insisted that she must occupy a separate room for sleeping that his rest should not be broken, she constantly disturbed him by getting up in the night and banging the doors in the house. He, on his side, reacted to her reproaches by maintaining silence. During 1940 she repeatedly insisted that he should leave the house altogether, and hand over his key to her. Finally, on Sept. 7, she came to his room early in the morning to tell him to "clear out," demanding the house-key and threatening to "split his head open" if he stayed. The wife did not deny that she made this threat. Later in the day, while he was shaving upstairs in the bathroom, she again lost control of herself, came to the door to demand the house-key, abused Miss Stewart without getting any answer from him, and finally carried out her threat by striking him on the side of the head. There was plenty of corroboration that the assault was serious. There was evidence from a specialist in nervous diseases and the family doctor that the husband's subsequent condition was consistent with his having been treated as he alleged, and that it would be dangerous for him to resume married life under such conditions. HIS LORDSHIP continued :—] While not subscribing to all the strictures made on the Lord Ordinary's opinion by LORD MACKAY, I have come to the conclusion that the Second Division was right in recalling the interlocutor and that the decree of divorce thus granted should stand.

- The Lord Ordinary had to deal with two issues :—(1) Had the husband
A proved the wife's cruelty ? (2) If he had, was there, nevertheless, any adequate reason disentitling him to a decree of dissolution of the marriage ? The wife's cruelty, in the necessary sense, was in my opinion clearly proved. I do not think there is any material difference between the law of England and that of Scotland as to the general nature of the ill-treatment which may constitute cruelty in a matrimonial cause. LORD BROUGHAM, in Paterson v. Paterson (5) (3 H.L. Cas. 308) asserted the substantial identity of the conception in the two countries. It is, generally speaking, conduct of such a character as to cause
B danger to life, limb or health (whether of body or of mind) or as to give rise to a reasonable apprehension of such danger, but the leading judicial authorities in both countries who have dealt with this subject are careful not to speak in too precise and absolute terms, for the circumstances which might conceivably arise in an unhappy married life are infinitely various. LORD STOWELL, for
C example, in Evans v. Evans (6) (1 Hag. Cons. 37, 38) avoids giving a "direct definition" while insisting that "mere austerity of temper, petulance of manners, rudeness of language, want of civil attention and accommodation, even occasional sallies of passion, if they do not threaten bodily harm, do not amount to legal cruelty." Again, LORD DAVEY in Russell v. Russell (7) ([1897] A.C. 468), points out that the courts have declined "to lay down any hard and fast definition of legal cruelty," but none the less concurred with the majority
D of the House in affirming that the principle acted on is that of "giving protection to the complaining spouse against actual or apprehended violence, physical ill-treatment, or injury to health." The same principle is recognised as governing the concept of saevitia in Scots law : see FRASER ON HUSBAND AND WIFE 2nd ed., vol. 2, pp. 788-900. There is, indeed, one difference which is suggested to exist at the present time between the law of England and the law of Scotland as regards the right to divorce on the ground of the cruelty of the other spouse.
E Before the Scottish Act of 1938, the only remedy for such cruelty was an action of separation, and for such an action to succeed in Scotland it was not enough to rely on past acts of cruelty, for judicial separation was "considered as belonging to the department of preventive police" (FRASER ON HUSBAND AND WIFE, 2nd ed., vol. 2, p. 877), and the court intervened only when its order was needed for the future protection of the pursuer. Thus, in Graham v. Graham (8),
F which was a case in which a wife complained of the past cruelties of her husband, LORD PRESIDENT INGLIS observed (5 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 1095) that the true issue was "whether the wife can with safety to person and health live with him now." LORD ASHMORE's decision in Adair v. Adair (9) was to the same effect. It is, I think, questionable whether, on the proper construction of the Act of 1938, this consideration of the prospect of future danger to the pursuer is relevant, but I do not find it necessary in the present
G case to reach a decision on the point. There was undisputed medical evidence that, in view of the husband's condition after the assault of Sept. 7 and of the wife's pathological state, there was danger for the future. The definition of the nature of cruelty is unchanged by the Act, and what is here involved is not the meaning of the expression, but the conditions attached to the remedy. As long as the remedy was separation without dissolution of marriage, it is easy to understand how the Scottish courts came to refuse the remedy if there was H no reason to suppose that the cruelty might be repeated, but when Parliament authorises a decree of dissolution on the ground that the defender "has been guilty" of cruelty, defined as it was defined for the purposes of separation, it seems difficult to introduce as a necessary condition that further cruelty must be apprehended, though this was necessary if the remedy of separation was being sought. This view appears to me to be strengthened by the terms of s. 4 of the Act. In England, at any rate, it has been held by the Court of Appeal that under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (where, however, the words differ from those used in the Scottish Act) a decree of dissolution on the ground of cruelty is based on past behaviour, and that there is no condition that the decree should be withheld "unless there is also a reasonable fear that further acts of cruelty will be committed" (Meacher v. Meacher (10)).

I do not see how a deliberate blow on the head, delivered after a threat of such an assault if he did not give up the house-key, and leading to the condition described by Dr. Paris, can—even if standing alone—be dismissed as not constituting legal cruelty: see Dawson v. Dawson (11). If the assault alleged to have occurred a year before is disregarded or excused, there is still also the persistent banging of doors at night which, even if the frequency of this performance is exaggerated, is admitted by the wife to have occurred and was a wanton disturbance of his sleep contributing to his nervous debility. The Lord Ordinary's main reason for refusing the decree seems to be, not that the wife did not in Sept., 1940, treat her husband with cruelty, but that he deserved all he got. He says: "In my opinion, he has no good reason to complain of what happened to him after Aug., 1939," i.e., after motoring Miss Stewart to the Highland show and annoying his wife by the suggestion that the lady should be included in a family excursion to Bournemouth. However reprehensible or inconsiderate was his behaviour down to Aug., 1939, or later, I cannot regard this as excusing the assault of Sept., 1940, especially as Miss Stewart left the husband's service and finally passed from the scene in the previous July. It is deplorable that this degree of mutual friction and discord should have existed between them, but I cannot regard the behaviour of the husband in this case as having "provoked" the assault of Sept. 7 in any relevant sense—in the sense in which a husband's shortcomings in relation to his wife may sometimes disentitle him to a decree for adultery or desertion. Neither can the husband's right to a decree for cruelty be denied on the ground of the wife's pathological condition which was producing increased nervous irritability. I conclude, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed. In the view I take, it is not necessary to pronounce on the correctness of decisions such as Main v. Main (12), and Forth v. Forth (13), where one of the considerations supporting the decree for relief was that otherwise the complaining party might be tempted to retaliate. It is due to the husband to say that neither his pleadings nor his evidence suggest that he might be provoked to do so.

LORD THANKERTON: My Lords, for the first time in Scotland cruelty was made a ground of dissolution of marriage by s. 1 (1) (c) of the Divorce (Scotland) Act, 1938, which provided as follows:

1. (1) Without prejudice to the power of the court to grant decree of divorce on the ground of adultery, it shall be competent for the court to grant decree of divorce on any of the following grounds, that is to say, that the defender— . . . (c) has been guilty of such cruelty towards the pursuer as would justify, according to the law and practice existing at the passing of this Act, the granting of a decree of separation a mensa et thoro.

I agree with my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack that, under the law and practice then existing, apart from the question of the quality of saevitia or cruelty, the court treated the matter as one of future protection for the complaining spouse, and that past acts of cruelty were only relevant in estimating future risks. It may well be open to argument that the Act of 1938 only imports the pre-existing law and practice as regards the quality of the cruelty required to be established, but does not retain the consideration of future risks. It is not necessary to consider that question for the purposes of the present appeal, and I, therefore, reserve it for future consideration, and express no opinion on it.

My Lords, I am of opinion that LORD MACKAY, whose opinion formed the judgment of the Second Division, has misconceived or disregarded the duty of an appellate court in regard to the decision of a judge, sitting without a jury, on a question of fact (when there is no misdirection), which has so repeatedly been laid down in your Lordships' House in cases from England and Scotland alike. The only suggestion by LORD MACKAY of the Lord Ordinary having misdirected himself was as to onus of proof, but the Lord Ordinary, quite rightly, makes no reference to onus of proof, for, as has often been pointed out, no question of burden of proof as a determining factor of the case arises on a concluded proof, except in so far as the court is ultimately unable to come to a definite conclusion on the evidence, or some part of it, and the question will arise as to which party has to suffer thereby. The Lord Ordinary came to a definite conclusion on the evidence, and no question of onus did, or could, arise: Robins v. National Trust Co. (14) ([1927] A.C., per LORD DUNEDIN, 520). I do not find it necessary to review the many decisions of this House, for it seems to me that the principle embodied therein is a simple one, and may be stated thus:—

I. Where a question of fact has been tried by a judge without a jury and there is no question of misdirection of himself by the judge, an appellate court which is disposed to come to a different conclusion on the printed evidence should not do so unless it is satisfied that any advantage enjoyed by the trial judge by reason of having seen and heard the witnesses could not be sufficient to explain or justify the trial judge's conclusion.

II. The appellate court may take the view that, without having seen or heard the witnesses, it is not in a position to come to any satisfactory conclusion on the printed evidence.

III. The appellate court, either because the reasons given by the trial judge are not satisfactory, or because it unmistakably so appears from the evidence, may be satisfied that he has not taken proper advantage of his having seen and heard the witnesses, and the matter will then become at large for the appellate court.

It is obvious that the value and importance of having seen and heard the witnesses will vary according to the class of case, and, it may be, the individual case in question. It will hardly be disputed that consistorial cases form a class in which it is generally most important to see and hear the witnesses, and particularly the spouses themselves, and, further, within that class, cases of alleged cruelty will afford an even stronger example of such an advantage. Normally, the cruelty is alleged to have occurred within the family establishment, and the physique, temperament, standard of culture, habits of verbal expression and of action, and the interaction between the spouses in their daily life, cannot be adequately judged except by seeing and hearing them in the witness box. The law has no footrule by which to measure the personalities of the spouses. In cases such as the present it will be almost invariably found that a divided household promotes partisanship, and it is difficult to get unbiased evidence.

It may be well to quote the passage from the opinion of LORD SHAW in Clarke v. Edinburgh & District Tramways Co. (15) (1919 S.C. (H.L.), 37), which was quoted with approval by LORD SANKEY, L.C., in Powell v. Streatham Manor Nursing Home (1) ([1935] A.C. 250). LORD SHAW said:

In my opinion, the duty of an appellate court in those circumstances is for each judge to put it to himself, as I now do in this case, the question, Am I—who sit here without those advantages, sometimes broad and sometimes subtle, which are the privilege of the judge who heard and tried the case—in a position, not having those privileges, to come to a clear conclusion that the judge who had them was plainly wrong? If I cannot be satisfied in my own mind that the judge with those privileges was plainly wrong, then it appears to me to be my duty to defer to his judgment.

LORD SHAW had already pointed out that these privileges involved more than questions of credibility. He said (ibid., 36):

... witnesses without any conscious bias towards a conclusion may have in their demeanour, in their manner, in their hesitation, in the nuance of their expressions, in even the turns of the eyelid, left an impression upon the man who saw and heard them which can never be reproduced on the printed page.

I may add that, after it became usual to have the printed transcript of the evidence in place of the judge's notes, it was argued in at least one case that, having the verbatim transcript of the evidence, the matter was more at large for the appellate court, but it is undoubted that the principle has not been relaxed—if, indeed, it has not been tightened—by the later decisions. I am aware that this contention was put forward in Kilpatrick v. Dunlop (16). In reference to this contention LORD HALSBURY says (1916 S.C. 632 n):

I am unable to determine one thing or the other, namely, whether the appellant or respondent was worthy of credit. It is a question of credit, where each gives a perfectly coherent account of what he has done and said, and contradicts the other. Under these circumstances it is impossible that the Court of Appeal should take upon itself to say, by simply reading printed and written evidence, which is right, when it has not had that decisive test of hearing the verbal evidence and seeing the witnesses, which the judge had who had to determine the question of fact, and to determine which story to believe.

In other words, whereas you might formerly find in the judge's notes some indication of the impression made on his mind by the witnesses, no trace of any such impression is to be found in the cold, mechanical, record of the evidence.

As regards the third proposition that I have ventured to express, an illustration of it will be found in the decision of this House in Hvalfangerselskapet Polaris A-S v. Unilever, Ltd. (17), which is fully referred to by LORD GREENE, M.R., in Yuill v. Yuill (2), and would also appear to illustrate the same proposition. I do not pause to consider whether the decision of the First Division of the Court of Session in Dunn v. Dunn's Trustees (3) can be similarly justified, but I cannot accept LORD PRESIDENT CLYDE's conclusion after a review of many of the authorities (1930 S.C. 145). I think his expressed feeling that he might be underestimating the "significance of the constant and increasing insistence by the House of Lords on the 'privileges' of the judge of first instance" was justified. LORD CLYDE laid stress on the dictum of LORD PRESIDENT INGLIS in Kinnell v. Peebles (4) (17 R. (Ct. of Sess.), 424), but, in my opinion, that dictum is not inconsistent with the decisions of this House, for the reasons stated by LORD SKERRINGTON in Maguire v. M'Neil (Charles), Ltd. (18) (1922 S.C. 189), to which LORD PRESIDENT CLYDE does not refer in Dunn's case (3), although he took part in its decision.

My Lords, I am clearly of opinion that this present case falls under the second of my propositions, for I am satisfied, with all respect to my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, that I am not in a position, without enjoying the advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses, of coming to a satisfactory conclusion on the printed evidence. Point is given to this by an opening comment in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary:

As in most of these cases, the evidence of the parties is not altogether to be relied on. Partisanship, brooding over their wrongs or fancied wrongs, has coloured and distorted their recollection. In addition I think that at times they have both been guilty of deliberate misstatement. Where they contradict each other on any issue of fact it is necessary to choose the version which accords best with the proved history of their relations with one another.

LORD MACKAY repeatedly declines to accept the opinion of the Lord Ordinary on the evidence, resulting from an assessment of its value, which must have been materially affected by the appearance of the witnesses and the way in which they gave their evidence. I can find no justification for rejecting the views of the Lord Ordinary. LORD MACKAY even declines to accept the evidence of John Watt, whom the Lord Ordinary accepted as a witness of truth and accuracy. In view of his misconception as to his duty as an appellate judge, I find it unnecessary to consider the various criticisms, including certain inaccuracies, to which LORD MACKAY's opinion has been subjected. It is enough for me that I am satisfied that he could not have formed a satisfactory opinion without having seen and heard the witnesses, let alone his not having found that the Lord Ordinary's opinion could not be explained or justified by his having seen and heard the witnesses.

It is right that I should illustrate the difficulty that I feel in forming a satisfactory opinion without having seen and heard the witnesses by a reference to two of the crucial incidents in the case, namely, the incident of Saturday, Sept. 7, 1940, and the banging of doors at night and the waking up of the husband in the autumn of 1939. As regards the former incident, the husband's story—according to his diary—was that, while shaving, the wife pushed and kicked him and knocked him twice into the bath, and that he had to go to the doctor suffering with his ears. In the witness box the kicks disappeared and, instead of being knocked twice into the bath, he stated he had put his foot into the bath to preserve his balance. There is really no evidence to prove that the box on the ear was a serious one. There is no evidence of external bruising or laceration, and it is notorious that a very slight blow—especially on an ear inclined to delicacy—may produce unexpected internal inflammation. I think that the Lord Ordinary's view that this incident was not such as to lead the husband to fear that his health or life was in danger, which was evidently based largely on his observation of the witnesses, is not open to exception.

The same remark applies to the banging of doors at night and the waking up of the husband by the wife in the autumn of 1939. The Lord Ordinary took the view that these occurrences were exaggerated, and he accepted the wife's story that it happened at times owing to insomnia and a feeling of loneliness. As regards both these matters I am not in a position to assess the value of the evidence without having seen and heard the witnesses.

I desire to add that, having in view the opinion formed by the Lord Ordinary of the evidence, I am of opinion that he was justified in his strictures on the conduct of the husband towards the wife, for he neglected the duty of mutual forbearance and help when she was in a nervous and irritable condition, which his merely negative attitude was calculated to enhance. For the same reason, his persistent attitude as to Margaret Stewart was inexcusable, and the departure of the latter in July, 1940, could not be expected to remove from the wife's mind and outlook the unfortunate results of that attitude.

I am, accordingly, of opinion that there is no justification for interference with the decision of the Lord Ordinary, but there is one further matter on which I feel bound to make some observations, although it does not appear to affect the present case very closely. I refer to the second part of a dictum of LORD RUSSELL in an Outer House case, Main v. Main (12) (1945 S.C. 471), of which LORD MACKAY has expressed approval in this case, namely,

It appears to be well settled that conduct which would amount to cruelty if practised by a husband towards his wife will equally amount to cruelty if practised by a wife towards her husband; and that in the latter case it is relevant to consider the interests of the wife in relation to the question whether her conduct may be likely to endanger her own safety by provoking her husband to retaliate: see FRASER ON HUSBAND AND WIFE, 2nd ed., vol. 2, p. 906; WALTON ON HUSBAND AND WIFE, 2nd ed., p. 79.

The case in which LORD RUSSELL made that statement was Main v. Main (12) (1945 S.C. 471). In Duffy v. Duffy (19), decided by the Second Division on Nov. 1, 1946, LORD MACKAY repeated his approval of LORD RUSSELL's dictum. The Lord Justice-Clerk and LORD STEVENSON concurred with LORD MACKAY generally, but LORD JAMIESON doubted whether the wife's safety was a relevant consideration in an action founded on her cruelty.

The passage in FRASER ON HUSBAND AND WIFE, 2nd ed., vol. 2, p. 906, is as follows:

In such a case, where the husband asks for judicial separation, the question is not simply whether the husband's safety is endangered; but the court will also consider the interests of the wife, and whether her conduct may not endanger her safety by provoking the husband to retaliate.

The only authority cited by the author for this assertion is a dictum to that effect by SIR JAMES P. WILDE, JUDGE ORDINARY, in Forth v. Forth (13) (36 L.J.P. & M. 122). The learned author had already described judicial separation as belonging to the department of preventive police for the protection of the injured spouse, and I know of no warrant for incorporating in the law of Scotland this dictum of an English judge. Until LORD RUSSELL took notice of it there is no trace of its having been accepted by the Scottish courts. It is not correct to describe it as well settled in the law of Scotland, and I may add that it appears to have long since lapsed into obscurity in England. It is interesting to note that in Nisbet v. Nisbet (20), which is stated in WALTON ON HUSBAND AND WIFE, 2nd ed., to be the only reported case of a husband's action based on the wife's cruelty, there is no mention of this doctrine, although the question of risk of retaliation was raised. The case was tried by LORD KINCAIRNEY, who said (4 S.L.T. 158):

It may be that the pursuer is able to take care of himself, but he could only protect himself from his wife's violence by retaliation, and his mere ability to retaliate cannot disentitle him to decree of separation.

This risk of retaliation by the husband may well be relevant in assessing the degree and quality of the wife's cruelty in an action by him, and I am unable to see why it might not also arise in a wife's action as relevant to the degree and quality of the husband's cruelty, for there may well be cases where the wife could protect herself by retaliation.

On the whole matter, accordingly, I propose that the appeal should be allowed, that the interlocutor of the Second Division, with the exception of the decerniture as to expenses, should be recalled, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be restored. The husband should pay the wife's costs of the appeal.

LORD MACMILLAN (read by LORD THANKERTON) : My Lords, a court of law provides at the best but an imperfect instrument for the determination of the rights and wrongs of the most personal and intimate of all human relationships, that of husband and wife. No outsider, however impartial, can enter fully into its subtle intricacies of feeling and conduct, but when a case involving such questions arises the court must do its best to judge dispassionately between the parties, though it may sometimes be left with a doubt whether, with the imperfect means at its disposal, it has achieved perfect justice, especially where the evidence is widely conflicting. The case now before the House provides a typical example of the difficulties I have indicated, but it is also a typical case for the application of the well-established rule defining the proper approach of an appellate court to the consideration of a decision on fact by the court of first instance, a rule which, in my opinion, is of special force in matrimonial disputes.

The appellate court had before it only the printed record of the evidence. Were that the whole evidence it might be said that the appellate judges were entitled and qualified to reach their own conclusion upon the case, but it is only part of the evidence. What is lacking is evidence of the demeanour of the witnesses, their candour or their partisanship, and all the incidental elements so difficult to describe which make up the atmosphere of an actual trial. This assistance the trial judge possesses in reaching his conclusion but it is not available to the appellate court. So far as the case stands on paper, it not infrequently happens that a decision either way may seem equally open. When this is so, and it may be said of the present case, then the decision of the trial judge, who has enjoyed advantages not available to the appellate court, becomes of paramount importance and ought not to be disturbed. This is not an abrogation of the powers of a court of appeal on questions of fact. The judgment of the trial judge on the facts may be demonstrated on the printed evidence to be affected by material inconsistencies and inaccuracies, or he may be shown to have failed to appreciate the weight or bearing of circumstances admitted or proved, or otherwise to have gone completely wrong.

But I need not pursue this topic which has been so fully expounded in many cases in this House and today again by my noble and learned friends who have preceded me. It is sufficient for me to say that agreeing with LORD THANKERTON in all that he has said, I do not find in the opinion of LORD MACKAY, which embodies the views of the Second Division of the Court of Session, or in the criticism to which the judgment of the Lord Ordinary was subjected at your Lordships' Bar, any adequate justification for reversing the decision which the Lord Ordinary reached. If the case on the printed evidence leaves the facts in balance, as it may be fairly said to do, then the rule enunciated in this House applies and brings the balance down on the side of the trial judge. I would only add that I also expressly reserve my opinion on the question whether under the Act of 1938 the pursuer who seeks divorce on the ground of cruelty is bound to prove reasonable apprehension of a recurrence of the cruelty. I, accordingly, concur in the motion that the appeal be allowed.

LORD SIMONDS : My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the opinions of my learned and noble friends, VISCOUNT SIMON and LORD THANKERTON, in this case. At the conclusion of the hearing I had formed the clear opinion that this appeal must be allowed and, though I distrust my own judgment when it differs from that of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, yet, having, after an appreciable interval, reviewed the case, I must adhere to my opinion and am happy that in doing so I find myself at one with my noble and learned friend, LORD THANKERTON with whose judgment I am in entire concurrence.

On the appeal, so far as it raises a question of law in regard to saevitia as a ground of divorce in the law of Scotland, I do not think it necessary to add anything to what has already been said, but it was mainly on the question of fact that this appeal was brought and on this I would add a few words. From time to time this House has propounded the principles on which an appellate court should review the findings of fact of a judge sitting without a jury, and, if I may respectfully say so, I am well content to accept what has fallen from both my learned and noble friends upon this matter. I would, in particular, say that I concur in the three propositions stated by my noble and learned friend, LORD THANKERTON. In my opinion, whatever may be the correct way of stating the principle, the learned judges of the Second Division were not justified in taking a different view of the facts of this case from that taken by the Lord Ordinary. In fact, they did so, and, recalling his interlocutor, granted a decree of divorce to the respondent to this appeal.

- A My Lords, the husband sought a decree of divorce from the wife on the ground of her cruelty to him. The evidence was heard on four days and fills nearly 400 pages of type-script. Witnesses included husband and wife, his and her relations, doctors and a maidservant. At the end of it all the Lord Ordinary, in a reserved judgment in which he carefully reviewed the evidence, stated with complete accuracy the question involved in the suit. In it, also, there is a clear recognition of the fact that the picture of the domestic lives of this man and woman must be surveyed as a whole, before a true judgment can be formed of their possible future relations. I then ask on what the judges of the Second Division founded which led them to reverse the decision of the Lord Ordinary.
- B My Lords, I must venture to say with all deference that they appear to me to have disregarded the principles laid down in this House for the guidance of courts of appellate jurisdiction where the appeal is against a finding of fact by a lower court.

- C Applying those principles to this case I am satisfied that an appellate court, having none of those advantages which the trial judge enjoyed of hearing and observing the witnesses, was not justified in concluding that he was so clearly wrong that their judgment of fact should be substituted for his. I concur in the motion that the appeal be allowed.

- D LORD DU PARCQ : My Lords, at the conclusion of the arguments of counsel I was left with a clear conviction that the recalling of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was not justified either by the reasoning of LORD MACKAY or on the grounds submitted for your Lordships' consideration at the Bar. Since then, I have had the privilege of reading in print the opinions of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack and of my noble and learned friend, LORD THANKERTON, and seeing that they have arrived at differing conclusions, I have felt bound to give further consideration to the evidence. Having done so, I am confirmed in the opinion which I had at first formed, and thus find myself in agreement with my noble and learned friend, LORD THANKERTON.

- E If it be right to say that there is no difference between the law of Scotland and the law of England for the present purpose, it may be argued that the Lord Ordinary attached undue importance to the fact that, if the parties were to come together again, there was no reasonable apprehension of danger to the pursuer's life or health. I have considered the Lord Ordinary's findings and his reasons on the assumption that the law to be applied in the present case does not differ from that of England, and, having made that assumption, I am satisfied that his decision would have been the same, and rightly so, if he had conceived himself to be bound by precisely the same principles which guide the English courts. It is unnecessary, therefore, to decide today whether any difference now exists between the principles applicable in the two countries in a case where it is sought to dissolve a marriage on the ground of cruelty.
- F

- G I was a party to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Yuill v. Yuill (2) to which my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack has referred. I am happy that it should meet with approval in this House and I agree with my noble friend's statement of the result of earlier cases. All the authoritative decisions which relate to the proper attitude of an appellate court towards the findings of fact of the trial judge naturally tend to lay emphasis on one aspect of the question, either on the fact that the appellate court's duty to see justice done may constrain it to reject the judge's findings, or on the undesirability of deciding a case on a written record against the view of the judge who heard the witnesses, but, though one aspect may be emphasized, the other must always be present to the mind of the court. Thus, in Yuill v. Yuill (2), where the decision of the judge was reversed, LORD GREENE, M.R., said ([1945] 1 All E.R. 188) :
- H

It can, of course, only be on the rarest occasions, and in circumstances where the appellate court is convinced by the plainest considerations, that it would be justified in finding that the trial judge had formed a wrong opinion.

My Lords, I am satisfied that this is not one of those very rare occasions. There are, no doubt, cases in which it is proper to say, after reading the printed record, that, after making allowance for possible exaggeration and giving full weight to the judge's estimate of the witnesses, no conclusion is possible except that his decision was wrong. I can come to no such conclusion in the present case. The opinion of the Lord Ordinary, if I may respectfully say so, seems to me to be careful, wise and fair. I agree with the reasoning as well as the conclusions of my noble and learned friend, LORD THANKERTON, and concur in the motion which he has proposed.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Re TEMPLE. Ex parte THE OFFICIAL RECEIVER.
THE TRUSTEE v. OFFICIAL ASSIGNEE OF BOMBAY.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer and Roxburgh, JJ.), February 24, March 10, 1947.]

Bankruptcy—Successive bankruptcies—First bankruptcy in England—Second bankruptcy in India—Assets available after second bankruptcy—Conflict of laws—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 21 (2), s. 39 (as substituted by Bankruptcy Act, 1926 (c. 7), s. 3).

On Mar. 2, 1927, the bankrupt was adjudicated bankrupt in England and at all material times was still undischarged. In 1933 the official receiver became trustee of the estate. On Aug. 25, 1942, the bankrupt was adjudicated insolvent in Bombay, and on Nov. 20, 1945, he was discharged from that insolvency subject to a suspension of two months. In 1944 the bankrupt became entitled under the will of his mother to certain property which was duly accounted for by her executors to the official receiver.

HELD : there was no rule of law, no statutory provision, and no principle of equity which required the court to direct the transmission of the fund in question to the official assignee of the debtor in India.

Semble, if an order purporting to approve a scheme of arrangement under s. 21 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, is invalid for want of jurisdiction in the court which made it, that defect is not remedied either by the fact that there was no appeal against the order or by the further fact that some thirteen years have passed since the order was made.

[AS TO PROPERTY ACQUIRED BY BANKRUPT AFTER SECOND BANKRUPTCY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 2, p. 222, para. 291; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 4, Nos. 2344, 2345.]

APPEAL from an order of His Honour JUDGE HANCOCK, sitting in bankruptcy at Kingston County Court, whereby he adjudged that a certain sum in the hands of the official receiver as trustee in bankruptcy of the bankrupt under a bankruptcy in England should be handed over to the official assignee of the bankrupt in Bombay where the bankrupt had subsequently been adjudicated insolvent. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Aronson for the official receiver.

Bagram for the official assignee of Bombay.

ROMER, J. : This is an appeal from an order of the county court judge of the Kingston County court sitting in bankruptcy whereby he adjudged that a certain sum of £1,959 odd which is now in the hands of the appellant, who is the official receiver and the trustee in bankruptcy of the bankrupt under his English bankruptcy, to which I shall again refer, should be paid over to the respondent, who is the official assignee of the debtor in India.

The facts generally of the case may be stated from the official receiver's report of July 29, 1946, from which it appears that the bankrupt was adjudicated bankrupt in the Kingston county court on Mar. 2, 1927, and is still undischarged. His statement of affairs disclosed unsecured liabilities of £33,083 7s. 2d., and, after a dividend of 3½d. had been paid in Oct., 1933, on proofs admitted at £12,019 19s. 2d. the non-official trustee was released and the official receiver became trustee of the estate. At the date of adjudication the bankrupt was possessed of 25,000 ls. shares in Page Estates, Ltd., a company incorporated for the purpose of acting as relator to the Crown in proceedings for the recovery of escheated estates. That company never did any effective business and was dissolved on Mar. 25, 1938. On Dec. 30, 1931, a meeting of creditors convened by the then trustee was held, at which the proposal, hereinafter referred to, was approved by a large majority. To facilitate its acceptance three family creditors for £15,798 16s. 9d. agreed that their claims should be postponed to those of the other creditors. The said proposal was as follows:—(1) That a dividend estimated at 5½d., but which was, in fact, only 3½d., should be paid out of assets other than the said 25,000 shares. (2) That a company to be known as Richard Durand Temple Trust, Ltd., should be registered by the then trustee with a nominal capital of £100 with which said sum the bankrupt's said 25,000 shares should be bought. (3) That Richard Durand Temple Trust, Ltd., should issue to the bankrupt's creditors redeemable notes providing for the payment of the balance of their claims plus interest at 4% per annum "such notes not to be redeemable until they (i.e., Richard Durand Temple Trust, Ltd.) should be successful in realising" the said 25,000 shares in Page Estates, Ltd. (4) That, subject to this payment, 75% of the capital of Richard Durand Temple Trust, Ltd., should be held in trust for the postponed creditors and the remaining 25% in trust for the bankrupt. By an order dated Apr. 20, 1933, made on an application by the then trustee for directions, the registrar of the county court approved the said proposal to wind up the estate in the above-mentioned manner. On Aug. 25, 1942, the bankrupt was adjudicated insolvent in the High Court of Justice, Bombay. He was discharged from that insolvency subject to a suspension of two weeks by an order of that High Court dated Nov. 20, 1945. On Sept. 10, 1943, the bankrupt's mother, Lady Agnes Fanny Temple, died. Under the terms of her will, which was proved on Feb. 8, 1944, the bankrupt became entitled to certain chattels and shares, the proceeds of which, amounting to £1,969 15s. 1d. after deducting the costs of realising these assets, have been accounted for by her executors to the official receiver, who now holds the said sum. The official receiver desires the directions of the court as to whether (1) he should pay the said sum of £1,969 15s. 1d. to the official assignee, or (2) he should distribute it rateably among all the creditors in the English bankruptcy, or (3) he should distribute it rateably among the three creditors who agreed by the said proposal that their debts should be postponed, or (4) he should distribute it rateably among the creditors other than the said three postponed creditors, or (5) he should pay it to the bankrupt. It is only necessary to add that it appears that the debtor compounded with his creditors at some time before his 1927 bankruptcy.

The debtor at some subsequent time went to India, and in Aug., 1942, while there he was adjudicated bankrupt. When the matter came before the judge of the Kingston county court on Sept. 6, 1946, there were represented before him by counsel, in addition to the official receiver and the official assignee in Bombay, the family creditors and the ordinary creditors. Having heard elaborate argument from the various parties concerned, the judge reserved his judgment, and, in a written judgment, he decided in effect, first, that the order of the registrar of Apr. 20, 1933, was an approval of a scheme for the final settlement of the debtor's affairs; secondly, that the registrar had no power to make that order; but, thirdly, as there had been no appeal from it, it should not be treated as a nullity after all these years. He, accordingly, decided that the fund should be paid over to the official assignee. There are two separate points to be decided by this court, first, as to the effect of the registrar's order of Apr. 20, 1933, and, secondly, if the effect of that order was not to terminate the bankruptcy, then what are the rights of the official receiver and the official assignee in Bombay as trustees of successive bankruptcies, the first being in the United Kingdom and the second in India.

[His LORDSHIP reviewed the facts, and referred to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 16 (5) (6) (7) (8) (9) (10) (11) (12) (13), s. 21, s. 26 (2) (3), s. 56 (7) (9), s. 79 (3), and s. 102 (1) (2) (5), and the Bankruptcy Rules, rr. 6, 7, 204, 205, and continued:] My conclusions on the first part of this case are that, if the registrar purported by his order to treat the trustee's application as an application under s. 21 and approved a scheme for winding up the estate, his order was made without jurisdiction. Secondly, such want of jurisdiction is not remedied either by the fact that there was no appeal or by the further fact that some years had passed since the order was made. It seems to me that, if the order was invalid for want of jurisdiction when it was made, it is invalid now and always has been invalid. That is on the assumption that the order was made approving a scheme of arrangement under s. 21 so as to bind dissenting creditors. An alternative view of the matter is that he was merely approving an application for directions under s. 79 (3) as to dealing with the assets which were then in his hands, in which case there would be no reason why he should not approve such a dealing with the assets existing then. I do not propose to indicate any view whether the registrar was intending to act under s. 21 or whether he was purporting to give directions under s. 79 (3). Accordingly, I come to the conclusion that, whichever he was intending to do, the first bankruptcy has never been determined and is still subsisting. It follows that, prima facie, the asset which has now fallen into the hands of the trustee is an asset in his bankruptcy.

The second point taken by counsel for the official assignee was to say, that being so and having regard to the Indian bankruptcy, the money should be handed over to the assignee in Bombay. That depends to some extent on Indian law. The provision of the law in this country dealing with successive bankruptcies is s. 39, which was introduced into the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, by s. 3 of the Act of 1926. It provides that, where there are successive bankruptcies, any property acquired by the bankrupt since he was last adjudged bankrupt shall vest in the trustee in the subsequent bankruptcy. That has, in fact, been law ever since the year 1913. It is said by counsel that he cannot rely, as I understand it, on that section itself because that section is specially referable by its terms only to bankruptcies in this country, but, he says, the law of India would follow the law of this country in that respect and it would be right for the courts of this country to recognise the claim of the official assignee in Bombay to have these assets handed over to him in the same way as, in a second bankruptcy in this country, they would have been handed over to the trustee in the second bankruptcy. I should think the question whether the law of India does, in fact, follow the law of this country in that respect is open to some question on the evidence before us. I should feel inclined to say that the onus is on the official assignee to satisfy the court on that point, as on others, and that he has failed to discharge that onus. When, however, the matter was before the county court judge, it does appear that some suggestion was made on behalf of the assignee about putting in evidence on the point, but the matter was arranged by counsel on the basis of some text book which was read. That is not a course which we can adopt if only for the reason that other parties besides those before us are interested in the case and they ought not to be bound by what might conceivably be a fallacious statement, but, even assuming that the law of India is the same as ours in this respect and that the second trustee in bankruptcy in India in the case of two successive bankruptcies would be entitled to an asset such as the present, I am unable myself to see on what principle this court should direct the transmission to India of this fund, knowing as it does, that there are English creditors in the first bankruptcy who are unsatisfied and unpaid. It seems to me impossible to rest the argument on principles of equity because it is not by reason of any principle of equity that property of a bankrupt who is subjected to two successive bankruptcies passes to the second rather than to the first, because the equity, if there was any, was the other way before the present rule was made in 1913. The rule, such as it is, is wholly statutory in this country and it is confined to bankruptcies in the United Kingdom. From that some inference might be drawn, I suppose, that it was not intended to extend to bankruptcies abroad, but, be that as it may, we have the position that there is no English statute which would require the court to send this asset to be administered by the foreign trustee, nor is there any English rule of equity which would require a similar step. I, for my part, fail to see how there can be room for such an equity where you have a court still administering a fund for the benefit of creditors which must be asked to deprive them of an asset which falls to be administered for the benefit of somebody else and to be administered by some other official. Counsel for the official assignee has failed to adduce any argument, to my mind, that such a course ought to be adopted and has not produced any authority in support of it. Such authority as there is, in the somewhat limited discussion which has taken place on this point, has been brought to our notice and is to be found in DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS. It seems to point to the opposite conclusion, because in that work the rule is laid down in r. 125 :

Where a debtor has been made bankrupt in more countries than one, and, under the bankruptcy law of each of such countries, there has been an assignment of the bankrupt's property, which might, under any of the foregoing rules, operate as an assignment of his property in England, effect will be given in England to that assignment which is earliest in date.

For an assignment one has to look to r. 81 :

An assignment of a bankrupt's property to the trustee in bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (English bankruptcy) is, or operates as, an assignment of the bankrupt's (1) immoveables (land), (2) moveables, whether situate in England or elsewhere.

- B It is suggested that that does not apply to property subsequently coming to the debtor, but is confined in its operation to property which the bankrupt had at the time of his adjudication. That, I think, is putting too narrow a view on it having regard to the fact that a trustee is entitled under the bankruptcy provisions of this country to both present and future property acquired prior to the date of discharge. I see no reason to put the narrow interpretation on the rule which has been suggested. It is, I think, unnecessary to decide
- C the point because it seems to me the answer to counsel's contention is that he has put forward no reason which is satisfactory, at least to my mind, in support of it. He can point to no rule of law in this country, no English statute, no principle of English equity, which would require the court to send this asset abroad, and for want of any such satisfactory argument or reasoning, I do not propose to accept the contention. I would allow the appeal.

- D ROXBURGH, J. : I am in complete agreement on all points.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Simon, Lord Wright, Lord Simonds, Lord Normand and Lord Oaksey), March 10, 11, April 1, 1947.]

Workmen's Compensation—Costs—Travelling expenses of workman attending for examination by medical referee—No arbitration actual or pending—Jurisdiction of county court judge—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (c. 42), s. 19 (2), sched. I (7)—Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1926 (S.R. & O. 1926, No. 448), rr. 57 (9), 76. (4).

- On Aug. 21, 1940, a workman was injured while at work, and the employers, recognising that the accident which caused the injury was within the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, without contest made to him weekly payments on the basis of total incapacity. The agreement to make these payments was never registered. On Feb. 22, 1945, the employers, exercising the right conferred on them by s. 18 of the Act, had the workman examined by their own doctor, and on Feb. 26, they served on the workman a notice under s. 12 (3) of their intention, in view of the doctor's certificate, to reduce the weekly payments to 15s. on the ground that his incapacity was no longer total. The workman then served on the employers a counter-notice, enclosing the certificate of his own doctor, who disagreed and declared that he was not able to follow his occupation and that payment for total incapacity should continue. On Mar. 13, the employers applied to the county court for an order referring the matter to a medical referee for a certificate, pursuant to s. 19 (2), as to the workman's condition and fitness for employment. The registrar of the court made the order, and the workman, who was required to travel some 20 miles on each of two occasions for the purpose, was examined by the medical referee. He certified (contrary to the view of the employers' doctor) that the workman was only fit for very light work. As the result of this certificate and as the workman could not be provided with light work, the employers continued to pay him compensation on the basis of total incapacity. The county court judge ordered the employers to pay the expenses incurred by the workman in attending on the medical referee :

HELD : (i) a reference to a medical referee under s. 19 (2) of the Act is a proceeding for settling a disputed question arising under the Act as to the liability to pay compensation, and s. 21, while prescribing arbitration by a committee or arbitrator or a judge of county courts as the ordinary method for settling disputed questions, also leaves room for the special provision in s. 19 by which the particular question in dispute is settled by the medical referee, and, therefore, the costs incidental to the reference to the medical referee were within the jurisdiction of the county court judge under para. 7 of sched. I to the Act.

(ii) jurisdiction also lay under the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1926, rr. 57 (9), 76 (4).

Decision of the Court of Appeal (DU PARCQ and TUCKER, L.JJ., SCOTT, L.J., dissenting), [1946] 1 All E.R. 471, reversed.

APPEAL by the workman from a decision of the Court of Appeal (DU PARCQ and TUCKER, L.JJ., SCOTT, L.J., dissenting) dated Jan. 17, 1946, and reported [1946] 1 All E.R. 471, allowing an appeal from a county court judge who had ordered the employers to pay the expenses incurred by the workman in attending for examination by a medical referee under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 19 (2). The majority of the Court of Appeal held that, as no arbitration had taken place and none was pending, the employer having met the workman's claim voluntarily, the county court judge had no jurisdiction to make such an order. The workman appealed.

Beney, K.C., and Gilbert Dare for the workman.

Phineas Quass and Martin Jukes for the employers.

The House took time for consideration.

April 1. VISCOUNT SIMON : My Lords, although the amount involved in the present appeal is only 14s., the question to be decided is one which may be of importance in many other cases. That question is whether, after an injured workman has complied with an order duly made, under s. 19 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, to submit himself for examination by a medical referee at the time and place appointed, the county court judge has jurisdiction to award to the workman costs in respect of the expenses incurred in travelling for the purpose of complying with the order. The Court of Appeal (DU PARCQ and TUCKER, L.JJ., SCOTT, L.J., dissenting) has held that, where there has been no previous arbitration instituted in respect of the workman's claim to compensation (because the employers met the claim voluntarily), no such jurisdiction exists.

The facts in the present case are few and simple. On Aug. 21, 1940, the workman was seriously injured while at work for the employers, and the latter, recognising that the accident which caused the injury was within the Act, without contest made to him weekly payments on the basis of total incapacity for a number of years. The agreement to make these payments was never registered. On Feb. 22, 1945, the employers, exercising the right conferred on them by s. 18 of the Act, had the workman examined by their own doctor, and on Feb. 26 served on the workman a notice under s. 12 (3) of their intention, in view of the doctor's certificate, to reduce the weekly payment to 15s. on the ground that his incapacity was no longer total incapacity. The workman then served on the employers a counter-notice, enclosing the certificate of his own doctor, who disagreed and declared that he was not able to follow his occupation and that payment as for total incapacity should continue. Thereupon, on Mar. 13, the employers applied to the county court for an order referring the matter to a medical referee for a certificate, pursuant to s. 19 (2), as to the workman's condition and fitness for employment. The registrar of the court duly made the order and the workman, who was required to travel some 20 miles to Mansfield on two occasions for the purpose, was examined by the medical referee. He certified (contrary to the view of the employers' doctor) that the workman was only fit for very light work. As the result of this certificate and as the workman could not find such light work, the employers continued to pay to the workman compensation on the basis of total incapacity.

A Now, it is not disputed that, if the weekly payments previously made by the employers to the workman had been arrived at by an award which settled a dispute between them, there would have been jurisdiction in the county court judge to award these costs, for there would have been an arbitration and the subsequent application and order under s. 19 would be proceedings connected with the arbitration, but the contention is that, inasmuch as the employers' liability to the workman under the Act and the weekly payments made by them to him were not in dispute, there has been no "arbitration," and, consequently, that the Act contains no provision authorising the award of these costs. A more unmeritorious distinction it would be hard to conceive, for in both cases alike the workman is compelled to incur the expense of travel on the application of his employer, who wishes to cut down the amount of the weekly compensation, while the workman wishes to continue to receive it at the old figure. Nevertheless, the question, of course, is whether the Act and rules made under it authorise the award of costs when at the earlier stage there was no conflict which required to be settled by arbitral award.

D I have come to the conclusion, on the words of the Act, that costs can be awarded in respect of the expenses of the workman's journey in both cases alike, and that too narrow a view as to the effect of the Act has been taken by the majority of the Court of Appeal. Section 21 deals with the procedure for settling any question which arises in any proceedings under the Act and says that "the question, if not settled by agreement, shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be settled by" arbitration in accordance with sched. I. The words "subject to the provisions of this Act" may well refer to the provisions in s. 19. The employers' application for a reference to the medical referee itself states that a "question has arisen as to the workman's condition and fitness for employment, and no agreement can be come to between the company and the workman with reference to such question." Indeed, the language of s. 19 (2) makes it plain that the reference to the medical referee is authorised only "in the event of no agreement being come to between the employer and the workman" on this matter. The medical referee's jurisdiction depends on this absence of agreement and his certificate is conclusive as to the condition of the workman and his fitness for employment (s. 19 (3)). In effect, therefore, the medical referee arbitrates between the parties on this disputed question. It follows that the costs incidental to the reference to the medical referee are within the jurisdiction of the county court judge, for by para. 7 of sched. I to the Act any costs of or incidental to the arbitration and proceedings connected therewith are in his discretion. The same conclusion might be reached by referring to the Workmen's Compensation Rules, especially to r. 76 (1) and (4), and, perhaps, also to r. 57 (9), but I prefer to base my conclusion on the broad construction that the reference to the medical referee is a procedure for settling a disputed question arising under the Act and that s. 21, while prescribing arbitration by a committee or an arbitrator or a judge of county courts as the ordinary method for settling disputed questions, also leaves room for the special provision in s. 19 by which this particular question in dispute is settled by the medical referee.

H Previous decisions to which we were referred do not appear to me greatly to advance the matter. In Brown v. Sherwood Colliery Co., Ltd. (1), the only question which was argued was whether the order for costs in favour of the workman in respect of a reference to a medical referee was final or interlocutory, and it was assumed without argument that the order was one which there was jurisdiction to make. Nevertheless, the judgment of GODDARD, L.J., is instructive, as he observes ([1940] 2 All E.R. 34) that an order for costs on a reference to a medical referee can be made:

... either when a workman makes a claim which the employer does not admit, or where the employer seeks to discontinue payments which he has been making.

In Summers v. William Baird & Co., Ltd. (2), the workman had been awarded weekly compensation as for total incapacity until further order of the court. Later, his employers, alleging that he was fit for light work on the surface (which he denied), applied for a reference to a medical referee. The referee reported that the workman was not yet fit for light work. The workman applied for his expenses in the medical reference, but this was refused by the arbitrator on the grounds that there was no existing arbitration in connection with which he could pronounce an award of such expenses. The House of Lords confirmed the view of the Court of Session that the workman was entitled to these expenses, holding that the original arbitration was not dead, but that an award under an arbitration is a continuing award. LORD DUNEDIN said (1926 S.C. (H.L.) 26) :

If the appellants here had in any particular week refused to pay the money, what the respondent would have done would have been to get an extract, and then charge, and get the money by the ordinary processes of execution. It is impossible to talk of the process here being dead.

That was enough to determine the case then under consideration, but I do not think this decision obliges us to hold that, if previously there has been no contested arbitration, the workman cannot recover his expenses in such a case as the present. I move that the appeal be allowed with costs.

LORD WRIGHT : My Lords, I agree with the opinion which has just been delivered by VISCOUNT SIMON.

LORD SIMONDS : My Lords, I have had the privilege of reading the opinion which LORD OAKSEY is about to deliver. I concur in his reasoning and conclusion and have nothing to add.

LORD NORMAND : My Lords, I also am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed. I think that the travelling expenses necessarily or reasonably incurred by a workman in obedience to an order, under s. 19 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, to submit himself for examination by a medical referee are "costs of the application" within the meaning of r. 57 (9) of the Workmen's Compensation Rules. They are costs occasioned by the granting of the application, and, as it seems to me, no less costs of an application than are the costs of opposing an application, but, if that view be erroneous, I think that these travelling expenses are clearly within the words of para. 7 (1) of sched. I to the Act, "the costs of and incidental to the arbitration and proceedings connected therewith." These comprehensive words cover costs incidental to any proceeding connected with an arbitration. Admittedly, the travelling expenses are costs incidental to a proceeding and the only question, therefore, is whether that proceeding, the medical reference, is connected with an arbitration. There was a dispute between the workman and his employers about his capacity to earn wages, and, under s. 21, that dispute could be settled only by agreement or, subject to the provisions of the Act, by the arbitration of a county court judge. The parties failed to agree and, therefore, it was necessary to resort, subject to the provisions of the Act, to the arbitration of a county court judge. A medical reference under the Act is in itself an arbitration proceeding and for certain purposes it comes in place of an arbitration by a county court judge. Moreover, when the application for the reference is made by one of the parties only it may, under the proviso to s. 19 (2), result in an arbitration by the county court judge. In the Scottish case of Summers v. Baird (2) the workman had made an application for the expenses caused to him by a medical reference and the question arose whether the sheriff substitute, who in Scotland is the arbitrator under the Act, had jurisdiction to award them. One of the grounds of the judgment in favour of the workman is stated thus in the speech of LORD DUNEDIN (1926 S.C. (H.L.) 26) :

The Act of Sederunt is in the same position as the Rules of Court in England . . . The Act of Sederunt of 1924, in s. 9, deals with incidental applications. The learned counsel said : "These are incidental applications under an arbitration, and this is not an arbitration." I think "incidental applications" means incidental to any proceedings under the Act, and s. 9 makes it exceedingly clear.

LORD DUNEDIN goes on to say that s. 9 of the Act of Sederunt brings the whole code of arbitration proceedings into a medical reference, and he points out that no one supposes that it is not competent in an arbitration to award expenses. That case illustrates in a very clear way the necessary connection between a medical reference and arbitration proceedings. The English rules of court are not in the same terms as the Act of Sederunt, but that does not affect the point that the House of Lords recognised the good sense and propriety of treating the workman's expenses incidental to a medical reference as if they were costs incidental to arbitration proceedings under the Act.

It may, I think, be useful to refer to an argument for the employers that these expenses, even if covered by the terms of para. 7 (1) of sched. I to the Act, cannot be awarded at the discretion of the county court judge unless they are also covered by the rules of court. I think there is no difficulty in finding a rule of court for them and r. 76 (1) seems to me to be the appropriate rule, but this is not a case in which the discretion to award costs depends on the making of rules of court. Paragraph 7 (1) of sched. I provides that the costs shall be in the discretion of the county court judge and the rules of court merely regulate procedure. If, therefore, the rules had failed to make appropriate provision for the procedure, the workman would none the less have had the right to ask the county court judge to award his expenses and the county court judge could not have denied his own jurisdiction.

LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, I am of the same opinion. The judgment of the majority in the Court of Appeal proceeds on the view that, although para. 7 of sched. I of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, may cover such expenses as those now in question if the rules of court are apt to cover them, the rules of court, and, in particular, rr. 57 (9) and 74 (4), do not cover them. The argument for the employers before your Lordships' House took a wider scope based on the contention that such expenses are not costs of or incidental to an arbitration or proceedings connected therewith within the meaning of para. 7 of sched. I. I am unable to agree with either view. In my opinion, expenses incurred by the workman in carrying out the order of the registrar to submit himself for examination by the medical referee in accordance with s. 19 (2) of the Act are costs of and incidental to proceedings connected with an arbitration within the meaning of para. 7 of sched. I. Section 21 lays down the procedure for settling any question which arises in any proceedings under the Act and provides that, if not settled by agreement, it shall, subject to the provisions of the Act, be settled by arbitration. A question arose as to the employers' liability to pay compensation or as to the duration of compensation when they applied on Mar. 23, 1945, to the registrar for the matter to be referred to the medical referee. This question was not settled by agreement, but by the referee's decision, that is to say, either by arbitration within the meaning of s. 21, or, it may be, under the words "subject to the provisions of this Act" by a reference to the medical referee which is equivalent to an arbitration. In either case, in my view, the proceeding is "connected with an arbitration" within the meaning of para. 7 of sched. I. Moreover, quite apart from the construction which I put on s. 21, I think that the fact that by s. 19 (2), where, as here, the application is made for the reference by one party only, the registrar or the judge may order an arbitration instead of a reference would bring the proceeding within the meaning of the words "connected with an arbitration."

Counsel for the employers also argued that the question was settled by agreement because the medical referee reported that the workman was fit for light work and the employers agreed none the less to pay compensation as for total incapacity, but this, in my view, does not show that the question which had arisen as to the workman's fitness to work was settled by agreement. It was not; it was settled by the reference. No question was settled by agreement. All that happened was that the employers could not or did not find light work for the workman, and, therefore, paid as for total incapacity.

I turn now to r. 57 (1) and (9) and r. 76 (4). Rule 57 (1) provides generally that the following rules shall apply to applications to the registrar, pursuant to s. 19, to refer any matter to a medical referee, and r. 57 (9) provides that the costs of any application to the registrar may be allowed by special order of the judge. It is clear that there was an application to the registrar pursuant to s. 19 to refer the matter to the medical referee and that the granting of that application necessarily involved an order under r. 57 (4) that the workman should submit himself for examination by the medical referee. To hold, in such circumstances, that the expense of carrying out that order is not part of the costs of the application to the registrar appears to me too narrow a construction of the words. Assuming, however, that such an expense is not within r. 57 (9), I am unable to see why it is not covered by r. 76 (4). It is a proceeding under the Act since it is a proceeding to settle a question as to the duration of compensation and, ex hypothesi, there is no provision made by the rules or by the scale of costs for it. For these reasons I agree with the motion proposed by the noble viscount on the Woolsack.

Appeal allowed with costs.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. AUSTRALIAN MUTUAL PROVIDENT SOCIETY.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Simon, Lord Wright, Lord Porter, Lord Simonds, Lord Normand), January 30, 31, February 3, March 31, 1947.]

Income Tax—Assurance company—Branch in United Kingdom—Head office abroad—Profits—Income from investments of life assurance fund—Inclusion of income from investments exempted from United Kingdom tax—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. D, case III, r. 3 (1).

The respondent society carried on mutual life assurance business, having its head office in Australia and a branch office in London. The society claimed relief under the Finance Act, 1923, s. 24, on the ground that the assessments to tax made on it for the years 1937-1940 were excessive by reason of an error. The income from the investments of the society's life assurance fund included interest and dividends which, by the provisions of the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 46, sched. C, r. 2 (d), and sched. D, Miscellaneous Rules, r. 7, were exempt from income tax in the United Kingdom because the society was not resident here. In 1937 the total income from the society's life assurance fund was £4,145,067, of which £72,354 was exempt from tax in the United Kingdom. The fraction of the society's total income chargeable to tax as "profits" under the Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. D, case III, was .05565268, calculated according to r. 3 of that Case. Since, however, the total income included the £72,354 which was exempt, the society claimed relief in respect thereof, contending that that sum should be deducted from the fraction .05565268 of the society's whole income of its life assurance fund.

HELD: in the application of r. 3 the income to be taxed was not, in whole or in part, receipts, exempted or otherwise, but was a conventional figure or notional sum which might include the proceeds of exempted investments, and as r. 3 (4) authorised a reduction of the tax on the sum arrived at only if contributions to United Kingdom income tax had been made from other sources, no reduction of liability on the ground that exempted investments entered into the calculation, was called for.

APPEAL by the Crown from a decision of the Court of Appeal, dated Mar. 7, 1946, reported [1946] 1 All E.R. 528, reversing a decision of MACNAGHTEN, J., ([1946] 1 All E.R. 236). MACNAGHTEN, J., in an appeal by way of Case Stated by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax, held that the assessments which had been made on the respondent society were correct under sched. D, case III, r. 3. The society claimed that £72,354 should be deducted from that part of its income liable to tax in the United Kingdom under r. 3, and this contention was upheld by the Court of Appeal. The facts appear from the opinion of VISCOUNT SIMON, and are fully set out at [1946] 1 All E.R. 236.

The House took time for consideration.

Mar. 31. VISCOUNT SIMON: My Lords, this is an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (LORD GREENE, M.R., SOMERVELL AND COHEN, L.JJ.) allowing an appeal by the respondent society from the order of MACNAGHTEN, J. The judge had dismissed the respondent society's appeal from a decision of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts on a Case Stated by those commissioners.

The respondent society carries on mutual life assurance business, having its head office in Sydney, New South Wales, but it has a branch in London through which it carries on a portion of its life assurance business. The appeal relates to the computation of the assessable income arising from the profits of the London branch for the years ending Apr. 5, 1937, 1938, 1939 and 1940 respectively and turns on the proper interpretation and application of the Income Tax Act of 1918, sched. D, case III, r. 3, which provides as follows:—

3. (1) Where an assurance company not having its head office in the United Kingdom carries on life assurance business through any branch or agency in the United Kingdom, any income of the company from the investments of its life assurance fund (excluding the annuity fund, if any), wherever received, shall, to the extent provided in this rule, be deemed to be profits comprised in this schedule and shall be charged under this Case. (2) Such portion only of the income from the investments of the life assurance fund for the year preceding the year of assessment shall be so charged as bears the same proportion to the total income from those investments as the amount of premiums received in that year from policy holders resident in the United Kingdom and from policy holders resident abroad whose proposals were made to the company at or through its office or agency in the United Kingdom bears to the total amount of the premiums received by the company: Provided that in the case of an assurance company having its head office in any British possession, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue may, by regulation, substitute some basis other than that herein prescribed for the purpose of ascertaining the portion of the income from investments to be so charged as being income derived from business carried on in the United Kingdom. (3) Every such charge shall be made by the Special Commissioners as though the company under the provisions of this Act had required the proceedings relating to the charge to be had and taken before those commissioners. (4) Where a company has already been charged to tax, by deduction or otherwise, in respect of its life assurance business, to an amount equal to or exceeding the charge under this rule, no further charge shall be made under this rule, and where a company has already been so charged, but to a less amount, the charge shall be proportionately reduced.

Since the respondent society was not resident in the United Kingdom for the purposes of United Kingdom income tax, it was entitled to exemption from that tax in respect of interest and dividends of securities and investments falling either (a) within the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 46, or (b) within r. 2 (d) of sched. C, or (c) within r. 7 of the Miscellaneous Rules of sched. D.

The investments of the life assurance fund of the respondent society included some investments which were exempted from income tax under each of these heads. For example the income from these exempted investments in the calendar year 1935 amounted to £72,354, and, if this figure is relevant, it would enter into the calculation of assessable profit for the fiscal year 1936-7. When the present appeal reached your Lordships' House a curious, and somewhat embarrassing situation was disclosed. In the courts below, and before the Special Commissioners, it seems to have been assumed, both on the side of the Inland Revenue and on the side of the respondent society, that the application of r. 3 to the latter was in some way affected by the existence of this exempted income, and that the question between them was, what was the proper method of making the adjustment called for on this account? But in the course of the argument before us, the House invited the Solicitor-General to explain why the calculation under r. 3 was affected by the fact of exempted income at all. A good deal of the subsequent discussion revolved around this point, and, consequently, your Lordships have now to decide two questions: first, what is the proper construction and application of r. 3 when an assurance society which falls within that rule holds investments exempt from income tax among the investments of its life assurance fund; and, secondly, what is the right decision in the case now before us where the Revenue has in effect made the concession that the existence of exempted income makes a difference to the calculation?

The present r. 3 had its origin in the Finance Act, 1915, s. 15. As counsel for the Revenue pointed out to us, before the Act of 1915 there was much difficulty in getting income tax from a life assurance company resident abroad with a branch here. Such a company could avoid United Kingdom income tax on its income from investments, even though it had a branch in the United Kingdom, by so arranging its affairs that its investments were foreign investments, the proceeds of which were not caught by United Kingdom income tax. It is true that the company might be regarded as carrying on in this country a trade through its branch, but there was much practical difficulty in arriving at the figure under case I of sched. D of annual profits of such a branch for, in the case of life assurance business, the true profits attributable to the branch could not be ascertained in the normal manner, as is shown by provisions in the Assurance Act, 1909, for a quinquennial valuation. The Finance Act, 1915, s. 15, was, it would seem, aimed at meeting this difficulty, and it did so by providing for a conventional figure, which should be "deemed to be profits" comprised in sched. D, on which a non-resident life assurance company, with a branch in the United Kingdom, would make a contribution to United Kingdom income tax, however it arranged its investments. The provisions now contained in r. 3 of case III call for the use of certain factors in order to arrive at this conventional figure on which such an assurance company as the respondent society is required to pay tax in respect of the annual profit of its life assurance business carried on in this country.

The rule itself is expressed in clear terms, and we are not entitled to read into it anything which is not there, unless on the true construction of the Income Tax Acts as a whole there is some statutory provision which must be treated as modifying it, in order to give it its true effect. In sub-s. (1) of the rule, there is no justification for reading "any income of the company from the investments of its life assurance fund" as though it ran, "any income of the company from such part of the investments of its life assurance fund as are not exempt from income tax." Yet this is the interpretation which is primarily favoured by the Crown. "The investments of its life assurance fund" must mean all such investments and not a residue of them after first subtracting what may be called "exempted investments." Sub-section (2) directs how the fraction is to be arrived at which is to be applied to the total of such investments, and naturally involves a comparison between two totals, one attributable to the life assurance business as a whole and the other attributable to the United Kingdom part of it. In the present case the proviso to sub-s. (2) was put into operation and the necessary fraction was obtained by the use of it. There is no dispute as to what the proper fraction is in this instance—it is roughly one-twentieth.

The language of sub-s. (4) seems to me to be equally clear. Its effect is to secure that the company's contribution by way of tax under the rule shall be abated, or even wiped out altogether, to the extent to which the company is charged to tax independently of the rule, but there is no justification for reading the words "where a company had already been charged to tax" as though they meant "where the company would be charged to tax if the investments it held were not investments the produce of which is exempt from tax." The relief given by sub-s. (4) arises from the company paying tax apart from the rule, not from the company holding exempted investments.

A From 1915 to 1936, as I understand, the practice of the Revenue, acquiesced in, or, at any rate, not challenged, in litigation, by life assurance companies with their head office abroad and a branch in the United Kingdom, was to charge tax on the conventional sum thus arrived at, treating as immaterial the fact that the life assurance fund might contain investments the proceeds of which were not subject to tax, but in 1938 this House decided the appeal of Hughes v. Bank of New Zealand (1), upholding a decision in the Court of Appeal given in Dec., 1936, when LORD WRIGHT was presiding as Master of the Rolls. The point there arising had nothing to do with r. 3 of case III of sched. D, and nothing to do with the taxing of life assurance companies. What was being considered was the taxation under case I of a bank resident in New Zealand with a branch in London. The question was whether, in calculating the profit of the branch by setting off expenses against receipts, it was right to include on the receipts side the interest on certain investments the proceeds of which were by statute exempt from tax. If these amounts were included, the result would be nothing short of the taxing of interest which was not to be taxed. The issue is made exceedingly clear by examining the statement of debits and credits printed in LORD THANKERTON'S opinion (21 Tax Cas. 518), and by studying his subsequent observations. In the Court of Appeal LORD WRIGHT had said (ibid., p. 492) :

D . . . it would be rather deplorable if, notwithstanding what I regard as the clear language of s. 46, the owner, not being ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, was still taxed on the interest as part of his trading profits, and in my view that is not the true construction of the section . . . If they are not taxable at all, then obviously they can neither be charged under case III of sched. D nor under any case of sched. D at all.

E Read in the light of the issue before him, the words of my noble and learned friend, and the decision of this House, do not, in my opinion, help the respondent society, and, consequently, do not call for any change in the practice previously adopted as correct in applying r. 3 of case III. In Hughes v. Bank of New Zealand (1), what was in issue was the taxing of receipts which were exempt from tax. In the application of r. 3, the thing to be taxed is not, in whole or in part, exempted receipts, but is a conventional or notional sum—calculated, it is true, by the use of figures which might include the proceeds of exempted investments—but a sum "deemed to be profits," to be charged as such, without any deduction save that provided for in sub-s. (4).

F The other decision which was thought to be helpful to his case by counsel for the respondent company was that of Cadbury Bros., Ltd. v. Sinclair (2), where it was held, in reference to r. 5 (1) of the rules applicable to cases I and II of sched. D, that the assessment of profits of Cadbury Bros. must be made by excluding the annual value of certain lands, notwithstanding that these lands of the taxpayer were, by a statute of 1660 (12 Car. R. 2 di No. 34), exempt from every form of taxation, and, therefore, could not be charged to tax under sched. A. To do otherwise would be to impose tax on an income which was in terms not to be taxed. This decision also does not, as it seems to me, afford guidance in the present case, for the reason already indicated. G Once it is accepted that r. 3 of case III is not one which taxes income from investments, whether exempted or not, but one which taxes a conventional sum calculated as the rule directs, it becomes reasonably clear that the sum to be taxed is not varied by inquiring whether one of the factors in the calculation contains income from exempted investments. If variation is required on this ground, it must be provided by legislation. The Finance Act, 1940, s. 21, vetoes the suggested variation for the future, as far as s. 46 of the Act of 1918 is concerned, but I do not think this can be read as a recognition that the previous law required it.

H As I am differing from the Court of Appeal, where SOMERVELL, L.J. delivered the judgment of the court, I must indicate why, with the greatest respect to the Lord Justice, I find myself unable to accept his reasoning. He points out that sub-s. (4) of the rule permits a set-off against the charge on what is to be "deemed to be profits," of the whole of the tax charged, by deduction or otherwise, in respect of the company's life assurance business, and this set-off may be sufficient to extinguish the charge under the rule altogether. The argument then proceeds thus. If the source of the set-off was tax borne by investments subject to tax, the set-off would be effective in reducing or might even extinguish the charge under the rule. If, however, these investments were changed into exempted investments, there would be nothing to set-off. This is true, but I cannot agree that such a result amounts to taxing indirectly the exempted investments. The resulting tax flows from the language of the rule, which authorises a reduction of the tax on the sum arrived at only if contributions to United Kingdom income tax have been made from other sources.

In my opinion, therefore, no reduction of liability on the ground that exempted investments enter into the calculation is called for, but inasmuch as there is no cross appeal and the Crown is merely seeking the reversal of the order of the Court of Appeal, the motion to be put to the House should be that the appeal be allowed. LORD NORMAND, who is not able to be here, authorises me to say that he concurs in this opinion.

LORD WRIGHT: My Lords, I have considered in print the opinion which has just been delivered by VISCOUNT SIMON and I agree with it.

The question is what effect is to be given to r. 3 of case III, sched. D, and the incorporated statutory regulation. The provisions of the rule are set out by my noble and learned friend, and I do not repeat them, nor do I recapitulate the facts which he has set out. It was stated by counsel for the Crown that up to 1938 the practice was to treat the rule as a self-contained provision, enacted in 1915 and directed to secure that non-resident foreign and colonial assurance companies should bear some share of taxation for the benefit of the British Revenue in respect of the part of their business carried on at their English branch. As it was difficult to assess their profit in the ordinary method, r. 3 was devised as a rough and ready way of imposing some tax on their British profits by assessing a definite proportion of their income from the securities of their life assurance fund. The proportion was arrived at by a ratio based on the comparison between one part of their liability (which may be described as British liability), i.e., their liability on life assurance policies effected on proposals made in Britain or of which the holders are in Britain, and the total amount of their liability on all life assurance policies. This is a conventional charge. The ratio, which in this case is roughly one-twentieth of the total premium receipt on life assurance business, is fixed and artificial. In the year of assessment 1936/1937, this ratio, when applied to the total sum of the life assurance fund, gave a figure of £230,684, as the British income of the respondent society on the basis directed by r. 3. No specific investments were taxed. The rule provided that the income from the fixed specified percentage of the securities in question was "to be deemed to be profits comprised in this schedule" [sched. D], and was to be charged under case III of that schedule. It was, therefore, a charge under the Case on a notional figure deemed to be a figure of profit. No doubt, it was possible to give a list of the securities which formed at any particular time the life assurance fund and to value them individually and add up the total, but there was nothing to show which of these securities were to be deemed to fall within the twentieth portion of the securities.

Of the securities comprising the life assurance fund there were certain investments amounting in value to £72,354 the income of which was specially exempted from tax. No allowance was made in the assessment under r. 3 of case III on account of these exemptions. That was not at first questioned by the respondent society, but after the decision of this House in Hughes v. Bank of New Zealand (1), the respondents claimed that these exempted securities should have been segregated and the total amount of the income from them in the year of charge deducted from the total "British" income so that the charge under r. 3 would have been proportionately reduced. The society, accordingly, made a corresponding claim for repayment of part of the tax so assessed on the ground of error or mistake under the Finance Act, 1923, s. 24, in its return, but, as the hearing of the appeal before your Lordships proceeded, it was pointed out by VISCOUNT SIMON that the real question to be determined was whether, on the true construction of r. 3, there had been any error or mistake. To decide that it was necessary to construe r. 3, and I think that it has now been made clear that the rule was correctly applied. Its application was not affected by the decision in Hughes v. Bank of New Zealand (1). In that case r. 3 was not considered. It was not necessary to consider it at all. Rule 3 deals with the life assurance fund of assurance companies. The decision just referred to deals with a bank. The exemption under the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 46, directly and plainly applies to the specified securities in question, but r. 3, as already explained, is not a plain or simple clause of exemption as were the clauses considered in Hughes v. Bank of New Zealand (1). It is, on the contrary, a charging provision intended to charge the society on the basis of a fixed percentage of the total British income. That was merely a convenient mode of imposing some charge on the assurance company in consideration of the privilege it enjoyed in trading in this country. The charge was a tax on the investment income only as a machinery to tax the general profits of the British business, and as a manner of measuring the charge by an arbitrary figure derived from a percentage of the investment income. In this connection it was not material to distinguish between exempted and unexempted income. All that was needed was a yardstick. This is borne out by the actual language of r. 3. It is positive in its terms. The only qualification is to be found in sub-s. (4) which provides for a set-off of charges on the society outside r. 3. The effect of the sub-rule is to secure that the fixed and conventional assessment under r. 3 is to be reduced proportionately if the company has already been charged apart from the charge under r. 3.

As VISCOUNT SIMON has pointed out, the decision in the Bank of New Zealand case (1) affords no guidance in the present appeal, nor do the expressions which he quotes from my judgment in the Court of Appeal ([1937] 1 K.B. 430). What I said there was quite correct in respect of the issues then before the court and of the securities then in question. The special provisions of r. 3 were not there relevant and were not before either the Court of Appeal or this House. In truth, as already observed, the charge under r. 3 is not a charge on the specified investments except in form. It is an artificial mode of charging the general profit of the British business. Rule 3, not being qualified except for sub-s. 4, and being a charging section, must receive its appropriate effect from the court, notwithstanding an apparent, but not real, conflict between it and the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 46. The difficulties involved in attempting to reconcile r. 3 and s. 46 and bring them both into operation are illustrated by the judgments in the tribunals below in the present case, but these difficulties do not arise if, as I think, r. 3 is the dominant and overriding enactment in this regard. If the court has failed to give effect to the purpose of the legislature, it is for the latter to cure the error. However, as LORD SIMON has pointed out, the only amendment of the law, namely, that contained in the Finance Act, 1940, s. 21, is not retrospective and cannot help the court in deciding this appeal. For these reasons and for the reasons explained by LORD SIMON, I shall concur in the motion which he will put to the House.

LORD PORTER (read by LORD SIMONDS): My Lords, the decision in this case turns on the true construction of r. 3 of the rules applicable to case III of sched. D of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The Revenue authorities say that the terms of the rule are plain. Its object is to determine what are to be regarded as the taxable profits of a non-resident assurance company with a branch in this country. Tax, in their contention, is not imposed on the income of its investments in the case of such a company. It is imposed on a purely notional sum of profits. They point out that if an assurance company is resident in this country they can either assess it under case III of sched. D on the income from its investments or under case I of that schedule on the profits of the business which it carries on, and agree that, if the former alternative is adopted, the interest derived from its tax-exempt investments must be excluded in computing what its income is. Indeed, I understood them to be prepared to concede that the exclusion of such interest cannot be avoided if the alternative method of taxing the company on its profits is adopted, since it is not permissible by any device to levy tax on such investments either directly or indirectly: see Hughes v. Bank of New Zealand (1). Similarly, if tax is being levied on profits, the taxable value of tax free land must be excluded from the credit side of the account in ascertaining what these profits are: see Cadbury Bros. Ltd. v. Sim.

clair (2). In each of these cases, however, the object was to determine what sums were to be brought into computation in ascertaining the actual profit. In the former case the profits of the English branch of a non-resident company charged, not on a conventional basis, but on the actual profits earned by that branch in this country; in the latter, the actual profits of a company which was resident here. In neither case did notional profits come in question, nor, indeed, is there any very obvious reason for applying these principles to notional profits calculated by adopting, in the case of a non-resident company with a branch here, some conventional method of finding the proportion which the income of the English branch bears to the income of the business of the company as a whole.

Where, as in this case, notional or conventional profits alone come in question, your Lordships have to decide whether the possession of tax-exempt investments has any effect in reducing the quantum of those profits, and, if it has, to determine the extent of that reduction. The respondents, on their part, assert, in the first place, that r. 3 does not prescribe a method of calculating profits under case I of sched. D, but, on the contrary, the word "profits" in the rule merely means income which is subject to tax under case III. Such income, they say, is that which is set out under the specific heads to be found in r. 1 of the rules applicable to that case under the sub-headings (a) to (f), and the matters included under those heads are confined to investment income and nowhere deal with profits as such. In support of this argument they point to the phraseology used in r. 3. What is being taxed, in their submission, is "income" not "profits." It is only deemed to be profits, and not even profits of any kind, but profits "comprised in this schedule" and "charged under this Case." Nor, they say, can the Revenue authorities escape this result by attempting to assess the income tax payer under case I in respect of profits as an alternative to charging him under case III. Rule 3, they argue, alone gives validity to the charge and no alternative method is permitted. If, then, it is income from investments which is being taxed in this country and the company on which the charge is made holds tax-exempt investments, that company, it is maintained, should have the benefit of the exemption to the extent to which it is assessed to tax, otherwise it is charged on its tax-exempt investments either directly because they form part of its income or, at any rate, indirectly in being compelled to pay on the income of its other securities which have not been brought into this country and should be exempt from taxation imposed here. This criticism would, I think, have force if applied to such circumstances as existed in Hughes v. Bank of New Zealand (1) and Cadbury Bros. Ltd. v. Sinclair (2), in both of which the tax was imposed on actual profits and the tax-free asset was part of the assets of the branch or company on whom it was imposed, but it has no application to a case where the profits or income, the subject of charge, is a notional sum calculated in a conventional way, nor do I think it matters whether it is or is not established that the tax-exempt investments are assets of the branch carried on in this country.

The stress of the respondents' argument was laid on the words "shall be charged under this Case," i.e., under case III, and it was said that those words mean that it is to be charged on the income of investments as such. I cannot think so. In the first place, it is not accurate to say that case III is concerned only with investment income. The general description of the content of that Case in cl. 2 at the beginning of that schedule shows a wider ambit. There the field covered by case III is delineated in the words

Tax in respect of profits of an uncertain value and of other income described in the rules applicable to this case.

In the face of such demarkation of the extent of the tax, there is no justification for limiting it to a charge on investment income. To do so would be to give effect only to the latter half of the definition and to confine the attention to "other income described in the rules applicable to this Case," while neglecting the opening words "profits of an uncertain value."

In any case, when the rules speak of income being taxable under case III they mean, I think, no more than that tax, being imposed under the rules of that Case and there only, must be charged under that Case. It does not mean that the charge is imposed on the income from investments and not on profits. But, say the respondents, let it be granted that the rule means no more than that notional profits are to be ascertained in a conventional way and then subjected to tax, nevertheless, the Crown will be charging tax on tax-exempt securities if we are not given the benefit of all our tax-exemption when we are being assessed in respect of the profits of the English branch. Unless the taxpayer gets the benefit of this exemption when assessed in this country he will, they maintain, gain no advantage from his purchase of tax-free securities—not in this country because no allowance is made in his assessment here, and not elsewhere because an assurance company not having its head office in the United Kingdom would, in any case, escape liability unless, of course, the tax were deducted at the source. Rule 3 (4), it is said, gives a benefit to those who have paid tax by deduction in England, and, therefore, those who hold tax-free investments should receive a like benefit by being treated as if they had paid tax on those securities. Otherwise they are not enjoying to the full the benefit of the exemption. The answer is, I think, that they receive such benefit as they are given by the rule, and, if no exemption is thus granted, the matter, if this result is not intended, may be one for the legislature, but is not one with which your Lordships can deal.

No doubt, this construction of the rule, if adopted, may in certain circumstances lead to an anomalous position, e.g. if a non-resident company should have invested all its life assurance fund in tax-exempt securities, it would pay tax on the conventionally apportioned sum without any reduction and would be no better off than if the statutory proportion were wholly liable to tax. I agree that this is a hardship, but it does not entitle your Lordships to disregard the plain meaning of the rule. So long as the words are in their present form the result must be looked on as the price which non-resident assurance companies have to pay for engaging in business in this country. I would only add that, even if the arguments for the respondents were accepted in principle, I find difficulty in seeing why the whole of the tax-exemption should be regarded as owed to the English branch. In the case of a bank such as the Bank of New Zealand and in circumstances such as existed in that case (1) any quantity of tax-free securities might have been held by the business as a whole, but exemption was only given to the English branch in respect of those held as part of that branch's assets and brought into account in calculating the amount of profits earned here. Both Hughes v. Bank of New Zealand (1) and Cadbury Bros. Ltd. v. Sinclair (2) do, in my opinion, decide that, when actual profits are being dealt with, the exempted interest or item must not be included as a credit item in the company's account when determining its profits. It is argued that when in the present case notional profits are being sought for, interest or items of that kind must on similar principles be excluded from the calculation of such profits.

The analogy, however, in my view, if it applies at all, only applies in a case where the quantum of actual, not notional, income is being ascertained. In the present case the only actual income which forms a factor in ascertaining the amount of profits is that mentioned in r. 3 (2), i.e., the total income from the investments of the life assurance fund. If, then, that sub-rule requires the interest derived from tax-free investments to be deducted, the logical course would be to deduct it from the actual total investments of the company which are exempt from tax. I cannot for myself see why it should be deducted from a sum which does not represent any real income or profit, but is merely arrived at by a conventional calculation adopted for the purpose of estimating an otherwise almost incalculable sum. It is not as if the tax-exempt investments were assets of the English branch, or as if, indeed, it were possible to separate the assets of the branch from those of the company as a whole—no argument as to or evidence of such a position was presented, and the method of calculating the profits adopted in r. 3 (2) would prevent such a suggestion being put forward. In any case, however, I think the wording of the rule too plain to justify even the modified relief which the Crown have been prepared to give since the decision in Hughes v. Bank of New Zealand (1) was decided.

I agree with your Lordships that the appeal should be allowed and the judgment of MACNAGHTEN, J., restored. This is the order asked for by the appellants and it is not, I think, material that the reasoning of your Lordships, including my own, would lead to the withdrawal even of the relief given by the commissioners and by the judge.

LORD SIMONDS: My Lords, I also concur.

Appeal allowed.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. NORTHERN ALUMINIUM CO., LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Simon, Lord Wright, Lord Simonds and Lord Normand), March 6, 7, 31, 1947.]

Revenue—Excess profits tax—Computation of capital employed in business during chargeable accounting period—Deduction of debts—"Debt"—Rebate paid to customer—Consequent reduction of profit—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939
(c. 109), sched. VII, pt. II, para. 2 (1).

The respondent company manufactured aluminium products and during the war it sold these to customers who, in turn, incorporated the articles supplied in aeroplanes which were purchased by the Ministry of Aircraft Production. All the contracts under which aluminium products were sold by the company were made at fixed prices, and in no case did these contracts provide for any variation of the prices therein specified. The company was at all material times a member of an association. On Dec. 16, 1939, a letter was written by the Air Ministry to the association confirming an agreement which had been reached to the effect that during the period from July 1, 1939, to June 30, 1940, prices for certain products manufactured by the members of the association should be reduced by amounts specified in a list. The letter further stated that negotiations were to be entered into not later than June 30, 1940, by representatives of the Air Ministry and of the association in regard to the prices to be charged for the supply of wrought aluminium alloys after that date. In fact, no negotiations were entered into before June 30, 1940, but at a meeting held in November, 1941, the question of reduced prices for goods and the payment of rebate to the Ministry for periods in respect of transactions entered into not earlier than Jan. 1, 1941, was discussed. No discussions took place with regard to any reduction of prices at which goods had been sold by members of the association during the six months from July 1, 1940, to Dec. 31, 1940, and no reductions in prices were ever made nor were any rebates ever paid for that period. On Oct. 12, 1942, heads of agreement were drawn up between the Minister of Aircraft Production, the association, and the member firms of the association which were intended to continue in force until the end of 1943, and to ensure that prices left only a reduced profit in the hands of manufacturers. This agreement regulated prices for the years 1941, 1942 and 1943 and provided that what was called a rebate in respect of the prices at which goods had been supplied by members of the association to their customers should be paid over to the Ministry, which involved an adjustment in the prices charged by the manufacturers of aeroplanes for the machines which they supplied to the government. The result of this was that the profit made by the company, calculated for the purpose of assessment to excess profits tax for the calendar year 1941, which originally stood at the figure of £3,371,120, was subsequently reduced by the sum of £2,743,469, which was the amount of the payment under the agreement of Oct. 12, 1942, made by the company to the Ministry late in 1943. The reduction of profit was manifestly referable to the trading year 1941, and, in accordance with the decision in Isaac Holden & Sons Ltd. v. Inland Rev. Comrs. (1924) (12 Tax Cas. 768), the accounts of the company as between themselves and the Revenue, were "re-opened" and the smaller figure of profit now ascertained to be correct was substituted for the original figure of profit in that year. The Crown contended that since this correction had been made retrospectively in calculating the profits of 1941, the company must submit to a new calculation of the capital employed in the business of the company in the corresponding chargeable accounting period, which would result in a reduction of the figure of standard profits with which the profits of the year 1941 had to be compared and so would increase the amount of excess profits tax imposed on the company for that period :—

HELD : (i) in calculating capital for the purposes of excess profits tax or in deducting “ debts ” which would reduce the amount of that capital, the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, sched. VII, pt. II, required that the debts should be “ real debts ” existing at the time.

A (ii) the calculation of capital in a given chargeable accounting period could not be affected by something which did not exist, even in futuro, as either a debt or a receipt referable to that period.

B (iii) under para. 4 of pt. II of sched. VII to the Act of 1939, if the contrary is not shown, then, for the purpose of ascertaining the average amount of capital, profits or losses made in the relevant period shall be deemed to have resulted, as they accrued, in a corresponding increase or decrease in the capital employed, but in this case the contrary was conclusively shown, for, whatever might be the correction ultimately arrived at in the figure of profits in 1941, the mere expectation that negotiations to be entered into might result in an agreed variation of the prices charged did not and could not result in a change in the capital employed in the year 1941.

(iv) the sum in question should not, therefore, be deducted in computing the capital of the company for the chargeable accounting period Jan. 1 to Dec. 31, 1941.

APPEAL by the Crown from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD GREENE, M.R., SOMERVELL and COHEN, L.JJ.), dated Mar. 6, 1945, and reported [1946] 1 All E.R. 546, reversing a decision of MACNAGHTEN, J., dated Nov. 8, 1945, and reported ibid.

E The Special Commissioners held that the sum of £2,743,469, being the agreed amount of a rebate for 1941 on the price of goods payable and subsequently paid to the Ministry of Aircraft Production by the respondent company under a certain agreement, was an “ accruing liability ” within the Finance Act, 1940, s. 34 (4), and should, accordingly, be deducted in computing the capital of the company for excess profits tax for the chargeable accounting period from Jan. 1 to Dec. 31, 1941. On an appeal by way of Case Stated MACNAGHTEN, J., upheld the decision of the commissioners, but the Court of Appeal reversed this decision.
F The Crown appealed.

The Solicitor General (Sir Frank Soskice, K.C.) and Reginald P. Hills for the Crown.

Frederick Grant, K.C., and J. S. Scrimgeour, K.C., for the company.

The House took time for consideration.

G VISCOUNT SIMON : My Lords, notwithstanding the sustained and vigorous argument put before the House by counsel for the Crown, I have reached the conclusion that the judgment pronounced by LORD GREENE, M.R., from which the Crown appeals, cannot be successfully challenged and that the conclusion at which the Court of Appeal arrived in reversing the decision of MACNAGHTEN, J., is right.

H The respondent company manufactures aluminium products and during the war it sold these to customers who, in turn, incorporated the articles supplied in aeroplanes which were purchased by the Ministry of Aircraft Production. All the contracts under which aluminium products were sold by the company were made at fixed prices, and in no case did these contracts provide for any variation of the prices therein specified. The company was at all material times a member of the Wrought Light Alloys Association. On Dec. 16, 1939, a letter was written by the Air Ministry to the association confirming an agreement which had been reached to the effect that during the period from July 1, 1939, to June 30, 1940, prices for certain products manufactured by the members of the association should be reduced by amounts specified in a list. The letter further stated that negotiations were to be entered into not later than June 30, 1940, by representatives of the Air Ministry and of the association in regard to the prices to be charged for the supply of wrought light aluminium alloys (which description may be treated as covering the aluminium products manufactured and sold by the company) after that date. It will be observed that the agreement in regard to prices after June 30, 1940, only provided that negotiations should be entered into. It cannot be construed as meaning that, if negotiations failed to produce agreement, reasonable prices should be substituted for the prices actually charged. In fact, no negotiations were entered into before June 30, 1940, but at a meeting held in November, 1941, the question of reduced prices for goods and the payment of rebate to the Ministry for periods in respect of transactions entered into not earlier than Jan. 1, 1941, was discussed. No discussions took place with regard to any reduction of prices at which goods had been sold by members of the association during the six months from July 1, 1940, to Dec. 31, 1940, and no reduction in prices was ever made nor were any rebates ever paid for that period. A B

On Oct. 12, 1942, heads of agreement were drawn up between the Minister of Aircraft Production, the association, and the member firms of the association (which would include the company) which were intended to continue in force until the end of 1943 and to ensure that prices left only a reduced profit in the hands of manufacturers. This agreement regulated prices for the years 1941, 1942 and 1943 and provided that what was called a rebate in respect of the prices at which goods had been supplied by members of the association to their customers should be paid over to the Ministry. This arrangement, of course, involved an adjustment in the prices charged by the manufacturers of aeroplanes for the machines which they supplied to the government. The result of this was that the profit made by the company, calculated for the purpose of assessment to excess profits tax for the calendar year 1941, which originally stood at the figure of £3,371,120, was subsequently reduced by the sum of £2,743,469, which was the amount of the payment under the agreement of Oct. 12, 1942, made by the company to the Ministry late in 1943. The reduction of profit was manifestly referable to the trading year 1941, and, in accordance with the well-known decision in the Woolcombers' case (1), the accounts of the company as between themselves and the Revenue were "re-opened" and the smaller figure of profit now ascertained to be correct was substituted for the original figure of profit in that year. The Crown now contends that since this correction has been made retrospectively in calculating the profits of 1941, the company must submit to a new calculation of the capital employed in the business of the company in the corresponding chargeable accounting period. The result would be to reduce the figure of standard profits with which the profits of the year 1941 have to be compared and so to increase the amount of excess profits tax imposed on the company for that period. C D E F

It is doubtless true that where a trader who comes within the scope of the excess profits tax makes a profit on his year's trading, that profit, so far as it is still in his hands, may enter into the calculation of capital, within the meaning of pt. II of sched. VII to the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, for such profit is an asset which remains intact and is available and may be required for the purposes of his trade or business. On the other hand, such profit or part of it may have been used during the year in the purchase of other assets, and in those circumstances to treat the figure of profits as a net increase to assets in the shape of additional money, when the whole or part of it has been transformed into a material asset like new machinery or further stock, would be to count it twice over. There is no dispute, I imagine, between the Revenue and accountants as to the making of the proper adjustments. A very different question, however, arises when the ultimate figure of profits cannot be ascertained at the time from the transactions of the year, but is (as in this case) arrived at by substantial correction years afterwards. By para. 2 of pt. II of sched. VII, debts owing by the taxpayer are to be deducted in calculating for the purposes of tax the amount of the capital employed in the trade or business, but in the present case the company did not, in the period for which the amount of capital is being calculated, owe any debt of £2,743,469 at all. Since the capital in any accounting period is assets minus debts, the calculation of capital for 1941 cannot be modified by G H deducting something which was not, in 1941, a debt at all. MACNAGHTEN, J., construed the letter of Dec. 16, 1939, as though it amounted to a contract that, if the contemplated negotiations did not result in agreement, a reasonable price was to be substituted for the sale price, but the Solicitor-General rightly repudiated this interpretation. The company were never under any obligation or liability to surrender part of the sale price until they agreed to do so in October, 1942, after the calculation of capital for the year 1941 had been correctly made.

- A A mere prospect that negotiations in the future might involve a return of some portion of the profit can no more affect the calculation of capital, according to the prescriptions of the Act, than would a prospect that in the future the company's customers might be benevolently disposed to pay them some additional amount. The assets of the company available for carrying on their trade or business in the year 1941 would neither be diminished nor increased by such speculation. It seems to me, therefore, that the Master of the Rolls was perfectly right in insisting that, in calculating capital for the purposes of excess profits tax or in deducting "debts" which would reduce the amount of that capital, what the statute requires is that the debts should be "real debts" existing at the time. He goes on ([1946] 1 All E.R. 551):

- C You cannot earn profits on a notional debt—it is not an asset. It is not an asset which would ever appear in a balance sheet. It must be in the balance sheet for the year as an existing asset, not something which is written back by a re-opening of the balance sheet in some subsequent year so as to let in something which in that year was not an asset at all . . . It is quite impossible to treat a receipt, which . . . is to be written back into a previous year for the purpose of ascertaining the profits, as being an asset in the shape of a debt within the meaning of these capital provisions.

- D It was suggested in argument before the House that the provisions in pt. II of the schedule for computing capital are in themselves so artificial that there was no difficulty in adopting the further artificiality for which the Crown contended, but it is not the description of the assets which go to make up capital which is artificial, it is the method of quantifying them, e.g., treating an asset acquired by purchase as valued at the price at which it was bought, even though it has lost nearly all its value, as in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Terence Byron Ltd. (2), which departs from proper business and accountancy practice. It is, I think, clear on the words of the existing statutory provisions that the calculation of capital in a given chargeable accounting period cannot be affected by something which did not exist, even in futuro, as either a debt or a receipt referable to that period.

- E The Crown advanced a further argument based on an amending section to be found in the Finance Act, 1940. Section 34 (4) of that Act adds to para. 2 (1) of pt. II of sched. VII enacted in the previous year the following words:

- F The debts to be deducted under this sub-paragraph shall include—(a) any such sums in respect of accruing liabilities as are allowable as a deduction in computing profits for the purposes of excess profits tax, or would have been so allowable if the period for which the amount of capital is being computed had been a chargeable accounting period; and (b) in the case of the business of an assurance company, also any sums representing profits of its life assurance business belonging or allocated to, or reserved for, or expended on behalf of, policy holders or annuitants (being sums which would be excluded under sub-s. (1) of section sixteen of the Finance Act, 1923, in computing the profits of the company for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts), and all the said sums shall be deducted notwithstanding that they have not become payable.

- G The Crown contended that this sum of £2,743,469 was an "accruing liability" under (a) and attempted to support this contention, which, in my opinion, is quite unsound, by pointing out that para. (b) referred to something which was not, properly speaking, a "debt," for it dealt with sums representing profits of life assurance business which were set aside for the benefit of policyholders, and the like. Hence, it was said, when the section above quoted provides that deductible debts "shall include (b)" this is bringing within the category of debts something which is not properly speaking a debt at all. I venture to think that the Master of the Rolls' argument on the implication of the word "include" was somewhat overstressed, but it makes no difference in the result, for there seems no ground at all for saying that because what is dealt with in (b) is not, strictly speaking, a debt, therefore a sum "in respect of accruing liabilities" in (a) is not strictly speaking a liability at all, but is a phrase wide enough to include an unascertained figure which either may, or may not, result from a future negotiation.

Finally, agreement must be made to para. 4 of pt. II of sched. VII to the Act of 1939 which runs as follows :

4. For the purpose of ascertaining the average amount of capital employed in a trade or business during any period, the profits or losses made in that period shall, except so far as the contrary is shown, be deemed—(a) to have accrued at an even rate throughout the period; and (b) to have resulted, as they accrued, in a corresponding increase or decrease, as the case may be, in the capital employed in the trade or business.

That paragraph does, indeed, imply that profits or losses made in a chargeable accounting period may affect the calculation of the average amount of capital employed in that period. But the important words for the present purpose are “except so far as the contrary is shown.” If the contrary is not shown then, for the purpose of ascertaining the average amount of capital, profits or losses made in the relevant period shall be deemed to have resulted, as they accrued, in a corresponding increase or decrease in the capital employed. But in the present case the contrary is conclusively shown, for, whatever may be the correction ultimately arrived at in the figure of profits in 1941, the mere expectation that negotiations to be entered into might result in an agreed variation of the prices charged did not and could not result in a change in the capital employed in the year 1941. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

LORD WRIGHT : My Lords, I agree.

LORD SIMONDS : My Lords, I also agree.

LORD NORMAND (read by LORD SIMONDS) : My Lords, I find myself in agreement with what has been said by VISCOUNT SIMON, and also in agreement with the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, to which I cannot usefully add anything.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

FRANKLIN v. MINISTER OF TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Oaksey, Morton and Tucker, L.JJ.), March 20, 21, 24, 1947.]

Town and Country Planning—New town—Objections—Onus of proof—Duty of Minister—Need to support proposed order by evidence at public inquiry—New Towns Act, 1946 (c. 68), s. 1 (1) ; sched. I (3).

Pursuant to the New Towns Act, 1946, sched. I, para. 3, the Minister of Town and Country Planning held a public local inquiry into objections to a proposed order under s. 1 (1) of that Act, called the Stevenage New Town Designation Order, 1946, by which Stevenage was designated as a “new town” within the Act. Before the Act became law, the Minister had stated that Stevenage was to be the first of the “new towns.” At the inquiry, no evidence in support of the order was adduced, and the objections then made were subsequently considered and rejected by the Minister. He dealt in writing with the substance of all objections except that directed to the difficulties of water supply and sewage disposal, with regard to which he said he was taking advice, having in mind a scheme which representatives of the Metropolitan Water Board and the Lee Conservancy had agreed would meet the difficulty.

HELD : (i) the inquiry under sched. I, para. 3, was to be held with respect to “any objection,” to the proposed order and not with respect to the proposed order itself, and, therefore, there was no obligation on the Minister to call evidence at the inquiry in support of his proposed order.

Re the Trunk Roads Act, 1936, [1939] 2 All E.R. 464, approved.

(ii) the only obligation which rested on the Minister after the inquiry was fairly and bona fide to consider the report of the person by whom the inquiry was held, and after consultation, under s. 1 of the Act, with any local authorities who appeared to him to be concerned, to decide whether it was expedient in the national interest that the new town should be developed as proposed. The objectors had failed to discharge the onus which was on them to show that this obligation had not been carried out and to provide evidence of bias.

Decision of HENN COLLINS, J. ([1947] 1 All E.R. 396) affirmed reversed

When applications are made to the court to quash orders made by Ministers in housing and town planning matters it is desirable that the notice of motion and the affidavits in support thereof should state the matters of complaint and objection with precision and particularity.

[EDITORIAL NOTE.] In an Editorial Note to Phoenix Assurance Co., Ltd. v. Minister of Town and Country Planning (ante p. 454) it was pointed out that that case, with the decision of HENN COLLINS, J., in the present case (ante p. 396), limited the powers of the Minister of Town and Country Planning when making orders under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944, and the New Towns Act, 1946, in the same manner as that in which the powers of the Minister of Health under the Housing Acts have been restricted in relation to the confirmation of clearance and compulsory purchase orders. In other words, the functions of the Minister were held to be quasi-judicial and his powers must be exercised judicially. The decision of HENN COLLINS, J., in the present case, is now reversed, but it is important to remember that the reversal is on the facts and that his decision on the scope of the Minister's authority is accepted.

APPEAL of the Minister of Town and Country Planning from an order of HENN COLLINS, J., dated Feb. 20, 1947, reported [1947] 1 All E.R. 396.

On Nov. 11, 1946, the Minister after having held a public local inquiry, made the Stevenage New Town Designation Order, 1946. The objectors, who were residents of Stevenage, opposed the order, and appealed to the court on the grounds that (1) the Minister had not acted within his powers in making the order, and that (2) in considering the objections to the proposed order he failed to carry his duty to give the objections fair and proper consideration. HENN COLLINS, J., held that the order was not ultra vires, but that the Minister had been biased in his consideration of the objections, and he, therefore, quashed the order. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD OAKSEY, L.J., and are summarised in the headnote.

The Attorney-General (Sir Hartley Shawcross, K.C.) and H. L. Parker for the Minister.

Capewell, K.C., and Squibb for the objectors.

LORD OAKSEY, L.J. : The material provisions of the New Towns Act, 1946, are as follows. By s. 1 :

- (1) If the Minister is satisfied, after consultation with any local authorities who appear to him to be concerned, that it is expedient in the national interest that any area of land should be developed as a new town by a corporation established under this Act, he may make an order designating that area as the site of the proposed new town.
- (2) The provisions of sched. 1 to this Act shall have effect with respect to the procedure to be followed in connection with the making of orders under this section . . . (3) An order under this section may include in the area designated as the site of the proposed new town any existing town or other centre of population, and references in this Act to a new town or proposed new town shall be construed accordingly.

That would make it possible for the town of Stevenage to be included in the area to be designated. By para. 1 of sched. I :

Where the Minister proposes to make an order under s. 1 of this Act, he shall prepare a draft of the order, describing the area to be designated as the site of the proposed new town by reference to a map, either with or without descriptive matter (which, in the case of any discrepancy with the map, shall prevail except in so far as may be otherwise provided by the draft order) together with such statement as the Minister considers necessary for indicating the size and general character of the proposed new town.

Paragraph 2 prescribes the details which have to be published. Paragraphs 3 and 4 are the most important. By para. 3 :

If any objection is duly made to the proposed order and is not withdrawn, the Minister shall, before making the order, cause a public local inquiry to be held with respect thereto, and shall consider the report of the person by whom the inquiry was held.

By para. 4 :

Subject to the provisions of the last foregoing paragraph, the Minister may make the order either in terms of the draft or subject to such modifications as he thinks fit.

I need not read the proviso.

The application to quash the order which the Minister had made in this case was made on the allegation that, when he made that order, he was biased and had not fairly or bona fide considered the report of the person by whom the inquiry was held or the objections which had been made to the proposed order. The facts are as follows. On May 6, 1946, before the New Towns Act, 1946, had been passed on Aug. 1, 1946, the Minister attended at Stevenage Town Hall and made a speech. Before that the Abercrombie Report had been issued indicating the desirability of certain new towns being formed round London, and a committee, called the New Towns Committee, of which Lord Reith was chairman, had been set up by the government and had issued an interim report of which para. 16 stated :

Stevenage is suggested in the Greater London Plan, 1944, as one of the new towns in the outer ring round London. We are informed that the development of this town is a matter of urgency . . .

They added this recommendation :

Arrangements should be made for setting up immediately a public corporation for the development of a new town at Stevenage to proceed with the necessary work in advance of legislation.

It was contended, inter alia, that those passages in the interim report showed that the government, and the Minister of Town and Country Planning in particular, had made up their minds that Stevenage was to be one of the new towns under the Act which they anticipated would be passed. When the Minister of Town and Country Planning made his speech at Stevenage the Act had not been passed, the Bill at that time being before the House of Commons. In his speech the Minister used expressions which, it is said, showed his bias and that he had determined that Stevenage should be one of these new towns. In the course of his speech, he said : " I want to carry out in Stevenage a daring exercise in town planning." At that point, according to the reporter, there were jeers and he said : " It is no good your jeering. It is going to be done (applause and boos, and cries of ' Dictator ')." Later on he said : " The project will go forward because it must go forward. It will do so more surely and more smoothly, and more successfully with your help and co-operation." Again, before answering written and verbal questions, he said : " I had a talk with members of your council this afternoon. I am perfectly ready, as I said to your council, to discuss any alternative proposals which will produce an equally good result. That must be a condition. Any alternative plan put forward must be as good as the plan I have submitted to you. I am prepared to consider any reasonable alternative subject to that." On behalf of the objectors it is contended that that does not refer to any alternative other than the adoption of Stevenage as the new town, that is to say, it was based on Stevenage as being the new town. The Minister further said : " While I will consult as far as possible all the local authorities, at the end, if people become fractious and unreasonable, I shall have to carry out my duty. (Voice : ' Gestapo ')." Those were the principal passages in the speech which are complained of as showing that the Minister at that time had already made up his mind that Stevenage was to be one of the new towns, and it is argued that when, under the first clause of the Bill which became the Act of 1946 and sched. I, the Minister had to consider the objections which were made to the proposal, he approached that question, not in a fair-minded way, but with a closed mind, as it has been called, and that he never lost the attitude of mind which he had when he made that speech. The interim

A report by the New Towns Committee was also relied on as showing that not only the Minister but the whole government had made up their minds that Stevenage should be a new town. It was also pointed out that the speech was not an ordinary impromptu speech, but that it had been settled in advance, the greater part of it being handed to the Press, although the passages to which I have referred, or some of them, were evidently inspired by the hostile attitude of some of those at the meeting.

B On Aug. 1, 1946, the Bill became law with the provisions already read, and on Aug. 3, the Minister prepared the draft Stevenage New Town (Designation) Order, 1946, which was published on Aug. 6. Objections were then made by a number of residents in the area concerned, one on behalf of farmers and one on behalf of certain other residents. There were three main objectors. They were all heard before the officer, a civil engineer, who was appointed as an

C inspector to hold the public local inquiry prescribed by the schedule. That inquiry was held on Oct. 7 and 8, 1946. On Oct. 25, the inspector made a report to the Minister of Town and Country Planning. On Nov. 7, 1946, the Minister issued a letter which discussed each of the most important objections which had been made at the inquiry. Our attention has not been drawn to any other objections which should, or might, have been referred to in that letter. It discussed each objection in turn and gave reasons for not thinking that the objections were such as to make the scheme an improper one to carry out.

D In para. 13 of the letter the Minister discussed the questions of water supply and sewage disposal, both of which had been raised at the public inquiry, evidence having been given on behalf of the Metropolitan Water Board on the question of water supply, and, on sewage disposal, by the officers of the Lee Conservancy Board. The letter stated :

E The problems arising from the provision of an adequate water supply and of efficient sewage disposal for the new town, and the consequent effects on the River Lee and London's water supplies, were the subject of representation by the Metropolitan Water Board, the Lee Conservancy Board and the Lee Conservancy Catchment Board. These problems have been taken into account from the beginning and have been the subject of discussions with the Ministry of Health from an early stage and subsequently with the Metropolitan Water Board and Lee Conservancy Board. After carefully examining the representations made to him, the Minister feels justified in going forward with the

F establishment of a properly planned community and will maintain close contact with the Ministry of Health and the statutory undertakers at every stage of the development. It has been fully recognised from the outset that every possible precaution must be taken to protect London's water supplies from any avoidable risk of pollution. The Minister has, accordingly, appointed a consultant to examine the possibilities of a scheme which will apply to a much wider area than that of the immediate vicinity of Stevenage. As regards the disposal of surface water, the Minister is satisfied that the problems involved can be dealt with effectively and he will ensure that the responsible Government Departments and the interested local authorities are consulted as to the measures to be adopted.

G It is in that paragraph that HENN COLLINS, J., has found the evidence of bias on which he has quashed this order. The evidence which had been produced on behalf of the Metropolitan Water Board and the Lee Conservancy Board was that the amount of sewage which was to be expected if a town of 60,000 inhabitants were established at Stevenage would pollute the River Lee and also the water supply of the city of London unless it were carried into the Lee below the intake of the Metropolitan Water Board from the Lee, and that, if that were done, it would involve the transport of a large amount of water from the River Thames into the River Lee to make up for the amount of water which was taken out of the Lee.

H Besides raising those objections the Metropolitan Water Board and the Lee Conservancy Board also proved that some years before, quite apart from this question of a new town at Stevenage, a scheme had been thought out for the water supplies and the sewage disposal of a very much larger area in that part of Hertfordshire which would satisfactorily dispose of all their difficulties. It was a wide and comprehensive scheme and the representatives of the Metropolitan Water Board and of the Lee Conservancy Board agreed that that scheme would meet the difficulty. It is that scheme to which the Minister alludes when he says that he "has, accordingly, appointed a consultant to examine the possibilities of a scheme which will apply to a much wider area than that of the immediate vicinity of Stevenage." But quite apart from that scheme, the only objection of the Metropolitan Water Board and the Lee Conservancy Board to the project of forming a new town at Stevenage was really the question of the expense of bringing water from the River Thames into the River Lee. It was never suggested that it was an entirely impracticable scheme. On Nov. 11, 1946, the Minister made the order which has been quashed designating Stevenage as a new town.

The application by the objectors to HENN COLLINS, J., to quash the order was made on affidavit evidence. In answer to the affidavits which were filed by the objectors, which summarised the objections which they had raised before the officer who held the inquiry, the Minister made an affidavit in which he set out the facts and said :

Before causing the said order [of Nov. 11] to be made, I personally carefully considered all the objections made by the objectors, including the present applicants, together with the submissions made and evidence given on their behalf as appearing in the said transcript. I also carefully considered the report of the said Arnold Morris. Prior to preparing the draft of the said order, I had before me, and had considered, a mass of information collected by my Ministry including the report of the Royal Commission on the Distribution of Industrial Population, 1940, Sir Patrick Abercrombie's Greater London Plan, 1944, and the reports of the New Towns Committee, dated Jan. 21, Apr. 9, and July 25, 1946. I had also consulted with all local authorities who appeared to me to be concerned, and also with the Ministry of Agriculture and the Ministry of Health. Subsequent to the preparation of the draft order and up to the time when I caused the said order to be made on Nov. 11, 1946, I obtained no further information, and in deciding to make the said order I had regard to nothing other than the matters set out in para. 8 hereof and the information above referred to. I came to the conclusion that it was expedient in the national interest that the proposed site should be developed as a new town.

Notwithstanding that the Minister had made that affidavit and that the objectors were charging the Minister with bias and with not having fairly considered the objections and report, no application was made to cross-examine him, which, in my opinion, would have been the fair way in which to substantiate allegations that the speech made on May 6, 1946, showed that his mind was already made up and that what he had said in his affidavit was not true. If that matter was to be gone into, as it would be gone into in the ordinary administration of justice, it would have been fair that he should be cross-examined and given an opportunity of answering the allegations. That was not done, however.

HENN COLLINS, J., referring to that speech, said (ante p. 398) :

He was bound, in my judgment, to bring to bear on the controversy between himself, as Minister, and the objectors, as the complainants of his administration, a mind open to conviction. The next question is, did the Minister do so? If I am to judge by what he said at the public meeting which was held very shortly before the Bill, then published, became an Act of Parliament, I could have no doubt but that any issue raised by objectors was forejudged. The Minister's language leaves no doubt about that. He was not saying there must be and shall be satellite towns, but he was saying that Stevenage was to be the first of them. But when he made that speech, and gave his answers to questions which were asked, he had no administrative functions in relation to the Act in question, for the Act had not then been passed. Though that was his attitude two days before the Bill received its second reading, it is on the objectors to prove that the Minister was in a like mind, or, at least, had not an open mind, from and after, at latest, the inception of the public inquiry, which was held in Oct., 1946.

In my opinion, the judge was right as a matter of law in saying that the onus rested on the objectors to show that the Minister had not an open mind when he made the order. I am prepared to assume his finding of fact for the purposes of my judgment, although I make no finding on it, that the Minister had been biased when he made his speech. I assume that it was clear, as the judge himself thought, and as I agree, that it was necessary for the objectors to show that that state of mind was continuing up to the time of the order. The judge goes on to say, after considering further the question of the attitude of mind which the Minister should have (ante p. 399):

This is to say not that, in making his decision, he must exclude from his consideration any of the material which was in his mind before the objections were made, but that he must weigh all fairly together. If objections have been raised which, in his honest opinion, are met by other information, albeit extra-judicial, he may simply overrule the objections and the objectors cannot complain. If he says nothing, but simply confirms the order, this court might have little, if any, ground for saying that he had not acted fairly in the light of all his information . . . In this case, however, as was only to be expected of him, the Minister has dealt, in writing, with the substance of the objections [that is by the letter of Nov. 7] with one exception, namely, that directed to the difficulties of water supply and sewage disposal. It is obvious that those difficulties must be met before the scheme can go through. The Minister acknowledges that they have not been met, and that he is taking advice as to how it can be done.

Non constat that any way will be found, and yet with that fundamental problem still outstanding, the Minister confirms his order. How can it be said that he weighed the objection with an open mind when he acknowledges that he did not, and does not, know the force of it?

For that reason, and for that reason alone, as I read this judgment, the judge quashes the order.

In my opinion, the evidence with reference to the disposal of sewage and water supplies and the way in which the matter was considered at the inquiry and in the letter of the Minister of Nov. 7, written before making the order, afford no evidence of bias whatever. It is clear that, on the designation of the new town in the way in which it had to be designated, all the problems raised by the establishment of such a new town could not possibly be gone into in detail. If it had been proved, or if there had been evidence before the Minister, that the question of water supply and sewage disposal could not be carried out—that it was absolutely impracticable—it is possible, in my opinion, that HENN COLLINS, J., might have been right. That, however, was not the evidence before the inspector who held the inquiry. It is quite clear from the evidence and from the Minister's letter that those problems were capable of solution, and it was, therefore, no evidence of bias on the part of the Minister that he should make the order before the particular way in which the problems should be solved had been decided. For those reasons, I am unable to agree with the judge's quashing of the order.

Another point was raised before us. It was argued that the public inquiry which was held was not a proper public local inquiry within the meaning of para. 3 of sched. I to the Act of 1946 because there had been at the inquiry no representative of the Minister of Town and Country Planning and no witnesses had been called on his behalf and the case for the designation of Stevenage had not been put. It was argued that in all analogous cases it had been held that the case for both sides must be put forward before the inspector who held the public local inquiry. The point that the inquiry was not being properly held was not taken at the inquiry, as, in my opinion, it ought to have been taken if the point was going to be raised on appeal. All that was done was that it was suggested to the inspector at the inquiry that witnesses ought to be called in support of the draft order, but it was never suggested that, on the true construction of the New Towns Act, the inquiry was not being properly held. In all the authorities which have been referred to as shewing that at an inquiry there must be an examination of the case of both sides, there was what has been called a lis, that is to say, there were two parties contesting and the Minister as an outside party was deciding the contest. In such a case, it seems obvious, that each of the parties must have the opportunity of calling any evidence which he wishes to call, and, if he is prevented from calling it, he is not being properly treated. It cannot, however, be said that he is under any obligation to call any particular witnesses or any witness at all. I do not think it is necessary to go into all the cases which have been cited to us on this point. Re the Trunk Roads Act, 1936 (1) is the only case which is truly analogous to the present case, for there, there was no lis, as here there is no lis, and, as here, the Minister in question was a judge in the matter in which he was himself interested from the public point of view. It was there a question of a trunk road, and this very argument was raised. It was held, to quote the headnote in the Law Reports, that :

... while the position of the Minister was peculiar in that he was both the person making the order and the person holding, by his inspector, an inquiry into it, it was not his duty to call evidence before the inquiry but the duty of the objectors to state their objections and call such evidence as they might be advised. Nothing had taken place at the inquiry which made it necessary to quash the order.

LORD HEWART, C.J., giving the judgment of the court said ([1939] 2 K.B. 522, 523) :

No evidence was called on behalf of the Minister, and as the object of the inquiry was to hear objections to the proposals it was not essential that evidence should be called on his behalf. It was for the objectors to state their objections and to call such evidence as they might think proper in support of those objections.

That is, we are told, the only case in which there had been a similar form of inquiry—an inquiry in which the Minister was both judge and at the same time to a certain extent an interested party. As that case was decided in that way, it seems impossible to argue successfully that Parliament, when it passed para. 3 of sched. I to the Act of 1946, intended to take a different view of the law from that which had been taken in that case. In my opinion, the true construction of para. 3 of sched. I to the New Towns Act, 1946, is that the objections are to be heard at the public local inquiry which is “to be held with respect thereto,” that is to say, with respect to the objections, and there is no obligation on the inspector to insist on having the case in favour of the order put forward by anybody on behalf of the Minister. The only obligation which, in my opinion, rests, on the Minister after that inquiry has been held is fairly and bona fide to consider the report of the person who held it, and, under s. 1 of the Act his duty is, after fairly and bona fide considering that report, to satisfy himself, after consultation with any local authorities who appear to him to be concerned, whether or not it is expedient in the national interest that the area of land in question should be developed as a new town.

I express no opinion on the policy of the Act. Those are matters with which we have nothing to do. The only question which we have to decide is whether, accepting that construction of the statute, which is in reality that which HENN COLLINS, J., himself adopted, there is any evidence that the Minister did not act in accordance with its terms. In my opinion, the evidence which is relied on by the judge is no evidence of bias, and I think that, in view of the affidavit of the Minister stating what he actually considered and in view of his letter of Nov. 7, 1946, in which he set out the considerations which led him to make the order, the objectors have not discharged the onus which rested on them of showing that the Minister was, when he made the order, in any way biased. I am of opinion, therefore, that the appeal ought to be allowed.

MORTON, L.J. : I agree. On the threshold of this case lies the question : What is the true construction of para. 3 of sched. I to the New Towns Acts, 1946 ? I entirely agree that in that paragraph the words “with respect thereto” mean “with respect to the objections.” It is with respect to the objections that the public local inquiry is to be held. What was the duty of the Minister, having regard to the terms of the Act of 1946 ? In my view, it was his duty to consider, with a perfectly open mind, the report made after the public local inquiry and any other information which might have come to his notice as a result of other inquiries which he had made—inquiries for instance of local authorities who appeared to him to be concerned, under s. 1 of the Act, and of experts whom he might have consulted with a view to obtaining assistance on the matter. It was his duty to consider all these matters with an open mind and to decide in good faith whether it was or was not “expedient in the national interest” that the area of land in question should be developed as a new town. I understood the Attorney-General assented to this view of the matter for the purpose only of the present case. That being the duty of the Minister, I think it clear, as the judge held, that it is for the objectors to satisfy the court that he has not carried out that duty.

With regard to the speech which the Minister made on May 6, 1946, I will only add that it was after that speech had been made that Parliament designated, as the person to give the decision under s. 1, the Minister of Town and Country

Planning. Moreover, after the Act had been passed there occurred these successive stages—first, there were objections by certain individuals and bodies; secondly, there was a public local inquiry which was followed by the letter of Nov. 7, to which my Lord has referred, dealing with the objections and giving the Minister's views on them; and, finally, on Nov. 11, 1946, the Minister made the order which had previously been only a draft order.

A The judge arrived at the conclusion that the objectors had made out their case that the Minister started with a closed mind and retained a closed mind throughout these stages, and I think that he based his judgment very largely, if not entirely, on the position with regard to the disposal of sewage and the water supply. I do not wish to recapitulate what has already been stated with regard to that by my Lord, but I feel that, if the judge's attention had been called to the speeches made at the inquiry on behalf of the Metropolitan Water Board and the Lee Conservancy Board and to the evidence which was given at that inquiry by persons called on behalf of those two bodies, he might well have arrived at a different conclusion. In the course of his judgment he said, "Non constat that any way will be found." I think that he had it in mind that it might turn out to be impossible to dispose satisfactorily of the sewage of the new town and to carry out the proposed scheme without interfering with the water supply to London. In my view, it is clear, on the evidence which was given and the speeches which were made at the inquiry, that

B neither of the bodies in question took the view that this was impossible. They suggested how it could be done, although they did take the view that it would be expensive and, no doubt, would involve a considerable amount of work. The Minister, however, may well have thought that, expensive and difficult as these arrangements might prove to be, yet, balancing the whole matter and having regard, not only to the interests of the inhabitants of one locality, but to the national interest as a whole, the order ought to be made.

C As a result of the provisions of the Act the matter has finally to be decided by a Minister who has himself drafted the proposed order. It is contemplated that objections will be decided by that Minister, although in a sense he is a judge in his own cause, after an inquiry which, according to the usual practice, is held by an official of the Ministry of Town and Country Planning. That, no doubt, places the Minister in a difficult position, but the burden is on the objectors to show that he has in any way failed to discharge his duty, and I agree that they have not established that. It must not be overlooked that the Minister swore an affidavit in which he said, in effect, that he had discharged his duty, and that the objectors did not choose to cross-examine him on it.

D As regards the final point of counsel for the objectors, that no proper public local inquiry was held, as my Lord has pointed out, the form which the inquiry took was not challenged at the inquiry itself. In the course of his address to the inspector, counsel said: "I know that this form of inquiry is prescribed under the Act and I know that of necessity the Minister is, so to speak, the promoter." He then went on to point out certain objections to the form of procedure, but he does not appear to have raised the point at the inquiry that it was incumbent on the Minister to call evidence. However that may be, and allowing him, as he has been allowed, to raise the question on appeal, I agree with the observations of the Divisional Court, in Re the Trunk Roads Act, 1936 (1), which have already been read by my Lord. The decision in that case is not binding on this court, but, in my view, these observations were correct and apply equally to the present case. I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

E As regards the final point of counsel for the objectors, that no proper public local inquiry was held, as my Lord has pointed out, the form which the inquiry took was not challenged at the inquiry itself. In the course of his address to the inspector, counsel said: "I know that this form of inquiry is prescribed under the Act and I know that of necessity the Minister is, so to speak, the promoter." He then went on to point out certain objections to the form of procedure, but he does not appear to have raised the point at the inquiry that it was incumbent on the Minister to call evidence. However that may be, and allowing him, as he has been allowed, to raise the question on appeal, I agree with the observations of the Divisional Court, in Re the Trunk Roads Act, 1936 (1), which have already been read by my Lord. The decision in that case is not binding on this court, but, in my view, these observations were correct and apply equally to the present case. I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

F TUCKER, L.J.: I also agree. With regard to para. 13 of the Minister's letter of Nov. 7, which was the decisive matter in HENN COLLINS, J.'s judgment, with all respect to him, I cannot read that paragraph, standing by itself, as indicating bias on the part of the Minister. When I say "bias" I mean lack of bona fides, as indicating the existence of a determination to approach this matter with a closed mind. The paragraph itself states in terms that he has carefully examined the representations made to him on this matter and that he feels justified in going forward with the establishment of a properly planned community. I need not read the other words in that paragraph. I find it quite impossible, reading it by itself, to say that it is an indication of lack of bona fides on the part of the Minister. It may—and it is not for me to express any view on that point—indicate a very unfortunate decision on the merits, but that is a matter of a totally different kind. I thought it right to say that, for HENN COLLINS, J. had not before him the material which we have had on this aspect of the matter, but, judging the matter only on the material before the judge, I should have come to a different conclusion, and I may say that, subject to anything that counsel might have been going to say, I had definitely come to that conclusion before the evidence and speeches at the inquiry were read to this court. A

I think that what has happened in this case indicates the desirability, when applications of this kind are made to the court, that the notice of motion and the affidavits in support thereof should state with precision and particularity the matters which are going to be relied on as indicating bias. The notice of motion and the affidavits here make no mention whatever of para. 13 of the letter of Nov. 7, which was eventually the decisive matter in HENN COLLINS, J.'s judgment. I feel convinced—at any rate, I think it highly probable—that, if those affidavits had contained a reference to this matter, the Minister would have dealt with it in his affidavit. As it was, he did not, and that is how it came about that this court admitted the affidavits setting out the speeches at the local inquiry and the evidence in support thereof. That evidence, incidentally, had already been exhibited to an affidavit which had not been used in the court below. Thus, this court admitted those further affidavits and that further evidence in order to investigate further this matter which arose under para. 13. The evidence and the speeches having been admitted, I for myself feel confident that, if HENN COLLINS, J. had had that material before him, he would not have arrived at the decision at which he did arrive. I entirely agree with the judgments which have been delivered on the other matters. B C D

Appeal allowed.

Divorce—Nullity—Marriage by proxy—Validity.

The celebration of marriage by proxy is a matter of the form of the ceremony or proceeding and is not an essential of the marriage, and there is no doctrine of public policy which invalidates in this country a proxy marriage celebrated in a foreign country between a person domiciled in England and a person domiciled in that country, provided that the form of the ceremony or proceeding is valid in that country and is performed strictly in accordance with the laws of that country and contains nothing abhorrent to Christian ideas. PETITION by wife for nullity of marriage on the ground that the ceremony of marriage having been performed by proxy in Argentina was invalid as being against public policy.

- C John Foster for the wife.
Colin Duncan for the King's Proctor.

Cur. adv. vult.

- Mar. 18. LORD MERRIMAN, P., read the following judgment: This is a wife's petition for nullity. On Jan. 15, 1941, while the wife was in this country, she being not only resident but domiciled, here, a ceremony of marriage was celebrated in Buenos Aires between the husband and the wife. She was represented by a person who, by power of attorney executed on Nov. 8, 1940, in London, before a notary public, she had named as her representative to contract the marriage. It is proved that the ceremony was valid and effectual by the law of the Argentine, which recognises proxy marriages, but the wife contends that it is not a marriage recognised by the law of this country. The question whether in these circumstances English law will recognise the celebration of a marriage by proxy as creating the status of marriage in this country is manifestly one of considerable public importance. There is, so far as I am aware, no English authority directly on the point. In these circumstances I invoked the assistance of the King's Proctor in the elucidation both of the facts and the law.
- D
- E

- The facts are as follows. Both parties were German nationals of Jewish origin. They were acquainted with each other when they were both living in Germany, but there was at that time no suggestion of marriage. In 1936 the husband emigrated to the Argentine as a refugee from the Nazi regime. In July, 1937, the wife and other members of her family came to England for the same reason. As regards the wife, it was admitted by the King's Proctor that she was at all material times domiciled in this country. The evidence on this point seems to me to be quite clear, and I so find. As regards the husband, whose domicile of origin was unquestionably Germany, it is quite clear from the evidence of the wife that his intention was to leave Germany for good, but I have no conclusive evidence that he had acquired a domicile of choice in the Argentine.
- G
- H
- There is no doubt, however, that he was still resident there, not only at the time of the ceremony of marriage, but also when the wife's petition, dated Dec. 4, 1945, was served on him there. It is also clear from the wife's evidence that at the time of the celebration their mutual intention was to make the matrimonial home in the Argentine when circumstances permitted. That being so, it is conceded by counsel on both sides that for the purposes of my decision I can safely ignore any question of the husband retaining his domicile of origin and can proceed on the footing that he is domiciled in the Argentine. He has certainly lived there consistently since his flight from Germany, and he is not only described in the wife's power of attorney as domiciled in the Argentine, but he is also so described in the marriage certificate. I do not ignore the possibility that the use of the word "domiciled" in these documents may not be conclusive, but I think that there is sufficient evidence to justify me in holding, as I do, that the husband at all material times had acquired a domicile of choice in the Argentine.

In 1940 the husband wrote to the wife proposing marriage. At the time it was impossible for her to travel to the Argentine owing to wartime restrictions. Eventually, on the advice of Dr. F. M. Palacios, a doctor of laws in the Argentine, who gave evidence before me, she executed before a notary public the power of attorney dated Nov. 8, 1940. The original, of course, has been filed in the marriage registry in Buenos Aires, and no copy was kept in this country, but I have a transaction of a similar power of attorney executed four days earlier before another notary public, which for some reason (I think a misdescription of the proxy) it was impossible to use. I am assured that otherwise there is no material difference between the two documents. The power of attorney recites that before the notary public and the subscribing witness the wife, described as having been born in Berlin, on Aug. 12, 1917, of named parents, domiciled at 71, Lindsay Drive, Kenton, of full age, single, capable, and known to the notary, appeared before him and said that she was engaged to be married to the husband, described as having been born in Berlin on June 7, 1916, the son of named parents, domiciled in Buenos Aires, Argentine Republic, at Sucre Street, No. 2923, single, whom she had known for many years, and that in order to contract that marriage she gave a special power to Mrs. Senta Goldglanz, nee Gundermann, of a certain address, so that in her name and as her representative she should contract the marriage in Buenos Aires with the husband, and empowering her to sign in the wife's name the respective act of marriage and any other document that might be necessary. As the marriage certificate shows, the proxy presented this power of attorney, and it is admitted that the marriage was thereupon duly celebrated in accordance with Argentine law.

The wife gave evidence, which I accept, that she had no intention of revoking the power of attorney, that she was informed in due course of the performance of the ceremony, that she was not merely ready and willing but eager to join the husband in Buenos Aires, and that she made repeated efforts to that end during the war, but that she was not allowed to leave England in spite of the marriage. Dr. Palacios proved that the husband had obtained a permit for her to enter the Argentine, but that this permit was not effective without the consent of the Argentine ambassador in London. He told me that he himself had applied to the ambassador personally for his consent, but that permission was refused on the ground that it was not convenient to allow a wife of German origin to enter the Argentine. After the war, the wife made further attempts to join her husband, but by the autumn of 1945, as the husband was no longer replying to her letters, and took no steps, in spite of her requests, to obtain or enable her to obtain a fresh permit, as was then required, she came to the conclusion that he had ceased to wish her to join him. She suggested a meeting in the United States, but this suggestion was also ignored. In these circumstances she decided to bring this petition.

I must now deal with the Argentine law on the subject as this was elucidated by Dr. Palacios. He proved that the power of attorney used in this case was valid in Argentine law to enable the proxy to contract the marriage, and that the certificate of marriage based thereon was evidence of a valid marriage. As regards the Argentine law covering proxy marriages generally, he told me that it was permissible to insert conditions, for example, that the marriage should be celebrated within a certain time limit, and that if, as here, no such time limit is expressed, the registrar might ask for confirmation if the power of attorney was of old standing. Again, the power of attorney might contain conditions defining the town where the celebration should take place, as is the case here, or even defining the particular registry office and the day and hour at which the celebration should take place, or stipulating that certain relatives should be present. He expressed the opinion that if any such conditions were not fulfilled the registrar would be obliged to refuse to perform the ceremony, but he seemed to me to be somewhat uncertain about conditions which he described as trivial, about which he thought that the registrar would have a discretion. By this I understood him to mean that, although the registrar might decide to allow the ceremony to go on, his decision about the essentiality of a particular condition would not be final, but would be subject to review by the court. He gave some very important evidence on the subject of revocation. Here, again, there appeared at first to be some confusion in his evidence, but in the result it came to this, that the intending spouse could revoke the power of attorney at any time before the ceremony, but that, if the power of attorney had been acted on before either the other spouse or the proxy had notice of the revocation, the marriage would be valid. If, however, the spouse giving the power of attorney had meanwhile lost the capacity to contract the marriage, for example, by an intervening marriage or by becoming of unsound mind, although the marriage certificate would be prima facie evidence of the ceremony having been performed, the court would declare the marriage null and void. The witness drew a clear

- A distinction between revocation by operation of law through loss of capacity to contract the marriage and revocation by the party. In the latter case he expressed, and maintained, the definite opinion that, unless either the other spouse or the proxy had notice of the revocation before the ceremony, the marriage in Argentine law would be held to be valid. He put the case of the loss or miscarriage of a letter of revocation in the following words: "If the proxy is revoked without any change of capacity and the revocation is not known to the attorney or the husband because the letter is lost in transit, a court would hold the marriage valid, but if the revocation is due to a change of capacity (for example, marriage or insanity), then the court will hold that the marriage is void." I will revert to this point later in the judgment, as it is one on which counsel for the petitioner laid great stress.

Now, as to the English law, VISCOUNT DUNEDIN in Berthiaume v. Dastous (1) ([1930] A.C. 83) said:

- C If there is one question better settled than any other in international law, it is that as regards marriage—putting aside the question of capacity—locus regit actum. If a marriage is good by the laws of the country where it is effected, it is good all the world over, no matter whether the proceeding or ceremony which constituted marriage according to the law of the place would or would not constitute marriage in the country of the domicile of one or other of the spouses. If the so-called marriage is no marriage in the place where it is celebrated, there is no marriage anywhere, although the ceremony or proceeding if conducted in the place of the parties' domicile would be considered a good marriage. These propositions are too well fixed to need much quotation.

- D This absolves me from any examination of the authorities for this proposition, but the crux of the argument put forward by counsel for the wife is that it is vital to determine what in relation to any marriage is merely, in VISCOUNT DUNEDIN's words "proceeding or ceremony." In Brook v. Brook (2) the distinction between what are described as forms and essentials is fully discussed. E That was a case in which the husband, a domiciled British subject, after the death of his wife went through a ceremony of marriage with her sister, also a domiciled British subject, in Denmark, where the marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister was valid. LORD CAMPBELL, L.C., said (9 H.L. Cas. 207):

- F There can be no doubt of the general rule, that "a foreign marriage, valid according to the law of a country where it is celebrated is good everywhere." But while the forms of entering into the contract of marriage are to be regulated by the lex loci contractus, the law of the country in which it is celebrated, the essentials of the contract depend upon the lex domicilii, the law of the country in which the parties are domiciled at the time of the marriage, and in which the matrimonial residence is contemplated. G Although the forms of celebrating the foreign marriage may be different from those required by the law of the country of domicile, the marriage may be good everywhere. But if the contract of marriage is such, in essentials, as to be contrary to the law of the country of domicile, and it is declared void by that law, it is to be regarded as void in the country of domicile, though not contrary to the law of the country in which it was celebrated.

- H It was held that the relationship between the spouses, being domiciled British subjects, was not a mere matter of form but was of the essence of the marriage, and that, marriage with a deceased wife's sister then being forbidden in this country, not because it was contrary to God's law, but because Parliament had declared it to be contrary to God's law—(ibid: see LORD CAMPBELL, L.C., at p. 215, LORD CRANWORTH at p. 226, LORD ST. LEONARDS at p. 233, and LORD WENSLEYDALE at p. 245)—the relationship between the spouses was fatal to the validity of the marriage, notwithstanding the fact that in the country where the ceremony was performed the marriage was valid. In arriving at this conclusion the noble Lords examined several examples of the distinction between form and essence. For example, in discussing Gretna Green marriages (at p. 214 and 215) LORD CAMPBELL, L.C., said of Lord Hardwicke's Act:

But I do lay very great stress on the consideration that LORD Hardwick's Act only regulated banns and licences, and the formalities by which the ceremony of marriage shall be celebrated. It does not touch the essentials of the contract or prohibit any marriage which was before lawful, or render any marriage lawful which was before prohibited. The formalities which it requires could only be observed in England, and the whole frame of it shows it was only territorial. The nullifying clauses about banns and licences can only apply to marriages celebrated in England.

Again, referring to the case of the marriage of a minor in Scotland, where the marriage was valid by the law of Scotland though declared by an Irish statute, [see Irish Statutes, 9 Geo. 2, 611] to be absolutely null and void to all intents and purposes for lack of consent, LORD CAMPBELL, L.C., in the same case (at p. 216) clearly regarded the lack of consent as being a matter of form and not of essence, but this class of case is contrasted (on p. 219) with incestuous marriages, and LORD CAMPBELL, L.C., was plainly of opinion that a marriage between a mulatto and a white woman prohibited by the law of Massachusetts, in which State the parties lived, ought to have been held to be invalid although the spouses went for the ceremony to the neighbouring province of Rhode Island, where such a marriage was valid. LORD CRANWORTH (in the same case at p. 224) put the question thus:

... that though in the case of marriages celebrated abroad the lex loci contractus must quoad solemnitates determine the validity of the contract, yet no law but our own can decide whether the contract is or is not one which the parties to it, being subjects of Her Majesty domiciled in this country, might lawfully make.

Moreover, the passage in the treatise of STORY, J., on the CONFLICT OF LAWS (8th ed., pp. 188, 189), in which he specifies the exceptions to the rule that a marriage valid where celebrated is good everywhere (ibid., pp. 208 and 209) was referred to with approval: see Brook v. Brook (9 H.L. Cas., 208, 209). He excepts marriages involving polygamy and incest, those positively prohibited by the public law of a country from motives of policy, and those celebrated in foreign countries by subjects entitling themselves, in special circumstances, to the benefit of the laws of their own country. There was some criticism, however, of the sentence in which he lays down that in speaking of incestuous marriages care must be taken to confine the doctrine to such cases as by the general consent of all Christendom are deemed incestuous. As has already appeared, all the noble Lords took the view that they were not so much concerned with the general consent of all Christendom, but rather with the fact that Parliament had declared what God's law on the subject was deemed to be in this country, and it was suggested that the particular case would most properly fall within the exception of a positive prohibition by the public law of this country from motives of policy—in other words, not as being incestuous in fact, but as being declared to be so by Parliament.

The question therefore is: Into which category, form or essence, do proxy marriages fall? If they are to be likened to polygamous or incestuous marriages or those positively prohibited by the public law of the country from motives of policy, the recent case of Baindail (otherwise Lawson) v. Baindail (3) establishes that the wife may obtain relief by a decree of nullity, although polygamous marriages are not otherwise recognised. But, as neither polygamy nor incest is in question, I am driven back to the question whether proxy marriages are positively prohibited by law for motives of policy. Counsel for the wife concedes that the Marriage Acts have a territorial effect only, and that there is no express statutory provision against a domiciled British subject contracting a marriage by proxy out of this country, but he argues that, at least as concerns a British subject domiciled and actually present in this country at the time of the ceremony, there is one matter as to which public policy points in the same direction as do the Marriage Acts, that is to say, the personal presence of both parties. This, he argues, is an essential, whatever form the ceremony itself may take. The argument may be summarised as saying that the distinction between form and essence is not absolute, but that public policy requires certain essential ingredients in the ceremony or proceeding itself. Put another way, the classification of the ceremony, celebration, proceeding, or whatever word one may choose to describe the formality of the marriage contract, must be determined by the law of this country. For this he relies on the section on the problem of classification in DR. CHESHIRE'S PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW

(2nd edn., pp. 24 to 45). Manifestly, he argues, there may be certain primitive tribal marriage rites which could not possibly be classified in this country as being a marriage ceremony at all, because they would offend our conception of propriety. Likewise he suggests that the question whether the presence of both parties is essential to the classification of this ceremony as a ceremony of marriage must, at any rate in the case where one at least of the parties is domiciled and resident in this country at the time of the ceremony, be determined as a matter of public policy by English law. He enumerated the respects in which a proxy marriage offended public policy under the following heads :—

First : The wife is entitled to change her mind up to the very last moment before the conclusion of the marriage contract, and, therefore, it is contrary to public policy that when the power of attorney has actually been revoked before the ceremony the parties should be compelled to conclude the contract of marriage because the accident of delay by post, telegram or telephone prevents the communication of the revocation from reaching either the other party or the proxy in time.

Secondly : If the wife can do everything necessary to effect a valid marriage in the Argentine merely by signing a document in this country, her marriage, with all the attendant changes of domicile, nationality and status generally, is, so far as concerns this country, a clandestine marriage and, therefore, contrary to public policy. This point was emphasised by pointing to the possibility that both parties, being resident in this country, might contract a marriage by proxy in some country, the law of which entitled both parties to be represented by proxy at the ceremony. It was suggested that this is the case in Mexico (see RINGROSE, MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE LAWS OF THE WORLD, p. 202) and it appears also to be the case in Portugal (p. 95). But although this appears to be so as regards the actual ceremony or celebration, I gather from the work in question that the date and place of the celebration are only fixed after certain preliminary formalities have been completed, which seem to me to involve the presence in the country of at least one of the parties. However this may be, and I have no evidence on the subject, it only affords an extreme instance of the same point.

Thirdly : Since it is well settled that in the case of a conflict of laws governing consent to the marriage of minors the question is one of form and the lex loci contractus is, therefore, decisive (Brook v. Brook, 9 H.L. Cas. 216), it would follow that minors, either or both of whom were living in England, could evade parental control by marrying by proxy in a country where either the consent of the parents is unnecessary or where the age of majority is lower. It was admitted that it is open to English minors, if they were personally present in the country in question, though with the express intention of evading English law, to effect a valid marriage, but it was suggested that it was contrary to public policy that they should be able to do so by proxy without the necessity of travelling.

Fourthly : The admission of a proxy marriage such as this would open the door much wider to the inward traffic in prostitution, since the husband in what are colloquially known as " five-pound marriages," instead of being shipped abroad go through the ceremony and bringing the wife into the country on his passport, could effect his purpose by simply signing a power of attorney here.

Fifthly : There is, in truth, no locus contractus in this case, seeing that the husband was present in the Argentine and the wife in England, and, therefore, that the public policy which, by the universal comity of nations, compels the recognition of a celebration valid by the lex loci contractus, does not apply.

Sixthly : The Marriage Acts of this country, including the Foreign Marriage Act, 1892, all require the presence of both parties at the ceremony, and, therefore, that this must be taken to be a declaration of the public policy of this country.

I will deal with the last two propositions first. Number 5 seems to me to beg the question at issue, which is whether there is or is not a valid contract of marriage. If there is not, cadit quaestio, but, in so far as the place where the ceremony or celebration took place is material, it is indisputable, and, indeed, it was not seriously disputed, that this was Buenos Aires. The power of attorney expressly empowers the proxy to contract a marriage in Buenos Aires in the wife's name and as her representative, and incidentally gives the proxy power to sign in the wife's name the act of marriage and any other document that may be necessary. The marriage certificate seems to me to be conclusive as to the place of celebration. As to No. 6, I have no doubt that the Marriage Acts, in common with public Acts of parliament in general, declare the public policy of this country regarding their subject-matter, but, as is conceded, they have only territorial effect so far as concerns forms and ceremonies. The argument that such declarations of public policy operate universally seems to me to ignore the fact that public policy also demands, by virtue of the comity of nations, the recognition of marriages celebrated out of this country in accordance with forms and ceremonies in no wise conforming to those prescribed by the Marriage Acts. As regards Nos. 2, 3, and 4, I recognise the possibility that the mischiefs depicted under these headings may arise from a judicial declaration in favour of this marriage, but, if so, they are all matters which can be dealt with by the legislature. There is nothing whatever to prevent Parliament from enacting in relation to domiciled British subjects generally that proxy marriages shall not be recognised in this country wherever celebrated, or (leaving aside the point that a minor cannot give a power of attorney in this country : see Oliver v. Woodroffe (4)) that marriages by minors domiciled in this country, wherever celebrated, shall be invalid without the prescribed consent, or, more specifically, that the proxy marriage of a domiciled British subject, wherever celebrated, shall not be recognised for the purposes of immigration.

Before I deal with head No. 1, it will be well to deal generally with the question of public policy in relation to all these heads. It was laid down by the House of Lords in Janson v. Driefontein Consolidated Mines, Ltd. (5) that public policy is not a safe or trustworthy ground for legal decision. At [1902] A.C. 491, in an oft-quoted passage, the EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C., says : ". . . but I deny that any court can invent a new head of public policy . . ." This sentence was the subject of adverse comment by McCARDIE, J., in Naylor, Benzon & Co., Ltd. v. Krainische Industrie Gesellschaft (6) ([1918] 1 K.B. 342), but it seems to me that such force as this criticism may have depends entirely on what was intended by the words "new head" of public policy. The EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C., goes on :

. . . so a contract for marriage brokerage, the creation of a perpetuity, a contract in restraint of trade, a gaming or wagering contract, or, what is relevant here, the assisting of the King's enemies, are all undoubtedly unlawful things ; and you may say that it is because they are contrary to public policy they are unlawful ; but it is because these things have been either enacted or assumed to be by the common law unlawful, and not because a judge or court have a right to declare that such and such things are in his or their view contrary to public policy. Of course, in the application of the principles here insisted on, it is inevitable that the particular case must be decided by a judge ; he must find the facts, and he must decide whether the facts so found do or do not come within the principles which I have endeavoured to describe—that is, a principle of public policy, recognised by the law, which the suggested contract is infringing, or is supposed to infringe.

I ask myself, therefore, what principle of public policy, recognised by the law this suggested contract infringes or is supposed to infringe. It is, of course, necessary to bear in mind the distinction in the use of the word "marriage" between the contract itself and the status created by the contract : see per BRETT, L.J., in Niboyet v. Niboyet (7) (4 P.D. 11), and per SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., in Sottomayer v. De Barros (8) (5 P.D. 101). As regards the status, there can be no question, in my opinion, that what was intended to be created in this case was a Christian marriage within LORD PENZANCE'S definition in Hyde v. Hyde and Woodmansee (9) (L.R. 1 P. & D. 133) as being "the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others." This definition has repeatedly received judicial approval, recent instances of which are R. v. Hammersmith Superintendent Registrar of Marriages (10) ([1917] 1 K.B. 640, 645, 657, 658, 660), and Nachimson v. Nachimson (11) ([1930] P. 224, 227, 228, 238).

What is in question here, therefore, is the form of contract. By this contract a woman domiciled in this country wished to assume the character of the wife of a foreign husband. The words of LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in Harvey v. Farnie (12) (8 A.C. 50, 51) :

The marriage is contracted with a view to that matrimonial domicile which results from her placing herself by contract in the relation of wife to the husband whom she marries, knowing him to be a foreigner, domiciled and contemplating permanent and settled residence abroad.

A describe this case exactly. I ask myself, therefore, what public policy is infringed by the wife adopting a form of contract lawful in that country. Had she gone to the Argentine and had there signed a power of attorney enabling her to be represented at the ceremony by proxy, the case would be covered expressly by LORD DUNEDIN's words :

... no matter whether the proceeding or ceremony which constituted marriage according to the law of the place would or would not constitute marriage in the country of the domicile of one or other of the spouses

B in the passage from his opinion in Berthiaume v. Dastous (1) ([1930] A.C. 83), which I have already quoted. In her case, therefore, the issue as to public policy is reduced to the question whether or not she should be allowed to sign the power of attorney here, but it is said that, in considering whether or not the subject-matter is contrary to public policy, one must look at the problem as a whole and not allow one's self to be influenced by the fact that in individual cases no harm, or even benefit, may accrue. As a general proposition that is, no doubt, true, but I am by no means satisfied that the problem here is one and indivisible and embraces proxy marriages as a whole. It may well be that C the problem should be sub-divided into categories and the test of public policy be applied, if at all, to each category separately. For example, the converse case of the husband in the Argentine being a domiciled Englishman and intending to make the matrimonial home here, and the case of a minor domiciled in this country where the law does not permit him to give a power of attorney at all, D seems manifestly to call for separate consideration, as does the case, which I will consider shortly, of the revocation of the power of attorney before the ceremony. I do not think it is necessary to pursue this topic further than to say that I am not satisfied that a single test of public policy can be applied to all proxy marriages indiscriminately.

Undoubtedly, proxy marriages are liable to abuse, but, as I have already said, if these abuses occur or are apprehended they can be prevented or cured by legislation. The objection that clandestine marriages may be promoted E appears to me to go too far, in view of the fact that Gretna Green marriages were tolerated for years in spite of their notorious abuse for the very purpose of evading the mischief of Lord Hardwicke's Act, which was expressly directed to the preventing of clandestine marriages, and, incidentally, of evading the restrictions on the marriage of minors. It is true that after 1856 the condition of residence for 21 days was imposed by 19 and 20 Vict., c. 96 [an Act for amending the Law of Marriage in Scotland], and that, by the recent Marriage (Scotland) F Act, 1939, s. 5, irregular marriages in Scotland are abolished. So slow a process of legislation to deal with abuses not less glaring than anything that is likely to result from the recognition of a proxy marriage such as this seems to call for caution in invoking the doctrine of public policy in this connection, and emphasises the point that the matter is one to be dealt with by legislation.

G I will deal next with the suggestion that it is a matter of public policy that both parties should be present. It seems to me that it is hardly possible to base this argument on the principle that the presence of both parties at the celebration is necessary for a Christian marriage. It is not disputed that proxy marriages were recognised by the canon law. In SWINBURNE'S TREATISE OF SPOUSALS OR MATRIMONIAL CONTRACTS (1686 ed., pp. 162 and 163) the conditions of a valid proxy marriage are described. Moreover, proxy marriages are recognised, not only in the Argentine, but in other Christian countries such as Portugal H and Spain. Also, in the United States of America, where the regulation of marriage and divorce remains within the jurisdiction of individual States, the validity of proxy marriages has been recognised. As a result of the industrious researches of counsel for the wife I have had the advantage of considering many reported cases decided in various States of the Union. Most of these arise out of the immigration laws. They are none the less important for that reason, for, as LORD CAMPBELL said in Brook v. Brook (2) (9 H.L. Cas. 219), some very important social questions have arisen on cases raising the kindred question of the settlement of the poor. Counsel for the wife quoted the following dictum of BURNHAM, J., in Commonwealth v. Farmers' and Shippers' Tobacco Warehouse Co. (13):

There are acts of so peculiarly personal a nature that their performance cannot be delegated. To this class of cases belong the making of wills [and] the contracting of marriages.

The immigration cases show that the generality of this dictum requires considerable qualification.

In Re Lum Lin Ying (14), decided in the District Court of Oregon, it was held that a marriage solemnised in China according to the laws and customs thereof, but while the bridegroom was in America, is not valid in America. The decision, however, appears to turn not on any dissent from the proposition that a marriage which is valid in the place where it is contracted is valid everywhere, but a doubt whether China was in fact the place of solemnisation of the marriage. Apparently, the parties had been betrothed when the bride was two years of age. In accordance with Chinese customs, the marriage was arranged by professional go-betweens with the parents and families of the respective parties. The particulars of the engagement were committed to writing on duplicate cards, and the ceremony was completed by sewing the cards together, whereupon the bride attempted to join her husband, who was all the time domiciled in the United States. The district judge expressed a doubt whether this was a China marriage. He said that it was not enough that such a marriage was valid under the laws of China, but was of opinion that it must not only be valid under such laws, but to be valid elsewhere must have been solemnised within the jurisdiction of those laws, but he made an order allowing the wife's admission on the ground that the parties had acted in good faith. I do not think that this decision, depending as it does on the question whether there could be said to be a solemnisation in China, affords much guidance in the present case.

More directly in point is Ex parte Suzanna (15) decided in the District Court in Massachusetts. The husband was resident in Pennsylvania. By the relevant Act it was provided that an illiterate woman over 16 years of age should not be admitted unless she was, among other things, the wife of an admissible or domiciled alien or a citizen. The wife was resident in Portugal at the time of the alleged marriage. The marriage was by proxy, and Portuguese law recognises proxy marriages. Presumably, it was the husband who was represented by proxy at the ceremony in Portugal, though this fact is not expressly stated except by inference from the statement in the last sentence of the judgment that the proxy marriage was celebrated in Portugal. On the ground that the question must be decided on the law of Pennsylvania, where it was well settled that a common law marriage was valid and that nothing in the law of Pennsylvania required the personal presence of the parties at the ceremony, the judge decided that the petitioner had the right to admission as a wife.

An even stronger case is United States ex rel. Modianos v. Tuttle (16). In this case, decided in the New Orleans division of the District Court of Louisiana, the husband, born a Turkish subject, but at the time of the celebration of the alleged marriage in 1922 a naturalised American citizen domiciled in the state of Louisiana and actually in New Orleans, was represented at the ceremony in Turkey by proxy, proxy marriages being valid in Turkey. The revised civil code of Louisiana (art. 109) expressly declares: "No marriage can be contracted or celebrated by procuration." The district judge held that this prohibition only applied to marriages celebrated in the State, while at the same time he held that the State legislature had the right to declare what marriages would be recognised, regardless of whether the participants were domiciled within or without the State, and that a statute invalidating proxy marriages, wherever performed, would be valid. In the absence of any such legislation, he held that the particular marriage was valid, and that the wife was entitled to admission as such, regardless of the question whether the quota of Turkish immigrants had been exhausted or not. It is interesting to note that the learned judge expressly held that there was nothing in the circumstances of this marriage conflicting with the views of Christendom, and that he was also of opinion that, if it was desired to except from the general principle that marriages celebrated in accordance with the lex loci contractus are valid everywhere, a marriage by proxy celebrated out of the particular State, it was for the State legislature so to enact.

The fact that it was conceded that no American case has been found conflicting with this decision, which obviously is directly in point, absolved me from the necessity of any further examination of American cases. It is clear, however, not only from the cases cited, but also from the article, MARRIAGE BY PROXY AND THE CONFLICT OF LAWS, by PROFESSOR E. G. LORENZEN, in 32 HARVARD LAW REVIEW, pp. 473-488, that the view is held in America that the common law inherited by certain States of the Union at the time of their settlement enabled a marriage to be contracted per verba de praesenti, or per verba de futuro, followed by consummation: see also the argument in R. v. Millis (17) (10 Cl. & F., 545). That a proxy marriage can take either form appears from SWINBURNE, at p. 164, and see ss. 10 and 11 of the same work. It has been accepted throughout the argument, and I think rightly, that this marriage was celebrated, if at all, per verba de praesenti, and that the question of consummation is, therefore irrelevant, but, whatever view may be held in America, I think that I am precluded by the actual decision in R. v. Millis (17) from holding that the common law ever recognised the validity of a marriage per verba de praesenti unless celebrated before an episcopally ordained priest. Nevertheless, the point seems to me to be that it is difficult to assert that a marriage ceremony expressly recognised by the common law and adopted in civilised countries with a long Christian tradition is so essentially abhorrent to Christian ideas as to take a proxy marriage out of the category of ceremony or proceeding and to classify it with incest or polygamy.

Reliance was also placed on the passage in LORD FRASER's work on HUSBAND AND WIFE, 2nd ed., p. 319:

Suppose an offer of marriage is sent through the post-office from Scotland, and an acceptance sent by return of post from England, it is obvious that there could be no marriage in such circumstances, because marriage cannot be entered into in England merely by a declaration of present consent. If marriage can be entered into after this fashion, the two parties must be in Scotland at the time.

But the question is not the same as is raised in this case. The wife did not purport to constitute the marriage by the power of attorney signed here. She merely authorised her proxy to constitute it on her behalf in the Argentine.

This brings me to a consideration of head No. 1. The objection based on the Argentine law regarding revocation of the power of attorney seems to me to be the most formidable argument against the validity of the marriage. In s. 13, entitled "Of Contracting Spousals either betwixt parties present or absent," SWINBURNE, in para. 22, p. 165, says:

Furthermore, it is not only necessary that the proxy be sufficient, and that the contract be made in due form, as aforesaid; but it is requisite also that the party which did constitute the proctor, do persevere and continue in the same mind and purpose, until the contract be finished; for if he repent in the meantime, or revoke his proctor (which thing is lawful for him to do though he has covenanted, yea and sworn not to revoke him) the contract is utterly void, which conclusion hath place, albeit the proctor were ignorant of the parties repentance or revocation of the proxy, seeing the perseverance and continuance of the parties consent, which did constitute, is so necessary, as without the which the contract is not of any force.

There is a passage to the same effect with regard to contracting matrimony by letter in para. 39 on p. 182. SWINBURNE died in 1623, and his book was first published posthumously in 1686. That he was an ecclesiastical lawyer of repute appears from the DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY, vol. LV, pp. 228 and 229.

Now, manifestly, in the case of the revocation of a power of attorney like the present, the communication of which for whatever reason has miscarried, it would not be true to say that the party giving it still continued in the same mind without alteration until the time of the other's consent. That is to say, the Argentine law differs from the canon law, as expressed by SWINBURNE, in this respect. The question as I see it is whether this objection applies to the validity of proxy marriages in general or only to the validity of those which are actually affected by the Argentine law regarding revocation. No such question arises, as has already been said, in this case. Supposing, however, that had been the situation in this case, I incline to the opinion that the marriage would not be a Christian marriage as defined by LORD PENZANCE in Hyde v. Hyde and Woodmansee (9), which I have already quoted. The case might be put as follows. The wife was a domiciled British subject when she gave the power of attorney. This is not expressed to be irrevocable. Although her intention at the time she gave it was to contract a Christian marriage and to acquire the husband's domicile when the marriage was celebrated, she changed her mind and revoked the power of attorney before the celebration, while she was still a British subject. The marriage ceremony, therefore, did not effect a "voluntary" union, but only a union which is deemed to be voluntary by the law of a country to which she was not subject at the time of the revocation of the power of attorney. That being so, the effect of the revocation should be decided according to English law. I do not think that it is necessary or desirable for me to decide that point. Suffice it to say that the manifest distinction between that case and the present points strongly against there being one test of public policy with regard to all proxy marriages alike and towards the propriety of the definition by Parliament of the conditions in which proxy marriages shall or shall not be recognised.

My conclusions, therefore, are (i) that the contract of marriage in this case was celebrated in Buenos Aires; (ii) that the ceremony was performed strictly in accordance with the law of that country; (iii) that the celebration of marriage by proxy is a matter of the form of the ceremony or proceeding and not an essential of the marriage; (iv) that there is nothing abhorrent to Christian ideas in the adoption of that form; and (v) that, in the absence of legislation to the contrary, there is no doctrine of public policy which entitles me to hold that the ceremony, valid where it was performed, is not effective in this country to constitute a valid marriage. For these reasons, whatever may be the petitioner's remedies as a wife, I am obliged to hold that this petition must be dismissed.

Petition dismissed.

GARDNER v. GARDNER

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Hudson, J.), March 10, 11, 12, 17, 1947.]

Divorce—Cruelty—Wife's unnatural sexual relations with other women—Neglect of marital home and duties—Husband no willing party to sexual irregularities.

In proceedings for divorce on the ground of cruelty, the husband's case was that the wife's conduct, persisted in throughout the marriage and consisting of unnatural relations with other women and neglect of her marital home and duties, had so affected him as to break down his health. The wife's propensities were known to the husband before the marriage, but, though the husband had exhibited meekness and patience, it was found, as a fact, that he was never a willing party to the wife's sexual irregularities and did what he could to prevent them:—

HELD: the husband had proved a course of conduct which not only injured his health, but also caused reasonable apprehension of future injury, and he was, therefore, entitled to a decree.

[EDITORIAL NOTE. This case affords a new instance of what may amount to cruelty within the accepted definition—conduct causing danger to bodily or mental health or giving rise to a reasonable apprehension of such danger. It is interesting to observe that in the Laws of England (Hailsham edn.), p. 653, para. 960, it is stated that: "Unnatural or pervert practices by a wife with another woman do not entitle the husband to a decree of divorce, but it is submitted that they could be taken into account as part of a course of conduct amounting to legal cruelty." The present case can now be taken as authority for the submission advanced in the Laws of England.

As to CRUELTY ON PART OF WIFE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 650, 653, paras. 955, 960; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 290, 291, Nos. 2649-2661.]

PETITION by the husband for divorce on the ground of his wife's cruelty. The facts appear in the judgment.

Bush James, K.C., and Lord Meston for the husband.
Marston Garsia for the wife.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 17. HODSON, J., read the following judgment. This petition is presented on the ground of cruelty. The husband's case is that his wife, by a course of conduct persisted in throughout the marriage, has injured his health. In substance, the conduct alleged consists of the wife's unnatural sexual relations with other women and neglect of her marital home and duties which so affected the husband as to break down his health. The whole of the allegations are denied.

The marriage took place on Aug. 27, 1938, the husband being a bachelor of 29 and the wife a spinster of 24. Before marriage she had been living with another woman, H., and the husband's case was that the relationship between the two women was admitted by the wife to be an unnatural one and was objectionable to him. That the wife's attitude to sex, at any rate as regards her husband, was one of repulsion, is shown by a letter written, as she says, several months before the marriage, in which the following passage occurs:

Although you seem to pride yourself that you know me, you obviously don't know me well enough to see the danger signal. I wrote you a long letter from Cornwall I think, about sleeping with you. Couldn't you read between the lines and realise that I wanted no sexual contact with you. I hate being pawed about—I loathe to have the abhorrent fact that I am a woman accentuated. That's enough to set my teeth on edge—and yet your psychology is rather put aside by your instincts on occasions. I can usually by understanding how you feel be pleasant about it at the time, and it is only when you behave like this that I seethe with rage about it and everything . . . I'm sorry for this outburst, but God knows I've tried every other way with no success.

Before the marriage, to which she somewhat reluctantly assented, she made arrangements to return after the ceremony to live with the woman H. She says this was due to the husband's failure to provide a home and took place with his concurrence. He, on the other hand, says that the question of accommodation had nothing to do with it, and that his wife's return to H. was against his wishes, and that he only let her go in the hope that this association might die with lapse of time under the influence of his affection. The husband's version is confirmed by a letter written by the wife from Paris about Nov., 1938, in which she said:

I should certainly be prepared to talk to Jimmy, but I do want you to understand that nothing can make me change my views at the moment. You have tried for over a year, so have other people, but I go on just the same. Therefore, if you are coming over to persuade me to return, or to leave—in fairness to you and to prevent you making an abortive journey and spending large sums of money unnecessarily, I must say—don't.

While the wife was in Paris she was visited by the husband from time to time and he tried unsuccessfully to persuade her to leave this woman and to join him as his wife. On the occasions of these visits the conversation of the two women in his presence made plain to him, he says, that unnatural sexual relations were taking place between them. For example, the woman said she had only had an orgasm after living with the wife for several weeks, and the wife regretted she had taken so long to fulfil her purpose. Such language, if used, was calculated to cause great pain and distress to him. The wife denies that any such language was used.

In the summer of 1939 the wife returned to England and said, according to the husband, that the affair with H. had run its course and she was ready to live with him. In June the parties went for a week-end to Paris and stayed at the Quai Voltaire Hotel where the husband, going unexpectedly into his wife's bedroom, said that he found her sitting on the knee of another woman who had her hand under her skirt. This again was flatly denied by the wife. The parties then went to live under the same roof at Sunbury Court Island, occupying separate rooms, and the husband said he had again to complain of his wife's unnatural conduct observed by him while she was dancing with another woman and similar trouble with her and the same woman some days later in a motor car. The wife then returned to France against the husband's wishes with the expressed intention of going to stay with the woman concerned in the incident at the Quai Voltaire Hotel. She returned at the outbreak of war, bringing with her a man and woman, husband and wife, who came to stay with the parties at Sunbury Court Island. This resulted in the husband being virtually turned out of his own home and going to sleep at the A.R.P. post where he had duties to perform. The husband did not like the wife's attitude towards the woman and told his wife these people must leave, but the wife insisted on going herself also, and when the married couple left she also left and went to live with them in London, leaving her husband. It is right to say that there is no evidence of any sexual impropriety with this woman, whose husband was called as a witness and indignantly repudiated any suggestion that his wife had ever been addicted to unnatural practices. The wife [the present respondent] told the husband, according to him, that their life was finished and that there was nothing to be done. She, in fact, remained away until August, 1942. By this time the husband's health had been affected by the worry which his wife's conduct had caused him.

In 1942 the parties met from time to time, and in August the wife returned. She then said, according to the husband, that she had been living for two years with another woman to whom she had to teach everything whereas the others knew it all. This again was denied by the wife. They lived together at an address where they had separate rooms, but intercourse took place between them on several occasions. This was the period in which, according to the husband's evidence, their marriage was consummated, no sexual intercourse having ever taken place before. The wife became pregnant and a child was born to her in October, 1943. The husband found that during her pregnancy she again became infatuated with another woman and caused him further distress by her association with and verbal references to this woman. The husband tried to keep her from this course of conduct, but without result. The wife took little interest in the child after the first few days, but eventually the parties and the child were installed in a house in London, where they lived until June, 1944, when bomb damage caused them to leave and to go into the country. The wife, however, persisted in sleeping in London during part of the week and in wearing male clothing all the time, which the husband says she did in order to ridicule his family.

The husband consulted solicitors during 1944 and in Sept. of that year a letter was written to the wife on his behalf intimating proceedings against her on the ground of cruelty. The wife was distressed at the idea of divorce and, according to him, agreed to make a new start, to cease to dress as a man and to live with him as his wife. She rejoined him and sexual intercourse took place for the last time soon afterwards. She, however, did not remain, but returned shortly to London to the bombed house, agreeing to return at the end of the year when the lease was up. She did not return, but, as the husband said, declared that she had met another woman whom she described as the most wonderful girl she had ever seen and was trying to stop herself from falling for her. She still occasionally visited her husband, but, as he said, showed no interest in either him or the child. In Feb., 1945, she ceased to visit and had by that time installed herself in another house in London with the other woman. There is no evidence of unnatural practices with this woman, but by this time the husband's health had deteriorated further, and evidence was given by his father, who is a medical practitioner and a pathologist, to the effect that the son was nervous, losing weight, unable to concentrate and suffering to an increasing extent from his stammer. He added that after the parting there was a gradual improvement in his son's condition.

The husband did not at once renew his instructions to solicitors to take proceedings on the ground of cruelty, but entered into some discreditable negotiations with the wife with a view to getting her to divorce him on terms acceptable to himself. These negotiations were abortive, and at this point the parties met and the wife made detailed statements to him and to his uncle declaring her intention of having herself changed into a man by treatment and by operation. On Oct. 9, she wrote to her husband on this subject, and on the subject of divorce:

Dear John, I did not receive any reply from you with reference to my last letter. This, in itself, does not worry me, but the thing that does worry me is that no move has as yet been made in any direction, either by you or your solicitors. As I told you, my hands are tied in this matter until the medical report is O.K. No one has been able to give any specified time when such information as you require will become available. I wish I knew myself, as it is a continual worry to me, and at the same time the expense is not small. The hormones used cost £1 every six days, if the rhythm of treatment is to be kept up. At the same time there is an operation hanging over my head. I saw my man last evening and he told me it would not be long, but that is no comfort. In the meanwhile I have to keep going. I suppose this treatment is using up strength, at any rate I have no energy, and I have to work in order to keep A alive. Frankly, I do not know the legal position in this matter, and neither do my solicitors. I suppose there has been no precedent. At all events, it seems that I am entitled to a small allowance, until such time as the change-over takes place.

The petition was finally presented on Jan. 19, 1946, and at a later date the wife put in her defence denying the allegations in the petition. The husband's case depends very largely on his own evidence, but it is not unsupported by the
 B passages to which I have referred in the wife's letters, and, in particular, her sexual perversion is borne out by the letter which she wrote to her husband on the subject of her proposed change of sex, confirming the previous statements to the like effect made by her to her husband and to his uncle. These statements were admittedly made and she seeks to explain them as being a fantastic form of shock treatment administered to her husband with a view to extorting money from him. This explanation, whether true or not, does not destroy
 C the inference to be drawn from these statements. The husband was, in my view, a reliable witness. I formed the opinion that he was fair and accurate in the account which he gave of his married life and that when he and his wife are in conflict his evidence is to be preferred to hers. I have had to consider whether, in any way, he has put it out of his power to complain of his wife's conduct as being wilful and unjustifiable in relation to him by the meekness and patience which he has exhibited. He summed up his position in this way :
 D "I realise now I was far too easy and gave in too much. I was desperately fond of her. I regarded myself as being the only person in possession of the facts to try and get her back to normality and to try and keep a contact which made persuasion possible." He was never a willing party to her sexual irregularities, and did what he felt able to do to prevent them. In my judgment, the husband has proved a course of conduct consisting of wilful and unjustifiable
 E acts on the part of the wife directed towards him, which not only did injury to his health, but also caused reasonable apprehension of the same. This justifies a finding of cruelty against her, and I pronounce a decree nisi of divorce on that ground.

Decree nisi.

COLLINS v. HERTFORDSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL AND ANOTHER

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Hilbery, J.), March 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 10, 11, 1947.]

Medicine and Pharmacy—Medical practitioner—Pharmacist—Negligence—Liability of hospital—Dangerous and negligent system—Injection of lethal dose of cocaine—Apportionment of damages between joint tortfeasors—Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935 (c. 30), s. 6 (2).

While undergoing an operation, a patient in a county council hospital was killed by an injection of cocaine which was given by the operating surgeon in the mistaken belief that it was procaine. The operating surgeon had ordered procaine on the telephone, but the resident house surgeon (who was then unqualified) had mis-heard "procaine" as "cocaine," and had told the pharmacist to dispense a mixture which was, in fact, lethal. The pharmacist dispensed the mixture without making further inquiry and without requiring the written instruction of a qualified person, and the operating surgeon had given the injection without checking that it was what he had ordered. The operating surgeon, the house surgeon, and the pharmacist were all three in the full-time or part-time employment of the council. In an action by the patient's widow against the county council and the operating surgeon alleging that the death was the result of (a) the council's negligence in the conduct of their hospital, and (b) the operating surgeon's failure to exercise reasonable care,

HELD: (i) the county council, in managing the hospital, was permitting a dangerous and negligent system to be in operation, and the operating surgeon and the house surgeon had failed to exercise reasonable skill and care.

(ii) the council were able to control the manner in which the resident medical officer performed her work and, therefore, the acts of the house surgeon done in the course of her employment were acts for which the council was responsible.

(iii) although the operating surgeon was a part-time employee on the staff of the council, the council could not control how he was to perform his duties and was not responsible for his want of care.

Gold v. Essex County Council ([1942] 2 All E.R. 237) applied.

Quaere, whether Hillyer v. St. Bartholomew's Hospital (Governors) ([1909] 2 K.B. 820) still a binding authority.

(iv) the county council and the surgeon were to contribute in equal proportions to the amount of damages recoverable by the plaintiff.

Limitation of Actions—Amendment of statement of claim—Action against public authority alleging negligence in the conduct of a hospital—Allegation in statement of claim that authority responsible for negligence of house surgeon and surgeon—Amendment to include responsibility for pharmacist—New particular and not new cause of action—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (c. 61), s. 1—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), s. 21.

At the trial of an action against a public authority alleging negligence in the conduct of a hospital, it being alleged that the authority was responsible for the negligence of the house surgeon and the operating surgeon, the plaintiff sought to amend the statement of claim by including a charge that the council was also responsible for the negligence of the pharmacist. The council contended that such an amendment would be stating a new cause of action and could not be allowed, under the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, s. 1 (see now Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21).

HELD: since the cause of action was the negligence of the council in the conduct of a hospital and the allegations that it was vicariously responsible for certain named persons were only by way of particulars, the amendment was not a new cause of action, but only a new particular, and could be allowed.

ACTION for damages for negligence.

- A A patient in a county council hospital was killed by an injection of cocaine given in mistake for procaine. His widow claimed damages (i) against the council, on the ground of their negligence in and about the conduct of their hospital, and (ii) against the surgeon for failure to exercise reasonable care. The facts appear in the judgment.

- B Berryman, K.C., and R. Marven Everett for the first defendants.
Havers, K.C., and H. C. Dickens for the second defendant.

- HILBERY, J. : Pursuant to the powers given to them by the Public Health Act, pt. VI, s. 181, the first defendants, the Hertfordshire County Council, own and manage the hospital known as the Wellhouse Hospital, at Barnet, in the county of Herts. In 1945 they had a resident house surgeon, a Miss Knight, who was a last-year student, not a qualified medical practitioner, although she had already at the time of the happening of the matters which are under discussion in this action, passed some parts of her final examination, and, what is, perhaps, most important, the pharmacological part. The defendant county council had at the same hospital, as an operating surgeon, the second defendant, Mr. Alan Henderson Hunt, a surgeon holding the highest possible qualifications in surgery, and not only holding them, but, from all that I have heard in this case, obviously meriting them. On Apr. 20, 1945, one James William Henry Collins, whose widow brings this action, was a patient in this hospital, having been received by the defendant county council for treatment. He had a fairly extensive growth of the jaw which required a very serious operation. That operation was undertaken by Mr. Hunt. On that day, Apr. 20, Mr. Collins, while on the operating table for the purpose of that operation, and while that operation was being carried out, was killed by the injection into him of 80 cc. of 1 per cent. cocaine mixed with 1-20,000th of adrenaline. That injection was given by the surgeon in the belief that he was injecting a perfectly proper and harmless local anaesthetic, a mixture of 1 per cent. procaine with 1-20,000th of adrenaline.

- The widow of James Collins claims in this action damages against, first, the Hertfordshire County Council, as the proprietors and managers of the hospital, alleging that the death of her husband was the result of their negligence in and about the conduct of their hospital, and against, secondly, Mr. Hunt, alleging that this injection was partly the result of a failure on his part to exercise reasonable care so as to see that he did not inject what was, in fact, injected. The circumstances that led to this deplorable event are extraordinary and I cannot believe likely ever to occur again. They began with an event of the evening of Apr. 19, and the chain of causation led, unfortunately, onwards until the time came when the injection was made.

- G On the evening of Apr. 19, Miss Knight, acting as the resident surgical officer at the hospital, rang up the surgeon, Mr. Hunt (as was usual) to know his orders for the next day, when he would be operating at the hospital, performing those operations which were assigned to him. It was arranged that Collins's operation would come first, as it was likely to take a considerable time. Mr. Hunt gave his directions for what would be his requirements for the operation. At the other end of the telephone Miss Knight had her notebook in front of her, and took down what she thought were the directions given by Mr. Hunt. The first two articles which she had entered in her book were intended obviously to be used for injection as a local anaesthetic. I am satisfied beyond any question that what Mr. Hunt ordered was 1 per cent. procaine with 1-20,000th adrenaline. Miss Knight acted in perfect good faith, but she mis-heard it. Over the telephone some sounds are notoriously distorted. At any rate, "procaine" came to Miss Knight's hearing as "cocaine," and she wrote down in her book "100 cc. 1 per cent. cocaine," and she added to that "adrenaline." Nobody has ever heard of injecting anything like 100 cc. of 1 per cent. cocaine into anybody. A lethal dose would be 20 cc. Indeed, that is, probably, more than a lethal dose. Moreover, I am satisfied by the evidence that at this time throughout the surgical and medical profession cocaine had ceased to be used for injection as a local anaesthetic because it had been found to be far too dangerous a poison. Miss Knight knew what a lethal dose of cocaine, if injected, was. She admits that she knew that whatever Mr. Hunt was then ordering was for injection. But she says :

Although I knew that, and although I knew that 100 cc. of cocaine would be five times a lethal dose, none the less I did not know how much of the 100 cc. of 1 per cent. cocaine Mr. Hunt intended to inject.

She was receiving an order for something which, if she had heard it aright, was a local anaesthetic which she, in her experience of Mr. Hunt, of this hospital, and of the work in the theatres of this hospital, knew had never been used before either by him or in hospital. She says that she repeated what Mr. Hunt said to her, but even if the repetition got through to him, it may have been so pronounced that he mis-heard it. I think the misunderstanding had its origin in this fact, that in the theatre at the hospital down to that time the old name for this drug, "novocaine," was still used.

Miss Knight thereupon went, with her book, to the pharmacist at the hospital. She did not give the pharmacist any written prescription or order to dispense this mixture. She told him by word of mouth to make up this 1 per cent. cocaine, and she asked him what was the usual quantity of adrenaline. He told her that it was 1 in 20,000. So it came to be made up of 1 in 20,000 adrenaline and 1 per cent. cocaine. In my view, there is no doubt that she told him that it was wanted for Mr. Hunt's operation the next day, and there is equally no doubt that he knew that it was for use on a particular patient in a particular operation, because the evidence before me shows that he sent it up as a sterile solution for injection and in an open flask only plugged with cotton wool at the top because it was for immediate use and not as a stock preparation to be kept in the theatre. Miss Knight then gave the theatre sister a list of Mr. Hunt's requirements for the operation. When the sister was getting together those requirements, she checked the flask against the list given her by Miss Knight and saw that it was, as Miss Knight's list said it should be, 100 cc. of 1 per cent. cocaine and adrenaline in solution. The sister placed the flask with other bottles on the shelf above the sink or basin where the surgeon would do his scrubbing before beginning his operation, and there it remained until, in the course of the operation, the surgeon called for the local anaesthetic, having arrived at that stage in the operation where it was needed. Sister Rockhill thereupon pointed out to the nurse the flask which stood on the shelf and watched to see that the nurse took down the right flask and poured it into the appropriate sterilised bowl on the trolley. Then Sister Rockhill filled the sterile syringe with the solution and handed it to Mr. Hunt. There then emerges a controversy as to what actually took place. Mr. Hunt says that he asked : "Is this the 1 per cent. procaine ?" and that Sister Rockhill said : "Yes." Sister Rockhill says that Mr. Hunt did not ask her : "Is this 1 per cent. procaine ?" She gave to me her statement in a way which carried to me the complete conviction of truth. The importance of that is this. It is conceded that every surgeon takes responsibility for what he injects into a patient as a local anaesthetic and that he should take some step reasonably to make sure before he injects it that he is injecting that which he ordered. Mr. Hunt's case here is : "I accept that obligation, that measure of duty, and I did make a check, because before I injected I asked the sister : 'Is this 1 per cent. procaine ?'" I am satisfied that Mr. Hunt is a man of honour, who has only told me what he profoundly believes to be the fact, and it may be that he did say at some stage : "Is this 1 per cent. procaine ?" But, if that was said, I am certain that it was not, at the moment at which it was said, intended as a test whether he had got the right mixture, but was directed to whether he was filling his syringe from the right bowl. Those are two quite different things. I think all the circumstances show that it was an occasion on which a surgeon who was habitually careful might omit one step which must appear to him in the circumstances to be of comparatively minor importance. From his point of view, the local anaesthetic that he expected to have handed to him was routine and he had not the slightest reason to suppose that it would be anything other than routine. At the moment he was involved in an operation which required the greatest skill, delicacy of touch, and concentration, and, expecting to get the anaesthetic he always had had, he just omitted to check. There ought not to have been any necessity for him to check. If the system which was in operation at the hospital had not been as utterly defective and dangerous as I think it was, the anaesthetic which was presented to him could not have been presented to him.

A If Miss Knight had used reasonable care and skill in the performance of her duties, it could not have got to him. If the pharmacist had used reasonable care and skill in the performance of his duties, it could not have got to him. If either Miss Knight or the pharmacist had called any qualified person's attention to it, that qualified person must at once have rung up Mr. Hunt and said: "Did you ever order such a thing as this?" Nobody had ever heard of such an order for injection.

B Those are the circumstances. In the first place, what do they indicate on the evidence? It is clear to my mind, in the first place, that the hospital was permitting to be in operation a dangerous and negligent system. Miss Knight, an unqualified person, was enabled to take an order for a dangerous drug in a phenomenal quantity to the pharmacist to be dispensed, and to get it dispensed without it being ordered on a prescription in writing or any prescription or order signed by a qualified person. She tells me she did that as a matter of course and that she had done it in respect of other dangerous drugs such as morphia. The system which was being operated at the hospital was such that the pharmacist accepted that order and dispensed the drug in sterile form for an injection, knowing that it was for a patient who was to be operated on and sent it up, and he did that without having any qualified person's signature. There were regulations which were, apparently, hidden from Miss Knight—not wilfully hidden, but which, according to her, had never been discovered. The regulations which should have been in operation at the hospital and which are, therefore, useful as indicating what the hospital authorities state should be the system, include, among other things, these provisions:

C 8. Every order for a dangerous drug (including dangerous hypnotics and sedatives) i.e., chloral, paraldehyde, sulphonal, etc., must be dated and the drug and dosage clearly written, and the time to be given stated and the entry initialled by the medical officer. . . . 9. Verbal instructions as to treatment and ordering of drugs and medicines are not allowed. All instructions as to treatment, drugs and medicines must be clearly stated in writing under "Treatment" column.

E Therefore, this order for this drug for this injection into this patient ought to have been entered on the patient's case sheet, written, and signed by the medical officer. If by "medical officer" is meant "fully qualified medical officer," as I expect it is (because at the time when the regulation was drawn I suppose F that nobody had heard of a medical officer other than a fully qualified one), it is perfectly plain that Miss Knight had no right to make an entry on the patient's sheet and sign it. There was a green book, entitled "Routine Procedures" for the hospital, which was on the table in the room which Miss Knight and the other resident medical officer used, although she had never had her attention specially directed to it or been told to read it. In that book it is G stated:

All prescriptions for dangerous drugs and preparations containing them must be initialled by a medical officer and the number of doses specified.

No doubt, that is primarily intended to refer to medicines given in the course of treatment in a medical case, but it is, at any rate, a warning that the hospital recognises that dangerous drugs and preparations containing them ought to be H initialled by a medical officer. On the evidence before me I am satisfied that the hospital negligently failed to bring to the mind and attention of Miss Knight when they appointed her the regulations that they regarded as necessary for the management of the hospital, they did not bring to her attention the requirements of their routine procedures or the fact that she was bound to adopt them, and they were permitting a state of affairs where a dangerous drug in an extraordinary quantity was made up in a solution with a very high fraction of another drug. If they had had a proper system in operation, this solution could not have arrived at the theatre, let alone at the body of the unfortunate patient.

It is alleged in the statement of claim that the hospital has a vicarious responsibility for the alleged negligence of Miss Knight. I think that it is clear that Miss Knight did not use reasonable skill and care in her office which she was performing under a contract of whole-time service as a resident medical officer for the defendant county council. She admits that she knew that this solution was for injection, she admits that it was 1 per cent. cocaine, she knew what a fatal dose of cocaine was, and she knew that cocaine had never been used in that hospital or by Mr. Hunt as a local anaesthetic, but, faced with all that, she did not immediately query to Mr. Hunt what he had ordered. Her mind might not have jumped sufficiently quickly with many other things to think of at that moment, but she had taken it down and, on reading it over, apparently, it still did not strike her, although she had passed her final examination in pharmacology, that there must have been some mistake. In addition, if she knew the contents of the green book, and she says she had seen it, she must have known that she ought to have the initials of a qualified person to this order, but she took no steps to get any qualified person to initial it. I am sure that no qualified person would have initialled it without referring to Mr. Hunt. Lastly, Miss Knight, with her training, should have known, and I am satisfied did know, that a pronounced symptom of acute cocaine poisoning was convulsions such as the patient here developed very quickly after these injections. Even then Miss Knight's mind did not turn to the fact that she had ordered 1 per cent. cocaine for injection into him. That was the last moment at which there was any hope of saving the patient's life, and up to the last moment Miss Knight remained as one who in the circumstances failed to exercise reasonable skill and care.

As regards Miss Knight's situation, the question whether the hospital is vicariously responsible for her want of care in addition to its own responsibility for its own negligent system involves a point of law about which the situation seems at present to be highly uncertain. Recently, in Gold v. Essex County Council (1) observations have been made on the situation of a hospital with regard to various persons ordinarily to be found employed by such an institution that it may fulfil its functions. Before Gold v. Essex County Council (1) it was generally accepted, after the decision in Hillyer v. St. Bartholomew's Hospital (2)—though exactly what was decided in Hillyer's case (2) has been the subject of much discussion and some difference of opinion—that the test to be applied was whether the officer for whose negligence it was sought to make the hospital vicariously responsible was performing his duties under, on the one hand, a contract for services, or, on the other hand, a contract of service. If, on the facts, the right view was that the officer was doing the duties in question in performance of a contract of service, the hospital was vicariously liable. If, on the other hand, he was doing the duties in pursuance of a contract for services as a professional man, there was no responsibility on the part of the hospital authorities.

Counsel for the hospital has called my attention to a very useful decision in Simmons v. Heath Laundry Co. (3), where the Court of Appeal had in the neatest possible form to decide whether certain services rendered by the appellant were rendered pursuant to a contract of service or to a contract for services. The appellant there, being employed by the laundry company as a machine hand, received injuries in the course of and arising out of her employment. In addition to doing that work, the appellant gave lessons in pianoforte playing to a neighbour's children for which she received 3s. a week. As she was entitled to do if the 3s. a week were earnings which came from a contract of service, she claimed to have them taken into consideration in assessing her earnings so as to arrive at the figure of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The short effect of the decision was that in a contract for services the master can order or require what is to be done, while in the other case he can not only order or require what is to be done but direct how it shall be done. BUCKLEY, L.J., cited with approval ([1910] 1 K.B. 552) the statement of BRAMWELL, L.J., in Yewens v. Noakes (4) (6 Q.B.D. 530) that :

A servant is a person subject to the command of his master as to the manner in which he shall do his work:

I think that the words "as to the manner in which he shall do his work" is only the same thing as saying what I have just said, "subject to the master's orders as to how it shall be done."

A I think that is consistent with the recent decision in the House of Lords in Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Coggins & Griffiths (Liverpool), Ltd. (5), although there the matter had to be considered from a different angle and in different circumstances. The House of Lords had to decide the test to apply to find out whether, in what a man was doing which resulted in injury to a third party, he was to be held in law to be the servant of one or other of two persons or of both. The decision that had to be made was where the responsibility rested for what the crane driver did in that case—which of two parties was the superior to the driver so as to make him not responsible in law. They held, as LORD UTHWATT put it ([1946] 2 All E.R. 355)—and I think he is only saying exactly what VISCOUNT SIMON put in another way:

The proper test is whether or not the hirer had authority to control the manner of execution of the act in question.

B In this case, Miss Knight was employed as a whole-time resident medical officer on the terms of an appointment form used for this purpose both in her case and, I am sorry to say, in the case of Mr. Hunt, because I am satisfied that in his case it is an inappropriate form to use. It is a notification to the clerk of the council of the appointment of an employee to the staff of the county council assistance department, Barnet area. The material part is:

C Dear Sir, the undermentioned has been appointed to the staff of this department, and the following are the full particulars of appointment.

D That is signed by the medical superintendent at the hospital, Dr. Segar, and says that Ellen Mary Knight is employed in the capacity of a junior house surgeon (student) from Mar. 4, 1945, that the employment is temporary and full-time employment, and that the remuneration is an annual basic cash salary, or basic weekly wage at the date of appointment, of £50 per annum, and the particulars of emoluments, if any, are described as "Resident annual value, £100." I am not sure that much help is to be derived from the use of that form. It was not intended to be a written contract between the parties. At the end of the form, all that Miss Knight did (just as Mr. Hunt did) was to sign a certificate that:

E The particulars of my previous service with local authorities set forth above are complete and correct to the best of my knowledge and belief.

Therefore, I derive from that document very little help towards solving the conundrum whether there is vicarious responsibility on the part of the county council here for the omission and negligence of Miss Knight.

F But when I turn to Gold v. Essex County Council (1), it appears to me, if I am not misinterpreting what LORD GREENE, M.R., said and what the effect of that decision is, first, that Hillyer's case (2) is no longer a binding authority, and, secondly, that the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., passes on the basis that in such a case the first thing one has to do is to ascertain what the obligation is which the one party is assuming towards the other. What is the obligation that the hospital authorities assume towards the patient who comes to them for admission and treatment? LORD GREENE, M.R., said ([1942] 2 All E.R. 242):

G Apart from any express term governing the relationship of the parties, the extent of the obligation which one person assumes towards another is to be inferred from the circumstances of the case. This is true whether the relationship be contractual (as in the case of a nursing home conducted for profit) or non-contractual (as in the case of a hospital which gives free treatment).

H I pause there to say that, while I have no evidence in this case, I cannot blind myself to the fact that this patient was earning £571 a year and the almoner of such a hospital would take that into account and would make out a charge on the conclusion of the treatment and the county council would have power under the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 184, to recover the costs of the treatment which they may have given to him. LORD GREENE, M.R., then said (ibid):

In the former case there is, of course, a remedy in contract, in the latter the only remedy is in tort; but in each case the first task is to discover the extent of the obligation assumed by the person whom it is sought to make liable. Once this is discovered, it follows of necessity that the person accused of a breach of the obligation cannot escape liability because he has employed another person, whether a servant or agent, to discharge it on his behalf; and this is equally true whether or not the obligation involves the use of skill. It is also true that, if the obligation is undertaken by a corporation, or a body of trustees or governors, they cannot escape liability for its breach, any more than an individual can; and it is no answer to say that the obligation is one which on the face of it they could never perform themselves. Nor can it make any difference that the obligation is assumed gratuitously by a person, body or corporation which does not act for profit: Mersey Docks Trustees v. Gibbs (6). Once the extent of the obligation is determined the ordinary principles of liability for the acts of servants or agents must be applied. The question which presents itself in the present case may therefore be formulated as follows. When a patient seeking free advice and treatment such as that given to the infant appellant knocks at the door of the respondent's hospital, what is he entitled to expect? He will find an organisation which comprises consulting physicians and surgeons, presumably also house physicians and surgeons, a staff of nurses, equipment for administering Grenz-ray treatment and a radiographer, Mead, employed to give that treatment. So far as consulting physicians and surgeons are concerned, clearly the nature of their work and the relationship in which they stand to the respondents precludes the drawing of an inference that the respondents undertake responsibility for their negligent acts. The same may be true of the house physicians and surgeons, but their case is not relevant to the present inquiry and I say nothing about it.

Therefore, the position of Miss Knight as a resident house surgeon is one that is still expressly left open by that case for decision. MACKINNON, L.J., dealt with the case, it seems to me, on the same broad principle, qui facit per alium facit per se, and he gives certain examples of the legal principles to be followed. It is, however, when one comes to the judgment of GODDARD, L.J., that one finds a return by him to the test of whether the services which are negligently rendered are pursuant to a contract of service or a contract for services. I think that the opinions of LORD GREENE, M.R., and MACKINNON, L.J., go to show that, if a county council exercising its powers under the Public Health Act, 1936, manages and controls a hospital, undertaking the obligation of affording to patients who resort to the hospital nursing, accommodation and treatment, the fact that they employ a professional person to perform some of those obligations does not divest them of their responsibility in law. If a professional person so employed by them is negligent, the observations of LORD GREENE, M.R., which I have quoted seem to me to support that proposition. Here, as a part of the amenities of the hospital offered to a person resorting to it for treatment and accommodation, was the presence at all times on the premises of a resident medical officer, and his acts, done in the course of treatment of the patient, are, in my view, acts for which the hospital is responsible. In arriving at that conclusion, I am following what I think was the ratio decidendi in Gold v. Essex County Council (1).

Gold v. Essex County Council (1) expressly stated (although it is not decided by that case and the statements made on the topic may be said to be obiter dicta), that a consulting surgeon coming to a hospital is in another category. Mr. Hunt was not in precisely the same situation with regard to this hospital as is a consulting surgeon who is on the staff of one of the teaching hospitals, or, indeed, on the staff of an ordinary hospital. One knows that a consulting surgeon goes to hospitals where he is on the staff to perform operations, voluntarily giving services to the hospital. He can refuse to perform an operation, and he can come as often as he likes or as seldom as he likes, although, of course, for the convenience of running a hospital he has his days for operating to which he adheres. But he does not do any of that contractually; he does it as a matter of arrangement to which he honourably adheres. It may be that the situation of such a surgeon can be distinguished from the situation of qualified persons employed to fulfil the obligation undertaken by the hospital to give the necessary treatment to a patient. As MACKINNON, L.J., pointed out ([1942] 2 All E.R. 244) in Gold v. Essex County Council (1), a shipowner none the less remains liable for the negligent navigation of one of his ships, notwithstanding that the navigation was performed by a fully qualified master mariner.

My difficulty in this case is that Mr. Hunt signed a form similar to the one which Miss Knight signed, a form which spoke of the capacity in which he was employed as a temporary part-time employee on the staff of the county council, undertaking specifically to attend on Tuesday for three hours and on Friday for four hours, and to be on call on Tuesdays, Thursdays and alternate Fridays and week-ends, at an annual basic cash salary of £500 per annum. I am in considerable doubt whether that should represent the written terms of a contract between them. I am sure there was no intention on Mr. Hunt's part that it should be so. None the less, from his own answers to interrogatories I think it is clear that those were the terms of an employment, and I am very doubtful whether the hospital is not in the circumstances also vicariously responsible for what Mr. Hunt may have omitted in the way of reasonable care.

A On the whole, however, I think that Mr. Hunt's position was such that, if he the test to be applied is whether the authorities could in any way control how he was to perform his duties, they certainly could not do so. I do not think they could even say what he should or should not do. I think he had only to say: "I will not do this operation," for them to have to put up with it. I do not think they could order him to do an operation. I do not think they could say what he was to do, and I am certain that they could not say how he should do it. The same is not true of Miss Knight. I think that to a very great extent B the hospital authorities could say how she should perform her work, as, indeed, they did under the regulations which they, at any rate, intended should be binding on her, though those regulations had not, in fact, been brought to her attention in a way which would make them binding. In the circumstances, while I think that the hospital was vicariously responsible for Miss Knight's acts of negligence or negligent omissions in the course of the performance of her duties, the same does not apply to Mr. Hunt.

C It is said that the pharmacist was negligent. He certainly and most clearly was. It has been called to my attention in the course of the evidence not only that this was a dangerous drug for which any pharmacist should, and would, expect a prescription in writing from a fully-qualified medical officer, but it has also been called to my attention that in the BRITISH PHARMACOPOEIA every dispenser is warned that when an order is received (i.e., even in writing signed D by a qualified medical officer) requiring him to dispense an unusually large quantity of a dangerous or poisonous drug, before doing so he should take steps to verify that there is no mistake about what is being ordered. This pharmacist took an order by word of mouth for an unheard of dose of cocaine and adrenaline and made it up. He knew that it was for an operation, and he knew that it was for injection. He took no step whatever to insist on a qualified person E initialling the order, he made no check, and he did not even send up the flask, when made up, with a note calling special attention to it or asking that Mr. Hunt's attention should be specially called to it. He disregarded every sort of plain and ordinary safeguard for the making up of dangerous drugs.

At a very early stage in this case counsel for the plaintiff asked for leave to amend his statement of claim by including a charge that the hospital was also responsible for the negligence of the pharmacist. Counsel for the county F council objected to the amendment being made so late, and he indicated that, if such an amendment were made, he would say that the answer was the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, [see now Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21] because it would be alleging a new cause of action. I said that I would allow the amendment, giving any adjournment that counsel for the county council might require so that he could meet the situation, but he intimated that he did not require any adjournment and so the matter went on. I confess that I had not then G present to my mind what the Court of Appeal had said in Marshall v. London Passenger Transport Board (7), which was a clear case of an amendment which imported a completely different and new cause of action. So also was Batting v. London Passenger Transport Board (8). In each of those cases a transport authority in the original action was alleged negligently to have managed and controlled a vehicle so that the plaintiff was injured. The amendment that was sought to be made was not to allege that there was, in addition to the negligence H that had already been alleged on the part of one servant, negligence of another servant which contributed to bring about the mishap of which the plaintiff complained, but that in addition to the negligent management the transport authority had been guilty of a breach of a statutory obligation and duty, a totally different thing. In the present case the cause of action relied on by the plaintiff on the writ is that the death of her husband was the result of the negligence of the defendants in and about the conduct of a hospital. Particulars of that negligence are given, the persons for whom it is alleged that the hospital was vicariously responsible being named. In addition, it is alleged that there was a defective and negligent system. The allegations of Miss Knight's and Mr. Hunt's negligence are only particulars of the cause of action, which is negligence in the management and control of the hospital. The allegation that the hospital was responsible for the negligence of the pharmacist is not a new cause of action. It is merely a new particular. Therefore, I think that I should have allowed the amendment even although the argument about the applicability of the Limitation Act had been pressed, and I think that the hospital has no answer to the outstanding negligence of the pharmacist.

In these circumstances, there must be judgment for the plaintiff against each of the defendants. Each of the defendants is responsible, because each was guilty of what the law calls negligence, that is to say, a failure to exercise reasonable skill and care in the treatment of the patient, with the result that he died.

[HIS LORDSHIP then assessed the damages at £2,500, and counsel addressed HIS LORDSHIP on the question of apportionment].

HILBERY, J. : I have the greatest difficulty, as I have said before, in arriving at a conclusion as to what the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6 (1) (c) and (2) really intends shall be the guiding principle in arriving at what the court has to find as between two tortfeasors in proceedings between them for contribution. Section 6 (2) says that in those proceedings for contribution :

... the amount of the contribution recoverable from any person shall be such as may be found by the court to be just and equitable having regard to the extent of that person's responsibility for the damage ; . . .

If the wording of that section had stopped at the word "equitable" and the semicolon had occurred there, I should have thought that what was plainly intended was that the court was to have the fullest discretion to distribute the damages between persons whose several acts had brought about the damage according as the court thought they had degrees of culpability, but the words "just and equitable," are immediately followed by governing words, i.e., "having regard to the extent of that person's responsibility for the damage." Once before my attention has been called to this difficulty, and I expressed the view that it seemed to me that, whereas it would be comparatively easy to distribute the damages according to the relative degrees of negligence, it was quite a different matter if these qualifying words were to be given their full effect and the court had to decide to what extent the negligence of the one party or the other was causal in bringing about the damage. The words "having regard to the extent of that person's responsibility for the damage," certainly seem to be an indication that the extent of the responsibility for the damage is to be the guiding principle, and, if that is so, it is difficult to conceive how anything other than causal acts can be in any sense acts resulting in the damage or, in other words, responsibility for the damage.

In this case, difficult as it is, I think that right up to the very moment of the injection (because that was the moment which, on Mr. Hunt's own evidence, he regarded as the appropriate time to make the test) and even after that moment there was negligence on the part of the hospital, as I have indicated. At the same time, Mr. Hunt has accepted the view that he had the responsibility of checking to see whether what was injected was what he had ordered. On his own showing he had selected a late moment, but none the less a moment which would have been perfectly effective, to make the necessary enquiry, if, in fact, I had been able to find that he had then made it. I feel quite unable, however, to do otherwise than direct that the hospital and Mr. Hunt should share equally the responsibility which was there up to the last moment. I think the contribution ought to be half and half, and I have made that order on both parties' applications.

Judgment for plaintiff against defendants with costs.

Power of appointment among nephews of a nephew—Agreement by appointee

A By his will a testator settled a legacy on trust for his daughter R. for life with remainder to her issue, but should there be no child of R. who should attain 21, then on trust for such issue of her brothers and sister as she should by will appoint, and, in default of appointment, to be divided equally between all the children of her brothers and sister as should be living at her death. By a codicil the testator excluded the issue of his daughter R. by W. (whom she was about to marry) from taking any benefit under his will. The testator died in 1879 and R. died in 1943, having been married once only, i.e., to W., by whom she had two children who had attained 21. At the time of R.'s death, four of her nephews and nieces were alive, one whom was J.C., a son of R.'s brother, W.T.C. By his will, W.T.C. (who died in 1918) gave certain property to J.C. on condition that he assigned for the benefit of R.'s issue any interest to which he might become entitled in the settled legacy under the testator's will or the exercise of the power of appointment. This direction to assign was complied with by J.C., and R. by her will appointed the whole legacy to J.C., with the object of benefiting her own children:—

HELD: the nephews and nieces who survived R. took vested interests in the settled legacy and R.'s power to divest such interest by appointment was conferred on her by the testator in order that she might, fiduciarily, select one or more of them as recipients of his bounty to the exclusion or partial exclusion of the other or others on a due consideration of their merits and needs, and, since R. had exercised the power, not for this purpose, but to benefit her own children, the appointment in favour of J.C. failed, as being a fraud on the power.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether a power of appointment given to Mrs. Rose Williams under the will of her father, the testator, Robert Thompson Crawshay, had been validly exercised by her by her will.

By his will made on June 24, 1877, the testator directed his trustees to hold a sum of £100,000 invested in consols on trust for his daughter, Rose, for life, and after her death on trust for all or any of her issue in such manner as she should appoint, and in default of appointment in trust for all her children who should attain 21, but, should there be no child of the daughter, Rose, who should live to attain 21, on trust for the benefit of all or any of the children or issue who might be living at the time of her decease of her brothers and sister and in such parts, shares and proportions, and subject to such conditions and provisions, as she should by will appoint, but, in the event of her not exercising this last power, then the fund was to be divided equally between all the children of her brothers and sister as should be living at her decease. The testator gave his residuary estate to his three sons. By a codicil made on Nov. 14, 1877, the testator, after reciting that his daughter, Rose, was engaged to be married to a Mr. Williams and that he disapproved of the marriage, declared that none of her children or issue by Mr. Williams should take any interest whatsoever under his will, but that his will should read in all respects as if all and every the child, children and issue of the intended marriage of Rose with Mr. Williams had been expressly excluded by his will from all benefits, interest, or right of participation in the trust funds or any part thereof respectively thereby given, or by the exercise of any of the powers or provisions therein contained empowered to be given to the children or issue of his daughter, Rose, but so that nothing therein contained should in anywise affect the right title or interest in or to the trust funds of any children or issue of Rose by any other husband than Mr. Williams. The daughter, Rose, who died on Sept. 16, 1943, was married once only (i.e., to Mr. Williams) and had two children who had attained 21. On July 9, 1946, VAISEY, J., held that, on the true construction of the testator's will and codicil and in the events which had happened, the trust funds became on her death held on the trusts declared by the will to take effect on failure of the trusts thereby declared in favour of her issue, and did not fall into the testator's residue. By her will, made on June 13, 1934, Mrs. Rose Williams appointed the whole of the trust funds to her nephew Jack Crawshay. The facts appear in the judgment.

Cur. ad. vult.

Mar. 13. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment: I have already decided that the funds representing the legacy of £100,000 consols settled by the will of Robert Thompson Crawshay the elder (I will refer to him as the first testator), who died on May 10, 1879, on his daughter Rose (afterwards Mrs. Williams) for life did not at her death fall into the first testator's residue. That is to say, I held that those funds became subject to the trusts declared by such will to take effect on failure of the trusts thereby declared in favour of her issue (not being issue of her marriage to Mr. Williams), viz., on such trusts for the benefit of all or any of the children who might be living at the time of her death of her brothers and sisters and in such proportions and subject to such conditions and provisions as she, Mrs. Williams, should by will appoint, but, in the event of her not exercising such power, then the funds were to be divided equally between all such children of her brothers and sisters as should be living at her decease.

Mrs. Williams, by her will dated June 13, 1934, exercised, or purported to exercise, the before-mentioned power by appointing the whole of the funds to her nephew, the defendant Jack William Leslie Crawshay (whom I will call Mr. Jack Crawshay), a son of one of her brothers. She died on Sept. 16, 1943, and her will was proved on May 12, 1944. At the time of her death only four of her nephews and nieces were living and, accordingly, were objects of the power, namely, Mr. Jack Crawshay himself; the plaintiff, Robert Oakes Crawshay and the defendant, Mrs. Greener, son and daughter of another of her brothers, and the defendant, Mrs. Spiller, a daughter of her sister. Consequently, if the appointment is valid—and that is the question which I have to decide—the whole of the funds go to Mr. Jack Crawshay. If it is not valid, they are divisible in equal fourth shares between him and the three other persons whom I have named.

The exact circumstances in which it is alleged that the appointment was fraudulent must be presently narrated, but the underlying fact, undoubtedly, is and has been the resentment felt, and naturally felt, by Mrs. Williams against the provision in a codicil to the will of her father, the first testator, excluding her issue by Mr. Williams from taking any benefit under that will. It is clear that other members of the family sympathised with and shared that resentment and that she and they regarded such exclusion as an injustice which deserved or required to be remedied. That object would have been completely and satisfactorily achieved if my decision of the point of construction had been the other way, for by a deed dated June 23, 1887, which I will call the 1887 deed, Mrs. Williams' three brothers, who were together absolutely entitled to the first testator's residue, assigned to the then trustees of the first testator's will all the share or shares to which as such residuary legatees they then were, or they or their representatives might thereafter become, entitled expectant on the death of their sister, Mrs. Williams, in the said settled legacy or the funds representing the same on trusts for the benefit of the issue of Mr. and Mrs. Williams which it is unnecessary for me to state more particularly.

The execution of the 1887 deed was the first step in what I may call, I hope not unfairly, a family conspiracy or scheme to defeat the express wishes of the first testator and to redress the grievance occasioned by the discrimination made against the children and other issue of Mr. and Mrs. Williams, a discrimination which applied also to the trusts of another fund settled by his will, a fact to which I refer merely to emphasise the great care which the first testator took to exclude such issue from any kind of participation in any part of his estate. Let me say at once that the conspiracy was meritorious enough and in no way exceptionable so far as it was, or could be, implemented by the conspirators out of, and by means of, their own property, but the difficulty of making a proper use of any special (i.e., any fiduciary) power of appointment to further or bring about any such end or purpose is at once apparent.

The next matter to be mentioned is the will of William Thompson Crawshay, one of those three brothers of Mrs. Williams who have been already referred to. I will call him the second testator. His will is dated July 11, 1907, and by cl. 10 he devised certain real estates to the following uses (so far as material), i.e., to the use of trustees for a term of 1,000 years to commence from his death, and, subject thereto, to the use of Mr. Jack Crawshay in fee simple. By cl. 13 the trusts of the said term of 1,000 years were declared. These included a trust that, if the 1887 deed should for any reason fail to take effect (as, in fact, having regard to my decision on the construction, it has), the trustees should immediately after the death of the survivor of the persons therein named, that is to say (in the events which happened), of Mrs. Williams herself, raise by mortgage of the said premises or any part thereof such a sum as should be equivalent to the value at such death of the investments representing the said settled legacy, less such share or interest therein as should have been previously assigned to the trustees of the 1887 deed by Mr. Jack Crawshay, pursuant to the provisions thereafter contained, with interest from the death of Mrs. Williams as therein mentioned, and should stand possessed of the said sum and interest on the trusts which would have been subsisting under the 1887 deed with respect to the said funds if the 1887 deed had taken effect. By cl. 15 the second testator, in effect and so far as material, declared that Mr. Jack Crawshay should within six calendar months from his coming of age, or the second testator's subsequent death, assign to the satisfaction of the trustees of such will any share or interest to which he might be, or become, entitled in the said settled legacy under the will of the first testator or the exercise of any power of appointment therein contained to the trustees of the 1887 deed on the trusts of the 1887 deed as though the same were effectual, with a further provision that, in case Mr. Jack Crawshay should refuse or neglect to execute such assignment, his estate in the devised premises should determine and become void.

The second testator died on Sept. 25, 1918, and his will with certain codicils thereto was proved on Feb. 18, 1919. Mr. Jack Crawshay was born on Sept. 10, 1894, and, therefore, attained his majority on the corresponding date in 1915. By a deed dated Feb. 3, 1919 (i.e., within the prescribed period of six months after the death of the second testator), and made between Mr. Jack Crawshay, of the first part, the trustees of the second testator's will, of the second part, and the trustees of the 1887 deed, of the third part, Mr. Jack Crawshay assigned to the parties thereto of the third part all the share or interest, whether vested or contingent, to which he then was or might thereafter become entitled, of and in the said settled legacy and investments under the first testator's will or the exercise of any power of appointment therein contained, on the trusts and subject to the powers and provisions which under the 1887 deed, or any exercise of any powers therein contained, would then be subsisting or capable of taking effect.

with respect to the same if the assignment made by the 1887 deed had been effectual. I will call this deed the 1919 deed.

It is in evidence that the property subject to the said term of 1,000 years created by the will of the second testator is sufficient to provide the value at the death of Mrs. Williams of three-fourths of the investments then representing the said settled legacy, but I am not told, and I do not know, whether it is sufficient to provide the value of the whole of such investments. I am also not told, and do not know, whether Mrs. Williams was ever informed or knew at any material time whether or to what extent the property comprised in the term of 1,000 years would suffice to provide the amount of the settled legacy or any part of such amount. If the appointment of the funds to Mr. Jack Crawshay is ineffective, the fourth share taken by him in default of appointment has been effectively assigned by the 1919 deed and is available to provide the remaining one-fourth of such value. On the other hand, any interest taken by him under an appointment by Mrs. Williams (being a mere expectancy) would not have been effectively assigned by the 1919 deed: see Re Brooks' Settlement Trusts (1), with the somewhat strange consequence that, if she had left the fund to go in default of appointment, the position of the issue of her marriage to Mr. Williams would have been more secure than she could possibly have made it even by a valid exercise of her power. I do not, however, suppose that Mr. Jack Crawshay would wish to dispute that the 1919 deed operated to assign the expectancy to the trustees of the 1887 deed according to the tenour of the 1919 deed.

The facts are that Mrs. Williams, by a series of testamentary instruments beginning with a codicil dated May 1, 1907, to a then existing will and ending with her last will, dated June 13, 1924, appointed the whole of the settled funds to Mr. Jack Crawshay absolutely, using appropriate and practically identical expressions throughout the whole of the series. The draft of the codicil of May 1, 1907, is before me. It indicates some vacillation on the part of Mrs. Williams whether the appointee should be Mr. Jack Crawshay or Mrs. Greener (who was then unmarried) and there is, in the margin of the draft, a somewhat cryptic note by the conveyancing counsel who settled it that it would be better to select a nephew rather than a niece, since the funds might, in the case of a niece, be caught by a covenant in her marriage settlement to settle after-acquired property. In the end, the appointment to Mr. Jack Crawshay was made, and it was repeated in all the lady's subsequent testaments. At this date Mr. Jack Crawshay was under 13 years of age, and it appears that there were several older nephews and nieces of Mrs. Williams who were considerably older than that, but were for that reason presumably less likely to survive her. The draft of the codicil was settled on Mar. 18, 1907, and on the same day counsel wrote an opinion dealing first with the point of construction (which he regarded as "doubtful") and then saying this:

I think that an appointment by Mrs. Williams in favour of one of her nephews and nieces would not be a fraud on the power provided there is no antecedent arrangement or bargain between Mrs. Williams and the appointee as to the manner in which the appointed fund is to be dealt with: Re Crawshay (2). The expression of Mrs. Williams' wishes might be contained in the codicil itself (see the last-cited case) or in a separate paper. I think it would be better if it were contained in a separate paper to be opened after Mrs. Williams' death and no communication on the subject should be made to the appointee during Mrs. Williams' lifetime.

I am told that this advice was almost certainly communicated to Mrs. Williams.

The next of Mrs. Williams' wills was dated Jan. 8, 1910, and on Jan. 16 she wrote a letter to Mr. Jack Crawshay, now 15 years of age. The original intention that it should be handed to Mr. Jack Crawshay after the writer's death may well have been abandoned, but it, in fact, survived, as did also a draft of it put away with other papers of little importance. This is what it says:

My dear Jack, You will not, I am sure, misunderstand what I have done with regard to the disposition of money in my will. It is scarcely to be imagined that any question will arise that would possibly deprive your cousins, Eliot and Leslie [the writer's sons by her marriage to Mr. Williams], of their just inheritance, and I have only exercised my power of appointment under your grandfather's will in case by any possibility any difficulty should arise and must in that event trust to your honour that reparation should be made. In case you may not know, it was decided by your father and uncles' lawyers that in consequence of the codicil to your grandfather's will the £100,000 he left to me came to them at my death, and they were honourable, kind and just enough to give up all right to it so that there can hardly be any question of claim on the part of anyone in the matter except the rightful inheritors, Eliot and Leslie. I have not as yet, dear Jack, seen very much of you. Before this letter reaches you we may be better acquainted. In any case, I trust the transaction may not cause you any trouble or bother and that these few words from one then no longer here may not impose a very painful duty and that you will not regard unkindly Your affectionate aunt, Rose H. T. Williams.

A This letter really speaks for itself, and it certainly has a very material bearing on the case. I will refer to the question of its admissibility later.

The next will of Mrs. Williams was signed on Nov. 2, 1911, as to which I have no comment to make. That will remained unrevoked until after the death of the second testator, and the probate of his will. I cannot doubt that the substance of such will (so far as it affected her family) must have been known to Mrs. Williams. Indeed, the matter is placed beyond any doubt by a letter written to Mrs. Williams by her solicitor on Apr. 10, 1919, the material part of which is as follows :

I am preparing a draft of a new will for you . . . You will remember that there has always been a question whether it was competent for your three brothers to secure the consols legacy under your father's will to your sons after your death, although they did all they could for the purpose by signing a settlement in 1887. Mr. William Crawshay in his will has arranged for the money being provided out of his estate . . . should the settlement of 1887 prove to be ineffectual and his will further provides that Mr. Jack Crawshay (who would be one of those to benefit if the deed of 1887 is not effectual) should as a condition of taking any interest under his will confirm the settlement of 1887 so far as he is concerned. This Mr. Jack Crawshay has done. It will, however, still be necessary to retain in your new will the provisions on the subject which were inserted in your present will.

D The final sentence in that letter certainly raises some extremely puzzling questions. By "the provisions" which were to be retained, the appointment to Mr. Jack Crawshay was obviously meant, but in what possible sense was she being told that its retention was "necessary"? I have failed to find any other explanation of it than this: "Your brothers did what they could, and now Mr. Jack Crawshay has done what he could, to secure the Consols legacy to your sons, and now you must for that purpose continue to make the appointment to Mr. Jack Crawshay as in your present will." At that time the number of nephews and nieces, who would, by surviving Mrs. Williams, constitute the class entitled to the funds in default of appointment, was more than four, so that Mr. Jack Crawshay's share might have been less than one fourth, as, of course, it might also have been more. It is difficult to see in what respect the exercise of this fiduciary power in favour of a particular object can properly have been described as "necessary," except for the purpose of implementing the conspiracy, or perhaps of fulfilling some promise or obligation made by Mrs. Williams to the second testator, or possibly to all her brothers. Having regard to the second testator's will and the 1919 deed, I should have thought that it might have been more appropriate to tell her that it had now become unnecessary for her to appoint the funds to Mr. Jack Crawshay, though open to her to do so, either in order to compensate him for what the second testator was obliging him to lose or part with for the benefit of her family, or for any other reason. But the matter was represented to her as one of necessity, that is, presumably, one in which she had for some reason or other no free choice. Although, as shown by the letter, Mrs. Williams was intending to make a new will in April, 1919, she did not, in fact, do so until Aug. 11, 1920. Further wills were made on Oct. 19, 1922, and Dec. 14, 1928, and then the final and last will on June 13, 1934.

H Paragraph 2 of the originating summons suggests that, if the appointment was fraudulent, it was so by reason of Mr. Jack Crawshay having before the date of the will assigned any interest which he might take by appointment on trusts for persons who were not objects of the power. In my judgment, the reasons for its invalidity ought to be stated somewhat differently. It seems to me that the nephews and nieces who survived Mrs. Williams took vested interests in the settled legacy, and that her power to divest such interests by appointment was conferred on her by the first testator in order that she might, fiduciarily, select one or more of them as recipients of the first testator's bounty to the exclusion, or partial exclusion, of the others or other of them, on a due consideration of their merits or needs. She was, of course, dealing with his property, and not with her own. That Mrs. Williams ever considered the matter in that light I find no hint at all. I am satisfied that from first to last she was thinking exclusively of her own children and their rights or wrongs. To use or attempt to use the power for their benefit, and so to defeat the plain wishes of the donor of the power, was certainly a most cynical act, though I am very willing to believe that Mrs. Williams was not in the least degree conscious of any such impropriety, particularly, if it were, as I understand the case, that the first testator was reconciled to her marriage before his death.

Mr. Jack Crawshay has sworn that to the best of his recollection and belief he did not, nor did any person acting for him, have any discussions with Mrs. Williams or her solicitors either before or after he executed the 1919 deed with regard to the execution or proposed execution thereof. This I readily accept, but he goes on to say that she did not at any time give him to understand that (either in view of the said deed or otherwise) she had made or would make any appointment in his favour in respect of the settled legacy. While accepting this as representing the present recollection and belief of Mr. Jack Crawshay, it is very strange that, when instructions (evidently on behalf of Mr. Jack Crawshay) were given to the conveyancing counsel before mentioned to settle the draft of the 1919 deed, he was supplied with copies of (i) the 1887 deed, (ii) the instructions of Mar. 15, 1907, and his opinion, (iii) Mrs. Williams' will dated Nov. 2, 1911, and (iv) the will and codicils of the second testator, and he was at the same time asked to consider whether any alteration in Mrs. Williams' will was desirable in the then present circumstances. His opinion, dated Jan. 28, 1919, was as follows :

In my opinion no alteration in Mrs. Williams' will is necessary, but if she has, as suggested in my opinion of Mar. 18, 1907, expressed any wish as regards the fund appointed by her to Mr. Jack Crawshay in a separate paper, such paper should now be destroyed.

The discrepancy is obvious, and it is not easy to believe that Mr. Jack Crawshay was not fully aware of the existence and purport of the documents, including Mrs. Williams' will, which were being put before counsel on his behalf. I think that his memory must be somewhat at fault. I am told that the purport of the last-mentioned opinion was almost certainly conveyed to Mrs. Williams though she appears to have disregarded the recommendation that she should destroy the letter. I should add that the solicitors acting for Mr. Jack Crawshay in 1919 were the same as those who acted at all material times for Mrs. Williams and many other members of the Crawshay family.

As to the general principles which govern the question of fraudulent appointment, there are so many judicial pronouncements of high authority that it is difficult to make a choice, but I may refer to a short passage from the judgment of LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON in Vatcher v. Paull (3), where he said ([1915] A.C. 378) :

The term fraud in connection with frauds on a power does not necessarily denote any conduct on the part of the appointor amounting to fraud in the common law meaning of the term or any conduct which could be properly termed dishonest or immoral. It merely means that the power has been exercised for a purpose, or with an intention, beyond the scope of or not justified by the instrument creating the power. Perhaps the most common instance of this is where the exercise is due to some bargain between the appointor and appointee, whereby the appointor, or some other person not an object of the power, is to derive a benefit. But such a bargain is not essential. It is enough that the appointor's purpose and intention is to secure a benefit for himself, or some other person not an object of the power. In such a case the appointment is invalid . . .

I would further, for the sake of completeness, read the well-known passage from the speech of LORD WESTBURY, L.C. (11 H.L. Cas. 54) in Portland v. Topham (4) :

Without farther dwelling on the matter, inasmuch as your Lordships concur in this opinion, I think we must all feel that the settled principles of the law upon this subject must be upheld, namely, that the donee, the appointor under the power, shall, at the time of the exercise of that power, and for any purpose for which it is used, act with good faith and sincerity, and with an entire and single view to the real purpose and object of the power, and not for the purpose of accomplishing or carrying into effect any bye or sinister object (I mean sinister in the sense of its being beyond the purpose and intent of the power) which he may desire to effect in the exercise of the power. I think it would be endangering the whole of the established principles of our law upon this subject if we were to permit a transaction of this kind to stand, or to hold that it is a transaction which can be reconciled with the faithful, sincere, just, and honest exercise of the power committed to the appointor, and which he is to exercise as a trustee.

But I ought, having regard to those last words, to add the following observation from FARWELL ON POWERS (3rd ed., pp. 458, 459):

A It will be observed that the essential notion is disposition beyond the scope of the power, not breach of trust by the donee, though it is not unusual to speak of the donee of a limited power as being in a fiduciary position. His position is referable to the terms, express and implied, of the instrument creating the power and the implied obligation not to appoint for an ulterior purpose, and is not in truth founded, like the position of a trustee, upon a state of conscience imputed to him by courts of equity.

B But there is a strong analogy between the obligation imposed on the donee by the terms of the instrument creating the power and that imposed upon a trustee by the terms of the instrument creating the trust.

C As regards other authorities, those who seek to support the appointment have relied chiefly on Re Crawshaw (2), referred to in counsel's opinion of Mar. 18, 1907. I am unable to regard that case as a satisfactory one, for it seems to me to be somewhat opposed to the general trend of the decisions on the subject. In any case, it does not seem to me to be really applicable to the facts of the present case. The headnote reads as follows:

D Under a settlement, made in 1828, a testator had power to appoint by will to and among his children a sum of £35,000. By his will, made in 1865, he bequeathed £150,000 to his daughter Jessy, and directed that this legacy should be paid to four trustees named in the will, and should be held by them upon trust for her during her life, with remainder for her issue. The will then recited the power of appointment contained in the settlement, and by virtue of that power the testator appointed £10,000, part of the £35,000, to the same daughter; but his will was that the same should be paid to the trustees thereinbefore named with reference to the legacy of £150,000, and should be held by them upon the trusts thereinbefore declared thereof. The testator then appointed two sums of £10,000 and £7,000 respectively in favour of two other daughters, and he appointed the residue of the £35,000 to his son Robert absolutely. And, in case he had exceeded his power in not appointing the £10,000 to his daughter Jessy unconditionally, but in directing the settlement thereof, and

E in case his said daughter, or her husband, or others having any right or power to object to the settlement thereof as aforesaid, should so object, or should not confirm such settlement, if required so to do, then he appointed that the said sum of £10,000 should go and belong to his son Robert, "but who will I am assured settle the same voluntarily in the manner in which I have attempted to settle the same as aforesaid so as thereby to carry out my wishes." After the testator's death the son Robert executed a declaration of trust of the £10,000 to carry out his father's wishes. There

F was no evidence (other than the will itself) of any bargain between the son and the testator that the former would settle the £10,000: Held, that the appointment of the £10,000 in favour of the daughter Jessy was invalid; that the £10,000 did not pass to the son under the appointment of the residue to him; but that, under the last appointment to him, there being only an expression of the testator's wish, and no evidence of any bargain by the son that the fund should be settled, it passed to him absolutely, free from any obligation to settle it, and was, therefore, validly appointed. Re Marsden's Trust (5) commented on and explained.

G In Re Marsden's Trust (5), the objects of the power were the children of the marriage, and the donee (the wife) desired to benefit her husband. To effectuate this, she appointed to her eldest daughter, unconditionally on the face of it, but under an arrangement between the appointor and her husband that on the appointor's death the daughter should be informed by her father of the intention with which the appointment was made and so be induced to

H carry out that intention. KINDERSLEY, V.C., said (4 Drew. 601):

... it is not necessary that the appointee should be privy to the transaction, because the design to defeat the purpose for which the power was created will stand just the same, whether the appointee was aware of it or not; and the case of Wellesley v. Mornington (6) shows that it is not necessary, in order to bring the case within the scope of the jurisdiction on which this court acts, that the appointee should be aware of the intentions of the appointment, or of its being actually made.

In FARWELL ON POWERS (3rd ed., pp. 478, 479), Re Marsden (5) is referred to in the words just used by me, and then Re Crawshaw (2) is mentioned without comment. I say that Re Crawshaw (2) differs from the present case because there the appointor merely believed that the appointee would, in fact, utilise the appointed property in a particular way. No pressure or solicitation was applied, and it was certainly never represented that any other person than the appointee was the rightful inheritor of the appointed property. Surer guidance can, in my judgment, be obtained from Re Wright (7), from which I derive the following relevant propositions: (i) that an intention to benefit a non-object may vitiate an appointment whether the intention is successfully achieved or not; (ii) that it is not necessary to establish any bargain; (iii) that, if there were originally a corrupt intention, the onus is shifted and rests on those who seek to show it was abandoned, and (iv) that the letter and other documents to which I have referred are properly admissible as evidence in this case. The whole of that part of the judgment of P.O. LAWRENCE, J., which deals with the question of fraud ([1920] 1 Ch. 117) is relevant.

On the question of the onus of proof, I have come to the conclusion that the letter of Jan. 16, 1910, is plainly indicative of a corrupt motive and a corrupt intention on the part of Mrs. Williams, and I can find no proof that such motive and intention were ever altered or abandoned by her. She regarded her two sons as the rightful inheritors, and nothing was further from her thoughts, hopes or wishes than that any nephew or niece of hers should take any benefit under the appointment. From first to last she was thinking, not of them, but of her own family. In fact, it seems to me that Mrs. Williams misunderstood the nature of her rights and duties in regard to this power of appointment, and that she regarded the funds as though they were her own property or, in any case, attempted to use them to further ends and objects quite outside the scope of the power. In my judgment, the case is typically and characteristically one of fraud (in the technical sense) and I must so decide. I would only add that I have never heard of a case before this one in which the persons sought to be benefited are not merely negatively non-objects of the power, but are the very persons whom the donor of the power has positively and affirmatively pointed out as disqualified from becoming participants of his bounty, and has deliberately and in the clearest terms excluded from the ambit of his beneficence.

An order must now be drawn up containing the declaration on the point of construction, and a declaration that the appointment has failed as being a fraud on the power. The costs of all parties taxed as between solicitor and client must be raised out of the settled funds.

Declaration accordingly.

GARDNER, MOUNTAIN AND D'AMBRUMENIL, LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Simon, Lord Wright, Lord Porter, Lord Simonds and Lord Normand), February 6, 10, 20, 21, 24, 25, April 1, 1947.]

Revenue—National defence contribution—Computation of profits—Chargeable accounting period—Underwriting agents—Commission not ascertainable and not payable until 2 years after underwriting of risk—When earned—Finance Act, 1937, (c. 54), ss. 19, 20; sched. IV, para. 1.

The appellant company was employed as underwriter's agents at Lloyd's, its function being to carry on the whole of the underwriting business on behalf of the group or syndicate for whom it acted, and it was paid a commission on the profits of the business. Under its agreements of employment and in accordance with the usual practice of Lloyd's, its underwriting accounts were drawn up by reference to the year in which the risks were underwritten, but were kept open until the end of the second year after the year in which the risk had been underwritten, to allow for the adjustments required in order to ascertain the eventual profits. Commission, therefore, was not calculated and paid until 2 years after a risk had been underwritten. It was provided, however, that the account for each year should be treated as a separate account for ascertaining the commission and that one year should not be affected by another. Either party could terminate the agency at the end of any year on giving 6 months' notice, and, where the company was paid a fixed salary as well as commission, the salary was to cease at the termination of the agency, although the account had not yet been wound up. The company was entitled, on the termination of the agency, to wind up the underwriting and accounts, and, if it did so, it was to be paid a special remuneration for its services in that connection. It was contended by the Crown that, for the purpose of computing the company's liability for national defence contribution under the Finance Act, 1937, pt. III, ss. 19, 20, the profits of the company on transactions underwritten in the year ending Mar. 31, 1939, arose in that year (1938-39), although they were not actually paid until Mar., 1941 :—

HELD : (i) on the true construction of the agreements, commission arising from underwriting in 1938-39, though calculated partly on future outcome and paid 2 years later (i.e., in Mar., 1941), was remuneration for work done, and completely done, in the year ending Mar. 31, 1939.

(ii) the sum paid to the company in Mar., 1941, for underwriting in 1938-39, was rightly assessed, for the purpose of national defence contribution, as profits arising in the chargeable accounting period Apr. 1, 1938 to Mar. 31, 1939, the principle being to refer back to the year in which it was earned, so far as possible, remuneration subsequently received, even though it could only be precisely calculated afterwards.

APPEAL by the taxpayer from an order of the Court of Appeal (LORD GREENE, M.R., MACKINNON and TUCKER, L.J.J.), dated Nov. 28, 1945, allowing an appeal by the Crown from an order of MACNAGHTEN, J., on a Case Stated by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

The appellant company carried on the business of underwriter's agents at Lloyd's. Under its agreements of employment, its accounts were drawn up by reference to the year in which risks were underwritten, but were kept open for 2 years in order to ascertain the actual profits, so that commission on risks underwritten in 1938-39 was not paid until Mar., 1941. The Court of Appeal held that commission paid in Mar., 1941, on risks underwritten in 1938-39 was earned in 1938-39, and was to be assessed for the purpose of national defence contribution, under the Finance Act, 1937, as profits arising in the chargeable accounting period Apr. 1, 1938 to Mar. 31, 1939. The facts and the relevant clauses of the agreement appear in the opinions of their Lordships.

The House took time for consideration.

Apr. 1. VISCOUNT SIMON: My Lords, this is an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (LORD GREENE, M.R., MACKINNON and TUCKER, L.JJ.) whereby an appeal by the respondents against an order made by MACNAGHTEN, J., was allowed. The matter arose on a Case Stated by the Special Commissioners, who had decided against the Crown, and the judge had taken the same view. The problem to be solved is: In what year is remuneration by way of commission, arising under agreements for the appellant company's employment in the business of underwriter's agent at Lloyd's, to be brought in for the calculation of their profits chargeable under national defence contribution?

National defence contribution was imposed by the Finance Act, 1937, s. 19, the charge (of 5 per cent. in the case of a company and of 4 per cent. in other cases) being on profits arising in each chargeable accounting period falling within the five years beginning on Apr. 1, 1937. By s. 20 of the Act these profits were to be separately computed, but were to be computed "on income tax principles" as adapted by sched. IV, to that Act, and one of these adaptations was that the profits were to be taken to be the actual profits arising in the chargeable accounting period and were not to be computed by reference to any other period [see sched. IV, para. 1]—whereas profits computed for income tax under sched. D are arrived at by reference to the figures of the previous year.

The appellant company's profit and loss account for the year ending Mar. 31, 1939, brought in on the receipts side a figure of £1,728, being the amount of commission actually paid to it in that year. The similar account for the year ending Mar. 31, 1941, brought in a corresponding figure of £21,995. The question is whether this latter and larger figure, though paid two years later, is properly to be regarded as entering into the calculation of the appellant company's profits in the earlier year. An additional assessment was made on the appellant company in the sum of £18,678 (the adjusted difference between the two sums above) for the chargeable accounting period Apr. 1, 1938, to Mar. 31, 1939, in respect of profits alleged to have arisen in that year, and this additional assessment is challenged by the appellant company.

The first thing to be decided is the proper construction of the written agreement between the appellant company and its employer, who is one of the "names" in an underwriting syndicate making insurances at Lloyd's. A specimen agreement, which is annexed to the Case, recites that the underwriter "is desirous that the company should act as his agent for the purpose of underwriting business" and in cl. 1 binds the company:

... to act ... as the underwriter's agent for the purpose of underwriting at Lloyd's all such policies of insurance ... as the company in their discretion think fit and to carry on the ordinary business of underwriter there in his name and on his account.

Clause 2 stipulates that:

... the company shall have the sole control and management of the underwriting and all risks shall be taken and all claims settled by them at their sole discretion in the name of and on account of the underwriter and the company shall be at liberty to reinsure the whole or a portion of any risk ... whenever they think fit.

The clauses next following deal with the keeping of accounts, and then in cl. 8 the remuneration of the company is provided for as follows:

8. The underwriter shall pay to the company as remuneration for its services in conducting the agency a fixed salary at the rate of £— per annum and £— expenses for — share [i.e., the fractional share of the contracting "name" in the syndicate's underwriting business conducted by the company] and a commission of — per cent. on the net profits on each year's underwriting...

In another specimen agreement also annexed to the Case the element of remuneration by fixed salary is omitted, but this is immaterial, for the question to be decided is the proper treatment of commission.

Clause 10 of the agreement provides how the commission is to be arrived at, and when it is to be paid. It runs thus:

10. An account shall be kept for the period ending Dec. 31, 19—, and for each subsequent year of the agency and all premiums salvages reinsurance recoveries and other receipts and all losses averages returns of premium and other payments and outgoings including cost of reinsurance if any of outstanding liability in respect of the underwriting carried on during each such period or year shall be carried to the account for such period or year and each such account shall be made up and balanced at the end of the second clear year from the expiration of the period or year to which it relates and the amount then remaining to the credit of the account shall be taken to represent the amount of the net profit of the period or year to which it relates and the commission payable to the company shall be calculated and paid thereon Provided always that for the purpose of ascertaining the commission payable to the company the account for each period or year shall be treated as a separate account and the profits of any one period or year shall not be affected by the result of the underwriting done in any other period or year.

A The agreement manifestly contemplates (and this is the ordinary practice at Lloyd's) that, in the normal course, the employment created by it will last over a number of years, though cl. 14 provides for a termination of the agency by either side by six months' notice ending at Dec. 31. The appellant company does not discharge all its duties in reference to a given transaction of insurance by merely underwriting the risk and receiving the premium. It has to follow the transaction through to the end, which may involve modifications of premium and reinsurance of risk, as well as possible questions of average and payment of losses—matters which, it is contemplated, may occupy the attention of the agent for as much as two years after the year in which the risk was underwritten. (I can omit reference to cl. 12 which provides for what is to be done if anything is left outstanding after the two years have expired). Hence the net profits resulting from a year's underwriting are not ascertained, and cannot be ascertained, till two years later. It is only then that the figure of profit for the year is known, and only then that the commission on that profit is calculated and paid.

D So far, as I understand, there is no dispute. But the difficult question remains—for what service is this commission paid? If we assume that five successive years are denoted by 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5, is the commission, which is calculated and paid at the end of the year 5, paid as remuneration for the agent's services in underwriting risks in the year 3 together with his services in looking after the outcome of those risks in the years 3, 4 and 5 (as the appellants contend), or is it paid for the total services of the agent in year 3, which consist of underwriting in that year and of looking after the outcome of risks already underwritten in the years 1 and 2 (as the respondents contend)? If the former is the correct view, the services which earn the commission will not be completely performed in the year 3 and, as the Crown is not suggesting any apportionment, the appellant company will succeed in this appeal. If, however, the commission, though calculated in part on future outcome and payable later, is remuneration for services completely performed in year 3, the respondents' claim that the additional assessment in respect of the year 3 is justified, as the appellant company, on this view, has at the end of the year 3 done everything it has to do to earn it. The agreement has been acutely analysed from both sides, with special reference to the complications arising under cl. 9 and 12, if and when the agreement is terminated. I will not detail these arguments, but will content myself with saying that I agree with the rest of your Lordships, to whose opinions I would refer, and with LORD GREENE, M.R., that the better view is that the commission, though ascertained by reference to profits arising from underwriting in the year 1938-39 and its subsequent outcome, and paid two years later, e.g., in Mar., 1941, is remuneration for work done, and completely done, in the year ending Mar. 31, 1939.

H All that remains is to apply the law correctly to the situation thus established. For the purpose of national defence contribution, the appellant company's profits arising in the chargeable accounting period Apr. 1, 1938, to Mar. 31, 1939, are to be calculated "on income tax principles," but they are to be taken to be the actual profits arising within that period. In calculating the taxable profit of a business on income tax principles (and the same point has been constantly illustrated in calculating excess profits duty—Tax Cases, Vol. 12, contains a number of examples), services completely rendered or goods supplied which are not to be paid for till a subsequent year cannot, generally speaking, be dealt with by treating the taxpayer's outlay as pure loss in the year in which it was incurred and bringing in the remuneration as pure profit in the subsequent year in which it is paid, or is due to be paid. In making an assessment to income tax under sched. D, the net result of the transaction, setting expense on the one side and a figure for remuneration on the other side, ought to appear, (as it would appear in a proper system of accountancy) in the same year's profit and loss account, and that year will be the year when the service was rendered or the goods delivered. (I am not speaking of the proper treatment of "work in progress" where the whole subject-matter has to be spread over more than one year: compare the Finance Act, 1937, sched. IV, para. 14). This may involve, in some instances, an estimate of what the future remuneration will amount to (and in theory, though not usually in practice, a discounting of the amount to be paid in the future), but in the present case the amount of the commission due to be paid on Mar. 31, 1941, as part of the remuneration for services rendered two years before was already known before the additional assessment was made. The Crown is right in treating this additional sum as earned in the chargeable accounting period Apr. 1, 1938, to Mar. 31, 1939. If the accounts for this last-mentioned period were made up before the amount of the commission was ascertained, a provisional estimate of what the amount would be might be inserted in the first place, and could be corrected when the precise figure was known, by additional assessment or by a return of any excess within six years of the original assessment. A B C

This, as it seems to me, is the result of applying the well-known decision in the Woolcombers case [Holden & Sons, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1)], where the taxpayer had been engaged in combing wool on commission for the government in the year 1917-18 and the commission was by a subsequent arrangement increased and paid to the taxpayer after the end of the trading year. ROWLATT, J., held that the total amount of commission must be included in arriving at the profits of the taxpayer for the year 1917-18. In other words, the taxpayer was treated as earning, by his work in that year, all the profits arising from the business of the year, even though there was no legal right to part of them until the agreement was afterwards made. It will be observed that the Crown's contention in the present case does not go so far as the contention which prevailed in the Woolcombers case (1), for in the latter there was no legal right, at the time when the work was done, to receive the amount which was ultimately paid. Here the appellant company had a legal right to be paid in futuro. The same principle is involved in the decision of this House in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Newcastle Breweries, Ltd. (2). Another illustration of the same principle may be found in the English Dairies case [English Dairies, Ltd. v. Phillips (3)]. The principle is to refer back to the year in which it was earned, so far as possible, remuneration subsequently received, even though it can only be precisely calculated afterwards. D E F

The decision of this House in Harrison v. Cronk & Sons, Ltd. (4), was referred to as though it qualified, or provided some exception to, the above principle. This can hardly be so, for the line of cases to which I have referred above does not seem to have been referred to at all. The case arose on very special and complicated facts and in substance confirmed the view of the Court of Appeal (LORD HANWORTH, M.R., ROMER and MAUGHAM, L.J.J.) that sums which were not received by the taxpayer in the year for which his profits were being calculated should, none the less, be brought in at a valuation as trading receipts for that year. So far, this is in strict accordance with the ordinary principle, but in the House of Lords doubt was expressed as to whether a proper valuation could be made and the order of the House was that, if it could not, the sums, whatever they turned out to be, must be left to be taxed in the year when they were received. I may add that I think that the use of the phrase "actuarial" valuation in that case was a slip, derived from the terms of the Case Stated. At any rate, Cronk's case (4), does not assist the appellant company, for here the actual amount of the commission was known before the additional assessment was made. Even if its ascertainment was not yet possible, it seems to me that a provisional or estimated figure for the commission could be inserted which would be subject to correction G H either way when the figures were precisely known. I move that this appeal be dismissed, with costs.

LORD WRIGHT: My Lords, I have considered in print the opinion which has just been delivered by my noble and learned friend, VISCOUNT SIMON. I agree with it and shall merely state briefly in my own words my reasons for doing so.

A The appellant company conducts (inter alia) the business of agent for the members of various syndicates of underwriters at Lloyd's. Its remuneration consists of a commission on the profits of the particular underwriter on whose behalf the risk is effected along with, in some cases, a fixed yearly salary during the agency. In computing under the Finance Act, 1937, pt. III, its liability for national defence contribution under that Act, it is necessary to determine in what year the commission is earned, or, in the language of the Act, in what year the appellant's profits arose. The particular problem B has arisen in respect of an additional assessment for national defence contribution made on the appellant company for the accounting period ending on Mar. 31, 1939. The original assessment had been on the basis of the appellant's commission in respect of profits from policies underwritten in 1936: the additional assessment was on a larger sum representing the appellant's commission on profit from policies underwritten in 1938.

C It is necessary, to explain this, to state briefly the position of the appellant as underwriter's agent. Its function is, on behalf of the group or syndicate of "names" as principals for whom it acts, to accept risks, issue policies, collect premiums, settle claims, adjust returns of premium or extra premiums, effect reinsurances where necessary, and, in short, to conduct the entirety of the underwriting business. The practice of Lloyd's is for underwriting D accounts to be drawn up by reference to the calendar year in which the risks are underwritten, but for the accounts to be kept open for a certain time (generally three years) from the acceptance of the risk, to allow for the adjustments required in order to ascertain the eventual profits. The delay is necessary in order to close the accounts. There must be an interval of time for ascertaining and settling losses, and winding up the financial results of each risk which will depend on how the risk has worked out. Accordingly, E accounts are made up in general practice at the end of the second year after the year in which the risk has been underwritten. That period is generally sufficient to ascertain the final results of the venture and to complete the accounts. The dispute in this particular case is whether the profits are to be taken on the basis of the risks underwritten in 1938, the account of which would be drawn up in 1938, or in respect of the risks underwritten in 1936 F which was the accounting period. The respondents contend that the former is the correct basis because they say the commission was earned in that year, though its amount was not ascertainable until the end of the three-year period. The appellant contends that the latter is the true basis because, it says, nothing was ascertainable, demandable or payable until the latter date.

I accept that the law on the point is as stated by my noble and learned friend in his judgment. He sums it up in this way:

G The principle is to refer back to the year in which it was earned, so far as possible, remuneration subsequently received, even though it can only be precisely calculated afterwards.

I agree also with his comments on the decision of the House in Harrison v. Cronk (4), and his view that that case did not qualify the rules laid down in the earlier cases to which he refers. With this principle in mind, I turn to consider if the profits from the commissions in question on which the H respondents claim to assess the appellant company were those arising from risks effected in 1938 or in 1936, and for that purpose I must consider the form of agreement in use in the particular transactions in question.

Your Lordships have been supplied with copies of two skeleton agreements. I shall take first the form applicable to the names of F. G. Hall and G. Harrisons Syndicate. Under that skeleton agreement the appellant company was vested with full discretion to carry on the ordinary business of underwriters at Lloyd's in the name and on account of a particular member of the syndicate, with full control and management of the underwriting, and with full power to take risks and settle claims and to reinsure the whole or any portion of any risk or outstanding liability. The appellant was to keep proper accounts and keep a separate banking account and all moneys received were to be held on trust. Clause 8 dealt with remuneration. The appellant company was to be paid as remuneration for conducting the agency a fixed salary at the rate of £— per annum, and expenses, and a commission of — per cent. on the net profits on each year's underwriting, and also certain further contributions to outgoings. Clause 9 is particularly significant. It provided that the fixed salary and expenses should cease at the termination of the agency, but after such termination (whether by death of the underwriter or otherwise) the appellant company should be entitled to wind up the underwriting and the account in connection therewith, and should be paid for its services in connection therewith a remuneration of not less than one hundred guineas. Clause 10 provided for the 3 years method of accounting and stipulated that the account for each year should be treated as a separate account for ascertaining the commission and one year should not be affected by another. The accounts for each year were to be made up and balanced at the end of the second clear year after the expiration of the period or year to which it related. Clause 12 contained provisions for dealing with matters left outstanding when the account for the year has been made up and balanced. Clause 13 provided for what was to happen on the death of one member of the syndicate and for his account being taken over or reinsured by the surviving members. Clause 14 gave an option to either party to terminate the agency at the end of any year on giving six months' notice. Clause 15 provided that nothing in the agreement should be taken to constitute a partnership.

It is on the provisions of the contract that it must be decided, as a question of construction, and, therefore, of law, when the commission was earned. What I think is the crucial provision is that in cl. 9, which deals with what is to happen when the agency is terminated. It expressly stipulates that the fixed salary is to cease. The appellant company, however, is to have the option to wind up the underwriting and accounts and, if it exercises that option, it is to be entitled to a special remuneration for that work. This is in place of the stipulated annual salary, which ceases with the termination of the agency. But it is not bound to exercise that option, though it may for various reasons suit it to do so. What then is the position if it does not? The agency is a yearly employment while it lasts. The yearly salary naturally ceases with the agency, but the question of commission is not mentioned. I agree with the Court of Appeal in thinking that the necessary conclusion from that must be that the right to the commission is treated as a vested right which has accrued at the time when the risk was underwritten. It has then been earned, though the profits resulting from the insurance cannot be then ascertained and, in practice, are not ascertained until the end of two years beyond the date of underwriting. The right is vested though its valuation is postponed—and is not merely postponed but depends on all the contingencies which are inevitable in any insurance risk, losses which may or may not happen, returns of premium, premiums to be arranged for additional risks, reinsurance and the whole catalogue of uncertain future factors. All these have to be brought into account according to ordinary commercial practice and understanding. But the delays and difficulties which there may be in any particular case, however they may affect the profit, do not affect the right for what it eventually proves to be worth. The right itself in a case like this does not depend on whether the appellant company has discharged all its duties as underwriting agent. It is clear that these duties are not limited to the simple but decisive act of taking the risk for its principal. The future working out of the insurance may involve, so long as the agency and the authority to act for the same continues, the exercise of discretions, such as settling claims, effecting reinsurances and many other matters almost as vital as the original taking of the risk. But all these duties are covered, while the agency continues, by the agreed commission, together with the yearly salary, in addition, where that is stipulated for by the agreement. The appellant has contended strenuously that the various duties ancillary and subsequent to the writing of the risk are conditions precedent to the earning of the commission. As I have already explained, this view would destroy the right to commission altogether in the event of the agency being terminated, whenever that happens before the underwriting and accounts are wound up. The company then is no longer agent and its authority to act for the underwriter has ceased. Suppose a risk is written in a particular year of the agency, say year 1, and the agency is terminated in year 2 or year 3, i.e., in either of the succeeding years of the 3 years' cycle: the underwriter on that basis would get no commission at all for writing the risks of year 1, because he would not have completed the duties which are said to be conditions precedent to earning the commission, and could not do so because his authority to act for the same would have ceased. That cannot, in my opinion, be regarded as a possible agreement between business men. The only alternative which I can see is to accept the view already stated that the commission is not referred to specifically in cl. 9, 10, 12, 13 or 14, because it was meant to be treated as something fixed and established and unaffected by the termination of the agency. That will be so, not only in the case of the skeleton agreements which I have been so far discussing (viz., those providing for a fixed yearly salary), but equally in the case of the other type of agreement, that in which no fixed salary is agreed, but the only remuneration provided for the agent is the fixed commission. This conclusion is more in harmony not only with the true construction of the contract, but also with the business exigencies of the matter and with the general trend of authority embodying the legal principle which has been stated by my noble and learned friend, VISCOUNT SIMON. It may, of course, happen sometimes that a particular risk cannot be closed or wound up at, or before the end of, the three years' period, but such a case can be dealt with as it is dealt with in the agreement by a subsequent re-opening and adjustment of the accounts. Nor is it an objection to this view that in these cases the act of accepting the risk does not exhaust the functions of the agent. That aspect, which is not generally present in the cases cited, is, perhaps, easier to work into the scheme in the type of contract in which there is, besides the commission, a fixed annual salary, which may be taken to cover in conjunction with the commission the general duty of conducting the business. But in the other type of contract, where there is no such fixed annual salary, still the commission must be taken to include a payment for the subsequent activities which the agent has to perform.

I may observe in concluding that no question is raised in the case as to apportionment under the Finance Act, 1937, sched. IV, para. 14. Indeed, such an idea would not square with the contentions of either party. Nor have I found much help in what is called the distinction between the legal and the conventional basis. I should dismiss the appeal.

LORD PORTER [read by LORD SIMONDS]: My Lords, this case raises a question as to the year in respect of which commission earned by underwriting agents at Lloyd's is subject to charge for the purposes of national defence contribution. The charge was imposed by the Finance Act, 1937, and the operative sections are 19 and 20:

19. (1) There shall be charged, on the profits arising in each chargeable accounting period falling within the 5 years beginning on April 1, 1937, from any trade or business to which this section applies, a tax (to be called the "national defence contribution") of an amount equal to 5 per cent. of those profits in a case where the trade or business is carried on by a body corporate and 4 per cent. of those profits in any other case.

20 (1) For the purpose of the national defence contribution, the profits arising from a trade or business in each chargeable accounting period shall be separately computed and shall be so computed on income tax principles as adapted in accordance with the provisions of sched. IV to this Act. . . (2) For the purpose of the national defence contribution, the accounting periods of a trade or business shall be determined as follows: (a) in a case where the accounts of the trade or business are made up for successive periods of 12 months, each of those periods shall be an accounting period . . . (c) and the expression "chargeable accounting period" means (i) any accounting period determined as aforesaid which falls wholly within the 5 years beginning on April 1, 1937. . . Admittedly the appellants' business is one to which s. 19 applies.

The period with which your Lordships are concerned is that beginning on April 1, 1938, and ending on Mar. 31, 1939, and the appellants are accustomed to make up their accounts for successive periods of 12 months beginning on Apr. 1 and ending on Mar. 31, in each year. They, in fact, carry on two separate businesses, viz., that of insurance brokers and that of underwriting agents, but the question at issue is solely concerned with their profits in the latter capacity and their activities as brokers are not in issue. The appellants act as agents for more than one syndicate and, in accordance with the ordinary practice of Lloyd's, have a separate agreement in identical terms with the various members of each syndicate, but it does not follow that the contracts are the same in the case of one syndicate as they are in the case of another. Indeed, two separate forms of agreement have been exhibited to the Case Stated by the Special Commissioners upon which your Lordships have to pronounce. In substance, the terms of each are similar but there are some differences in detail. To become a "name" in a syndicate, the individual concerned must become an underwriting member of Lloyd's and for that purpose he must, in conjunction with his fellow "names" and the underwriting agent, enter into an indenture called a trust deed, under the terms of which all premiums received by the syndicate are to be retained by trustees for the payment of losses and other outgoings, including expenses, and, subject thereto, as profits of the business. The "name" must also, as a condition of his admission as an underwriting member of Lloyd's, sign an undertaking as to his method of carrying on business, and this undertaking contains an obligation similar to that found in the trust deed whereby all premiums are to be placed in the hands of trustees for the purposes aforesaid. The universal practice of Lloyd's is for the underwriting accounts of risks written in any particular year to be separated from those of any other year and to be kept open for a certain time (usually three years) in order that losses and expenses may be calculated and profits ascertained.

Ultimately, the decision of the dispute which your Lordships have to determine depends on the true construction of the agreements between the appellants and their "names" and for that purpose those agreements must be analytically examined, but for the moment it is sufficient to say that they provide (inter alia) for the payment of a commission on the profits of the business by the "names" to the appellants. Inasmuch as it is impossible to find out what losses will occur, what settlements may be made, what increase or return of premiums may be necessary and what reinsurances and other expenses may be involved, the amount of profits upon which the commission is calculated is not, and cannot be, known until at least the three years during which the accounts are kept open have come to an end. The result is that the amount of commission due on risks underwritten in the year (say) 1938 is only discoverable three years later i.e., profits on risks written in the year April 1, 1938, to Mar. 31, 1939, are only ascertained at Mar. 31, 1941. In these conditions the appellants claim that, under the terms of the agreement between them and their "names", the commission is not earned until the last-mentioned date, whereas the respondents maintain that it is earned in the chargeable accountancy period Apr. 1, 1938 to Mar. 31, 1939.

There is no dispute as to one of the considerations to be applied. Each of the parties accepts the view that the material period is that in which the commission is earned, but disagrees as to what that period is. The commissioners say that it was earned in the year in which the risks were underwritten, whereas the company assert that it was not finally earned until Apr., 1941, and give two reasons in support of their contention, viz., (i) that the work which they had to do in order to earn their commission was not completed until the last-mentioned date, and (ii) that, even if their task was completed by April, 1939, still, in consequence of certain authorities decided by and binding upon your Lordships' House, such emoluments could not be said to be earned in law as were unascertained and unascertainable in the sense that no evaluation of them could be made at the end of the chargeable accounting period and any figure inserted in respect of them into the syndicate's accounts would at best be no more than a guess since they might amount to anything between a substantial sum and nothing.

In the Case stating the facts on which the present dispute has to be determined, the Special Commissioners have found that it is impossible to ascertain in the initial year what commission would accrue to an agent with regard to risks underwritten in that year, that in the case of disputed claims there was normally as much to do in the second and third years after the risks were underwritten as in the first, and that there was a considerable amount of expert business to be performed by the agent in the latter period in respect of risks written in the earlier year. Further, they found that the underwriters' profits, on which the commission was calculated, depended on events, some of which would happen after the end of the year in which the risk was written. In these circumstances it was contended on behalf of the appellants that the contracts into which they entered were executory contracts under which their services were not completed nor the commission earned until the relevant account was made up. The profit in the form of commission, they said, was not ascertainable or earned and did not arise until that time. It was contended on behalf of the Crown that, under the terms of the agreements entered into by the company, their commissions were earned in the respective years in which the policies were underwritten, and that it was immaterial in law that the amounts of the commissions were not ascertained until two years later. The additional assessment to national defence contribution for the year 1938-39 had been correctly made in accordance with the law and should be confirmed.

A On these findings the commissioners who heard the appeal gave their decision in the following terms :

B 1. The underwriter's profit, on which the agent's commission depends, does not normally emerge for a considerable time. For this reason Lloyd's underwriters have adopted the method of accounting, known as "the conventional basis," under which results are brought to profit and loss account in the second year after the end of the first year—i.e., that in which the policy is underwritten. The appellant company, in common with other agents, has adopted and consistently employed the same method. Thus it brought into its account for the year to Mar. 31, 1939, the commissions on underwriters' profits, ascertained in Dec., 1938, from policies underwritten in 1936.

C 2. The present case raised the question what is the proper basis of liability to national defence contribution in the case of the underwriter's agent, and we are concerned with that question alone. The answer is not necessarily the same as in the case of the underwriter, if only because the agent's reward (salary, etc., and commission) is not related in the same way to the undertaking of a risk in the first year, but is earned by agency services over an indefinite period.

D 3. That period normally extends well beyond the end of the first year, and in the circumstances we do not think the Crown is right in its contention that the part of the agent's reward which takes the form of commission is earned in the first year and, when received, should be related back to that year.

E 4. The only alternative put to us was "the conventional basis" indicated in para. 1 above. The agent's services under his contract may extend to the end of the second year there referred to, or may be completed at some earlier date. In this respect, therefore, "the conventional basis" does not seem equally appropriate to every case, even though the commission may not be known till the end of the underwriters' second year. However it is obviously convenient and has the support of accountancy evidence. We see no good reason for rejecting it and accordingly allow the appeal, and discharge the additional assessment before us.

F On these findings one matter may, I think, be disposed of at once. I understand that the statement, in findings (3) and (4), that no other basis of claim was put forward before the commissioners except the "conventional basis", on the one hand, and the Crown's contention, on the other, was made in order to dispose of any argument founded upon sched. IV, para. 14, to the Act of 1937 which is in the following terms :

G Where the performance of a contract extends beyond the chargeable accounting period, there shall (unless the Commissioners of Inland Revenue owing to any special circumstances otherwise direct) be attributed to that period such proportion of the entire profit or loss which has resulted, or which it is estimated will result, from the complete performance of the contract as is properly attributable to that period, having regard to the extent to which the contract was performed in that period.

H Under these provisions it might have been possible for the respondents to maintain that, if they were wrong on the main theses and if the commission was earned by work done in each of the three years during which the accounts of the underwriting year were kept open, it would then be proper to apportion the commission over each of those years in accordance with the terms of this paragraph, but they have expressly declined to put forward any such contention and the appellants have equally refrained from relying upon such a claim. In these circumstances your Lordships, like the commissioners, have to determine whether the commission was earned in 1938 or at a later date.

The question is a matter of importance. Even in the present case it would add some £18,000 to the profits subject to tax, and I have no doubt that there are a large number of accounts which will be similarly affected. My Lords, I am conscious of the regard which must be paid to the findings of the commissioners, which I accept fully, as, indeed, your Lordships' House is bound to do. Moreover, in matters of business and the keeping of business accounts, the practice followed in the particular occupation is always a matter for the most careful thought and cannot lightly be disregarded. Nevertheless, these considerations do not absolve your Lordships from a scrutiny of the exact terms of the agreement between the agent and the "names", and from deciding the date at which the commission is earned under its terms.

In substance, the appellants contend that, just as the underwriting done in each year is kept separate from that done in all those preceding or succeeding it, so the work in respect of each must also be kept in a watertight compartment, and, consequently, the commission in respect of each underwriting period is earned by undertaking the risks and following them through until all of them are finally disposed of, subject to some slight overlap (not material to a decision of this case) where an uncompleted transaction may be carried forward into a fourth or even later year. In other words, the work which earns the commission is done, not in one year, but in three, and is not completed until the third year has elapsed. If this is the true construction of the contract, admittedly the appellants must succeed. The respondents, on the other hand, while they agree that the underwriters' profits are to be ascertained by such a separation of one year from another and that the quantum of commission is to be calculated upon a percentage of those profits, yet say that this is merely a conventional method of discovering what the commission is to be and in no way determinative of the work by which it is earned. For the latter purpose one must look at the terms of the agreement itself.

The clauses in the agency agreement on which stress was laid in the discussion before the House were cl. 8, 9, 10, 12 and 14 and those clauses do, I think, contain substantially all the provisions on which your Lordships' decision must depend. As I have endeavoured to indicate, the Crown say that the commission is earned, not by the work done in respect of a particular year's underwriting, but for all the work done in a particular year, whether in respect of underwriting done in that year or in the previous two years or indeed in any previous year, whereas the company say that the work done in respect of the risks undertaken in a particular year is to be kept entirely separate from that in respect of the risks undertaken in any other year, and that the commission in respect of any individual year is earned by writing the risks in that year and following up the work incidental thereto. In their submission, until that task is fulfilled, which will not be until the end of the third year, the work for which they are being paid commission is not completed nor is the commission earned.

Bearing in mind these two contentions I turn to the material clauses. To my mind cl. 8 stipulates in terms the task for which commission is paid. It is "for its" (i.e., the agent's) "services in conducting the agency," not for its services in writing a particular year's risk and dealing with the various matters necessary for disposing of them. Moreover, under the terms of that clause, the payment of the fixed year's salary is to be made for exactly the same work and, undoubtedly, the latter remuneration is for the whole of the work done in that year, not the proportion of it attributable to a particular year's underwriting. It is true that in the case of one of the appellants' syndicates there is no fixed salary payable, but in that case also the commission is for the company's services in conducting the agency and without any stipulation that the payment should be for the work done in respect of a particular year's underwriting and that only. No doubt, cl. 10 does provide for the separation of the accounts respecting the risks undertaken in one year from those respecting the risks undertaken in any other year, and for separating the profit accruing to the "names" in respect of any one year's business from the profits accruing in respect of any other year's underwriting, and further provides that commission shall be paid on the profits so ascertained. But it does not follow that the work by which the commission is earned is that done in respect of the risks underwritten in a particular year. The clause is merely a method of finding out the profits to which the "name" is entitled. "It shall be taken to represent the amount of the net profit of the period or year to which it relates," are the words of the clause (the italics are mine):

"and," it goes on, "the commission payable to the company shall be calculated and paid thereon." This phraseology means, I think, that a conventional sum so calculated shall be regarded as the commission which the agent shall be deemed to have earned in respect of the work which he has done in an individual year. It is, as the proviso says, "for the purpose of ascertaining the commission payable to the company," and for that purpose the account for each period or year is to be treated as a separate account.

A The commission is calculated on, but not earned by doing, that portion of the year's work.

The appellants, however, say that so to construe the agreement is to confine the attention to part only of its provisions and indicate certain difficulties in administering the business if such a construction is adopted. They point out that cl. 14 provides for the termination of the agreement by either party at Dec. 31, in any year and that cl. 9 contemplates such a termination either

B under cl. 14 or by reason of the death of the "name." How, they ask, is the outstanding business to be dealt with in such an event? Clause 9, they agree, entitles, but does not compel, the appellants to wind up the business and settle the uncompleted risks. But, it is said, suppose they do not elect to do so.

In that event the "name", instead of having the work completed by them, must find some other agent, or, if alive and willing to do so, himself wind up the venture although, as they contend, on the respondents' construction he will

C have to pay for that very work out of the commission due at the end of the third year. They admit that cl. 9 speaks of the termination of the agency and that that expression might in another collocation mean that notice or death would finally bring the relationship between agent and "names" to an immediate end, but say that in its association in the agreement "termination" means that, though the mandate to write further risks is ended, yet the obligation

D to wind up the business is not, but continues until the further two years have elapsed. How else, they add, could outstanding matters be efficiently dealt with. The company, it is urged, are under an obligation to complete the work entailed by writing the previous one or two years' risks for the "names" who remain, unless the agents themselves go out of business, and the natural assumption and convenience of all parties involve their finishing the work for the retired or deceased "name" as well as for those whose membership

E continues. Moreover, the terms of cl. 12 must be considered. That clause provides for the carrying over of an uncompleted account even to the fourth year and the proviso, in saying that "in the event of the termination of this agreement the account may at the discretion of the company remain open until all the risks have run off and the business shall have been completely wound up," by implication says and means that it will normally remain open until the usual two years period has elapsed.

F My Lords, I hope I have not misstated the argument. I am conscious that I have found it elusive. The answer is, I think, that so to construe the agreement is to give its phraseology a meaning which the words used do not naturally bear. To my mind "termination of the agency" or "termination of the agreement" mean the same thing, viz., the cessation of all the mutual obligations of either party forthwith. Moreover, the whole method of expression used in

G cl. 9, i.e., the cessation of the right to fixed salary and expenses, the option to wind up the underwriting—not, it is to be noted, to cease future underwriting—and the right to be paid for winding it up all suggest that "termination" means termination of all future rights and obligations between the parties, except the right on the part of the "name" to receive his profits when ascertained and that of the agent to receive his commission on those profits, subject always to the fact that the agent may elect to wind up the affairs of

H the "name" and be paid for doing so. If the obligation to finish all the work consequent on previous underwriting remains, I do not see why the company should be paid for the winding up.

It was sought to overcome this last difficulty by suggesting that winding up in cl. 9 refers to any winding up necessitated by carrying over the accounts beyond the two years and, as I understood the argument, the provisions of cl. 12, under which uncompleted accounts were to be carried over and included in the next year's account and the phrase "completely wound up" in that clause were relied on as indicating that the agency did not terminate until after the whole of the work consequent on underwriting done had been fully disposed of and its results ascertained after two years' interval. I do not myself think that the wording used implies any such result. Those provisions were required for dealing with a continuing agency, they have no necessary application to an agency which has been terminated.

A further argument, however, was strongly relied on on behalf of the appellants. It was pointed out that on the respondents' construction the agent is not remunerated for a similar amount of work in respect of each year. If, as the case finds, a year's underwriting involves an equal amount of work in each of the three years during which its accounts remain open and if the "name" is to pay the full commission in respect of the work done in each year, whatever it may be, then when a new "name" joins a syndicate, he will pay full commission for the first year though the agent would only have done one third of the work which would be required after the account had reached its third year and in the second only two thirds of that sum. Consequently, if the agency was terminated after ten years, the agent would have completed a volume of work equivalent only to nine times the work necessary in a full year's working, i.e., eight full years work, one year involving two-thirds of one full year's work and one involving only one-third. No doubt, this is, in a sense, an anomaly, but it is, in my opinion, what the agreement says, and the anomaly does not justify a construction inconsistent with its terms.

If I am right in my view as to the true construction of the agreement, it only remains to consider the second contention put forward by the appellants. That contention was modified in the course of the argument before your Lordships. Originally it was said that, though remuneration earned in a particular year is, in general, part of that year's taxable profits, even if not ascertained or payable until a later date, nevertheless there is an exception to this rule in a case where that remuneration is not only unascertained but unascertainable. In such a case it was maintained that the remuneration was chargeable to tax in the year in which its existence and amount was first ascertained. By a later modification the view was accepted that, in some cases, profits payable at a date outside and beyond the year in which they were earned, and even though unascertainable in that year, are chargeable to tax as profits of the earlier year, but not in all. Where, it was said, some remuneration is certain, but its quantum is not and cannot be ascertained, still it must be regarded as profits of the year in which it was earned, but, where it is uncertain whether there will be any profits at all, then, if any profit is eventually discovered to have been earned, it must be charged to the year in which it is ascertained or paid. No sum, it is contended, could be inserted in the earlier year's accounts in such a case. To credit any sum would not be to make an estimate, but to hazard a guess, not only as to its quantum, but even as to its existence, and, where one can only guess, the sum eventually found to have been earned must be attributed to the year of payment. In support of this contention three cases were called in aid, viz., Dailuaine-Talisker Distilleries v. Inland Revenue (5), Harrison v. Cronk (4), and Absalom v. Talbot (6).

The first case is not binding on your Lordships, and I am not prepared to accept the view that it would necessarily have been decided in the way in which it was, had it been brought before this House. Some of the observations, at any rate, of the members of the Court of Session cannot, I think, be supported. For instance, the LORD PRESIDENT (LORD CLYDE), quoting from an earlier decision of his own [in Collins & Sons v. Inland Revenue (7)] said (1930 S.C. 884):

Those elements of profit or gain, and those only, enter into the computation which are earned or ascertained in the year to which the inquiry refers . . .

LORD SANDS also appears to take the view that, though remuneration unascertained at the end of the chargeable period may yet be profits of that period, nevertheless, if it is then unascertainable, it cannot be regarded as an element in those profits. LORD BLACKBURN goes, I think, further and holds that, if the remuneration is not payable until a date beyond the period of charge, it is not be reckoned as profits of that period. But the decision itself can be supported in principle. The Lord President said (ibid., 884):

Thus, if goods have been sold or delivered to a customer within the year, the sum due by the customer is credited to the business and debited to the customer and enters the profit and loss account at the end of the year, whether payment in cash (or otherwise) has been received within the year or not. But this elementary principle does not necessarily apply to the price of a contract made during the year (or in a previous year) but not completed within the year.

If this means that, where the contract is an entire one, the remuneration is not earned until the whole task is completed, I think it accurately expresses the true principle, and it has the support of LORD MORISON who dissented.

A Indeed, it may well be that the only difference between the members of the Court of Session consisted in a divergence of opinion between them as to when the work for which payment was to be made was completed, the majority taking the view that the appellants had undertaken to store whisky for their customers for a period of time and that their charges were not earned, nor the work they had to do completed, until the whisky was finally removed, though
B the sum due was calculated on a weekly basis, LORD MORISON, on the other hand, thinking that it was earned week by week. If this be the difference of opinion, there is no divergence in principle, merely two separate views as to the construction of a particular document.

Harrison v. Cronk (4), does, undoubtedly, give rise to more difficulty and was strongly relied on by the appellants. The principle for which it was cited
C said ([1936] 3 All E.R. 751) :

I have serious doubt as to whether the valuation ordered by the Court of Appeal is practicable in any proper sense ; the commissioners, after hearing evidence, have expressed the view that an actuarial valuation is not possible, and it may well be that no proper valuation is possible. I propose, therefore, that the order of the Court of Appeal should be varied by adding that in the event of the commissioners finding such valuation to be impracticable, the sums deposited with the building society under the circumstances described in the Case Stated should not be treated as receipts of the company's trade except in so far as such sums, or any part thereof, were released to the company during the trading periods in question.

These observations, in the submission of the appellants, constituted a ruling that in any case where a sum earned in presenti and payable in futuro is incapable of any computation except by a guess and may, in fact, have no value, it must be chargeable to tax, not in the year in which the work
E necessary to earn it is performed, but in the year in which it is received.

My Lords, I do not think the case lays down any such general proposition. The facts were peculiar. The material parties were a building company which constructed houses for clients, a building society which advanced money to enable the clients to purchase their houses, and the clients themselves. To take the illustration apparently given in the Case Stated, which represented
F a typical transaction : A house is built and sold for £575 ; the society nominally advances the whole sum, but actually the builders receive only £501 13s. 4d., leaving £73 6s. 8d., which is called a deposit, in the hands of the society, and which earns interest so long as it is retained. In addition, in case of the client's default, the builders are liable to the society for a sum not exceeding £76 13s. 4d., i.e., their total liability amounts to £150 in case of default. In these exceptional circumstances it may well be said that a new
G relationship has been established between the society and the company under which, indeed, if it can be fairly estimated that some sum is due to the latter by the former, the remuneration is regarded as earned though its payment is postponed, but, if no estimate can be made, the contract between the parties must be regarded as leaving no debt due on one side or the other, but only a position in which there are mutual obligations which may as well show a credit to the one party as to the other.

H If I may be permitted to quote from my own speech in Absalom v. Talbot (6) I said ([1944] 1 All E.R. 651) :

In it [i.e., Cronk's case (4)] no debt remained due from the purchaser to the owner, the full price was paid to the latter by the building society. But lest the society should not be repaid by the purchaser in full, the owner deposited a sum of money with it and guaranteed payment of an additional sum beyond the deposit. In these circumstances there were contingent liabilities on each side—in the case of the society to return the deposit or some part of it, if the money which was recovered from the purchaser enabled this to be done : on the side of the owner to implement his guarantee if the purchaser failed to pay even so much as with the deposit made up the full price In such a case there was no debt either present or future due to the appellant. It might eventually happen that something would be found to be due to him, but, on the other hand, so far from receiving, he might have to pay.

It is true that in Absalom v. Talbot (6) my opinion differed from that of the majority of your Lordships who sat to hear the matter, but the difference was only as to the quantum of the sum to be charged, not as to the year to which its gain was to be attributed. All the members of the House who were present were of opinion that the sums agreed to be paid should be assessed to tax in the year in which the house which had been sold was transferred to the purchaser, but the majority thought they should be assessed at a reduced figure, whereas the minority thought the full sum should be the basis of assessment. The decision therefore, is antagonistic to the appellants' argument here and the case itself did not exhibit those exceptional and peculiar features which are to be found in Cronk's case (4). In my view, the cases cited do not establish the principle sought to be deduced from them and, for that reason, as well as because I think the sum in dispute in the present case was wholly earned in the year in which the risks were underwritten, I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD SIMONDS : My Lords, this is, I think, a very plain case and it is only in deference to the prolonged and vigorous argument of counsel for the appellants that I make a few observations on it. Two questions are involved, the first a question of construction of certain agreements made by the appellants with members of certain syndicates of underwriters at Lloyd's, the second a question of the application of the correct principle of income tax law to the case. The impost actually in dispute is the national defence contribution which was imposed by the Finance Act, 1937, but it is common ground that the point at issue is governed by the principles on which the profits and gains of a trade are determined for income tax purposes.

The appellants, a limited company incorporated in 1902, carry on (inter alia) the business of underwriting agents, i.e., they act as agents for underwriters at Lloyd's, who form themselves into syndicates, the members of which (known as "names") are insurers of various types of risks. As such agents on behalf of their principals they accept risks, issue policies, collect premiums and settle claims and do all the other work which appertains to the business of underwriting. For this purpose the appellants enter into a separate agreement with each member of a syndicate. The agreements with every member of a syndicate are identical, but in the case of one of the three syndicates with whose members the appellants entered into agreements, viz., the Carisbrooke Syndicate, the appellants' remuneration was by way of commission and expenses only, whereas in the other two cases a fixed annual salary also was provided. The universal practice of Lloyd's is for underwriting accounts to be drawn up by reference to the calendar year, but for the accounts to be kept open for a certain time (usually three years) to allow the necessary adjustments to be ascertained and made. This fact, which is dictated by the nature of the business, is reflected in the agreements to which I have referred and is the cause of the difficulty that has arisen.

I will refer briefly to the salient features of a typical agreement. By cl. 1 it provides that the company (as, in this recital, I will call the appellants) agrees and is retained and authorised to act as the underwriter's agent for the purpose of underwriting at Lloyd's all such policies of insurance as the company thinks fit and to carry on the ordinary business of underwriter there in his name and on his account. Clause 2 elaborates the functions and duties of the company. Clause 8 is the vital clause which provides for the company's remuneration. Under it the underwriter is to pay to the company (except in the case of members of the Carisbrooke Syndicate) a fixed annual salary, a fixed sum for expenses, and "a commission of — per cent. on the net profits on each year's underwriting," and it is also to make certain other contributions for the benefit of the company. In the agreements with members of the Carisbrooke Syndicate there is no provision for an annual salary, and the provision in regard to expenses is somewhat different, but there is a similar provision in regard to commission.

My Lords, I pause for a moment at this point, for it is the crucial one, to state the question which arises. It is whether, on the true construction of this clause, the company earns, not only the annual salary, where it is paid, but also the commission on the "net profits on each year's underwriting" in the year in which the risks are written, or whether that commission is only earned over a period comprising the year of writing and the ensuing years which elapse before the "profits on the year's underwriting" are conventionally ascertained. This clause must, no doubt, be read in its context, but it must first be read by itself, and, if it is so read, the question I have asked admits of only one answer. The

A clause provides for annual remuneration for annual service. That remuneration so far as it consists of commission, is not the less earned by the year's service because it cannot be ascertained until a later date.

I read on, prepared to find in the following clauses provisions which may confirm, or be irreconcilable with, the prima facie meaning of cl. 8. Clause 9 provides that the fixed salary and expenses shall cease at the termination of the agency, but after such termination (whether by death of the underwriter or otherwise) the company shall be entitled to wind up the underwriting and the accounts in connection therewith and shall be paid for its services in connection therewith a remuneration of not less than one hundred guineas. This clause looks forward to cl. 14 which provides that either of the parties may terminate the agency on Dec. 31, 19— or on Dec. 31 in any succeeding year by giving to the other party six months' previous notice in writing. There was some controversy whether the date of termination should be the year of the agreement or a later year. I do not think that it matters.

Clauses 9 and 14 appear to me strongly to confirm the natural meaning of cl. 8. I will adopt the convenient method that was used in argument. Let year 1 be the year in which risks are first written. Then, at the end of year 3, the profit in respect of those risks, i.e., "the net profits on the underwriting of year 1," is ascertained. During year 1 the company's duties will necessarily be confined to performing its covenanted service under the agreement in respect of risks written in that year. In year 2 further risks are written and in that year the company's duties will cover the risks written in that year and in year 1. So in year 3 its duties will cover the risks written in year 3 and the two previous years. What then happens, if the agency is terminated at the end of any year? Something must be done, for, if nothing is done, risks that have not run off are left in the air. Accordingly, it is provided by cl. 9 that, if the agency is determined,

E the company shall be entitled to wind up the underwriting and the accounts in connection therewith. It may not write any risks, but it "may," not "must" wind up the underwriting. And if it does so, it is to be paid a remuneration of 100 guineas, i.e., 100 guineas for a "name," a substantial reward. This is so clearly inconsistent with the view put forward by the company that it did not earn its commission on the net profits of the underwriting of year 1 until the accounts had been made up at the end of year 3, that counsel for the appellants

F was driven to an extravagant argument on cl. 9. He urged on the House that the company, notwithstanding the termination of the agency, was yet bound to carry out all the duties which the agreement imposed on it in relation to outstanding risks, that the agency could only be "terminated" in the sense that the company was no longer authorised to write new risks, and that the expression "to wind up the underwriting and the accounts in connection therewith"

G meant something else than the performance of those duties, such as settling claims, etc., in regard to outstanding risks, which were the necessary prelude to making up accounts and ascertaining profits. What else those plain words meant was not clear to me.

My Lords, I see no reason whatever for doubting that the words "terminate the agency" in cll. 9 and 14 mean the same as "terminate the agreement" or, if you like, "terminate the agency agreement," and that nothing else is contemplated than the conclusion of the rights and obligations of the parties to the agreement. Nor can the words "wind up the underwriting, etc." in cl. 9, have any other than their natural meaning. If so, that is an end of the appellants' case, for no reason has been suggested why the company should be paid 100 guineas "per name" for performing duties which without that reward it was bound to perform.

H

A further argument was founded on the language of cl. 10. This clause (to state it shortly) provides that the company shall keep an account for the first and each subsequent year of the agency and shall carry to the account of such year the relative credit and debit entries and shall make up and balance such account at the end of the second year after that to which it relates and that the amount then remaining to the credit of the account shall be taken to represent the amount of the net profit of the year to which it relates and that the commission payable to the company shall be calculated and paid thereon. It was urged that it was implicit in this clause that the company was bound, notwithstanding the termination of the agency, to carry on its duties in regard to risks already written. But, it appears to me that this argument really begs the question. I should assume in the absence of some express provision to the contrary that an obligation imposed by a contract of service or agency was operative during the term of that contract and that the termination of the contract determined the obligation. I see nothing in cl. 10 which is inconsistent with this view. But, on the contrary, giving to it its natural meaning, viz., that contract and contractual obligation are co-terminous, I find in cl. 9, giving to that clause also its natural meaning, exactly the provision that might be expected in order that the agency agreement might be carried to a business like conclusion.

Certain other clauses were also relied on as suggesting that the commission in respect of the profits on a year's underwriting was not earned until the end of the second year after that year, but I do not think it necessary further to examine them. It is clear to me that the commission is wholly earned in year 1 in respect of the profits of that year's underwriting. If so, I should have thought that it was not arguable that that commission did not accrue for income tax purposes in that same year, though it was not ascertainable until later. So, indeed, thought LORD GREENE, M.R., who treated the matter as one beyond dispute as soon as it was determined in what year the commission was earned. Nor would any other conclusion be consistent with a long line of authority beginning with Holden v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) and including the Newcastle Breweries case (2), a decision of this House which seems to me to govern the present case. Your Lordships were, however, pressed with, first, a decision of the Court of Session, Dailuaine-Talisker Distilleries, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue (5), and, secondly, two decisions of this House, Harrison v. Cronk & Sons, Ltd. (4) and Absalom v. Talbot (6). The Scottish case appears to me to have turned on the construction of a contract of a very peculiar nature, and the decision may, perhaps, be justified by that fact. But I must, with deference to the judges who took part in it, express a grave doubt as to its correctness. In the two cases before this House, to which I have referred, the question now under discussion was not raised. The issue in Harrison's case (4) was not to what year profits, which had in fact been ascertained, should for income tax purposes be ascribed, i.e., when were they earned, when did they accrue or arise? On the contrary, the profits not having been ascertained, the issue was whether certain sums, which were admittedly subject to possible diminution, should be brought into charge at their face value, as the Crown contended, or, as the subject in the alternative successfully contended, should be brought into charge at their then present value. It was the latter view that prevailed in this House, though, in consideration of the possibility that no valuation was possible, the rider was added to the effect that in that event only such sums should be treated as receipts of the period in question as were actually received. I find nothing in this decision which in any way supports the plea of the appellants in the present case. In Absalom's case (6) somewhat similar considerations arose and again it appears to me that there is nothing in this decision which is in conflict with the authority of the Newcastle Breweries case (2) or assists the appellants. This appeal should, in my opinion, be dismissed.

LORD NORMAND [read by LORD WRIGHT]: My Lords, I agree with the construction which my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack and my noble and learned friend LORD PORTER have put on the agreements between the appellant company and their principals. I agree also with the exposition of the principles on which the profits, though not payable nor even receivable until a later year, are brought into the accounts for the year in which they are earned. I wish only to add that I find much in the opinion of the majority of the court in Dailuaine-Talisker Distilleries v. Inland Revenue (5) which is not reconcilable with these principles and I think that the dissenting opinion of LORD MORISON should be preferred.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

WHITLEY v. WHITLEY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Bucknill and Cohen, L.JJ.), March 6, 7, April 1, 1947.]

Divorce—Incurable unsoundness of mind—Care and treatment for five years—Admission of wife as temporary patient on application of husband—Detention “in pursuance of order”—No statement by visiting committee as to propriety of continuance of detention—Mental Treatment Act, 1930 (c. 23), s. 5 (9) (10) (11)—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, (c. 57), ss. 2 (d), 3 (a).

On Dec. 6, 1936, on the application of the husband, supported by the appropriate recommendation of two medical practitioners, the wife was admitted to a mental hospital as a temporary patient. At the end of 6 months, viz., on June 5, 1937, the wife, at her own written request, was admitted to the same hospital as a rate-aided voluntary patient and had remained there ever since under care and treatment as a person of unsound mind. The visiting committee signed no statement to the effect that it was proper that the wife should continue to be detained, as required by the Mental Treatment Act, 1930, s. 5 (10). In a petition by the husband, under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 2, for dissolution of the marriage on the ground that the wife was incurably of unsound mind and had been continuously under care and treatment for the last 5 years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition:—

APPEAL by the husband from a decision of BARNARD, J., dated Nov. 22, 1946, and reported [1946] 2 All E.R. 726, dismissing a petition for dissolution of marriage under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 2 (d). The facts appear

Apr. 1. BUCKNILL, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal from a judgment of BARNARD, J., dismissing a petition dated Nov. 10, 1943, by a husband for dissolution of his marriage on the ground that his wife was incurably of unsound mind and had been continuously under care and treatment for the last 5 years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition.

H

The parties were married on Feb. 8, 1936. The wife gave birth to a child on July 22, 1936, and shortly afterwards showed signs of mental disorder, and on Dec. 6, 1936, was admitted to the West Riding Hospital, Wakefield, as a temporary patient. At the end of 6 months, viz., on June 5, 1937, the wife, at her own written request, was admitted at the same hospital as a rate-aided voluntary patient and she has remained there ever since under care and treatment as a person of unsound mind. The learned judge in his judgment stated that he was satisfied that the wife was incurably of unsound mind and also that she had been continuously under care and treatment for the necessary 5 years, but he dismissed the petition on the ground that the wife had not been detained "in pursuance of any order or inquisition."

For the purposes of this case the material words of s. 3 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, which created the right to a decree dissolving a valid marriage on the ground of the insanity of a spouse, are :

... a person of unsound mind shall be deemed to be under care and treatment—
(a) while he is detained in pursuance of any order or inquisition under the Lunacy and Mental Treatment Acts, 1890 to 1930...; (b) while he is receiving treatment as a voluntary patient under the Mental Treatment Act, 1930, being treatment which follows without any interval a period of such detention as aforesaid; and not otherwise.

In the present case, before the wife was admitted as a temporary patient, the husband signed a form as prescribed by the Act requesting the superintendent of the mental hospital to receive his wife as a temporary patient into the hospital. This "application," as it is described in the Act, was accompanied by the appropriate recommendation of two medical practitioners who stated that each had examined the wife on Dec. 5 and 6 respectively, and declared that she—1. Was suffering from mental illness; 2. Was likely to benefit by temporary treatment; 3. Was for the time being incapable of expressing herself as willing or unwilling to receive such treatment. They also stated that it was expedient with a view to her recovery that she should be received into the hospital for a period not exceeding 6 months. Counsel for the husband put forward as one of his points that, if a patient may be lawfully detained for 6 months without her or his consent as a person of unsound mind, it must be presumed that the detention was imposed by virtue of some legal order. This attractive proposition, however, is based on the assumption that all the safeguards provided by the Act of 1930 to ensure that the patient is properly detained are scrupulously complied with. One of these safeguards is contained in sub-s. 9 and 10 of s. 5 of the Act of 1930 which are as follows :

(9) Within one month of the reception of any person received as a temporary patient under this section he shall be visited by at least two members of the visiting committee of the institution, if he is in an institution which has a visiting committee, or if he is not in such an institution by two at least of the visitors of licensed houses appointed for the district in which he is, of which visitors one must be a registered medical practitioner: Provided that in the area within the immediate jurisdiction of the Board of Control, the duty imposed by this section on the visitors of licensed houses shall be performed by the Board of Control. (10) If the persons making the said visits are of opinion that it is proper that the patient should continue to be detained they shall sign a statement to that effect and shall leave it with the person in charge but if they are of opinion that it is not proper that he should continue to be detained, they shall, before the expiration of the second day after the day of the said visit, send to the Board of Control a report stating their said opinion, and the grounds on which it is based, together with such other observations as they think fit.

Sub-section 11 is also important :

Subject to the provisions of this section a person received as a temporary patient may be detained for a period not exceeding six months but shall not be detained as such for any longer period.

This sub-section clearly indicates that the statement or report of the visiting committee is one of the essential requisites for the lawful detention of the temporary patient for the period of not more than 6 months.

No evidence was given before BARNARD, J. as to what the visiting committee did with reference to the wife in performance of their duties under these sub-sections and BARNARD, J., therefore, did not deal with the point. During the hearing of the appeal we thought it right to ask the Official Solicitor who was representing the wife to make inquiries on this point. The result of these inquiries have been communicated to the court and also to the husband's legal advisers, who have stated that they do not wish to address the court further in the matter. It is clear to us that the provisions of the sub-sections of s. 5 to which we have referred have not been complied with in this case, in that the visiting committee signed no statement to the effect that it was proper that the wife should continue to be detained. We think, that the failure to comply with these important provisions, which are intended to safeguard a patient against any possible abuse of the powers given under this Act, itself defeats the argument that the wife was lawfully detained under an order made under the Mental Treatment Act, 1930.

Although the facts in Murray v. Murray (1) were quite different from the facts in this case, the principle laid down by SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., in that case appears to us to apply to this case ([1940] 4 All E.R. 252) :

- A The safeguards which the legislature has laid down in those Acts [the Lunacy and Mental Treatment Acts, 1890 to 1930] in order to ensure that detention on the ground of lunacy, or something short of lunacy, shall take place only in proper cases, are strict, and, unless they are strictly observed, the detention of an alleged lunatic is illegal. Accordingly, when the legislature laid down this stringent test, which must be satisfied before a person can be said to be under care and treatment, it required that that machinery should be carried out according to the letter of the law.
- B In this case the necessary safeguards were not carried out, and, therefore, in our opinion, the husband has not made out that the wife was detained in pursuance of an order under the Lunacy and Mental Treatment Acts, 1890 to 1930. We, therefore, do not think it necessary to decide the difficult point whether a temporary patient who is lawfully detained under the Act of 1930, and in respect of whom all the provisions of the Act have been properly carried out can be held to be detained in pursuance of such an order. In our opinion,
- C the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

D YEOVIL RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. SOUTH SOMERSET AND DISTRICT ELECTRICITY CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Oaksey, Tucker and Cohen, L.JJ.), January 28, 30, March 28, 1947.]

Rates and Rating—Assessment—Basis—Profits basis—Electricity undertaking—Calculation of profits—Deduction of excess profits tax.

- E Where the rateable value of a public undertaking is assessed on the profits basis, the whole of the sum payable by the undertaking in respect of excess profits tax should not be deducted from the gross receipts of the undertaking in estimating the rateable value of the undertaking, but the liability to pay excess profits tax is a factor which a rating authority is entitled to take into consideration with others in deciding what percentage of the net receipts should be allocated to tenants' profit when the net receipts are apportioned between hypothetical landlord, hypothetical tenant, and rating authority :
- F per TUCKER and COHEN, L.JJ., LORD OAKSEY, L.J., dissenting.

Port of London Authority v. Orsett Union ([1919] 1 K.B. 84) overruled.

[EDITORIAL NOTE. The importance of this case is that a practice which has been followed since the decision of the Divisional Court in Port of London Authority v. Orsett Union Assessment Committee (1), both in the post-war period of nearly 30 years ago and during the recent war, is now altered by a majority of the Court of Appeal and the decision itself is overruled. TUCKER and COHEN, L.JJ., largely base their view on the dictum in the Orsett case when it went to the House of Lords on another point that, in applying the profits basis for rating purposes, it is profits which are earned and not profits which are divisible that is the governing factor. Or, as LORD DUNEDIN put it on the same occasion : "Sterility in earning profits is one thing"—and would entitle the ratepayer to a deduction when the rateable value of his undertaking was being assessed—"but sterility in the disposing of profits is another. The former affects value, the latter does not." As long ago as 1851 it was decided in R. v. Southampton Docks (4) that, in ascertaining rateable value, no deduction can be made in respect of payments of income tax, and the position with regard to excess profits tax is now held to be the same. Indeed, COHEN, L.J., points out that an assessment authority might consider that excess profits tax, having less permanent a history as a tax than income tax, was less likely to influence the mind of the tenant. COHEN, L.J., expresses approval of the view that "the present high level of income tax is a factor which is not wholly irrelevant to the fixing of the tenant's share," and, again putting excess profits tax on the same footing as income tax, the majority of the court held that excess profits tax should also be considered when arriving at that figure.

APPEAL by Yeovil Rural District Council from a decision of the Divisional Court (LORD GODDARD, C.J., HUMPHREYS and SINGLETON, JJ.) dated Apr. 30, 1946, dismissing an appeal by the council by way of Case stated by the Assessment Appeals Committee of the justices of the county of Somerset, who had held that, in estimating the rateable value of the respondent company's undertaking as a whole, a deduction should be made of the whole of the excess profits tax payable by the respondents.

Our adv. vult.

MAR. 28. The following judgments were read.

LORD OAKSEY, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of the Divisional Court dated Apr. 30, 1946, on a Case stated by the Assessment Appeals Committee of the justices of the county of Somerset on the question whether, on the facts stated in the Case, the committee were right in holding that, in estimating the rateable value of the respondent company's undertaking as a whole, a deduction should be made equivalent to the whole of the excess profits tax payable by the respondent company. The Divisional Court, following Port of London Authority v. Orsett Union (1) and Newton-on-Ayr Gas Co. Ltd. v. Ayr Assessor (2), dismissed the appeal of the district council. The argument on behalf of the council before this court is that the judgments above cited are wrong and that no deduction ought to be made of excess profits tax, or, alternatively, not a deduction of the whole amount of the said tax. The council rely principally on the dicta of LORD DUNEDIN in his speech in Port of London Authority v. Orsett Union (1) ([1920] A.C. 299) where he quoted LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., in the Erith case (3) ([1893] A.C. 591) and said :

Sterility in earning profits is one thing ; sterility in the disposing of profits is another. The former affects the value—the latter does not.

- A They rely also on the fact that since 1851 income tax has not been deducted in estimating rateable value following the decision of LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., in R. v. Southampton Docks Co. (4) (14 Q.B. 611). The council also contended that s. 18 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, which provides that excess profits tax shall, for the purposes of income tax, be allowed to be deducted as an expense, was mere machinery for preventing double taxation and had no bearing on the question. The respondent company, on the other hand, contended that the decision of the Divisional Court in Port of London Authority v. Orsett Union (1) and that in the Newton-on-Ayr case (2) were right ; that, where rateable value is to be estimated on a profits basis, regard cannot be had to profits which the profit earner cannot touch ; and that the fact that excess profits tax is allowed as an expense in computing profits and gains for the purposes of income tax is not mere machinery and demonstrates that the amount of the tax is not really a profit at all.

- C I am of opinion that the decision of the Divisional Court in Port of London Authority v. Orsett Union (1) and the decision of the Divisional Court appealed from are right. It is common ground that the profits basis is to be adopted in the present case, i.e., as LORD CAVE, L.C., says in Kingston Union v. Metropolitan Water Board (5) [1926] A.C. 339, from the gross receipts of the undertakers for the preceding year there are to be deducted working expenses, an allowance for tenant's profit, and the cost of repairs and other statutable deductions, and the balance is to be treated as the rateable value, but LORD CAVE adds (ibid, 342) :

- D The object of the assessing authorities must be that laid down in s. 1 of the Act of 1836—namely, to find the rent at which the hereditament to be assessed might reasonably be expected to let from year to year upon the conditions prescribed in the section. For this purpose they are entitled, as the courts have held, to regard the actual occupants—in this case the Metropolitan Water Board—as possible tenants, and to consider what rent those occupants might reasonably be expected to pay for the privilege of occupying the hereditaments, having regard to the profits to be derived from such occupation ; but in so doing they must take the hypothetical tenants as they are, and with all the limitations and restrictions which are imposed upon them by law and which they could not “reasonably be expected” to leave out of sight. If other tenants can be found who might be expected to give a higher rent, well and good ; but it can hardly be doubted that the Board, with all its limitations, would pay a better rent for the hereditaments which it occupies than any other tenants who could conceivably be found, and the basis of assessment must, therefore, be the rent which rebus sic stantibus the Board could and would pay.

- F It follows, in my opinion, that in the present case the actual occupants, the respondents, whose profits for the preceding year form the basis of the computation, must be regarded as possible tenants, and they must be taken as they are, with all the limitations and restrictions which are imposed on them by law and
- G which they could not reasonably be expected to leave out of sight in deciding what rent they would pay, and it appears to me impossible to assume that they would leave out of sight their standard revenue and the excess profits tax which prevented them from keeping any profits beyond their standard revenue.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., appears to me to say the same thing in the Erith case (3) ([1893] A.C. 592) :

- H There is no doubt a certain class of cases in which the amount of profit which can be earned by the occupation of a hereditament is very material in ascertaining the sum at which it should be assessed. In the case of gasworks, waterworks, and other industrial undertakings where a hereditament is enhanced in value by its connection with a profit-bearing undertaking, the profits earned and the share of those profits attributable to any particular hereditament have to be taken into account, and in such cases as these any restrictions which the law has imposed upon the profit-earning capacity of the undertaking must, of course, be considered.

It is said, of course, by the appellant council that excess profits tax is not a limitation on the profit-earning capacity of the respondents, but on their profit-distributing capacity, but this seems to me to be a question of words and to ignore the object of adopting the profits basis, which is, as LORD CAVE says, only a basis for arriving at the rent which the hypothetical tenant might reasonably be expected to pay. In my opinion, he cannot be reasonably expected to pay a rent which may far exceed any profit he can retain. For instance, an undertaking's standard revenue may be £100,000, and its actual net earnings in the preceding year may be £500,000. Can it be that such an undertaking might be expected to pay £500,000 as rent, less an allowance for tenant's profits and interest on tenant's capital, although £400,000 is payable as excess profits tax?

In my opinion, there is no true analogy for the present purpose between income tax and excess profits tax. Income tax falls equally on all, more or less, but excess profits tax is based entirely on the profits of a particular taxpayer for the standard year. It seems to me impossible to assume that a hypothetical tenant whose rent is based on the profits of a particular taxpayer for a particular year will ignore the standard revenue of that taxpayer in deciding what rent he will offer.

The observations of LORD DUNEDIN in Port of London Authority v. Orsett Union (1) ([1920] A.C. 299) were not made with reference to the point now raised. The Court of Appeal and the House of Lords expressed no opinion on the question decided by the Divisional Court. What they dealt with was the question whether an allowance for tenant's profits might be made in assessing the Port of London Authority and they decided that it might. LORD DUNEDIN was there dealing with the contention that the occupation of an undertaking the profits of which are by law to be applied to certain purposes is not a beneficial occupation. Moreover, the Port of London Authority was a public corporation created by statute whose occupation of the hereditaments in question was for the benefit of the public, and the particular way in which the statute prescribed that the profits derived from the hereditament should be distributed among the public did not deprive the hereditament of the value of its beneficial occupation. In the present case the undertaking is a private undertaking for private profit, and it appears to me that excess profits tax, where the hereditament is rated on the profits basis, does deprive the hereditament of that part of its value to its occupier.

My brethren are of opinion that, though excess profits tax should not be deducted in toto, it may be considered in arriving at the amount of the tenant's profit to be deducted. Although this may, in the result, amount to much the same as deducting the whole tax, I do not think it is right in principle, nor do I think the practice established in 1919 ought to be altered at the present time. Moreover, in my view, it distinguishes excess profits tax from income tax, for it appears to me that a hypothetical tenant does not, in fact, pay any attention to income tax in deciding what rent he will agree to pay since rent of business premises is undoubtedly an expense to be deducted in computing the balance of profits and gains for the purposes of income tax. I do not think that the cases cited as to net profits in commercial agreements, in which it has been held that excess profits tax should be deducted, afford much assistance. I am also of opinion that s. 18 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, in enacting that excess profits tax is to be deducted as an expense in computing for the purposes of income tax the profits of the business, proceeds on the basis that it is not income because it is not of any beneficial value to the taxpayer.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed, but, as my brethren are of a different opinion, it will be allowed to the extent indicated in their judgments and the Case be remitted to the Appeals Committee with the opinion of this court that the whole of the excess profits tax should not be deducted, but that excess profits tax is a factor which the Committee are entitled to take into account.

TUCKER, L.J. : This appeal raises the question whether, in estimating the rateable value of the respondents' undertaking on the profits basis, the sum payable by the respondents in respect of excess profits tax should be deducted from the gross receipts of the undertaking before arriving at the profits to be apportioned as between rent, rates and tenant's profit, and, if such sum is not deductible, whether quarter sessions are entitled to give any consideration at any stage to the existence of this liability in arriving at the rateable value.

A The Assessment Appeals Committee of the Somerset Quarter Sessions decided on the authority of Port of London Authority v. Orsett Union (1), that such deduction should be made before arriving at the divisible profits. They were clearly bound so to decide on this authority, and the Divisional Court, on appeal, held that they were similarly bound by the same authority, which was a decision of a Divisional Court, to dismiss the appeal. This appeal, in effect, raises the question whether the decision of the Divisional Court in the Orsett Union case (1) was correct. That case dealt with excess profits duty, but it was agreed by both sides that, for present purposes, no distinction can be drawn between excess profits duty and excess profits tax. It was further agreed that income tax is not deductible as a working expense. This was decided as long ago as 1851 in R. v. Southampton Docks Co. (4) where LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., says (14 Q.B. 611):

B On the last point no reasonable doubt can be entertained; the appellants claiming a deduction of £155 for income tax in respect of the estimated profit of the tenant to whom the docks might be let. This is not a tax upon the subject-matter rated, which the tenant as such would be obliged to pay, but upon the net income of the tenant after paying the rent of the premises by which his profits are earned. The cases cited apply to local taxes which affect the subject-matter rated and operate directly in diminution of the rent.

C This authority has remained unquestioned for nearly 100 years.

In what respect is this language inapplicable to excess profits tax? In Port of London Authority v. Orsett Union (1) the Divisional Court held that, for rating purposes, excess profits duty was distinguishable from income tax, but the grounds for this distinction do not clearly appear from the judgments. DARLING, J., compares excess profits duty to tithe and says ([1919] 1 K.B. 93):

D In my opinion the intending tenant of a dock must equally be entitled to consider how far his profits may be reduced by his having to pay excess profits duty.

He then refers to s. 35 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915, which provided that, for the purpose of income tax, excess profits duty is treated as an outgoing of the business which reduces the profits in respect of which income tax is assessable and proceeds (ibid., 94):

E But if it is an outgoing of the business for the purpose of income tax, why is it not an outgoing of the business which reduces the profits for other purposes, just as the taking of tithe from the profits of a farm reduces the profits of the farm?

I think the answer to the first of these points is to be found in the language of LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., referred to above, and the answer to the second in the words of LORD WRIGHT, in L.C. Ltd. v. G. B. Ollivant, Ltd. (6), where he says ([1944] 1 All E.R. 519):

F Indeed the Finance Act, 1939, s. 18, expressly provides that in computing the profits and gains for the purposes of income tax the excess profits tax shall be allowed to be deducted as an expense incurred in the relevant period. I do not take that as meaning that it is actually an expense, because it is clearly not so; what is meant is that it is as much to be deducted from the earnings as if it were an expense in the strict sense.

G LORD COLERIDGE and AVORY, J.J., in the Orsett Union case (1) considered that excess profits duty might be deducted because it reduced the amount of profit which the tenant could retain for his own use. They do not explain how in this respect it differs from income tax. Furthermore, this approach seems to me to be erroneous in the light of the language used by LORD DUNEDIN in the same case (when it reached the House of Lords on a different point) where, after quoting LORD HERSCHELL'S speech in the Erith case (3) ([1893] A.C. 591), he says ([1920] A.C. 299):

H This seems to me to be the key of the whole matter. Sterility in earning profits is one thing, sterility in the disposing of profits is another. The former affects value, the latter does not.

Applying this statement to the present case, excess profits tax sterilises the disposition of a percentage of the profits, but, so far from sterilising the earnings of profits, it only takes effect if and when such profits have resulted from a condition of fertility.

I find it impossible to distinguish between income tax and excess profits tax for present purposes. I do not think it is necessary to refer in detail to the relevant sections of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939. The nature of this tax has been analysed and explained by LORD MACMILLAN, in L.C., Ltd. v. G. B. Ollivant, Ltd. (6). In his speech he expressed a dissenting view on the construction of an agreement relating to the ascertainment of the divisible profits of a trading concern, but I can find nothing in the speeches of the majority of their Lordships to suggest any dissent from this exposition of the essential nature of this tax. He says ([1944] 1 All E.R. 517) :

I confess that I have always understood that in ordinary commercial practice the profits of a business were ascertained by setting its receipts against its outgoings. I agree with SCRUTTON, L.J., when he said that "profits mean profits after deducting the expense of earning them" (Vulcan Motor and Engineering Co. Ltd. v. Hampson (7), [1921] 3 K.B. 606), though I entirely disagree with his view that excess profits duty (the tax with which he was concerned) was an expense of earning the receipts. It is indeed a commonplace in tax law that in ascertaining what deductions are permissible in computing the amount of the taxpayer's profits or gains the question is whether the deduction claimed represents an outlay in order to earn profits or is a disbursement of profits earned. It seems to me unintelligible that the payment of a tax levied on profits after they have been earned should be construed to be a payment made in order to earn these profits. I need not examine the complicated details of the legislation relating to excess profits tax. It is enough for my purpose to emphasise that, as its name denotes, the tax is a tax on profits, namely, the profits earned in excess of a fixed standard and that for the purpose of computing it the profits are, subject to certain special provisions, to "include all such income arising from the trade or business as is chargeable to income tax under case I of schedule D" : see the Finance (No. 2) Act 1939, sched. VII, para. 7. It is in short a super income tax. For its purposes the profits arising from a trade or business are to be "computed on income tax principles" with certain adaptations (1939 Act, s. 14 (1)).

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the decision of the Divisional Court in Port of London Authority v. Orsett Union (1) was wrong and should be overruled, and that we should not follow the decision of the Court of Session in the unreported case of Neutown-on-Ayr Gas Co., Ltd. (2) in 1923 which followed the Orsett Union case (1). It is to be observed that in the Newton-on-Ayr case (2) LORD HUNTER was undoubtedly influenced by his view that a company paying income tax does so as agent on behalf of the individual shareholders. This view, which prevailed for some time, and is, I think, apparent in some of the other authorities to which we were referred, has been held by the House of Lords to be erroneous : vide per LORD CAVE in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Blott (8) ([1921] 2 A.C. 201).

The respondents to this appeal, however, submit that, even if excess profits tax is not deductible as a working expense in arriving at the profits, none the less it is open to the tribunal of fact to give some weight to the existence of this tax as one of the elements to be taken into consideration in fixing the tenant's share, whether this is arrived at on the basis of allowing a percentage on the appropriate tenant's capital, or by means of a percentage on the gross receipts. Counsel for the appellant council was, I think, disposed to concede that the present high level of income tax was a factor which was not wholly irrelevant to the fixing of the tenant's share, and I think he was right in making this concession. It must be remembered that all these mathematical calculations which have been devised for ascertaining the value for rating purposes of public utility undertakings are, after all, designed to ascertain the rent which the hypothetical tenant might be expected to pay, and such matters as current interest, rates from investments and the level of taxation are, I think, matters which may properly be taken into consideration in deciding what should be the tenant's share of the ascertained profits.

In my view, therefore, the question asked in the Case Stated should be answered by saying that quarter sessions did not come to a correct decision in deciding that the whole of the excess profits tax payable by the respondent company should be deducted in estimating the rateable value of the respondents' undertaking, but that the Case should be remitted to quarter sessions with an intimation that the existence of excess profits tax is a factor which they are entitled to take into consideration with others in arriving at the appropriate share of the profits to be allowed to the tenant.

COHEN, L.J. [read by TUCKER, L.J.] : The main point raised on this appeal is whether, in estimating the rateable value of the respondent company's undertaking as a whole, a deduction should be made equivalent to the excess profits tax payable by the respondent company.

- A It is common ground that (1) the proper basis for assessing the rateable value of the undertaking is what is known as "the profits basis," as explained by LORD CAVE, L.C., in Kingston Union v. Metropolitan Water Board (5); (2) the relevant year is the year 1943, that being the latest period before the date of the rate as to which profits had been ascertained: see Barking Rating Authority v. Central Electricity Board (9) ([1940] 2 K.B. 497); (3) the excess profits tax payable by the respondent company in respect of the year 1943 was £8,155; (4) if, in calculating the sum divisible between the hypothetical landlord, the hypothetical tenant, and the rating authority, no deduction ought to be made from gross receipts in respect of this payment of excess profits tax, the rateable value of the respondents' undertaking as a whole is £15,642, and the portion thereof apportionable to the hereditament lying within the area of the appellant council is £3,540. The Assessment Appeals Committee held that a deduction should be made of the whole of the excess profits tax, but at the request of the appellants stated a Case for the determination of the court. This Case Stated came before the Divisional Court on Apr. 30, 1946. The appellant council contended that no deduction whatsoever should be made in respect of excess profits tax. Alternatively, they argued that (i) if a deduction was to be made, it should not be of the full amount actually paid, but only of a sum of £5,000 calculated as shewn in the third schedule to the Case, and (ii) in any event, regard should be had (a) to the post-war credit of 20 per cent. under s. 28 of the Finance Act, 1941, and (b) to the reduced liability of the respondents to income tax by reason of the payment of excess profits tax. The Divisional Court held that on the main question they were bound by the decision of a Divisional Court in Port of London Authority v. Orsett Union Assessment Committee (1) to hold that the full amount of excess profits tax actually paid was deductible, since there was no material difference on this point between the law in relation to excess profits duty imposed during the first world war and the law relating to excess profits tax. Under the Act imposing excess profits duty, however, there was no provision for post-war credit. On this subsidiary point LORD GODDARD, C.J. (with whose judgment the other members of the court agreed) said:
- E When it is repaid it will become an asset, or a profit, whatever one likes to call it, of the business, and, no doubt, will have to be taken into account, or may have to be taken into account, hereafter, but from the Kingston case (5) it is quite clear that the House of Lords thought that when you are assessing rateable value upon a profits basis you have to take the profits rebus sic stantibus. You have to take the profits for the preceding year and proceed on those profits. Therefore, I think we cannot interfere in any way with the fact that quarter sessions did disregard the fact of a hypothetical or problematical chance that 20 per cent. will be received at some time hereafter.
- F Accordingly, the Divisional Court dismissed the appeal from the Assessment Appeals Committee. From this decision the appellant council now appeals to this court.

- G The argument of counsel for the council, so far as the main point is concerned, was (i) that there is no distinction in principle between excess profits tax and income tax; (ii) that it has been long established that no deduction ought to be made in respect of the payments of income tax (see R. v. Southampton Docks Co. (4), and that, accordingly, no deduction should be made in respect of payment of excess profits tax; (iii) that, although there was no appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court in the Orsett case (1) so far as the excess profits duty point was concerned, that case had gone to the House of Lords on another point and it was plain from the observations of the learned Lords that the decision of the Divisional Court on the excess profits duty point was wrong; (iv) that, in any event, the decision of the Divisional Court was wrong and does not bind this court. Counsel for the respondent company, on the other hand, contended that the case was concluded in his favour by the decision of the Divisional Court in the Orsett case (1) which was followed in Scotland by the Court of Session in the unreported case of Newton-on-Ayr Gas Co., Ltd. (2).
- H

In the Orsett case (1) the Divisional Court held, as stated in the headnote ([1919] 1 K.B. 84):

A rating authority when assessing the rateable value of a hereditament capable of earning profits, such as a dock, is entitled to take into consideration the liability of the occupiers to pay excess profits duty.

Moreover, it is clear from the observations of the learned judges that in the view, at any rate, of DARLING, J., and LORD COLERIDGE, J., the proper method of taking it into consideration was by deduction from the gross receipts. Thus DARLING, J., says (ibid., 93):

There appear to be a good many decisions that he is not entitled to consider the income tax which he would have to pay on the profits of the undertaking, but there are, I think, no cases which say that he may not take into consideration the liability to pay excess profits duty, nor can I see any reason why it should not be allowed as a deduction. The Act expressly provides that he may consider the tithe commutation rent charge, but what distinction in principle can be drawn between excess profits duty and tithe?

Again he cites R. v. Shoreditch Assessment Committee (10), where it was held that an increase in the licence duty was prima facie evidence of a reduction in value of a public house and says (ibid., 94):

If a deduction in such a case was to be allowed because of the increase in the licence duty it ought equally to be allowed in the case of excess profits duty.

LORD COLERIDGE, J., says (ibid.):

If you are entitled to look at the profits in order to estimate the rent, you are surely entitled to consider the fact that the profits may be diminished by the excess profits duty.

AVORY, J., was, I think, of the same opinion, though he does not state quite so explicitly the view that a deduction of the whole amount of the excess profits duty liability is the proper method of taking it into consideration. This decision was followed by the Court of Session in the Newton-on-Ayr Gas Co., Ltd. case (2), where LORD HUNTER, delivering the leading judgment, said:

The question depends for its solution upon the ascertainment of the rent which a hypothetical tenant would probably pay for the subjects [i.e. the hereditaments to be assessed] if the subjects were let. In my opinion, such a tenant, before deciding what would be a reasonable rent to pay for the subjects, would ascertain what charges were laid upon the business. Among those charges he would, in my opinion, rightly include excess profits duty, and, in calculating the rent, he would, undoubtedly, deduct excess profits duty from revenue. Accordingly, in my opinion, in valuing premises according to the revenue principle (i.e., on the profits basis) excess profits duty should be deducted from revenue.

LORD HUNTER thus clearly treated excess profits duty as an expense of the business.

From the decision of the Divisional Court in the Orsett case (1) on the excess profits duty point there was, as I have said, no appeal, but the Divisional Court had also held on the authority of Mersey Docks v. Liverpool Overseers (11), that in applying "the profits basis" no allowance should be made out of the receipts for the hypothetical tenant's profit. On this point there was an appeal, first to the Court of Appeal, who dismissed the appeal, and then to the House of Lords who held that quarter sessions were not precluded by law from making an allowance for tenant's profit. The reasoning on which the majority of the House of Lords based their opinions, has, in my opinion, a distinct bearing on the question before us and is inconsistent with the decision of the Divisional Court thereon. Thus LORD BIRKENHEAD, L.C., says ([1920] A.C. 284):

Firstly, the question of rateability does not depend on whether the occupier does, or can, make a profit by the use to which he puts the hereditament; it depends on whether the occupation is of value. Secondly, in considering what rent a tenant would pay, the rating authority must consider the owner who is in actual occupation, or indeed the only possible occupier, as a possible tenant. Thirdly, in cases such as the present where a hereditament is enhanced in value by its connection with a profit-bearing undertaking, such as docks, the profits earned, and the share of profits attributable to any particular hereditament, have to be taken into account. Fourthly, in such cases, any restriction imposed by law on the profit-earning capacity of the undertaking must be considered, for the profits to be taken into account must be such as the tenant can earn under the only conditions in which he is allowed to earn profits at all. In other words, if the law has prevented the hereditament being profitable at all, then the occupation is of no value, and if the law has restricted its profit-earning capacity, then the effect of such restriction will tend to diminish the value. This proposition does not mean, and ought not to be understood to mean, that, where profits can lawfully be earned, but such profits must be applied in a particular way or for a particular purpose, the occupation of the hereditament is valueless and therefore not rateable, or, on the other hand, that the tenant derives no profit from the occupation, and therefore that the whole profit increases the net annual value of the land.

LORD DUNEDIN says (ibid., 299) :

Sterility in earning profits is one thing, sterility in the disposing of profits is another. The former affects the value—the latter does not.

The same thing is practically said by LORD DAVEY in Mersey Docks v. Birkenhead Assessment Committee (12) ([1901] A.C. 185) :

A I conceive that in principle, and impliedly (as I think has been held in subsequent cases which have come before the courts), what was really decided was that, notwithstanding the restrictions upon the application of the profits resulting from carrying on that business on the hereditament, the profits so derived were a legitimate element in arriving at the value of the beneficial occupation which was to be the subject of rating.

Then, after saying that he really derives this view from Jones v. Mersey Docks (13), he says (ibid., 186) :

B In other words, it is perfectly immaterial what becomes of the amount which is the result of carrying on the business on the hereditament after paying the expenses and other outgoings.

LORD BUCKMASTER says ([1920] A.C. 303) :

C It is quite true that the hypothetical tenant of such an undertaking as the present must, on the hypothesis, be a tenant who is subject to the restrictions which have been imposed on the carrying on of the undertaking by the legislature. This may materially affect the rateable value of the hereditament by reason of the fact that such restrictions may impose a limit upon its profit-earning capacity. But the method of application of such profits, however closely defined and regulated they may be, does not mean that they cannot be earned, and consequently that they may not be brought into consideration in determining the rateable value.

D The only point their Lordships were considering was whether, in assessing the rateable value on the profits basis, a deduction was permissible for tenant's profits. They were not considering what other deductions might be allowable, but, in my opinion, it is a necessary inference from the ratio decidendi on which they based their conclusion, that, in arriving at the net receipts from which a deduction must be made for tenant's profit, no deduction should be made for a liability payable only out of profits when earned.

E In R. v. Southampton Docks Co. (4) LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., giving the judgment of the court, refused to allow a deduction for income tax estimated to be payable in respect of the estimated profit of the hypothetical tenant, saying (14 Q.B. 611) :

This is not a tax upon the subject-matter rated, which the tenant as such would be obliged to pay, but upon the net income of the tenant after paying the rent of the premises by which his profits are earned.

F I can see no difference in principle between income tax and excess profits tax. Both are taxes on profits when earned. Any amount paid by a taxpayer for excess profits tax is, it is true, deductible as an expense when ascertaining the profits for the purposes of income tax under the express provisions of s. 18 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, but the very fact that this express provision was necessary seems to me to support the conclusion I should have reached in its absence that excess profits tax cannot properly be described as an expense

G incurred in earning profit, but is really an application of profit when earned. I would add that some confusion appears to have existed in the minds of the members of the Divisional Court in the Orsett case (1). DARLING, J., treated tithe in the case of a farmer and licence duty in the case of a publican as on a par with excess profits duty. He ignored what seems to me the essential difference, which is that tithe or licence duty are payable irrespective of whether any profits are earned or not, whereas excess profits duty was, and excess profits

H tax is, only payable out of the profits earned when ascertained.

Counsel for the respondents relied on a number of decisions of which Patent Castings Syndicate, Ltd. v. Etherington (14) is typical. In that case it was held that, in ascertaining net profits for the purposes of a commercial agreement, payments of excess profits duty should be deducted, but I do not derive any assistance from these cases. It seems to me that quite different considerations may arise when the court has to consider commercial documents from that with which we are faced. It may well be that in the case of commercial documents, the expression "net profits" on its true meaning means profits available for distribution among the shareholders and that, therefore, payments of excess profits duty ought to be deducted, but it is plain from the observations of the House of Lords in the Orsett case (1), that, in applying the "profits basis" for rating purposes, it is profits earned and not divisible profits that is the governing factor. The importance of the distinction is well illustrated by the observations of VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., in L.C., Ltd. v. G. B. Ollivant, Ltd. (6). where he said ([1944] 1 All E.R. 513):

The word "divisible" or "distributable" does not occur in the agreement from beginning to end, and, to my mind, the profits of a trading company when ascertained in accordance with ordinary commercial practice are the profits before, and not after, deducting the direct taxation which has to be paid in respect of them.

LORD SIMON was one of a dissentient minority. but the difference of opinion was whether "profits" meant upon the true construction of the agreement then in question "divisible profits" and not as to what the position would be if this were not the right construction.

For these reasons, in my opinion, neither the sum of £8,155 nor any lesser sum is a proper deduction in ascertaining the net receipts which have to be apportioned as between hypothetical landlord, hypothetical tenant and the rating authority.

Counsel for the respondent company contended that, if we were against him on the main point, the liability to excess profits tax was a factor which the assessment committee should take into account in deciding what percentage of the net receipts should be allocated to tenant's profit when the net receipts were apportioned between hypothetical landlord, hypothetical tenant and rating authority. The 10 per cent. of net receipts usually allocated to tenant's profit was, he said, not fixed as immutably as the law of the Medes and Persians. The existence of liability to excess profits tax was a factor which might influence the mind of the tenant in deciding what return he would require for his risk, before he would take the hereditaments. Here again I can see no distinction in principle between excess profits tax and income tax, and counsel for the appellant council conceded that the fact of liability to income tax was a factor which must be present to the mind of the hypothetical tenant. He was, I think, bound to make this concession. The amount of the deduction for tenant's profit is certainly a question of fact. The methods adopted in calculating the tenant's share are, as pointed out in RYDE ON RATING, 8th ed., p. 448:

... but means to an end, namely, the proper answer to the question, what allowance for tenant's profits would be sufficient to induce the hypothetical tenant to take the hereditaments at the supposed rent?

Liability to income tax and excess profits tax must surely be factors which would influence his mind. I think, however, that in this connection the principle applicable in calculating the net receipts, viz., that the profits basis has to be calculated, not on what may happen in the future, but on the profits ascertained down to the latest period before the date of the rate: see the Barking case (9) ([1940] 2 K.B. 497) is not binding. The liability is merely one of the factors influencing the tenant's mind and there is no reason for giving more weight to the actual amount paid for excess profits tax than to the amount payable for income tax. Indeed, from some points of view, the assessment authority might consider that excess profits tax, having less permanent a history as a tax than income tax, is less likely to influence the mind of the hypothetical tenant. Be that as it may, I think we can safely leave it to quarter sessions in the light of their previous experience to estimate what weight, if any, to give to the factor of liability to excess profits tax. In view of the conclusion to which I have come on the main questions, the subsidiary questions argued by counsel for the appellant council do not arise. I would, therefore, allow the appeal and remit the matter to quarter sessions, and I agree with the order proposed by TUCKER, L.J.

ENGLISH SEWING COTTON CO., LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS [COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Morton and Asquith, L.JJ.),

March 12, 13, 1947.]

Revenue—Excess profits tax—Principal company beneficial owner of stock in American subsidiary company—Stock compulsorily made security for loan by U.S.A. Government to H.M. Government—Treasury statutory mandatory to carry out terms of agreement—Whether principal company's beneficial interest lost.

Statutes—Taxing Act—Construction—Machinery provision read as reference to charge of tax—"Assessment"—Finance Act, 1940 (c. 29), sched. V, pt. 1.

The taxpayers, as beneficial owners of certain shares in an American company, acquired the status, for the purposes of excess profits tax, of a principal company in relation to a subsidiary. On July 21, 1941, on the occasion of a loan by the government of the United States to H.M. Government, an agreement was entered into between the American Reconstruction Finance Corporation (as representative of the U.S.A. government) and H.M. Government, under which securities owned by persons or companies in Great Britain (including the common stock of the taxpayers' subsidiary company) were mortgaged to the corporation as security for the loan. By the Finance Powers (U.S.A. Securities) Act, 1941, and the regulations made thereunder, H.M. Treasury became a statutory mandatory or agent to, and did, in fact, carry out, in an executive manner, the provisions of the agreement:—

HELD: (i) the taxpayers remained throughout the beneficial owners of the shares in the subsidiary company, which, consequently, continued to be a subsidiary of the taxpayers for the purposes of excess profits tax.

(ii) the reference to "assessment" in the Finance Act, 1940, sched. V, pt. I, is a reference to a charge of tax, and should not be read as a mere piece of machinery.

[FOR THE FINANCE ACT, 1940, SCHED. V, PT. I, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 33, p. 194].

APPEAL by the taxpayers from a decision of MACNAGHTEN, J., dated July 17, 1946, dismissing an appeal by way of Case Stated by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax, who had held that the taxpayers remained beneficial owners of certain stock in an American company which formed part of the security for a loan from the government of the United States to H.M. Government, and that, consequently, the American company continued to be a subsidiary of the taxpayers for the purposes of excess profits tax.

J. Millard Tucker, K.C., and Heyworth Talbot for the taxpayers.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Frank Soskice, K.C.), J. H. Stamp and Reginald P. Hills for the Crown.

LORD GREENE, M.R.: Two questions are propounded in this appeal. The first, which was the only question raised before the Special Commissioners, was whether or not at the relevant time the appellant company were the beneficial owners of certain common stock in an American company called the American Thread Co. (Inc.). If they were, the American company was, for the purposes of the legislation relating to excess profits tax, a subsidiary of the appellant company. Subject to the second question, the effect of its being so treated would be to produce certain consequences under which the liability of the appellant company to excess profits tax would be increased. On the other hand, if the American company was not a subsidiary of the appellants, the excess profits tax would be correspondingly less. I need not refer in detail to the sections of the Acts which would produce these results, because the sole question to be decided here is whether or not, within the meaning of the relevant section, the English company was the beneficial owner of the shares. Again I need not refer to the sections in detail because there is no special meaning to be extracted from the context which would result in the words "beneficial owner" having some meaning other than their ordinary meaning. The Special Commissioners held that the appellant company were the beneficial owners of the stock and their decision was affirmed by MACNAGHTEN, J.

The appellant company unquestionably held the necessary 90 per cent. of the common stock, which is the figure required in order that a company may acquire the status of a principal company in relation to a subsidiary. There is no question that, until the events which I shall mention took place, the appellant company owned that stock beneficially. The company, however, claims that, in view of those events, the beneficial ownership was taken away from it in whole or in part, and that thereby it ceased to be beneficial owner.

The events relied on relate to an agreement come to between H.M. Government in the United Kingdom and an American company called the Reconstruction Finance Corporation on July 21, 1941, an Act of the United Kingdom Parliament called the Financial Powers (U.S.A. Securities) Act, 1941, and certain regulations and directions made pursuant to that Act. I do not find it necessary to go into the details of the agreement, the Act, the regulations or the directions. It is, I think, sufficient to state their general nature and effect.

The agreement was made on the occasion of a loan of $425,000,000 granted by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to H.M. Government in the United Kingdom, and it provided that security should be given for that loan. The security to be given is specified in a schedule to the agreement, which sets out a very large number of securities owned by persons or companies in Great Britain. Among those securities are the common stock of the American Thread Company (Inc.). The agreement provided that all the scheduled securities should be mortgaged to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as security for the loan. It set out the mortgage provisions at great length. I think it fair to say that many of those provisions are to be found in quite ordinary mortgages, and, in so far as any unusual provisions with regard to the securities are to be found in the agreement, those provisions are nothing but mortgage provisions intended to make the security more watertight. The securities were to be deposited in the United States. Provision was to be made for securing that the interest and dividends on them should be paid to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and applied in ways specified in the agreement, namely, payment of interest on the loan, the provision of a sinking fund, and repayment of capital, if necessary. Proxies were to be provided to enable the mortgagees to control the voting power of the various companies whose shares constituted security for the loan. Dividend mandates were to be provided also. When the loan was paid off the securities would be released. If it were not paid off, the provisions of the agreement could be enforced by the securities being disposed of on behalf of the mortgagees. For that purpose, blank transfers were to be signed and deposited. The interest of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was nothing but that of mortgagees.

If that agreement had been voluntarily given effect to by the owners of the various securities which formed what was called the collateral for the loan, it could not have been suggested, I think, that they had thereby lost the beneficial interest in their property. The position then, reduced to its simplest terms, would have been this. The owners of the securities would have hypothecated them to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to secure the loan made to the British Government. They would, in effect, have assumed the position of guarantors of the loan made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the government, not, of course, in the sense that they would have assumed personal liability for the loan, but in the sense that they would have been using their own property to provide security to the lenders. If that had been done, the beneficial ownership in the securities would, unquestionably, have remained in the owners. There would simply have been created the relationship of mortgagor (by way of guarantee) and mortgagee. I have never heard it suggested that, where a mortgage transaction is made, the result of it is to deprive the mortgagor of his beneficial ownership. The interest of the mortgagee is merely the interest of a person holding a security and does not affect the beneficial ownership in the ordinary meaning of that phrase. In the present case, however, no such voluntary hypothecation took place. It would obviously have been impossible to put this agreement into operation without some form of compulsion. That compulsion was effected in this way. Under the agreement, H.M. Government undertook to provide the necessary security and to see that all the machinery (such as dividend mandates, blank transfers, and so on) was put into working order. It acquired the necessary powers to do that as against the owners of the securities by the Act of Parliament to which I have referred. That Act of Parliament enables the Treasury to exercise any powers necessary to give effect to the agreement with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. In particular, they were empowered to require securities and income and other payments arising therefrom to be placed at the disposal of the Treasury. Very wide powers were given, but the substance of it is that the Treasury became, so to speak, the statutory mandatory to carry out the hypothecation to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of these various securities. It was given full powers of compulsion to enable it to carry out that mandate, and it carried it out.

The agreement, so far as the appellant company are concerned, was carried out smoothly and effectively. The deposit has created the rights in the American company of an equitable mortgagee. The blank transfers, and so forth, have never been used, but I do not think that matters. The company argued that, as a result of these operations, the beneficial ownership of the common stock has been wholly or partially removed from them and transferred elsewhere. I say "wholly" and I think that was suggested at one time, but I am not sure whether it was persisted in. The weight of the argument was that the beneficial ownership became divided between the Treasury and the company.

For the company it was said that a share is a bundle of rights, and certain of those rights, as a result of these transactions, were taken away from them. Particular emphasis was laid on the fact that the dividends were to be no longer payable to the appellant company, but were to be payable in accordance with the dividend mandate which they were required to give to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It was said—I had difficulty in following the argument—that the Treasury in some way became entitled to these dividends, and, therefore, that that particular element in the bundle of rights which constitute the stock was vested in the Treasury. I am unable to discover anything of the kind.

I return to the summary which I ventured to give of the position of the Treasury under the statute. The Treasury became a statutory mandatory or agent to carry out in an executive manner all the various provisions of the agreement. There are no words in the agreement, or in the Act of Parliament or regulations made under it, which can be construed as vesting in the Treasury any beneficial interest whatsoever in regard to these shares or any of the rights which go to make up the shares. I put more than once to counsel for the company the question: "If the beneficial interest is not in the company, where is it?" Counsel replied: "In the Treasury and the company taken together." I have already dealt with that, but when he was asked: "Where is that element which you say is vested in the Treasury, if it is not in the Treasury?" he vigorously replied that that was no business of his. All he was required to say was that the company had lost part of the beneficial interest and it did not matter for his purposes where it had gone. I am not satisfied with that method of handling the problem, because it seems to me, if anyone says that the company had lost part of their beneficial interest, that proposition can only be established if it can be shown that it has gone somewhere. The only place where it was said it had gone was the Treasury.

There was one element in this transaction which I should have mentioned before, and that is this. The Act of Parliament and the regulations provide that the owners of the hypothecated securities should receive in London the sterling equivalent of the dollar dividends paid on them. Similarly, if the securities were realised for the purposes of paying off the loan or part of it, the owners were to receive in London the sterling equivalent of the dollars. It was said the result is a complete deprivation in the case of the dividends, and a possible deprivation in the case of the capital, of the beneficial interest of the company in the shares. It seems to me that it is impossible that the operations so described can have the result suggested. The mortgagor who mortgages his shares on the terms that the mortgagee shall be entitled to collect the dividends and apply them towards the loan does not become any the less the beneficial owner of his shares because of the existence of that provision. That is the provision here. The owners of the securities, undoubtedly, lose their right to the dividends as such in dollars so long as the loan remains. That is always what happens in mortgages where, for instance, the mortgagee appoints a receiver. It has never been suggested to my knowledge, and it cannot be suggested on principle, that the appointment of a receiver by a mortgagee affects the beneficial ownership of the shares. All, in substance, which is done in the present case is that a receiver is appointed by a mortgage deed. The machinery for compensating the owners in London by payment in sterling of the equivalent of what they have lost in the shape of the dollar dividends is machinery for compensating them, and does not have the effect in any way of altering the beneficial ownership of the shares.

That being the view I take of the essential nature of this transaction, and its object and effect, it is not necessary, as I have said, to go into the various details and to discuss some of the matters that were discussed below. In my opinion, the appellant company remained throughout the beneficial owners of the common stock of the American Thread Co., and, consequently, that company became a subsidiary of the appellant company for the purposes of the excess profits tax.

The second question leads to a very remarkable argument. It arises in this way. Excess profits tax was imposed by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, pt. III. The charging section is s. 12. That charges excess profits tax on the excess profits arising from any trade or business to which the section applies. By sub-s. (2) the trades and businesses to which the section applies are defined. They are :

... all trades or businesses of any description carried on in the United Kingdom, or carried on, whether personally or through an agent, by persons ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom.

That sub-section is prefaced by the words "Subject as hereafter provided," which means, in my opinion (contrary to what MACNAGHTEN, J., thought), "subject as hereafter provided in the relevant part of the Act," and not merely "subject as provided in that particular section." I see no reason for confining it in the way that MACNAGHTEN, J., did, but whether that be right or wrong does not, in my view, really affect the question which we have to decide. The consequences of sub-s. (2) will appear presently, but I say at once, with all respect, I cannot take the view taken by the learned judge as to its construction in relation to the facts of this case. He thought that the business of the American Thread Co. was a business carried on by the appellant company through an agent, viz., the American Thread Co. That seems to me to be putting on the word "agent" an interpretation which neither is the ordinary meaning of the word nor one which the context permits. "Agent" there means agent, and a company whose shares are controlled by another company is not by mere existence of that control properly to be described as agent. The learned judge gave that interpretation to the word by way of avoiding the difficulty which the argument which I am now discussing raised. In my opinion, the difficulty can be got round in a simpler manner. Trades in that section are confined to those carried on in the United Kingdom or carried on abroad through an agent. If the matter had stood there, the profits of the American company would not have come into the picture. Under s. 17 (3) of the Act provisions were made for bringing in for certain purposes the profits of what I may call a foreign subsidiary, i.e., a subsidiary not a resident or carrying on a business within the United Kingdom. Putting it broadly, the effect of this provision was to aggregate the profits of the principal company which, ex hypothesi, is a United Kingdom company, with the profits of the subsidiary company, which may be a foreign company, for the purposes of the excess profits tax, the assessable entity being, of course, the United Kingdom company whose profits are treated as including the profits of the subsidiary, whether it be a United Kingdom subsidiary or a foreign subsidiary. Broadly speaking, that was the scheme by which the profits of a foreign company might be brought into computation for the purposes of the tax, notwithstanding that limitation on the tax laid down by sub-s. (2) of s. 12. That a foreign subsidiary or, indeed, any subsidiary, might qualify for such treatment, 90 per cent. of its shares had to be beneficially owned.

If s. 17 had remained in the legislation the point I am now dealing with would never have arisen, but the Finance Act, 1940, effected a number of important alterations in the law governing excess profits tax, and, in particular, it adopted a new scheme in connection with subsidiary companies and principal companies or, as they are called in the side-note, "interconnected companies." By s. 28 it repealed the relevant portions of s. 17 of the Act of 1939, to which I have made a brief reference, and it substituted some very complicated provisions which are to be found in sched. V to the Act of 1940. Those provisions clearly aimed at bringing into the ambit of taxation the profits of the subsidiaries, whether foreign or not, of companies carrying on business here. Counsel for the appellant company frankly confessed that, if his second point was right, it meant that the obvious intention of the legislature had been defeated. Schedule V, pt. I, which contains three paragraphs, is headed "Assessment of excess profits tax." I repeat that sub-s. (3) of s. 17 of the Act of 1939, which provided for the aggregation of the profits of the principal company and its subsidiary, was repealed. Therefore, if there had been nothing but the repeal, no charge would have remained in respect of the profits of a foreign subsidiary, and it is said that the substituted provisions are ineffective to bring into charge the profits of a foreign subsidiary, and so to take the place of the repealed parts of s. 17.

Paragraph 1 of pt. I of sched. V to the Act of 1940 provides in sub-para. (1) for members of what is called in the Act a "group of companies," i.e., a principal company with its subsidiary or subsidiaries. That paragraph enacts that assessments shall be made in respect of the excess profits of a body corporate which is a member of a group of companies. By sub-para. (2):

Such assessment shall be made in respect of any trade or business carried on by a subsidiary member of a group of companies whether or not the trade or business is carried on in the United Kingdom, and whether or not the subsidiary member is ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom.

Paragraph 2 provides that an assessment to excess profits tax in respect of the trade or business of a body corporate which is a member of a group is to be made on the "then principal company of the group," but in the case of an assessment in respect of a trade or business of a subsidiary member tax shall be "recoverable from the principal company and the subsidiary member jointly and severally." If anything is clear it is, I think, that the legislature was under the belief that it had effectively brought in under this new machinery the excess profits of a subsidiary whether foreign or not foreign.

It is, however, said that all these are provisions for assessment only—machinery provisions which assume the existence of a charge on the excess profits of a foreign subsidiary but do not themselves create the charge. If no charge is created by the Act of Parliament, the insertion of these machinery provisions cannot, it is said, create a charge, and they have been put in under the false belief that there was to be found somewhere in the Act a charge on the excess profits of a foreign subsidiary. In my opinion, that argument fails. As I have said, it is a singularly unattractive argument, because, if correct, it would mean that Parliament had made a hideous mistake and that a great many provisions of this scheme were completely inoperative. If Parliament has made a mistake, so much the worse, but, having regard to the clear intention which is to be found in the language of this schedule, I cannot put on the section an interpretation which would lead to such a fantastic result. The argument proceeds in this way. The only type of company that can be assessed to excess profits tax is a company whose trade or business is carried on in the United Kingdom. It is said that is the only charging section. Under the original s. 17 the effect of aggregating with the profits of an English company the profits of its foreign subsidiary and treating them for the purpose of tax as profits of the English company was effective to bring those profits into tax notwithstanding the limitation imposed by sub-s. (3). It is said the present scheme is quite different. The profits of the subsidiary are not treated as the profits of the United Kingdom company, but they are treated as profits of the subsidiary company. Therefore, in the case of a foreign subsidiary they are not chargeable at all by reason of the language of sub-s. (3), and the reference to "assessments" which I have just read does not operate to take the place of a proper charging section.

In my opinion, that argument cannot prevail. As counsel for the Crown pointed out, the clear intention of the provisions of the schedule is to impose a tax. The language used directs the making of assessments. He also says, giving full weight to the distinction between charging provisions and machinery provisions, that if, on the true construction of a taxing Act, the legislature has used a machinery provision such as is to be found in the word "assessment," with the clear intention of treating that as an assessment which will impose a liability to tax on the person assessed, the reference to "assessment" must be read as being, in effect, a reference to a charge of tax. It appears to me impossible to read the relevant provision of the Act of 1940 save in the sense that there is to be an assessment in relation to the profits of a foreign subsidiary company. If it is read as a mere piece of machinery, it is entirely inoperative. The only way in which effect can be given to the language is to treat the direction for making an assessment in respect of those profits as intended to make the profits liable to tax. For a reason different from that which MACNAGHTEN, J., took, I think that point also fails, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

MORTON, L.J. : I agree. I would only add that, when, in sched. V to the Act of 1940, the legislature uses the phrase "assessments shall be made in respect of its excess profits," I think it is plain that the legislature means that effective assessments shall be made, and assessments can only be effective if they are in fact a charge imposed on the parties.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I am entirely in accord with the judgment which my Lord has delivered.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

PROGRESS BUILDING, LTD. v. WESTMINSTER CITY CORPORATION.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Macnaghten, J.), March 31, April 1, 1947.]

Emergency Legislation—Requisition of premises—Transfer of possession—Power of competent authority—Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 927 as amended), regs. 49, 51.

A Minister of the Crown who, as a competent authority, requisitions property under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, holds the property on behalf of the Crown, and is entitled to transfer possession of it to another competent authority.

By virtue of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, regs. 49 and 51, (which were amended in pursuance of the Supplies and Services (Transitional Powers) Act, 1945, s. 1 (1)), the Minister of Works requisitioned certain leasehold premises during the war to accommodate the American Red Cross Society. When the premises were vacated by the Society after the war, the Minister of Works transferred possession of the premises to the Minister of Health, who in turn transferred possession to the defendants, as the local housing authority, to provide housing accommodation.

HELD : the Minister of Works was entitled to transfer possession of the premises to the Minister of Health and the latter to the defendants.

ACTION by the lessees of premises for a declaration that they were entitled to possession of the premises and an injunction restraining the defendants from preventing, hindering or interfering with their use and enjoyment of the premises. The premises were requisitioned during the war by the Minister of Works, and were subsequently transferred by him to the Minister of Health, who, in turn, transferred possession of the premises to the defendants, as housing authority for the area, for the purpose of housing accommodation.

Robert Fortune for the plaintiffs.

H. L. Parker for the defendants.

MACNAGHTEN, J. : The plaintiffs in this action, are the lessees of a block of residential flats, known as Marlborough Chambers, 70-72, Jermyn Street, in the city of Westminster. They bring this action for a declaration that they are entitled to possession of those premises, and, among other things, they claim an injunction restraining the defendants from directly or indirectly taking any steps calculated in any way to prevent, hinder, or interfere with the plaintiffs' use and enjoyment of the premises.

The premises were requisitioned by the Minister of Works on Sept. 10, 1943, for the accommodation of the American Red Cross Society. The requisition was made by virtue of the provisions of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, regs. 49 and 51. Under the Supplies and Services (Transitional Powers) Act, 1945, power was given to extend the purposes of certain Defence Regulations. The title of the Act begins with these words :

An Act to provide for the application of certain Defence Regulations for purposes connected with the maintenance control and regulation of supplies and services. . .

and by sub-s. (1) of s. 1 of the Act it is provided :

If it appears to His Majesty to be necessary or expedient that any Defence Regulation to which this section applies should have effect for the purpose of so maintaining controlling and regulating supplies and services as —(a) to secure a sufficiency of those essential to the well being of the community or their equitable distribution or their availability at fair prices . . . he may by Order in Council direct that the Regulation shall have effect by virtue of this Act whether or not it is for the time being necessary or expedient for the purposes specified in sub-section (1) of section one of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939.

Pursuant to the power given by that Act, reg. 51 was amended so as to run thus :

(1) A competent authority, if it appears to that authority to be necessary or expedient so to do for any of the purposes specified in sub-section (1) of section one of the Supplies and Services (Transitional Powers) Act, 1945, may take possession of any land, and may give such directions as appear to the competent authority to be necessary or expedient in connection with the taking of possession of that land. (2) While any land is in the possession of a competent authority by virtue of this regulation . . . the land may, notwithstanding any restriction imposed on the use thereof (whether by any Act or other instrument or otherwise), be used by, or under the authority of, the competent authority for such purpose, and in such manner, as that authority thinks expedient for any of the purposes specified in sub-section (1) of section one of the Supplies and Services (Transitional Powers) Act, 1945.

It goes on to name the powers which the competent authority in that case may exercise.

The Minister of Works, no longer requiring the premises for the American Red Cross, transferred possession of them to the Minister of Health, who, in turn, after the necessary formalities transferred possession to the defendants to provide housing accommodation. The plaintiffs allege that the Minister of Works had no authority to transfer the possession of the flats to the Ministry of Health, and, consequently, that the Ministry of Health had no authority to authorise the defendants to make use of the flats. The Minister of Works is a competent authority within the meaning of the Defence Regulations. The question raised is : Did the Minister take possession by virtue of his office and as such officer, or did he take possession on behalf of His Majesty ? The words of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, seem plain enough, that it is on behalf of the Crown that the Minister exercises the power of requisition. The matter, one would have thought, was too plain for argument, but, if authority is needed, it is to be found in the decision in Minister of Health v. Bellotti and Another (1). That was a case dealing with refugees from Gibraltar. Some trouble arose and the refugees were given notice to quit the accommodation which had been provided for them in London, and an action was brought by the Minister of Health to turn them out. Various points were raised on behalf of the defendants, and LORD GREENE, M.R., said ([1944] 1 All E.R. 240, 241) :

I must deal, in the first instance, with what is really a preliminary point. The action is brought by the Minister of Health by that description. It is said that the action ought to have been brought on behalf of the Crown and that the Minister of Health has no title to maintain it . . . It is argued by counsel for the respondents that . . . the possession of the Ministry of Health being possession on behalf of His Majesty nobody but His Majesty is competent to institute proceedings such as have been instituted here, which are in form a claim for damages for trespass and an injunction to restrain the respondents from occupying his rooms. In my opinion, that argument cannot prevail, by reason of the provisions of the Ministry of Health Act, 1919, s. 7 (1). Apart from those provisions, I do not suppose it would be disputed that the argument would be right, but under that sub-section it is provided that "the Minister may sue and be sued by the name of the Minister of Health, and may for all purposes be described by that name."

So there the MASTER OF THE ROLLS is not only saying that the Minister holds the requisitioned property on behalf of His Majesty; he goes so far as to say he did not suppose it would be disputed that that contention was right. I need say no more than that this decision has established that possession is possession on behalf of His Majesty and, therefore a competent authority is entitled to transfer possession to another competent authority. Indeed, that was done again and again during the war. The Minister of Works frequently requisitioned land and used it, not only for the purposes of the Secretary of State for War, but also for the Admiralty and for the Royal Air Force, and the contention now put forth that possession is not taken on behalf of the Crown cannot be disputed successfully in this court.

Action for possession—Lease of flat with stipulated for attendance—Total rent—Whether attendance subsistent part of whole rent—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (2)—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (c. 32), s. 10 (1).

An unfurnished flat, the rateable value of which was less than that prescribed by the Rent Restrictions Acts, was let to a tenant at a yearly rent of £170, a further sum of £15 a year being specified for service charges which were stipulated in the agreement to be keeping the rooms and furniture clean, sweeping chimneys, lighting fires, valeting and general attendance, arranging to keep the staircase clean, and providing a hall porter to attend to the hall door and to take messages and parcels. In addition to these contractual services, the landlord provided a storeroom for luggage, etc., a lift and a liftman, central heating and a hot water supply, and a housekeeper who was available to cook and serve meals for which she was paid separately. In an action for possession:—

HELD: (i) the rent of the flat was the total payment under the agreement, including the payment in respect of attendance.

(iii) the contractual rights were reasonably and sufficiently covered by the charge of £15, and, as, in regard to the whole rent of £185, it did not form a substantial part within *Palser v. ACTION for possession of a flat. The facts appear in the judgment.

Diplock for the landlords.

Sebag Shaw for the tenant.

DENNING, J.: This is a claim by the landlords for the possession of a flat occupied by the tenant on the fifth floor of one of the buildings of Artillery Mansions in Victoria Street, London. The question that arises is whether or not the tenant is protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts.

The tenancy agreement, made in June, 1944, was one under which the landlords agreed to let the flat to the tenant for one year from June 24, 1944, and thereafter on a quarterly tenancy at a rent of £170 a year. In addition, the tenant agreed to pay the landlords by way of further or additional rent £15 a year for service charges. I have to determine whether this flat is excluded from the Act by reason of the fact that it is let at a rent which includes payment in respect of attendance within s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920.

The landlords provide a large number of services and facilities for the tenant which are not included in the written contract between them. They provide, for instance, a storeroom in the basement where the tenants can keep luggage, and so forth. They provide a lift and a liftman as a facility for the tenants and for people visiting them. They provide central heating and a hot water supply. They have also instituted a system whereby a housekeeper is available to cook meals for and to serve the meals on the tenants of the flats, but none of that comes within the agreement. In particular, the facility of providing meals is a matter which is done by the housekeeper, so to speak, on her own account. She provides the meals, charges for them and takes the profit. What is specified as coming within the contractual terms of the service is:

The service to be provided by the landlords shall include keeping the rooms and furniture clean, sweeping chimneys, cleaning windows, lighting fires, valeting and general attendance.

In addition, there is a specific clause whereby the landlords agree to arrange for the staircase to be kept clean, and to provide a hall porter to attend to the hall door and to take messages and parcels.

To see whether or not the case comes within s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920, I start with the fact that the rateable value is less than the prescribed amount of £105. Prima facie, therefore, the flat is within the protection of the Act. I next turn to the proviso to that sub-section, and I find that the flat is let at a rent which includes payment in respect of attendance. I am satisfied that the earlier cases of Wood v. Wallace (1) and Hocker v. Solomon (2) should no longer be followed, having regard to the decision of the Divisional Court in L. H. Woods & Co., Ltd. v. City & West End Properties, Ltd. (3), and the observations of the Court of Appeal in Wilkes v. Goodwin (4), and, particularly, the observations of YOUNGER, L.J. ([1923] 2 K.B. 105) where he says:

... the word "rent" in this exception surely means not rent in the strict sense but the total payment under the instrument of letting.

In the present case the total payment under the instrument of letting is not only the £170, but also the £15, making £185 altogether. Any other view would lead to an impossible position having regard to the fact that when the contractual tenancy comes to an end the tenant is entitled to the benefit of all the terms and conditions of the contract of tenancy which are consistent with the Act. In order to have that benefit, she must pay the £185, but not more. Therefore, it is necessary that all payments which are made in respect of the contractual stipulations should be added together and treated as rent for the purpose of this section. This rent of £185 included payments in respect of attendance, and, therefore, it is within the proviso to s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920.

This proviso must, however, now be read subject to s. 10 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, which says that :

... a dwelling-house shall not be deemed to be bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of attendance or the use of furniture unless the amount of rent which is fairly attributable to the attendance or the use of the furniture, regard being had to the value of the same to the tenant, forms a substantial portion of the whole rent.

That sub-section is, no doubt, dealing with the familiar case where there is an inclusive figure including both the strict rent and the attendance. It is the primary task of the court in such a case to find out how much of the inclusive sum is fairly attributable to the attendance. It was in relation to such a situation that the analysis and the observations of the Court of Appeal in Palser v. Grinling (5) primarily applied. In my opinion, they also apply in a case such as the present where there is not an inclusive rent, but the parties have specifically agreed on one figure, £170, for the rent and another figure, £15, for the services. In a case of this kind, however, where the parties themselves have made the severance, I think that in the ordinary way it is reasonable to assume that the amounts allocated are a genuine estimate of the value of the services mentioned. I am supported in this view by the analysis which has been put before me. It has been got out with the greatest care in accordance with the judgment of MORTON, L.J., in Palser v. Grinling (5) : but it became apparent in the course of the evidence that there were considerable margins of error and considerable difficulties arising in making the various apportionments, adjustments, estimates and deductions required by that calculation. When one has such a difficult matter to assess and estimate, it seems to me that when the parties have in their agreement set down their own figure, it is prima facie to be taken as correct. I see nothing in all these calculations to satisfy me that this £15 is not a perfectly proper figure to put on the value of the services which the landlords contract to provide for that sum. It says that the services to be provided by the landlords shall include keeping the rooms and furniture clean, sweeping chimneys, cleaning windows, lighting fires, valeting and general attendance. It seems to me on the figures that I have heard, that those contractual rights are reasonably and sufficiently covered by the charge of £15 per annum on account of it. It is not necessary for me to go into the particular details. With regard to the question of the lift and the liftman, there is no contractual right to it, as I understand the agreement, so that, in accordance with what MORTON, L.J., said, it is a matter which I should disregard, but in any case, following the approach in all these cases to what constitutes attendance, I myself should have thought that the provision of a liftman operating a lift such as this, which in ordinary circumstances is an essential means of access to the flat, would not be attendance.

The question, therefore, is whether the £15 forms a substantial portion of the whole rent of £185. It does not form a substantial part within the test laid down by the Court of Appeal. It is less than 15 per cent. of the whole.

In the result, in my judgment, this action fails. The house is prima facie within the Act, and the landlords have not satisfied me that there are circumstances existing which take it out of s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920 as amended by s. 10 (1) of the Act of 1923. The action, therefore, must be dismissed with costs.

Sale of land—Memorandum of contract—Material term not included in memorandum—Term exclusively for benefit of one party—Right to waive and proceed on agreement as evidenced by memorandum—Term specifying date of vacant possession—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 40 (1).

A

If a memorandum or note of a contract for the sale of land omits a material term of the bargain, it fails to comply with s. 40 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, subject to the qualification that, if the omitted term is exclusively for the benefit of one party, he may sometimes waive the benefit of it and sue for enforcement of the contract without it.

On January 31, 1946, vendor and purchaser met and a bargain was struck for the sale of a freehold bungalow and land. The purchaser paid a deposit of £100 and the vendor signed a deposit receipt as follows: "Received of H.H. [the purchaser] the sum of £100, being deposit on bungalow and ground named 'Oakdene,' Station Road, Stoke Mandeville, Bucks., sold for £1,000." In an action by the purchaser for specific performance of the agreement of sale, it was found that the agreement contained a term as to vacant possession of the property being given by Mar. 31, 1946, which was not mentioned in the deposit receipt, that term not being pleaded by the purchaser:—

(i) he had failed to prove that the agreement on which he had brought his action (which must be taken to include, not merely the terms specified in the deposit receipt, but also the term as to vacant possession, which was a material term of the agreement and not merely collateral to it) was evidenced by a memorandum or note thereof in writing in accordance with s. 40 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925;

WITNESS ACTION for specific performance of a contract of sale of land. The facts appear in the judgment.

C. L. Fawell for the purchaser.

H

EVERSHED, J.: This is an action, brought by the alleged purchaser, for specific performance of a contract for the sale to the plaintiff of a bungalow and ground known as "Oakdene," Station Road, Stoke Mandeville, Buckingham. Many questions have been indicated by the amended defence, but, in my view, there is one question only for determination—whether, on the facts of the case, the plaintiff is in a position to prove an enforceable bargain having regard to the terms of s. 40 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925.

The property, "Oakdene," consists of a one-storied dwelling-house, containing five living rooms or bedrooms and a scullery, and having attached to it some garden ground, the exact extent of which I do not know, but which has been used for fruit growing. In the dwelling-house at all material times lived the defendant, Mrs. Price, a lady now some 74 years old, who is substantially an invalid. There also lived in the house her own daughter, her son-in-law (the daughter's husband), and their child, nearly seven. The plaintiff, Hawkins, is in business as a market gardener and fruit buyer and seller. In July, 1945, an old friend of Mrs. Price, a Mrs. Ward, knowing that Mrs. Price was anxious to find a buyer of her growing fruit on the trees, introduced Mr. Hawkins to her. On January 31, 1946, Mrs. Ward informed Mr. Hawkins that she had the strongest ground for believing that Mrs. Price was willing to sell him the bungalow at his figure of £1,000. Mrs. Ward and Mr. Hawkins went over to Mrs. Price's bungalow, and then and there the bargain was made.

What was the bargain? As pleaded in para. 1 of the statement of claim, it is stated as follows:

It was orally agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant that the defendant would sell and the plaintiff would buy the freehold bungalow and ground of the defendant known as Oakdene, situate in Station Road, Stoke Mandeville, aforesaid for the sum of £1,000.

According to the statement of claim, that is all, but I am clear that there was another term which was part of the bargain, namely, that possession should be given on Mar. 31, particularly as regards the garden. That that was an important term of the arrangement is made plain from the correspondence. In every letter the term or condition that vacant possession should be given and completion had on that date was insisted on as one of the important parts of the arrangement. That term, however, does not form any part of the agreement as alleged in para. 1 of the statement of claim, nor is there any evidence of it in the note or memorandum which is relied on by Mr. Hawkins to satisfy s. 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. That document came into existence in the following circumstances. At the meeting on Jan. 31, Mr. Hawkins stated that the proper thing would be for him to pay a deposit and he drew a cheque on the Westminster Bank for £100. Mr. Hawkins was then concerned to get some writing as evidence of the bargain he had made, and it was arranged that Mrs. Ward's daughter should prepare a receipt which Mrs. Price should be asked to sign. Miss Ward did prepare the document, and next day or the day after Mrs. Price signed it. It is in these terms:

Received of Mr. Harold Hawkins, 20 Brook Street, Aston Clinton, Bucks., the sum of £100, being deposit on bungalow and ground named "Oakdene," Station Road, Stoke Mandeville, Bucks., sold for £1,000.

That document is alleged to constitute a note or memorandum in writing of the bargain sufficient to satisfy s. 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. The defence, by para. 1, denies that the oral agreement as alleged in para. 1 of the statement of claim was made. Paragraph 2 of the defence is as follows:

If, as is not admitted, an oral agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant on January 31, 1946, for the sale of Oakdene, Station Road, Stoke Mandeville, such agreement was subject to the following express conditions, viz., that the plaintiff should find for the defendant suitable alternative accommodation prior to March 31, 1946, unless the defendant should find such alternative accommodation prior to the said date and the defendant should be in the position of being able to give the plaintiff vacant possession on March 31, 1946.

The second alleged condition adumbrated a suggested statutory tenancy on the part of the daughter and the son-in-law, and the plea in para. 3 of the defence was that neither condition was complied with. I observe that the conditions as so pleaded have not been proved. I am satisfied that there was no condition as to finding alternative accommodation. I am not satisfied on the evidence before me that there was any statutory tenancy. In other words, it was no part of the bargain that the sale should be conditional on Mrs. Price being able to give vacant possession. It is, however, clear that the date—March 31—in reference to the giving of possession is something indicated by the defence as material to the bargain. In para. 5 of the defence there is a general plea of s. 40 of the Law of Property Act.

The first matter I have to determine is this. I have said that I hold the agreement to have been, not in the form pleaded in para. 1 of the statement of claim, but in that form together with the added term which I have stated in regard to possession, that term also involving the question of completion. Counsel for Mr. Hawkins says that that term, though not pleaded and although there is no evidence of it in the receipt, does not adversely affect the plaintiff's rights because it is substantially, if not exclusively, for the plaintiff's benefit,

A and one, therefore, which he is entitled to waive, and that he, having waived it, may sue on the agreement without it, the agreement so shortened being sufficiently evidenced by the receipt. Counsel adds that in any case, in the events which have happened, the term about possession on Mar. 31, or, possibly, during April or May, has ceased to have any practical significance, all those months having long since passed, and that it has ceased to be significant, not through any fault of the plaintiff, but because the defendant has proceeded to repudiate her obligations under the contract, so that, if the defendant were now to be entitled to set up this oral term and then to say that the plaintiff's rights were defeated because there was no sufficient memorandum to satisfy the statute, that would be allowing the statute to be used as an instrument of fraud, because it would be allowing it to be used to defeat what justice demanded. Counsel has further said that the plea of the statute in any case, on a proper view of the defence, is not raised as regards this matter. All that the defence has done is to plead the statute generally as an answer to the agreement which the plaintiff pleads, and, if the agreement was, in truth, as the plaintiff pleads it, then, since all the terms in para. 1 are evidenced in the receipt, the statute is satisfied. It is said it would be contrary to principle and the practice of the court to allow para. 2 of the defence to be amended by substituting for the plea of the somewhat vague condition about the defendant being able to give the plaintiff vacant possession an allegation of an additional term as to the date of possession, and then to enable the defendant to say that that term is not evidenced by any memorandum in writing to satisfy the statute.

C Those are formidable arguments, and particularly so when reference is had to the authorities to which counsel has drawn my attention, but, as I have already indicated, I have reached the conclusion that the plaintiff cannot succeed because he fails to satisfy what the statute requires him to satisfy (that statute D having been pleaded sufficiently), namely, that the agreement he seeks to prove has been evidenced in writing in accordance with the statute. Indeed, as I think, the plaintiff is placed on the horns of a dilemma. If he relies strictly on his pleading, he has failed to prove the contract which he has alleged, because the contract with the term added, as it seems to me, is substantially a different contract from that which he has pleaded, but, if, notwithstanding the plea, he is entitled to set up some other contract and then waive one of its terms, it seems to me that the general plea of the statute would then be an answer to it.

E It is, first, necessary to observe what the statute says. Section 40 (1) is in these terms so far as material :

No action may be brought upon any contract for the sale . . . of land . . . unless the agreement upon which such action is brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, is in writing . . .

F The agreement on which the action is brought is the agreement which the plaintiff and the defendant made, and that agreement, as I have held, consists not merely of the few terms specified in para. 1 of the statement of claim, but also of the term which I think was a material part of the bargain, namely, the term in regard to possession. That agreement is one and indivisible. Can it be said that there is a memorandum or note of that agreement in writing ?

G That raises the question : Is it necessary that every term of the parole agreement should be so evidenced ? There is, I think, clear authority that every material term must be so evidenced. The memorandum, however, need not refer to matters which the law implies. Such matters, I assume, would not in terms be part of the bargain struck, but, whether they were or not, it is clear that an implied term, such as that the vendor should make a good title, has not to be noted in the writing. But it is said that there is a further exception, and what I am concerned with and the difficulty in this case, is the scope of that further exception. The matter is thus stated in FRY ON SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (6th ed.), p. 504, n :

H It would seem that where a stipulation of no great importance and solely benefiting the plaintiff is omitted from the memorandum, the defendant will not, in an action for specific performance, in which the stipulation is not asserted against him, be allowed to set up that the memorandum is insufficient by reason of such omission to satisfy the statute, if the plaintiff chooses to waive the stipulation.

The case cited in support of that is North v. Loomes (1). I have also been referred to the last edition of WILLIAMS ON VENDOR AND PURCHASER, and at vol. 1, pp. 4, 5, the same point is dealt with, and the material sentence is this:

It appears, however, that if a stipulation, which is to the detriment or for the benefit of one of the parties exclusively, is omitted from the memorandum, that party may submit to perform it or waive the benefit of it (as the case may require), and may with such submission or waiver specifically enforce the contract as stated in the memorandum. But this exception does not apply where no agreement at all has been actually concluded.

There is no doubt that the two textbooks differ, that in FRY, but not in WILLIAMS, it is said that the stipulation not only has to be exclusively for the benefit, or to the detriment, of one party or the other, but also should be "of no great importance." I am very anxious not to try and lay down matters of general principle which are not necessary for the decision of this case, but it is, as things have turned out, incumbent on me to express a view, though not intended as an exhaustive definition, of the scope of this exception such as it is.

I wish to preface what I am about to say by observing that, as I see it, there may well be a difference between cases in which the memorandum is the contract or purports to be a record of the contract, on the one hand, and, on the other, cases where the contract sued on is oral, and the question is whether some document, such as a receipt for the deposit (which does not on the face of it purport to be an agreement), sufficiently satisfies the statute. I say that for this reason. In one of the cases cited (Martin v. Pycroft) (2) the question arose as regards an agreement for the grant of a sub-lease. The plaintiff sued for specific performance of the agreement, and the written document relied on was plainly and obviously intended to be an agreement. It was so described and expressed, and was on the face of it an exhaustive written agreement between the parties. The defendants, in resisting the decree, set up the allegation that, though not in writing, it was part of the arrangement that the plaintiff should pay the defendants a premium of £200 for the privilege of getting this sub-lease. To that the plaintiff assented, submitted to pay the £200, and said that, so submitting, he was entitled to specific performance of the contract, but PARKER, V.C., refused to grant specific performance on the ground that the Statute of Frauds was a fatal obstacle to the plaintiff. KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., in the Court of Appeal, expressing the judgment of the court, took a different view, and said that where, in circumstances such as were there proved, the plaintiff submitted to be bound by a term only for the benefit of the defendants, it would be contrary to all proper principles to allow the defendants to resist specific performance of the agreement contained in the written contract by setting up the added term to which the plaintiff had assented.

North v. Loomes (1), on the other hand, was a case in which the agreement made was a parole agreement for the sale by North to Loomes of certain premises for £590. The written memorandum relied on was a receipt in this form: "Received of Mr. Joseph Goddard Loomes the sum of Fifty pounds deposit on the purchase price Five Hundred and Ninety pounds (£590) for the house and premises and land in the occupation of Mr. R. Keene, situate in the High Street, Chinnor, and known as Holmleigh. The balance of the purchase price to be paid on or before March 25, 1918. Purchase price, £590; Balance £540. (sgd.) Frederick J. North," and there was a date. It was alleged that the bargain that was made included another term, not directly referable to the sale in the sense of affecting the title, or the price, or the right to possession, and so on, but a term, collateral to the bargain, that the defendant purchaser (Loomes) would pay both his own costs and those of the vendor (North). The obligation to pay these costs on the part of Loomes was stoutly denied. Certain correspondence had ensued while matters were in negotiation for the conveyance, and, Loomes having repudiated any bargain, the action was brought by North. Loomes set up as a defence the very term which he had previously repudiated, namely, his obligation to pay costs, and stated that, since that term was not in the memorandum, the plaintiff was defeated by reason of the statute. I say "set up" but the defence, in the form in which it was presented, did not in terms plead the matter in that way, and it was, therefore, necessary, if this defence was to be open to the defendant, that the defence should be amended that that might be pleaded, and the learned judge, not unnaturally, refused to allow such an amendment. He did, however, say that, even if such an amendment was made, or if the defence, as it stood, left it open to the defendant to plead this additional term, nevertheless, since the term was one (and here one gets the qualification referred to in FRY) of insufficient importance to have been referred to in the receipt, it being a term exclusively for the benefit of the party suing (namely, the vendor, North), North would be entitled to waive his right to have all the costs paid and to sue on the agreement as recorded in the receipt, which receipt contained a reference to all the terms of sufficient importance to be recorded in the document.

- A If I apply the principle which one finds in that decision—and I do not overlook the final paragraph in the judgment, referring to Martin v. Pycroft (2), which was added by the learned judge after he had written the earlier part of his judgment and after he had used the phrase “of sufficient importance”—there are obviously certain marked distinctions. In the first place, if the provision in North v. Loomes (1) about paying the costs could not be regarded as of sufficient importance to be worth recording, that observation could not fairly, in my judgment, be applied to the term about vacant possession which the parties made in this case. I need only recall on that head the reference I have already made to the correspondence which the plaintiff’s solicitors wrote. Throughout they laid emphasis on this term about vacant possession on March 31. They (and I assume they acted on the instructions of their client) regarded it as an obviously important clause. Secondly, I am far from satisfied that that term can be described as one exclusively for the benefit of the plaintiff. The contract was made on January 31. The date fixed (March 31) was two months ahead, and it may well be that, if there had been nothing agreed about possession or completion, a reasonable time might have expired on a date not greatly different from March 31, but it has to be remembered what were the circumstances as regards the defendant, her daughter and son-in-law as the plaintiff stated them.
- D The plaintiff wanted this house, not for his own occupation, but for that of a foreman, and he was particularly anxious to get possession of the garden so as to be able to attend to the fruit trees not later than the end of March. When all those circumstances are borne in mind, apart from the obvious importance that there should be something fixed about completion, it seems to me that the term was for the benefit, and intended for the benefit, of both parties. Mr. Hawkins was anxious to be secure of possession of the garden by March 31, and it may be some of the house, but he was willing to concede to Mrs. Price the right to remain on for an additional two months. I do not, therefore, think this is a case where one party or the other could have waived the term on the ground that it was exclusively for his or her benefit. So, without travelling further into the detail of these cases, it is, perhaps, prudent that I should confine myself to saying that this term was, in my judgment, of real importance so as to be a very substantial and material part of, and not merely collateral to, the bargain, and was, further, not exclusively for the benefit of one party or the other, certainly not exclusively for the benefit of Mr. Hawkins and one which he would be entitled, therefore, to waive.

- Now, I have already indicated that the question of importance may or may not be an essential element in these cases, according as one accepts the statement of the text in WILLIAMS, on the one hand, or that in FRY, on the other, but, so far as it is necessary for me to do so, I state my own view to be, that, if the term is really a fundamental part of the bargain and to that extent a material term, unless there is a note or memorandum of it, prima facie the plaintiff must fail to establish that there is a note or memorandum of the agreement within the terms of the section. In the absence of the note or memorandum of such a term, the note or memorandum which does exist is of some agreement which is materially different from or is not the agreement sued on.
- G

- H Allsopp v. Orchard (3) was referred to, and I do not think I need say anything about it beyond that there the alleged agreement was contained in letters. It was pleaded by the plaintiff, suing for specific performance, that it was on its proper construction an agreement for the sale of the rectory and all the glebe land, and that was the agreement he set up. The learned judge held that the true agreement was different from that if, indeed, there was any final agreement because there should have been an exclusion from the glebe land of three acres which had never been defined. The plaintiff sought to waive any exclusion, saying he was willing to transfer the whole of the glebe land, but it was held that there was no room for the doctrine of waiver, because the plaintiff had failed to prove the contract he sought to establish.

There is one other case to which it is necessary to refer, the recent decision of ROXBURGH, J., in Johnson v. Humphrey (4). That, again, was a case in which the bargain alleged was an oral bargain, and there was a memorandum of it made on the following day. The question there was similar in some respects to the present one—whether the bargain which had been proved contained a term to which there was no reference in the written memorandum. ROXBURGH, J., said [1946] 1 All E.R. 462, 463:

I am quite satisfied that one of the terms to which the plaintiff and the defendant agreed on Nov. 9 was that vacant possession should not be given until the defendant could make other suitable arrangements for herself and her furniture . . . But that the stipulation was made, and insisted upon, that she was not to give vacant possession until she had made some suitable arrangements for herself and her furniture, is to my mind established beyond all doubt. I do not think there is any conflict of evidence on the point. If there was a term agreed to by both parties on Nov. 9 that the lady should give vacant possession when she could make other suitable arrangements for herself and her furniture, the memorandum does not contain all the terms of the bargain because it does not contain that term. It leaves the matter as a big query. . . But it does not say when possession is to be given: therefore, plainly it does not include all the terms of the bargain, if I am right in holding, as I do hold, that one of the terms related to the giving of vacant possession. Nor do I think it matters precisely what that term was and whether or not it was too vague to be enforceable. If the term was too vague to be enforceable in a court of law, it would only mean that there was no contract, and, therefore, there could be no memorandum of it. Therefore, in my judgment, once I reach the conclusion, which I do, that there was a term about vacant possession agreed to on Nov. 9, the memorandum signed by the defendant on Nov. 10 cannot be a memorandum sufficient to comply with the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 40, because it omits a material term of the bargain.

It is, no doubt, true, as counsel for the plaintiff says, that the decision of that case may be rested on the ground that there was no real bargain at all. It is also true, as counsel points out, that, apparently, none of the cases (North v. Loomes (1) in particular) was cited to the learned judge, but there is no doubt to my mind that the learned judge is there affirming the proposition of law that, if the memorandum omits a material term of the bargain, it fails to comply with s. 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. In my judgment, that proposition is in general correct. No doubt, there is the qualification to it that, if a term is exclusively for the benefit of one party, that party may sometimes waive the benefit of it and sue on the contract for enforcement, even although the memorandum contains no evidence of that term. I say "may sometimes," because I do not want to lay down any final conclusion as regards the question whether the term in question must be of importance or material. I have indicated that, if the term is really an essential part of the bargain, my own view is that there must be some memorandum of it, but I make no attempt to determine the point at which a term may cease to be of such fundamental importance as to make it unnecessary that there should be a note of it. Subject to the qualification I have indicated, I see no ground to doubt the correctness of the decision of ROXBURGH, J., in Johnson v. Humphrey (4). I, therefore, have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff fails to prove such a contract as he set out to prove, and that the only contract which he can prove is one to which there is the fatal objection that it is insufficiently recorded in the receipt. The result must be that the action fails.

Re HOLLIDAY'S WILL TRUSTS, HOUGHTON AND ANOTHER
v. ADLARD AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), January 23, March 17, 18, 1947.]

Executors—Apportionment between capital and income—Settlement by will of residuary estate—Power to postpone conversion—Tenants for life entitled to retain income of wasting or hazardous assets—Residue including absolute interest in income-producing fund subject to annual charge on income.

Wills—Settlement—Apportionment between capital and income—Settlement of residuary estate including absolute interest in income-producing fund subject to annual charge on income.

By his will a testator, who died in 1927, settled his residuary estate on certain trusts. He gave the trustees a discretionary power to postpone sale and conversion and declared that any yearly interest accruing after his death and until actual sale and conversion should be applied as income, without regard to the amount of such income or the wasting or hazardous nature of the investments. The residue included interests derived under two settlements made by the testator's father. In the events that had happened, the testator was at his death absolutely entitled to certain sums of money under these settlements, subject to a discretionary power given to the trustees of the settlements to apply the annual income of the whole or any part thereof for the benefit of the widow of the testator's brother, C. Until 1939, C.'s widow had received £400 a year out of the settlement funds, and the surplus, after the testator's death, was received by his trustees, but between 1939 and her death in 1942, C.'s widow received the whole income of both funds. The testator's trustees had never exercised any discretion whether or not to sell the testator's interest in these funds. They had now received the sums to which he was entitled under the settlements and the question was whether, as between tenants for life and remaindermen of the testator's residue, these sums ought to be apportioned so as to give something in the nature of income to the tenants for life, or whether the whole amounts ought to be treated as capital. The life tenants contended that an apportionment should be made in accordance with the principle of Re Chesterfield's Trusts (24 Ch.D. 643):—

HELD: (i) the testator's interest in the settlement funds was not a reversionary interest, but an absolute interest subject only to a charge on income.

(ii) since these interests produced income and were immediate interests subject only to an annual charge on income, it was not necessary for the trustees, at the time of the testator's death, to exercise a discretion whether they should sell or retain.

Rowlls v. Bebb ([1900] 2 Ch. 107) distinguished.

(iii) the principle of Re Chesterfield's Trusts did not apply to an income-producing fund which was absolutely vested subject to an annual charge on income, and, accordingly, the rule applicable was that the tenants for life must submit to all the annual charges on income.

(iv) since the tenants for life had received income from time to time and were entitled to retain it under the will and their rights in relation to the funds were limited to that, there was no necessity for apportionment, because there was no equity which demanded any such interference with the ordinary course of administration as laid down in the will, and, therefore, the sums received by the trustees must be applied as capital.

ROMER, J. : This summons raises questions affecting two sums of money which are held by the plaintiffs as trustees of the will of the testator, James Richardson Holliday. The first sum represents money settled by a settlement dated Apr. 8, 1895, to which the testator's father and others were parties, and the other sum represents a fund settled by the will of the testator's father.

The testator made his will on Jan. 24, 1922, and by it he gave his residuary estate to his trustees on the usual trusts for sale and conversion and subject thereto to hold the proceeds upon the trusts therein declared. After directing the payment of an annuity to his wife, and making other dispositions, he directed his trustees to hold the proceeds of his residuary estate as to one-third part thereof upon trust to pay the income thereof to certain named nieces and the survivors or survivor of them during their respective lives, and upon the death of the survivor the one-third share, as well capital as income, was given to the trustees of the Public Picture Gallery Fund, Birmingham. The testator then directed his trustees to hold one other third part of the proceeds of his residuary estate as to one-half thereof in trust for a named niece and as to the other half in trust for another named niece, and, subject as aforesaid, he directed his trustees to hold the remaining one-third part on trust to pay the income to a sister for life—she is now dead—and from and after her decease he directed his trustees to stand possessed of the same one-third part, as well capital as income, as to one half in trust for a daughter of that sister and as to the other half for another daughter of that sister, and he proceeded then to settle the shares of the nieces in his residuary estate on trust for themselves for life, and then their issue were to take, and, subject to a power of appointment over one half of each share in default of issue as therein mentioned, the same Public Picture Gallery Fund, Birmingham, was to take each share. There was then a power to the trustees to postpone for such period as they should judge expedient the sale, conversion and getting in of his estate, and he authorised his trustees to retain investments as therein mentioned. By cl. 20 he declared that the dividends, interest and other yearly produce of his estate to accrue after his death and until the actual sale, conversion and getting in thereof should be deemed the income thereof applicable as such for the purposes of the said trusts without regard to the amount of such income or to the wasting or hazardous nature of the investments yielding the same. The testator died on July 22, 1927, and his widow, to whom he bequeathed an annuity, died on Jan. 2, 1939.

The problem which is before the court relates to two funds, and the trusts by virtue of which those funds have now come into the hands of the testator's trustees are set out in para. 9 of the affidavit of Mr. Frederick Leonard Houghton sworn on Aug. 19, 1946. Mr. Houghton says :

Included in the testator's residuary estate were the following interests, namely : (a) His beneficial interest under a settlement, dated Apr. 8, 1895, and made between the father of the testator, of the first part, Arthur Godlee and Edgar Hedley Howell, of the second part, and the testator's brother, Frank, the said Edgar Hedley Howell and Arthur Godlee of the third part. Under this settlement the father settled a fund (therein called "Charles' Fund") [Charles was a brother of the testator] on trust for the benefit of Charles and others during the life of Charles and after Charles' death (in the event which happened of his leaving no child) in trust for the testator and his brother Frank absolutely in equal shares with a proviso that it should be lawful for the trustees of the settlement if they in their absolute discretion thought fit to pay or apply the annual income of the whole or any part of Charles' fund to or for the benefit of any wife of Charles who should survive him during the residue of her life or during such shorter period as the trustees might in their absolute discretion think fit. (b) His beneficial interest under the will and codicil, proved on May 18, 1898, of the father (who died on Mar. 12, 1898) whereby part (therein called "Charles' Fund") of the proceeds of sale and conversion of the father's residuary trust estate were directed to be held on trusts after the death of Charles for his children and in default of children for the testator absolutely with a proviso (in similar terms to the proviso in the settlement) in favour of any widow of Charles.

Charles died on Apr. 7, 1899, without issue, but leaving a widow, namely, Mary Holliday, him surviving. Mary Holliday died on Oct. 30, 1942, having received for some years £100 without deduction of tax from "Charles' fund" under the settlement and £300 without deduction of tax from "Charles' fund" under the father's will and codicil, but after 1939 she received the whole income of "Charles' fund," both under the settlement and under the father's will and codicil, this being less than the £100 and the £300. Mr. Houghton then states :

A Half Charles' share under the settlement and all Charles' share under the father's will (less duties and costs) have now been received by the plaintiffs and were of the respective values at the date of transfer of £2,866 and £11,549 and are constituted by the investments respectively specified [in an exhibited document].

B The question in relation to these funds arises as between tenant for life and remainderman and is whether these funds ought to be apportioned so as to give something in the nature of income to the income beneficiaries under the testator's will, or whether the whole amounts ought to be treated as capital, and what principle should be applied if an apportionment is required.

C An exhibit to Mr. Houghton's affidavit shows the payments which were made to the executors and trustees of the will of the testator in respect of the surplus income of those two "Charles' funds." In 1927—that being the year in which the testator died—there was an apportioned amount of £71 under the will fund and £75 under the settlement fund. In 1928 there was a surplus to the estate of £100 under the will fund, and £58 under the settlement fund, and so on. In sums of varying amounts there was surplus income from both these funds down to 1939, the surplus in that year being a small one. To complete the evidence the summons was adjourned until to-day so that a further affidavit could be put in on behalf of the plaintiff trustees giving the facts affecting the question whether the trustees exercised a discretion in the matter of retaining or selling the interest of the testator in these two "Charles' funds." This further affidavit has now been filed and the effect of it is, I think, summed up in one sentence. Mr. Houghton says :

E We were, of course, fully aware of such interests and that we were receiving surplus income of such funds from time to time, but we never consciously considered the question whether we should sell such interests and the question of sale was never raised. We assumed as a matter of course that we should retain them.

F He then exhibits a document showing the investments constituting the testator's residuary estate when originally constituted, and some of those investments consisted and still consist of non-trustee securities.

F It is argued on behalf of those interested in income under the trusts of the testator's will that an apportionment of these funds which have now come to the hands of the trustees should be effected in accordance with the decision in Re Chesterfield's Trusts (1), and the kind of principles which, it is said, are relevant to the present case are stated thus in JARMAN ON WILLS, 7th ed., pp. 1203, 1204 :

G In most cases, however, the testator gives the trustees a discretionary power of sale, or power to postpone conversion, and then the tenant for life cannot compel a realisation of the property so long as the trustees, in the proper exercise of their discretion, think fit to keep it unconverted ; in such a case the tenant for life gets nothing until the property falls into possession or is sold ; but he may have a right to an apportioned part of the fund when it falls into possession . . . In such a case as that above referred to [Rowlls v. Bebb (2)] where conversion ought to have taken place, either because there was no power to postpone, or because the power was not exercised or improperly exercised, it becomes necessary to determine what portion of the property belongs to the tenant for life or his representatives.

H Those passages refer to reversionary or other interests not producing income, and the leading case on the subject of reversionary interests is Rowlls v. Bebb (2). In that case the Court of Appeal were satisfied that the trustees had not, in fact, exercised a discretion whether to retain or to realise a reversionary interest which formed part of the testator's estate and the court also came to the conclusion, having regard to the considerations which were disclosed in evidence, that it would not have been proper for the trustees to have exercised their discretion in favour of retention. It was held that, notwithstanding a clause in the will somewhat resembling cl. 20 in the will in the present case, the reversionary interest ought to be apportioned (when it fell into possession) as between tenant for life and remainderman in accordance with the principle of Re Chesterfield's Trusts (1). The argument advanced on behalf of the income beneficiaries in the present case is that such an equity is similarly applicable here, and should be applied.

To arrive at a conclusion on this subject it is necessary, first, to see precisely what the interest of the testator was in the two "Charles' funds" at the time of his death. Charles had died in 1899, without issue, but his widow was still alive. That being so, one looks at the settlement of 1895 to see what the interest of the testator's estate was at the time of his death. The position then was that the settled property was held in trust for the testator and his brother, Frank, absolutely in equal shares, but subject to a proviso that it should be lawful for the trustees of that settlement, if they in their absolute discretion should think fit so to do :

... to pay or apply the annual income of the whole or any part of Charles' fund or so much thereof as shall not have been so applied as aforesaid to or for the maintenance support and benefit of any wife of the said Charles Holliday who shall survive him during the residue of her life or during such shorter period as the trustees may in their absolute discretion think fit.

The interest of the testator under the other "Charles' fund" was precisely the same, save only that he had a sole interest in that fund (i.e., it was not shared by his brother, Frank, or by anyone else). Consequently, he had, during his lifetime and at all periods after the death of his brother, Charles, and his estate had at the time of his death and subsequently, an absolute interest in income-bearing property, and the only barrier separating him while he was alive, and his estate after he was dead, from receipt of that income and of the funds themselves was the power of the trustees of those funds to divert some or all of the income in their discretion from time to time to the maintenance, support and benefit of Charles' wife so long as she remained alive. It seems to me clear that that interest was not a reversionary interest in any true sense of the word at all. It was an absolute interest, but the income was temporarily charged in favour of a third person. In my view, there is no justification for holding that the equity which has long since been applied to reversionary interests in the strict sense—namely, interests which are wholly in reversion and bringing in no income to the estate—should be applied to an interest of that character for the purpose of adjusting the rights as between the tenants for life and remaindermen, that equity having no application, in my judgment, to an income-bearing fund which is absolutely and immediately vested and subject only to a charge imposed on the income for the benefit of a third party.

Counsel for the income beneficiaries conceded that the interests of the estate in the two "Charles' funds" were not truly reversionary interests, but, he said, they were the kind of interests which sufficiently justified and ought to attract an application of the same principle in order that justice might be done between the income beneficiaries, on the one hand, and the capital beneficiaries, on the other. He contends that these funds ought to be apportioned on the Chesterfield basis, but that the amounts which have been received by way of surplus income since the testator's death and paid to the income beneficiaries must be brought into account against the proportion of the sum which would be allocated to income on the Chesterfield calculation. As to this, I would only observe that the method of bringing such sums into account (with interest) would seem to give rise to difficult questions and somewhat intricate calculations. Counsel for the capital beneficiaries, on the other hand, argues that that kind of principle has no application to an income-bearing fund of this nature and that this must be treated as a case of an income-producing fund subject to an annual charge on income, and that, accordingly, in such cases as this, the rule applicable is that a tenant for life must keep down, or, at all events, submit to, all annual charges on income, and that the income beneficiaries, having received income since the testator's death, are entitled to keep it by virtue of cl. 20 of the will. That, he contends, is the beginning and end of the matter, and no question of apportionment or necessity for apportionment arises because there is no equity which demands any such interference with the ordinary course of administration as laid down in the testator's will itself.

I accept that view of the matter. I do not propose in this judgment to go into any further consideration of the decision in Rowlls v. Bebb (2), or the cases which preceded it. They were cases of non-income-bearing reversionary interests which, as such, fell to be apportioned. I do not regard these as non-income-producing reversionary interests at all, and it seems to me that, as they produced income and were immediate interests subject only to an annual charge on income, there was nothing for the trustees to direct their minds to at the date of the testator's death, from the point of view of inquiring whether they should sell or whether they should retain. Their interest in the funds was not reversionary, and the fact that some income might be diverted to a third party did not attract an inquiry of that kind.

- A No authority in point was cited, and, so far as I am aware, no authority precisely in point exists. Re Darby (3) was referred to, but, I think, only for purposes of comparison. In that case a father gave to his daughter an absolute interest in his estate, but subject to an annual sum charged on the estate in favour of the girl's mother, namely, the testator's widow. She inherited that estate on those terms, and then she made her own will and charged her residuary estate with an increased annuity in favour of her mother. The question arose on her death, leaving her mother surviving, whether or not (inter alia) the doctrine of Allhusen v. Whittell (4) should be brought into play in relation to payments to be made to the mother. I think the only point sought to be made on that authority was that it did not, apparently, occur to anyone to regard the daughter's interest in her father's estate as being a reversionary interest in any sense of the word, but it was treated as an absolute interest in possession, subject only to a charge upon income. The case was used merely as a matter of comment, and not as an authority on the question which I have to decide.

- C I decide this case on the short ground that these were absolute interests subject only to a charge on income; that the tenants for life of the testator's estate got such income as was available from time to time and were and are entitled to retain it; that their rights in relation to the funds are limited to that and extend no further; that this is not a case of a reversionary interest in respect of which the principle recognised and applied in Rowlls v. Bebb (2) operates; and, consequently, that no question arises of apportioning the sums which are now in the hands of the trustees. That being so, I need not express any opinion on what view should be taken of the evidence disclosed by the further affidavit or how—assuming that this had been a Chesterfield case (1)—that evidence should be treated. I will declare that the sums received by the plaintiffs on the death of Mary Holliday (the widow of the testator's brother, Charles), as representing both the "Charles' funds," ought to be held and applied as capital under the will and codicil of the testator.

Declaration accordingly.

Revenue—Excess profits tax—Deductions against profits—Cost of litigation—Appeal in respect of incidence of tax—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939 (c. 109), s. 14 (1).

The costs and expenses of a successful appeal in respect of the incidence of excess profits tax are not allowable as a deduction in the computation of profits for the purposes of either income tax or excess profits tax. The deduction authorised by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 18 (1), of the amount of the excess profits tax payable in respect of a trade or business in computing for the purposes of income tax the profits and gains arising from that trade or business does not extend beyond that expressly mentioned in the sub-section, viz., the excess profits tax itself, nor are the costs and expenses in question deductible as being "wholly or exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade" within the Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. D, Rules Applicable to Cases I and II, r. 3 (a), for an expense is not deductible under that rule if it falls on the trader in some character other than that of a trader, e.g., as in this case, where the expenditure was incurred by the trader primarily in his capacity as a taxpayer. Strong & Co. Ltd. v. Woodfield ([1906] A.C. 448), followed. By s. 14 (1) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, profits for the purposes of excess profits tax are to be computed on income tax principles.

APPEAL by the Crown from a decision of ATKINSON, J., dated June 6, 1946, and reported [1946] 2 All E.R. 141, where the facts are set out.

The General Commissioners for the division of Wellingborough held that the costs and expenses incurred by the taxpayers in an appeal to the Special Commissioners in respect of the incidence of excess profits tax should not be allowed in the computation of the taxpayers' profits for the purposes of income tax or for the purposes of excess profits tax. On appeals by the taxpayers, by way of Cases Stated, ATKINSON, J., allowed the appeals. The Crown appealed.

J. Millard Tucker, K.C., and J. W. P. Clements for the taxpayer.

Cur adv. vult.

Apr. 2. LORD GREENE, M.R., read the following judgment. These two appeals can conveniently be dealt with in one judgment. The questions for decision may be stated succinctly in this way: Are the costs and expenses of a successful appeal in respect of the incidence of excess profits tax allowable as a deduction in the computation of profits (a) for the purposes of income tax (b) for the purposes of excess profits tax. To decide these questions it is not necessary to state the facts set out in the Case by the General Commissioners for the division of Wellingborough whose decision was as follows:

That the expenses claimed be disallowed both for income tax and excess profits tax, and that the appeals be, accordingly, dismissed.

On appeal to the King's Bench Division, ATKINSON, J., reversed this decision both as to income tax and as to excess profits tax.

It will be convenient to deal first with the question whether these costs and expenses are allowable as a deduction for the purposes of income tax. Section 18 (1) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, which imposed excess profits tax, provides that excess profits tax payable in respect of a trade or business for any chargeable accounting period shall, in computing profits for the purposes of income tax, "be allowed to be deducted as an expense incurred in that period." The phrase "allowed to be deducted" echoes the language used in the Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. D, cases I and II, r. 1:

The tax shall be charged without any other deduction than is by this Act allowed. Similar phraseology as to the allowance or non-allowance of deductions appears elsewhere in the rules. The simplest argument submitted on behalf of the taxpayers was to the effect that, as the amount of the tax has to be ascertained before the deduction allowed by the section can properly be made, the cost of ascertaining it must, by implication, also be an allowable deduction, whether the ascertainment is effected by a simple calculation by accountants or by means of an appeal, successful or unsuccessful, to commissioners and, perhaps, ultimately to the House of Lords. There is, in my opinion, a simple answer to this argument—that the deduction authorised by the section does not extend beyond that expressly mentioned, viz., the tax itself, and I see no justification whatever for extending its scope beyond what the section has in express terms provided. If the legislature had wished to authorise the deduction of such costs and expenses it could easily have said so.

A Once this special argument on the meaning of s. 18 (1) is disposed of, we are thrown back on the relevant rules which are generally applicable to deductions for the purposes of income tax. I have already quoted r. 1 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II. Rule 3 of the same rules, which alone requires to be considered, prohibits deductions in respect of

B (a) any disbursements or expenses, not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade, profession, employment, or vocation.

The meaning of these words has been debated in a number of cases. The question has most frequently arisen in cases where the disbursement sought to be deducted was what may be very broadly described as of a commercial nature and the question has been whether it could be described as “money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade.” The present

C case differs, in that an altogether different element is present, viz., a liability to tax the ascertainment of which necessitates the expenditure. It is true that the excess profits tax is charged on the profits of the trade and the assessment is on the trader as a trader. Excess profits tax also differs from income tax in that it is not aptly described as the Crown’s share of the profits. It is also said on behalf of the taxpayers that it is a trade purpose to ascertain correctly the amount of excess profits tax which the trader is liable to pay, and that, if D he did not do so, his trade would suffer in the sense that, either he would not know its financial position, or he might be depleting his resources by submitting to excessive tax demands. From this is deduced the proposition, accepted by ATKINSON, J., that the cost of arriving at the correct figure, whether by simple accountancy or by litigation, successful or unsuccessful, is money wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the trade.

E In answering the question raised I do not obtain any assistance from the cases that have been cited to us other than three to which I will now refer. Special reliance is placed by the Crown on the well-known dicta of LORD DAVEY in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield (1). The deduction there claimed was in respect of the damages and costs awarded against the taxpayers (who were brewers) to a visitor at one of their licensed houses who was injured by the fall of a chimney. The only decision by the commissioners was that the deduction F claimed was not allowable. LORD DAVEY expressed the view ([1906] A.C. 453) that the words “for the purpose of the trade” mean ... for the purpose of enabling a person to carry on and earn profits in the trade ... It is not enough that the disbursement is made in the course of, or arises out of, or is connected with, the trade, or is made out of the profits of the trade. It must be made for the purpose of earning the profits.

G I do not myself find in these dicta a completely satisfactory answer to the present problem. The language that we have to construe is the language of the rule and there is always the risk of finding oneself construing, not the rule, but a paraphrase of the rule expressed in a previous judgment. I should have thought that in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield (1) it might have been said that an innkeeper who did not compensate a guest when the chimney of the inn fell on him and injured him would be likely to suffer in his trade, but the House did H not accept this argument. LORD DAVEY’s formula, however, at once confronts us with the question: “What is the meaning of the phrase ‘for the purpose of enabling a person to carry on and earn profits in the trade’ as applied to the present case?” It is said, and said, I think, with some force (and ATKINSON, J., agreed), that the ascertainment of a trader’s liabilities is essential for the successful carrying-on of his trade, whether they be trading liabilities in the strict sense or tax liabilities imposed on him as a trader in respect of his trade. I find, however, in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield (1) what appears to me to be a clear answer to the present appeal. It is, I think, a matter not of dictum, but of decision in that case that an expense is not deductible if it falls on a trader in some character other than that of a trader. This was the ground of the opinion of LORD LOREBURN, L.C., with which LORD MACNAGHTEN and LORD ATKINSON agreed. Their Lordships held that the expense there in question fell upon the taxpayers in their character not of traders but of householders. In the present case the excess profits tax is charged on the trader who carries on the trade, but his obligation to pay it is his obligation as a subject and a taxpayer, and, in ascertaining the amount of his liability, he is putting himself in a position to discharge his duty to the Crown. If his trading activities had come to an end, his obligations as a taxpayer would still have remained in respect of previous years. I am prepared to assume (although I do not so decide) that the ascertainment of the proper amount of tax payable ought, as the taxpayers argue, to be regarded as necessary for the proper carrying-on of the trade, and, therefore, for earning profits in the future, but I cannot agree that the money can be said to have been laid out "wholly and exclusively" for that purpose. It was laid out, as it appears to me, just as much, if not more, for the purpose of ensuring that the company, like any other taxpayer, should pay the proper amount of tax, no more and no less.

Only two cases have been referred to in which the element of expense connected with the payment of tax as distinct from what I have called a commercial expense had to be considered. The first is Allen v. Farquharson Bros. (2) a decision of FINLAY, J. The claim was for a deduction for income tax purposes of the costs of an appeal to the Special Commissioners against assessment to income tax under sched. D in respect of trading profits. The appeal had been in the main successful and the assessment had been considerably reduced in consequence. General Commissioners had held that the amount claimed was money necessarily wholly and exclusively laid out for the purpose of the business. FINLAY, J., referred to the distinction between income tax and excess profits duty and said that the former was the Crown's share of profits while the latter was a sum deducted before the profits are arrived at, but he did not regard the distinction as material for the decision of the case. He approved the practice of allowing the expenses of keeping an accountant, or in the case of large businesses an accountant's department. He referred to the probability that such a department would deal with income tax matters and he did not suppose that this fact would be used as a reason for disallowing the expense of the department. With this I agree, and I may add that an apportionment of the expense of such a department between its ordinary activities and its purely tax activities would normally be difficult and vexatious and any resulting tax probably negligible in amount. If FINLAY, J., meant more than this, e.g., if he meant that an accountancy expense incurred solely for the purpose of conducting a tax controversy with the Crown can be deducted, I would respectfully disagree. On the substance of the case, FINLAY, J., held that the expenditure there in question was an application of profits after they had been earned and not an expenditure necessary to earn the profits. He thus answered his question in the language of LORD DAVEY. It could, I think, have been as well answered on the ground which I have mentioned above, viz., that the expenditure was incurred by the company primarily in its capacity as a taxpayer and for the purpose of regulating the position as between itself as a taxpayer and the Crown.

The other case is Worsley Brewery Co. Ltd. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (3), a decision of this court. The company had employed accountants to audit their accounts for the 7 years 1914 to 1920 and to settle with the commissioners their excess profits duty position for each year. The fees paid for this work had been allowed as deductions both for income tax and excess profits duty purposes. In 1925 the company instructed other accountants. They completed their investigations in 1928 and as a result it was found that the company had paid too much duty and large sums were repaid to them. The company claimed that the costs of this investigation constituted an allowable expense for excess profits duty purposes and ought to be spread over the seven accounting periods in question. It does not appear to what extent the actual question of deductibility was argued. There was no reason why it should have been, since, as LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said (17 Tax Cas. 355), it was quite unnecessary to decide it. No advantage would have been gained by the company unless the expense could be written back into the seven years since excess profits duty had come to an end. The sole question, therefore, was whether or not such a sum, if allowable, could be written back, and it was held that it could not. LORD HANWORTH, M.R. (ibid.) referred to the custom (which he appears to have approved) to allow accountancy charges in the computation of the profits for the purpose of excess profits duty. ROMER, L.J. (ibid., p. 360) was "prepared to assent to the view" that the expense of an investigation by an accountant usually employed or by any accountant and the preparation of the profit and loss account and the balance sheet was a legitimate deduction both for income tax and for excess profits duty purposes. This, he thought "appears to be or at any rate may be taken" to be an expense made for the purpose of earning profits, but the expense of a later investigation made for the purposes of settling a question "between the trading concern and some third party" as to the correctness of the original ascertainment he was unable to regard as an expense incurred for the purpose of earning the profits. He said (ibid.):

It is not incurred for that purpose at all; it is incurred merely for the purpose of settling the dispute which has arisen.

These observations of ROMER, L.J., were relied on by the taxpayers in the present appeal. The argument is, I think, based on a misconstruction of what the Lord Justice said. His reference to the deductibility of accountancy expenses related only, as I read his words, to the ordinary investigation of a company's accounts for the purpose of drawing up or checking its profit and loss account and balance sheet "in the normal way." That this is what he meant is, I think, made clear by the contrast which he draws between work of that description and work undertaken for the purpose of a dispute between the company and a "third party"—by which, of course, he meant the Crown. It appears to me that the reference to the deductibility of accountants' fees does not extend to cover the case of accountants' fees incurred solely for the settlement of a tax question: a fortiori it cannot be relied upon as indicating a view that all the costs incurred in connection with a tax dispute, including the costs of litigation, are deductible. The language of ROMER, L.J., in my opinion, and with all respect to ATKINSON, J., who thought otherwise, was not intended by him to convey any such meaning.

This disposes of the question so far as deduction for the purposes of income tax is concerned. Under s. 14 (1) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, profits are to be computed for excess profits tax on income tax principles as adapted in accordance with the provisions of pt. I of sched. VII to the Act. There is nothing material in those provisions, and it follows that the costs and expenses in question cannot be deducted for excess profits tax purposes. Both appeals must be allowed with costs here and below.

MORTON, L.J.: I agree, but as we are differing from the view of the learned judge I desire to add a few words on what is, I think, a crucial portion of his judgment. He relies on the judgment of ROMER, L.J., in Worsley Brewery Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (3) and says it entirely confirms his own view. I think he understands ROMER, L.J., as saying that any expenses incurred to ascertain the profits of a business are money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of that business. I do not think that ROMER, L.J., intended to say this, and I respectfully agree with the construction which the Master of the Rolls has placed on the judgment of ROMER, L.J. If that judgment were given the wider meaning, it would, I think, lead to remarkable results. In the course of the argument it was put to counsel for the taxpayers that, if the expenses of a successful appeal to the Special Commissioners were allowable as a deduction, there was no logical reason why the expenses of a further appeal to the High Court, to the Court of Appeal, and, if leave were given, to the House of Lords, should not also be an allowable deduction. He agreed. It was then put to him that the same result must follow whether the taxpayer was ultimately successful or unsuccessful, and he agreed that this was so. He rightly qualified his answer by pointing out that such expenses must be "reasonable and necessary having regard to the requirements of the trade" in view of s. 32 of the Finance Act, 1940, but he admitted that that section could only affect the amount of the expenses allowed and had no bearing on the question whether the expenses which I have mentioned were or were not an allowable deduction within r. 3 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II. I agree with the order proposed.

LORD GREENE, M.R. : I have the authority of SOMERVELL, L.J., to say that he has read my judgment and agrees with it.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Morton and Somervell, L.JJ.), March 10, 11, April 2, 1947.]

Income Tax—Deductions against profits—Cost of litigation—Expenses of ascertaining profits—Appeal vital to retain services of valuable employee—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. D, Cases I and II, r. 3 (a).

Revenue—Excess profits tax—Cost of litigation—Expenses of ascertaining profits—Appeal vital to retain services of valuable employee—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. D, Cases I and II, r. 3 (a)—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939 (c. 109), s. 14 (1).

To secure their own supply of potatoes for the purpose of their business, a company formed and held all the shares in a subsidiary company which, with the parent company's money, acquired a large estate, previously managed for many years by an experienced farmer, Y. To retain Y.'s valuable services, the company entered into an agreement with him under which he was paid, in the accounting year ending Mar. 31, 1941, £6,486, which was included in the accounts of the subsidiary company. In computing the profits of the subsidiary company (which were thrown in with the parent company's profits) for assessment to excess profits tax for that chargeable accounting period, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, acting under the Finance Act, 1940, s. 32, decided that no deduction should be allowed in respect of Y.'s remuneration in excess of £3,500, being the amount the commissioners considered reasonable and necessary having regard to the requirements of the trade or business and to the actual services rendered by Y. By virtue of the Finance Act, 1941, s. 34, the substantial additional taxation for which the parent company was liable on that basis would, in future years, be recoverable from Y., and, as they had every reason to believe that that would be the basis for Y.'s future allowed remuneration, both companies, regarding Y.'s employment as essential to the well-being of the enterprise and fearing they would suffer through Y.'s discontent at the prospect of the parent company, as a public company, being obliged to enforce its rights against him, appealed to the Board of Referees against this decision, and that Board held that £5,800 out of the sum of £6,486 was deductible. As a result, the commissioners did not seek to disallow any part of Y.'s remuneration in subsequent years. The subsidiary company incurred legal and accountancy costs of £622 in the preparation and prosecution of that appeal :—

HELD : though there was a special business motive for prosecuting the appeal to the Board of Referees, viz., the protection of the benefit of Y.'s services, a matter going to the earning, as distinct from the taxation, of future profits, the immediate and substantive purpose was to obtain a reduction of tax, and as, in accordance with the decision in Rushden Heel Co., Ltd v. Keene (ante p. 699), costs incurred in ascertaining the correct amount of tax are incurred by a taxpayer partly, if not mainly, in his capacity as taxpayer to secure that his liability as a taxpayer is assessed at the correct amount, and cannot be said to be wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of trade, the costs incurred in prosecuting the appeal were, therefore, not deductible for the purposes of income tax or for the purposes of excess profits tax.

Decision of ATKINSON, J. ([1946] 2 All E.R. 284), reversed.

[EDITORIAL NOTE.] This case must be read with Rushden Heel Co., Ltd. v. Keene; Same v. Inland Revenue Commissioners; which immediately precede it. The ratio decidendi in all the three cases is the simple one that for a deduction to be allowable in computing income tax it must be in respect of a disbursement wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the trade: Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. D, Rules Applicable to Cases I and II, r. 3 (a); and the expense of litigation designed to secure a reduction in taxation, while, no doubt, partly, cannot be said to be wholly and exclusively incurred for those purposes. At first sight it may seem inconsistent that the expense of inducing an unsatisfactory director to retire is a business expense deductible from the company's profits when computing income tax—the case referred to by LORD GREENE, M.R., is Mitchell v. B. W. Noble, Ltd. ([1927] 1 K.B. 719)—whereas the expense of persuading a valuable employee to remain with the company is not, but on consideration it appears clear that the former expense can be said to have been incurred wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the trade and not to have fallen partly on the trader in his capacity as a taxpayer.

APPEALS by the Crown from a decision of ATKINSON, J., dated June 6, 1946, and reported [1946] 2 All E.R. 284.

The Special Commissioners had disallowed a deduction, for the purposes of income and excess profits tax, of legal and accountancy costs incurred by a subsidiary company in successful appeals by it and its parent company to the Board of Referees against the proportion of the remuneration of an employee which was allowable in computing the profits of the subsidiary company for assessment to excess profits tax.

On appeals by the taxpayers by way of Case Stated ATKINSON, J., allowed the appeals. The Crown appealed. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R.

Cur. adv. vult.

F Apr. 2. LORD GREENE, M.R., read the following judgment: In these two appeals similar questions are raised to those with which I have already dealt in the two appeals of Rushden Heel Co., Ltd. v. Keene and Rushden Heel Co., Ltd. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (1) (p. 699 ante), the decision in which admittedly covers them. There is, however, an additional argument based on special facts which were not present in the Rushden Heel cases (1), and those facts I must now state sufficiently to make this judgment intelligible.

G Smith's Potato Estates, Ltd. (the "estate company") is a subsidiary of Smith's Potato Crisps (1929), Ltd. (the "parent company") and the latter company was assessable to excess profits tax in respect of the profits of the estates company. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, acting under s. 32 of the Finance Act, 1940, disallowed, in the computation of profits of the estates company for the period ending Mar. 31, 1941, the excess over £3,500 of the remuneration paid to Mr. Young, the general manager of the estates company. Both companies appealed to the Board of Referees and were successful in getting H the sum of £3,500 increased to £5,800. The estates company incurred legal and accountancy costs in the preparation and prosecution of that appeal and claimed to deduct them in computing its profits for income tax purposes. This claim of the estates company is the subject of the first of these two appeals. The second of the two appeals is concerned with a claim by the parent company (which is assessable to excess profits tax as above mentioned in respect of the profits of the estates company) to deduct the same costs in computing the profits of the estates company for purposes of excess profits tax. The Special Commissioners rejected both claims, but their decision was reversed in each case by ATKINSON, J., in accordance with his judgment in the Rushden Heel cases (1). The Special Commissioners also decided the additional point in favour of the Crown, but ATKINSON, J., although it was not necessary for his decision, thought that they were wrong in so doing.

The additional point arises in this way. In 1936 the parent company, a very large consumer of potatoes, being desirous of providing a secure source of supply, formed the estates company as a wholly-owned subsidiary to acquire, as it did acquire, a well-equipped farm of 6,944 acres. As the boards of the two companies had no knowledge of farming, Mr. Young, who had managed the farm for the vendors for many years, was engaged as manager at a fixed salary and a commission under a written agreement. Owing to a variety of circumstances this agreement did not produce for Mr. Young the level of remuneration which had been expected, and as the result of his dissatisfaction and other considerations the boards, who attached great importance to keeping the services of Mr. Young, paid him a substantial bonus for the year ending Mar. 31, 1940. Mr. Young, however, still had grounds for dissatisfaction, and in Sept., 1940, he gave notice to terminate his engagement, intimating that he would not renew it unless the terms were substantially altered. As a result of negotiations a new agreement was entered into under which Mr. Young's remuneration for the year ending Mar. 31, 1941, worked out at £6,486 14s. 0d. His remuneration in the preceding years had been very much smaller. It was the excess of this sum over £3,500 that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue disallowed as above mentioned. By virtue of s. 34 (1) of the Finance Act, 1941, if a similar disallowance had taken place in respect of any accounting period after the end of Mar., 1941, the parent company, by reason of the additional tax which would thereby have fallen upon it, on giving notice to Mr. Young, would have been entitled to recover from him the amount of such additional tax. Although this section did not apply to the period in respect of which the costs in dispute were incurred, it was feared that the disallowance of the excess salary which had taken place would be followed by similar disallowances in the following years and that in that case the parent company would or might, as a public company, be obliged to enforce its rights against Mr. Young. Mr. Young protested vigorously against the suggestion that in future years action might be taken in this way and insisted on being paid in full. The two companies regarded Mr. Young as essential to the well-being of the enterprise and were afraid that, if they did have occasion to enforce their rights against him, they would suffer through his discontent. They, accordingly, prosecuted their appeal to the Board of Referees with the success already described, and, as a result, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue did not seek to disallow any part of Mr. Young's remuneration in subsequent years.

The commercial advantages thus obtained were relied on as affording a special ground for saying that the costs in question were money wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the trade. The Special Commissioners held that there was a special business motive for prosecuting the appeal to the Board of Referees, viz., the protection of the benefit of Mr. Young's services, a matter going to the earning, as distinct from the taxation, of future profits, but that the immediate purpose of the appeal was that of all taxation appeals, viz., to get a reduction of tax. This, they regarded as a substantive purpose in itself and, accordingly, they thought that the costs of the appeal were not wholly and exclusively laid out for the purpose of the trade. ATKINSON, J., thought that, as the expense of getting rid of a troublesome director is an allowable expenditure, expense incurred to retain an employee who is vital to the business must also be allowable.

In my opinion, the Special Commissioners took the right view. It is in substance the same as the view which I have already expressed in the Rushden Heel cases (1), viz., that costs incurred in ascertaining the correct amount of tax are incurred by a taxpayer partly, if not mainly, in his capacity as a taxpayer, and to secure that his liability as a taxpayer is assessed at the correct amount, and cannot be said to be wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of his trade. The analogy taken by ATKINSON, J., is, I think, with all respect, a misleading one. Expense incurred in getting rid of a troublesome director is what I have described in my judgment in the Rushden Heel cases (1) as a commercial expense. No element of liability as a taxpayer enters into it, and there is no question of a dual purpose, such as there is when one purpose in incurring the expense is to secure a reduction of liability to tax. Both appeals must be allowed with costs here and below.

MORTON, L.J. : I agree, and I cannot usefully add anything.

LORD GREENE, M.R. : I have SOMERVELL, L.J.'s authority to say he has read the judgment which I have just delivered, and he agrees with it.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Morton and Asquith, L.JJ.), April 1, 1947.]

Lease—Fishing rights—Grant for a term of years—Retention by owner of "one rod for her own use"—Effect of retention.

C By a lease for 21 years, beginning on Dec. 25, 1933, the owner granted to the lessee fishing rights on a stretch of the River T. at an annual rent of £250, and a schedule to the lease contained stringent covenants by the lessee as to how he was to exercise the right of fishing. By cl. 3 of the lease the owner retained "for her own use a rod in the said fishing." The owner had died and the question was whether cl. 3 operated as a re-grant of a profit a prendre for the beneficial use of the owner for the duration of the lease and capable of alienation by her during her lifetime or by her successors in title after her death, or whether the clause gave merely a contractual right limited to the owner's lifetime :—

D HELD : on the true construction of the lease, cl. 3 gave a contractual right to the owner which came to an end on her death, and was not a re-grant of a profit a prendre.

F APPEAL by the plaintiffs, the executors of the lessee, from an order of ROXBURGH, J., dated Jan. 13, 1947, and reported ante, p. 195. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R.

A. C. Nesbitt for the executors of the lessee.

Andrew Clark, K.C., and G. C. D. S. Dunbar for the executors of the lessor.

G LORD GREENE, M.R. : The controversy in this case turns on a short paragraph in a lease for 21 years, beginning Dec. 25, 1933, of fishing rights on a stretch of the River Test and of a dwelling-house and some land. Besides the crucial clause to which I have referred, there are certain covenants by the tenant set out in the first schedule to the lease which have some materiality. They are expressed to be covenants, and nothing but covenants. There is a covenant to pay rent and rates and taxes, and covenants to protect and preserve the fish, etc., to exercise the rights and privileges of fishing so as to do as little injury as possible to the banks and the tenants and others holding land on the adjoining banks and to make compensation for injury, to exercise the fishing rights in a sportsmanlike manner by fair rod and line angling, not to net, except for the destruction of coarse fish, not to permit worming or minnowing except in high flood, except for the taking of coarse fish, to employ a keeper to remove nets and prevent poaching and so forth, not to assign, under-let or transfer without the written consent of the owner, and there is the usual covenant to deliver up at the end of the term. The clause that gives rise to the difficulty is cl. 3. It is not expressed to be an exception or a reservation, nor are the words such as one would expect to find if what was intended was a re-grant. I use those three words, "exception," "reservation" and "re-grant," in a technical sense. The clause has all the appearance of something put in quite independently of anything else in the lease, and its language is more appropriate to a contractual term than to the grant or the creation of some estate. The clause is as follows :

It is hereby understood and agreed that the owner shall retain for her own use a rod in the said fishing but not on either bank between the Mill and Greatbridge.

The arguments, when tracked to their foundations, all turn on the words "for her own use." Mr. Andrew Clark, for the executors of the lessor, who is dead, says that this clause cannot be an exception or a reservation, because you cannot have an exception or a reservation of a profit a prendre—i.e., nothing can be excepted or reserved out of a grant, but that, in such circumstances, you can only have a profit a prendre created by re-grant. This, he says, is the re-grant of a profit a prendre, and he interprets the words "for her own use" as merely stating or emphasising the fact that she, the lessor, is to have the right of a rod for her own use in the sense that she is to be the absolute and beneficial owner, during, of course, a limited period. That period (Mr. Clark says) is the duration of the lease, because, it being a re-grant, that was the limit to what the lessee could give, and he must be taken to have re-granted everything that was possible having regard to the length of his own estate. Mr. Clark says that the words "for her own use" cannot be construed as imposing some limitation on alienation or enjoyment, because, if they were so construed, it would be repugnant to the whole conception and nature of a profit a prendre. It follows, according to his argument, that this is a re-grant of a profit a prendre for the beneficial use of the lessor herself, and, as such, is capable, not merely of personal enjoyment, but of alienation by her or by her successors in title after her death.

Mr. Clark does not, as I understand his argument, contest the proposition that by apt words, or words that on their true construction have that meaning, it is competent to give to a person the personal right to fish and to take away the fish caught, a right that would, of course, be limited to some definite period. If it purported to be an out-and-out grant, different considerations might apply, but when you are dealing with a limited period, be it a day or a year or twenty years or a lifetime, I understand him to admit that there is nothing in law to prevent you giving to a person the personal right, exercisable by nobody else, to fish and take away the fish. He would say that very clear words are required to produce that result, and I think he would also say that, if the construction of the words led to such a result, the right could not be a profit a prendre, but would be a personal licence and nothing else, notwithstanding the fact that the right included the right to take away the fish. I hope I have not misunderstood Mr. Clark or attributed to him some concession greater than he intended to make, but, speaking for myself, I should require very strong authority to convince me that, if parties were minded to create such a right, the law in some way prevented them from doing so. In the present case the language that is used is not sufficiently clear, he says, to produce such a result. Mr. Nesbitt, on the other hand, for the executors of the lessee (who is also dead), maintains that this is a purely contractual matter and that there is no question of exception or reservation. Nor, he says, are the words what you would expect to find in the case of a re-grant, although he admits that in a suitable context the word "retain" might operate to effect a re-grant. Here, however, he says, looking at this clause in the position where it is to be found in the lease, you would not naturally read it as showing an intention to re-grant, and he particularly relies on the words "for her own use."

On Mr. Clark's construction it appears to me that those words are really surplusage. Precisely the same effect would be achieved, according to his argument, if they had been left out, because the word "owner" must be construed as including heirs and assigns and there is nothing to suggest anything but a beneficial right. Therefore, the words "for her own use" would be mere surplusage. Why are they put in? I think some light can be found on that when one realises the nature of this particular subject-matter. First, the right is expressed as "a rod." In other words, it is, in one sense, metaphorical—in another sense, not metaphorical. What the word appears to contemplate is the right to use some physical object, namely, a rod—the rod which implies, it is said, the right to fish by rod and line angling. That word, I think, must not be ignored. What has the lessor got? Something, namely a rod, which she is to use for her own use. The right of fishing is one which you would expect to find in some way limited or qualified by prescribing the particular conduct that a sportsmanlike person would be expected to observe in a river such as the Test. Indeed, the lessee himself was put under very stringent covenants which are the perfectly proper and natural covenants to which I have referred. It is said by Mr. Clark that, if his construction is accepted, precisely the same covenants would by implication extend to the lessor as the proprietor of the rod, but I am not at all sure that that is so. They are not expressed as conditions ; A they are expressed to be purely in covenant and nothing else, and if the lessor had been going to be subject to the same obligations in respect of fishing on the river, one would have expected them to have been set out expressly. But, however that may be, I cannot avoid inferring, from the whole tenor of this document and the covenants, that fishing on this particular river is a thing in which you want to know your fisherman, and I can well understand that it B would be quite natural that the person granting a rod or giving a right to maintain a rod on the Test would expect to exercise some choice in the person to whom he granted it. I think that the fact that it is necessary to impose these restrictions rather confirms that view. If Mr. Clark's contention were correct, the lessor the next day could have assigned this right to anyone she chose, and her executors today could assign it to anyone that they chose, for value or not C for value. That is a right which I should not have expected to find in a document of this kind, unless the language compelled me, and, when I find that the right in question is put in in a three-lined clause by itself, expressed in language which is much more apt to express a contractual obligation than the creation of a right such as a profit a prendre, I am confirmed in the view that the proper construction is that it is a contractual obligation.

ROXBURGH, J., thought the case difficult, but he took the view that what the D draftsman was contemplating was a bundle of rods, and he visualised the owner as granting the rods but retaining one rod for her own use. He thought that the phrase "for her own use" did not involve any conception except that the rod was to belong beneficially to the owner. Mr. Nesbitt's construction is not necessarily limited to the personal use of the rod by the lessor. He concedes that it is possible that she personally might have lawfully allowed someone else to use it during her life, but, if she had any such licensing power (he says), it E would be personal to her. I do not find it necessary to express any concluded opinion on that, but my own strong impression is that that alternative is not the correct view, and I should have thought that this was a case where the right to use the rod as I have suggested, the rod being regarded as, in a sense, a physical object, was intended to be one for her own exclusive personal use, which must die with her and in her lifetime was not alienable. The case, I F agree, is not an easy one, but that is the conclusion to which I have come, and in the result the appeal succeeds.

MORTON, L.J. : I agree. It is a small point, but perhaps worth mentioning, that at the opening of this lease we find that it is :

... made between Bertha Vickers [then the address is given] (hereinafter called "the owner") of the one part and Percy Coventry Tarbutt ... (hereinafter called "the tenant") of the other part.

G There is not in that opening clause what one finds so often—an extension of the words "the owner" to include the successors in title of the person named. I do not doubt that in parts of this lease, by reason of the context, the expression "the owner" would extend to the successors in title of Miss Vickers, but, in my view, it refers only to Miss Vickers in cl. 3. The next point to be noted is that the fishing rights which are conferred by the lease are obviously of considerable H value, so much so that the rent is £150 for the house, out-house and cottages and for the fishing £250. Then, as my Lord has pointed out, there are very elaborate terms laid down as to how the tenant is to exercise his right of fishing. It is suggested that this brief cl. 3 was intended to confer on Miss Vickers and her successors in title not only the right to fish and to take away the fish, but to assign that right for value to any person or, if they so wish, to license a different person to come and fish each day for a monetary payment. That would obviously be a very valuable right to be reserved or re-granted to the owner, and it would at the same time be a right which would be quite onerous to the fishing tenant. For my part, I cannot imagine that, if it were intended to confer such a right as that upon Miss Vickers and her successors in title, it would have been done by the use of the words which appear in cl. 3. I think that a very different form of words would have been employed, and a very full and careful form of words. I think that by the words: "It is hereby understood and agreed that the owner shall retain for her own use a rod in the said fishing," it was intended to do nothing more than to enable Miss Bertha Vickers to come and fish herself. It may possibly be that Miss Vickers would have had the right personally to allow, for example, her nephew to come and fish. As to that I feel some doubt, but it is not necessary to express a view on it. However that may be, in my judgment, this is not a right which was ever intended to endure beyond the life of Miss Vickers, and I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I also agree.

M.W. INVESTMENTS, LTD. v. KILBURN ENVOY, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), March 21, 24, 1947.]

Landlord and Tenant—Lease for term of years or duration of hostilities, whichever the longer—Lessee's option for further term—Validation of War-Time Leases Act, 1944 (c. 34), ss. 1, 3 (3), 7 (3).

A lease "for the term of three years from Jan. 5, 1942, or for a period covering the duration of hostilities between Great Britain and Germany and Italy and 12 months after the date of the termination of hostilities whichever period shall be the longer . . ." contained in cl. 5 (4) an option, providing: "If the term of this lease shall not extend for a period of seven years from the said Jan. 5, 1942, and the lessee shall be desirous of continuing the term for a full period of seven years from such date and of such desire shall give not less than three calendar months' notice in writing prior to the expiration of the term granted by this lease then the lessor will grant a further term up to Jan. 5, 1949 . . . [at] a yearly rent equivalent to the highest aggregate certain and contingent rents paid . . . in any year during the term of this lease . . ."

HELD: (i) the Validation of War-time Leases Act, 1944, by s. 1, operated to make the lease one for 10 years determinable by one month's notice given by either side after the end of the war, and cl. 5 (4) was reconcilable with the statutory term, and, if the lease were to be brought to an end by notice within seven years, the option in the sub-clause would be valid and exercisable by the lessee.

(ii) the provision as to rent in cl. 5 (4) was also reconcilable with the habendum introduced by the Act, the rent provided for being the highest rent for a full year (i.e., a year ending on Jan. 4) since the beginning of the tenancy.

(iii) cl. 5 (4) was a provision which related to the duration of the tenancy and was not therefore excepted from the operation of s. 1 by s. 3 (3) of the Act.

(iv) the option could be validly exercised before it was ascertained that the lease would not extend for seven years.

LORD GREENE, M.R. : By a document purporting to be a lease dated Feb. 10, 1942, the lessors demised to the lessees a cinema at Kilburn

. . . for the term of three years from Jan. 5, 1942, or for a period covering the duration of hostilities between Great Britain and Germany and Italy and twelve months after the date of the termination of hostilities whichever period shall be the longer

A subject to the extension of such period as provided by cl. 5 (4).

The only other clause to which I need refer is cl. 5 (4), which provides :

If the term of this lease shall not extend for a period of seven years from the said Jan. 5, 1942, and the lessee shall be desirous of continuing the term for a full period of seven years from such date and of such desire shall give not less than three calendar months' notice in writing prior to the expiration of the term granted by this lease

B then the lessor will grant a further term up to Jan. 5, 1949 . . .

The question for decision depends on the operation of the Validation of War-Time Leases Act, 1944, in relation to that document. It was admittedly invalid as a lease for the reason that the term was not fixed, its continuance depending on something which, at the beginning of the lease, was uncertain, namely, the duration of hostilities between Great Britain and Germany and Italy. If it had not been for that defect in the document, the operation of the option clause,

C cl. 5 (4), would have been simple. If the period of the war plus twelve months did not extend for seven years from Jan. 5, 1942, the option was to be exercisable, and the result would have been that the tenant would have obtained his full seven years, but the effect of the invalidity of the lease would have been, subject to a point I will mention in a moment, to invalidate the option clause. It was suggested that the lease was, at any rate, a valid lease for three years and that the

D option clause could have been fitted in to it. I do not find it necessary to express any opinion as to that argument. VAISEY, J., inclined to think that the lease would have been a valid lease for three years. Counsel for the lessors argued that it would not, because he said on the true construction of the habendum it was for the duration of the war or three years. The point which we have to consider, however, is the application of the Act.

There is a general observation that I think may be made with regard to this

E Act. It is common knowledge that it was passed to meet a very awkward situation caused by the circumstance that it was not realised, save perhaps in more instructed quarters, that a lease for the duration of the war would be invalid in law. There were, I suppose, hundreds of such leases made during the war, and it was to remedy that position that this relieving statute was passed. One thing which appears clear on the face of the statute is that the

F legislature was minded to give to the parties who in all good faith had entered into invalid agreements something which would be as nearly as possible a practical, valid equivalent of what they had intended to contract for. For the invalid term, namely, a term for the duration of the war, was to be substituted a term of ten years determinable by notice given by either side after the end of the war if the war should end before the expiration of that ten-year term. That was

G putting the parties as nearly as possible into the position in which they would have been if the provisions of the lease had been valid from the first. The notice which either party is empowered to give takes, for practical purposes, the place of the end of the war, just as under the contractual terms, ignoring the twelve months in this particular case, which is irrelevant for the present point, the term would have come to an end at the expiration of the war. It is important to have that point in mind, because it has a bearing on the construction of the whole Act.

H Section 1 (1) of the Act provides :

Subject to the provisions of this section, any agreement, whether entered into before or after the passing of this Act, which purports to grant or provide for the grant of a tenancy for the duration of the war shall have effect as if it granted or provided for the grant of a tenancy for a term of ten years, subject to a right exercisable either by the landlord or the tenant to determine the tenancy, if the war ends before the expiration of that term, by at least one month's notice in writing given after the end of the war. . . .

That section is expressed in simple language, and I ask myself : Have we here an agreement? The answer is: We have an agreement dated Feb. 10, 1942. I then ask myself: Does that agreement purport to grant a tenancy for the duration of the war, a phrase which is interpreted in the Act and covers the present case? The answer to that is: Yes. Then I say: What, then, is to be the result of the Act? The result is that the agreement is to have effect as if it granted or provided for the grant of a tenancy for a term of ten years determinable in the manner stated. The statute tells me to treat this document as though the term it created had been a term of the nature described in s. 1. When I turn to s. 7 (3), I find that the Act, subject to the provisions of s. 3, is to be deemed to have had effect, in relation to any agreement, as from the date on which the agreement was entered into. We, therefore, have a document, the one and only blot in which, a blot which invalidated the document (subject to the three years' agreement, of course, which I have mentioned), has been removed by statute and, in place of that blot, that invalid clause in the habendum, there is substituted the statutory provision. We, therefore, now have a lease for ten years determinable by notice.

If there had been nothing else in the statute, I should have not felt any difficulty. I should have construed the document on the footing that it has now been amended ab initio in the manner provided by the statute. It is to be observed that the statute does not limit its operation to a mere alteration of the habendum. It provides that the agreement—that is, the whole agreement—is to have effect as if the habendum had been of the kind mentioned in s. 1. Bearing that in mind, what am I to do when I come to the option in cl. 5 (4)? I should have thought that, if, in the habendum to this document, there had been inserted for the contractual term the statutory term, the construction of cl. 5 (4) would not have been difficult. It would have been necessary to reconcile the language of that sub-clause with the language of the habendum as altered by statute. The result, it seems to me, would have been clear, viz., that, if the lease were to be brought to an end by notice within the seven years, the option would be a valid one exercisable by the tenant. In my view, that construction would have been the only one which could have been put on this document as soon as the new habendum provided for by the statute was substituted for the contractual habendum. Otherwise you would be left in this position, that the two parts, namely, the statutory habendum and cl. 5 (4) would have been irreconcilable. That was what the judge found had happened, because he said that he could not reconcile the two provisions, but, with all respect to him, I do not find any difficulty about it. I am prepared to accept what I think the judge stated quite accurately ([1946] 2 All E.R. 570) where he said:

On the other hand, such of the original provisions as contradict or conflict with or are incompatible with the positive provisions of the Act must be rejected, or at any rate modified, when and so far as they are susceptible of modification.

If I may say so with respect, I entirely agree with that statement, and counsel for the lessors accepted it. Therefore, in so far as the alteration of the habendum requires a modification or alteration of words in cl. 5 (4) to give full effect to what s. 1 tells us to do, those words must be modified accordingly. Section 1, as I have said, appears to give a clear direction as to what is to be done to this invalid clause in the lease, and I cannot myself see how the directions given by s. 1 can be satisfied unless any other clause in the lease which is referential to or dependent on the invalid term is construed, and, if necessary, modified, accordingly.

Counsel for the lessors would not accept that argument. His argument really amounts to this. He says that the term of the lease, when altered by the statute, is a ten-year term, and it is impossible to reconcile the language of cl. 5 (4) with the conception of a ten-year term, because, as he points out, the option only arises if "the term of this lease" shall not extend for a period of seven years from Jan. 5, 1942. He says the term of this lease is a ten-year term and to talk about a ten-year term not extending for seven years is nonsense, and, therefore, one cannot dovetail the option clause into the lease as modified by the statute. That seems to me to be flying in the face of s. 1 which provides that an alteration must be made in the habendum, and, if a consequential alteration is necessary and permissible, it must be made, but I should have thought that, if this lease, as a contractual document, had originally contained the habendum as fixed by the statute, then the only way of construing the option clause would have been by reconciling the language of the two in the way I have suggested. Otherwise, you would be left in the position, which the court will never accept unless it is absolutely forced to, of saying: "Here are two irreconcilable provisions and one of them must be rejected and treated as a nullity." If the parties had by contract put in what is now the statutory term, I would have found no difficulty, as a matter of construction, in giving the effect to the option clause which is contended for by the lessees. The gist of the argument of counsel for the lessors, in effect, although he disclaimed it, is that we should construe the option clause as though the statutory alteration in the habendum had never been brought about, and that is a conclusion which I cannot possibly accept.

That brings me to the consideration of another provision in the Act on which a good deal of argument turned; that is, s. 3 (3) which provides:

Nothing in the said section 1 shall affect any provision of an agreement to which that section applies, being a provision which does not relate to the duration of the tenancy, and any such provision shall continue to apply in relation to the tenancy as it takes effect under that section.

There has been argument whether this option clause is a provision which does or does not relate to the duration of the tenancy within the meaning of that sub-section. VAISEY, J., held that it did relate to the duration of the tenancy.

That was one of the grounds that he gave for his decision in favour of the lessors. He does not state why it leads to that result, but I think his reasoning must have been something like this. It was suggested by counsel for the lessees that sub-s. (3) is really a saving sub-section, and his first argument was that the option clause was a provision which did not relate to the duration of the tenancy and, therefore, that it was saved. I do not myself take that view. I think the judge was right and counsel for the lessors was right in maintaining that the option clause was a provision which did relate to the duration of the tenancy. The phrase "relate to" in that context is obviously a very wide phrase and, much as I dislike paraphrases, I think it means a provision which is not conditioned or affected by the duration of the tenancy. That makes sense, because sub-s. (3) excludes the operation of s. 1 in the case of provisions which do not relate to the duration of the tenancy, but, obviously, to make sense of the Act and make it workable, a provision which does relate to the duration of the tenancy must, if the Act is to have its full effect, be affected by s. 1. This option clause is a provision which relates to the duration of the tenancy, in my view, because the exercise of the option is contingent on that duration, and, accordingly, the Act does, as one would expect when it alters the habendum, necessarily alter such provisions in other parts of the Act as are dependent in any way on the length of the term contemplated by the contractual habendum.

Accordingly, I construe sub-s. (3) in this way, that s. 1 is not to operate on provisions in the lease which are not conditioned by or affected by the habendum. Those are to remain as they were, valid or invalid, but once you find a provision which is conditioned by the habendum, then the section contemplates that s. 1 in such a case is to have its full operation. That brings me back to what I said before. If s. 1 had stood alone, taken in combination with the retrospective s. 7 (3), the effect would have been that one must construe the whole document in the light of the alteration in the habendum which is effected by the statute. I, therefore, do not find myself the least embarrassed by s. 3 (3), and, accepting the judge's view of it, which I think is right, for the reasons I have given, it seems to me to operate not against the lessees but in their favour because it leaves s. (1) to be complied with according to its clear direction.

The argument of counsel for the lessors was really based on a very technical construction of the option clause and a construction which, however right it would have been if the contractual habendum had been valid, is impossible to maintain having regard to the directions in the Act. He says: The term of the lease is now ten years and it is not true to describe the length for which the lease, in fact, lives as the "term" of the lease, and if notice had been given to bring that ten-year term to an end at the end of nine years it would not have been correct to say that the lease had had a nine-years term. However right that argument might be in other contexts, I find it unacceptable in this particular context, and I do not think I need add anything more to what I have said about the necessity of reconciling inconsistent provisions in the same document. If, indeed, the technical meaning of the word "term" is so strong that it cannot yield to a context, which is really what counsel is saying, then I accept the principle I quoted from VAISEY, J., and the word "term" must be altered and some other phrase substituted. If, however, you read the words: "If the term of this lease—that is to say, a ten-year term determinable by one month's notice—shall not extend for a period of seven years," the whole thing makes sense. If you read the word "term" in that context, which is the right context having regard to the statute, it would mean the actual period for which the lease has lasted. A

The other point on which the judge decided was the impossibility, as he thought it, of reconciling the provisions as to rent contained in the option clause with the new habendum substituted by the statute. The rent in the reddendum under the original document was, first, a minimum yearly rent; secondly, an additional rent based on net takings; and, thirdly, what is sometimes called an insurance rent—that is to say, a yearly sum equivalent to the amount which the lessor should from time to time pay by way of premium. That insurance rent was to be paid once a year immediately following the payment by the lessor of such premiums. The rent year under the lease which began on Jan. 5, 1942, was the year ending Jan. 4 in each year. When you come to the option clause, you find that the rent to be paid under the new tenancy which is to be granted under the option clause is to be B

... a yearly rent equivalent to the highest aggregate certain and contingent rents paid under cl. 1 hereof in any year during the term of this lease and insurance rent.

The judge found it difficult to see exactly how that could be fitted in, but, once the option clause is construed in the way in which I consider it ought to be construed, I find no difficulty. The year is the lease year ending Jan. 4. Obviously, having regard to the power to give a month's notice, the tenancy may be put an end to in the middle of the year, and in such a case it seems to me that the rent must be the highest rent for a full year since the beginning of the tenancy, namely, Jan., 1942, disregarding the broken part of the year. That might have happened if the original contractual habendum had been good, because the war cannot have been contemplated as likely necessarily to end on Jan. 4 in any year. In the result, you would have had to disregard the broken year. The same thing is perfectly easy to do under the new statutory provisions. I feel no difficulty about that, and, indeed, counsel for the lessors admitted that that argument would not stand if he was wrong on his main argument that the option clause would not fit the new conditions at all. D

There is only one minor point that I should mention. Counsel for the lessors suggested that the option could not be exercised until it had been ascertained that the lease would not extend for seven years. That argument, in my opinion, is unsound. If you have an option conditional on the happening of a future event, there is nothing to prevent you exercising that option at once, although it will have no effect unless the event happens. You need not wait until the event happens, unless the language of the option clearly says so, and in the present case it does not do so. F

I must complete the facts to show what happened. The Act was passed on Aug. 3, 1944. On May 9, 1945, came the end of the war as declared by S.R. & O., No. 703, of 1945. On Dec. 4, 1945, the tenants gave notice in writing exercising the option. On May 2, 1946, the lessors took out the originating summons which has led to this appeal. VAISEY, J., declared that the option never was and never could be exercisable. His judgment was given on Oct. 25, 1946, and, relying on that, the landlords gave the month's notice required by the statute on Oct. 31, 1946. The effect of all that seems to me to be that the determination of the lease, or the expiration of the term, within the meaning of the option clause as properly construed, was the date on which the landlords' notice took effect. That notice, as I have said, took the place under the statute of the end of the war which the parties had provided for contractually. The result, therefore, was, on the facts as they happened, that the tenants had given not less than three calendar months' notice in writing before the expiration of the term, which took place on the expiration of the landlords' notice of Dec. 4, 1946. I say expressly "expiration of the term," which is the phrase in the option clause, G but I have already explained that that phrase and references to the term must, in my opinion, to comply with the directions of s. 1 of the Act, be construed as meaning the actual ending of the term in the events which happened, and the term came to an end in the events which happened when the landlords' notice expired. The result, therefore, is that the appeal must be allowed with costs here and below and an appropriate declaration made.

- COHEN, L.J. : Counsel for the lessors argued that the option in question
- A here was a provision relating to the duration of the tenancy, and that, therefore, s. 3 (3) of the Act did not apply. With this I agree and I do not desire to add anything to the reasons given by my Lord relating to counsel's argument based on this construction of the Act and the option clause. Counsel argued, alternatively, that, if the option clause was not a provision relating to the duration of the tenancy, s. 3 (3), therefore, applied, and that he was entitled on this construction to succeed, because the option clause was, as he said, invalid
- B ab initio and s. 3 (3) did not cure the invalidity. I do not think it necessary to decide this point, but I am by no means satisfied, as at present advised, that it is well founded. It seems to me there is much to be said for the alternative view, which I would summarise as follows : (i) If the option does not relate to the duration of the tenancy it is because a provision only relates to the duration of the tenancy within s. 3 (3) if it fixes or directly affects the duration of the
- C tenancy ; (ii) none the less, having regard to s. 7 (3) and s. 1 (1), all the provisions of the agreement must be construed as from the date of its execution as if for a reference to the term purported to be created thereby there was substituted a reference to the term of ten years determinable as in s. 1 (1), mentioned ; (iii) if so construed, the option clause is not invalid, notwithstanding that in its original form it might have been invalid—indeed, probably was invalid—owing to the uncertainty as to the duration of the war ; (iv) the option would be a
- D valid one exercisable by the tenant if the lease were to be brought to an end by notice within the seven years. For these reasons, I agree with the Order proposed by my Lord.

- ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree with the conclusions of my Lord. I think those conclusions follow from the unassisted operation of s. 1 and s. 7 (3) of the Act, without recourse to s. 3 (3). Indeed, if it were necessary to decide the point,
- E I should incline to the view that s. 3 (3) does not apply, since the option clause seems to me to be a provision which does relate to the duration of the tenancy and is, therefore, outside the sub-section. The entire argument for the lessors, as it seems to me, hinges upon the assumption that the Act draws a vital distinction between the statutory term of ten years, and the duration of the tenancy, which may well be less if the one month's notice is given to determine the ten years term. According to the argument, in applying the Act to the contractual
- F option in cl. 5, one must substitute for the words "term of the lease," "term of ten years," not "term of ten years determinable at one month's notice." It seems to me for the reasons given by my Lord, which I will not repeat, that the plain intention of the Act is that the latter and not the former substitution should take place. If it is made, there is no difficulty in amalgamating the statutory and contractual provisions into a coherent and consistent whole.
- G I agree that the appeal succeeds.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Re PRIESTLEY'S CONTRACT.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), March 19, April 1, 1947.]

Sale of Land—Interest on unpaid purchase money—Purchaser in possession before date fixed for completion—Delay in completion—Default of vendor in deducing title—Special conditions incorporating Law Society's Conditions of Sale "so far as not varied or inconsistent"—Law Society's Conditions of Sale, cl. 6, 7.

By a contract dated Jan. 23, 1946, a purchaser agreed to buy a house from P. and M., who were stated to be selling as trustees for sale under a trust deed. It was provided by the special conditions of sale that the property was sold subject to the Law Society's Conditions of Sale (1934 ed.) so far as they were not varied by or inconsistent with the special conditions. By cl. 3 of the special conditions, the purchaser agreed to pay interest at 5 per cent. on the balance of the purchase money from the date fixed for completion, Feb. 20, 1946, until payment. It was further provided that cl. 6 (2) (d) of the Law Society's Conditions, which provides for payment of interest on the purchase money by a purchaser authorised to take possession before completion, should be deemed to be omitted from the contract. The purchaser was let into possession before completion, which was delayed owing to the discovery by the purchaser's solicitors that the real trustees for sale, in whom the property was vested, were P. and his wife, and that a proposed deed appointing M. trustee in place of P.'s wife had not been executed. This deed was not, in fact, executed until Apr. 5, 1946. In proceedings by the vendors, P. and M., under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 49, for a declaration that they were entitled to interest on the unpaid purchase money from Feb. 20, 1946, the date fixed for completion, until actual completion, the purchaser contended that, under cl. 7 (3) of the Law Society's Conditions, he was under no liability to pay interest inasmuch as the delay in completion was "attributable to the default by the vendors in deducing title in accordance with the contract":—

HELD: (i) the deed of appointment was of vital importance, and, until it was executed, M. had no interest in the property, and, as the vendors were under an obligation both to show title on the face of the abstract which they delivered and to prove their title by production of the proper evidence, and both these obligations ought properly to be performed by the vendors well before the day fixed for completion, the vendors were in default on and after Feb. 20, 1946, in deducing title in accordance with the contract.

(ii) the deletion of cl. 6 (2) (d) of the Law Society's Conditions freed the purchaser from payment of interest on unpaid purchase money from the date of taking possession, but did not override his liability under cl. 3 of the special conditions to pay interest from and after the date fixed for completion.

(iii) the words "no interest shall become payable by the purchaser" in cl. 7 (3) of the Law Society's Conditions mean no interest payable under cl. 7 (1), which is clearly directed to purchasers who do not take possession before completion, and, therefore, the purchaser, being in possession, was not entitled to rely on cl. 7 (3) of the Law Society's Conditions as freeing him from the liability which he accepted under cl. 3 of the special conditions.

Per curiam: The concurrence of a mortgagee who is immediately redeemable is simply a matter of conveyancing and is not comparable to the due execution of a deed, such as a deed of appointment, which constitutes the very title of one of the vendors and without which he has no interest in the property at all.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 49, by the vendors for a declaration that they were entitled to interest on the balance of purchase money under a contract for the sale of a dwelling-house. The facts appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

- Apr. 1. ROMER, J., read the following judgment: This is a summons which has been taken out under s. 49 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, by the vendors under a contract of sale, and by it they ask for a declaration that they are entitled to interest on the sum of £1,620, the balance of the purchase money of the property described in the contract, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the date fixed for completion, viz., Feb. 20, 1946, to the day of actual completion. The dispute between the parties arises out of the fact that the purchaser was let into possession of the property sold prior to the date fixed for completion, and his contention is that, on the true construction of the contract, he is under no liability to pay interest on the unpaid purchase money inasmuch as the delay in completion was attributable to the default of the vendors in deducing title.

- By the contract which was dated Jan. 23, 1946, the purchaser, Mr. Dennis Arthur Pook, agreed to purchase from the vendors, Mr. Lawrence Vernon Priestley, solicitor, and Mr. Thomas Leslie Mallard, incorporated accountant, a certain dwelling-house, land and premises known as "Shottery," 8, The Highway, Orpington, Kent, for the sum of £1,800. It was provided by cl. 1 of the special conditions of sale that the property was sold subject to the Law Society's Conditions of Sale (1934 ed.), so far as they were not varied by or inconsistent with the special conditions. Clause 3 provided that the date fixed for completion was 4 weeks from the date thereof, namely, Feb. 20, 1946, and that the balance of the purchase money (credit being given for the deposit of 10 per cent. payable on the sale) was to be paid on that day and if not so paid would carry interest at 5 per cent. until payment. The condition then stated that the deposit had been paid to Messrs. Arthur Ray and Company, of Orpington, as stakeholders and provided for delivery of requisitions, replies and draft conveyance, and that completion should take place at the offices of the Bingley Building Society or their solicitors. Clause 4 stated that the vendors were selling as trustees for sale holding on trust for sale. Clause 8 provided that vacant possession would be given on completion and that cl. 6 (2) (d) of the general conditions should be deemed to be omitted from the contract. Clauses 6 and 7 of the Law Society's Conditions of Sale (1934 ed.) are as follows:

6. Where, under the contract or otherwise, a purchaser is authorised to take possession of the property before the actual completion of a purchase, then (save as otherwise agreed) the following provisions shall apply:—(1) The taking of possession shall not be deemed to be—(a) an acceptance by the purchaser of the vendor's title, (b) a waiver of the right of the purchaser to make requisitions or objections in respect of the title. (2) A purchaser who takes possession shall, from the date of taking possession, and until the time of actual completion, or until the vendor resumes possession by reason of the rescission of the contract—(a) keep the property in as good a state of repair and condition as it was in at the time of taking possession, (b) pay all rents, rates, taxes, costs of insurance and of repairs, and other outgoings in respect of the property, (c) be entitled to receive the rents and profits as if the date fixed for completion had arrived, (d) pay interest on the purchase money or the balance thereof at the rate specified in the next following condition. (3) If the sale is rescinded the purchaser shall—(a) forthwith deliver up possession of the property to the vendor, in as good a state of repair and condition as aforesaid, (b) apply any insurance money received by him in respect of the property, in making good any loss or damage to the property, or otherwise account for the same to the vendor. (4) Provided that (subject to the requisite apportionment being made of all rents, rates, taxes, costs of insurance and of repairs, and other outgoings and without prejudice, in case of the purchaser's default, to the rights of the vendor under condition 32) the vendor shall repay to a purchaser whose contract is rescinded, his deposit money, if any (including any purchase money previously paid), but without interest thereon, and the purchaser shall return forthwith all abstracts and papers in his possession belonging to the vendor, and shall not make any claim on the vendor for costs, compensation or otherwise. 7. (1) If from any cause whatever (save as hereinafter mentioned) the completion of the purchase is delayed beyond the date fixed for completion, the purchase money, or where a deposit is paid, the balance thereof, shall bear interest at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum from the date fixed for completion to the day of actual payment thereof. (2) Provided that, if delay in completion arises from any other cause than the purchaser's own act or default, the purchaser may (except in a case to which condition 6 applies)—(a) at his own risk, deposit the purchase money, or where a deposit is paid, the balance thereof, at any bank in England or Wales, and (b) give notice, in writing, forthwith of such deposit, to the vendor or his solicitors, and in that case the vendor shall (unless and until further delay in completion shall arise from the purchaser's own act or default) be bound to accept the interest, if any, allowed thereon, as from the date of such deposit, in lieu of the interest accruing after the date of the deposit, which would otherwise be payable to him under this condition. (3) No interest shall become payable by a purchaser if and so long as delay in completion is attributable to—(a) default by the vendor in deducing title in accordance with the contract, or in giving an authority to inspect the register kept under the Land Registration Act, 1925, or in conveying; or (b) any other act or default of the vendor or his Settled Land Act trustees. (4) The vendor shall, as from the date when interest becomes payable under paragraph (1) of this condition, have the option (to be exercised in writing at any time before actual completion and before a deposit of the purchase money or the balance thereof under paragraph (2) shall have been made) of taking the rents and profits or an apportioned part thereof (as the case requires) less the outgoings or an apportioned part thereof, up to the date of actual completion, in lieu of the interest otherwise payable under the said paragraph (1); and, if the said option is exercised, the same payments, allowances and apportionments shall be made, as if the date fixed for completion had been the date of actual completion.

The completion of the contract was delayed beyond Feb. 20, 1946, and I propose to consider, first, whether the purchaser is right in his contention that such delay was, in the words of cl. 7 (3) of the general conditions, "attributable to default by the vendors in deducing title in accordance with the contract." If the purchaser is right on this point the further question will arise whether, having regard to the contract as a whole, he is exempted from payment of interest by cl. 7 (3) notwithstanding that he was allowed to enter into and remain in possession.

The history of the matter, so far as the question of title is concerned, appears from the correspondence exhibited to the affidavits which were filed on this application. On Jan. 9, 1946, Mr. Priestley sent to the purchaser's solicitors (Messrs. A. C. Warwick & Co.) the contract, which he had signed, and it seems that he also enclosed an abstract of title. Messrs. Warwick amended the contract in one respect and returned it to Mr. Priestley on Jan. 22 with the request that he would let them have the rest of the abstract in exchange for the purchaser's part of the contract as the purchaser desired to complete as early as possible. On Jan. 24, Mr. Priestley forwarded a supplemental abstract of title. The original and supplemental abstracts of title were not exhibited and I did not see them at the hearing, but it appears that they showed that at the date of the contract the property agreed to be sold was vested in Mr. Priestley and his wife, Mrs. Olive Priestley, to whom the property had been conveyed on trust for sale, and that they had mortgaged the property to the Bingley Building Society.

It also appears from a letter from Messrs. Warwick to Mr. Priestley on Feb. 14 that the abstract of title purported to abstract a deed of appointment, stamped, duly executed and attested and dated as of Jan., 1946, whereby Mr. Thomas Leslie Mallard was appointed a trustee for sale in the place of Mrs. Olive Priestley. A letter of Feb. 22 to Mr. Priestley from a firm of solicitors in Birmingham, however, says that the appointment had not the word "January" inserted. On Jan. 29 Messrs. Warwick sent in their requisitions on title and in answer to requisition number 16 were informed by Mr. Priestley, who was acting as solicitor to the vendors, that "the conveyance to the vendors, the mortgage by them and the deed of appointment" would be handed over to the purchaser on completion. On Feb. 1 Messrs. Warwick wrote to Mr. Priestley asking (inter alia) what was the date of the deed of appointment of new trustees and whether it had been executed by all three parties, and they asked to be supplied with a copy of executions and attestations. On Feb. 3 Messrs. Warwick enclosed a draft conveyance subject to outstanding requisitions. In answer to Messrs. Warwick's queries in their letter of Feb. 1 Mr. Priestley wrote on Feb. 5 saying:

The deed of appointment is not dated, but is intended to be dated the same date as the vacating receipt on the mortgage to the Bingley Building Society. The deed has been executed by Olive Priestley in the presence of a clerk with Messrs. A. V. Hammond & Company, solicitors, Bradford, and will be executed by me on completion. The deed is held by Messrs. Mogford, Son & Warwick, solicitors, Birmingham, at whose office it is intended completion shall take place as they are solicitors for the Bingley Building Society at Birmingham.

In response to this information Messrs. Warwick replied on Feb. 5 :

A In view of your further reply the conveyance must be by yourself and Olive Priestley. Mr. Mallard should not have been a party to the contract. Please return our draft conveyance so that it can be amended.

Mr. Priestley answered on Feb. 6 that the conveyance was to be made by himself and Mr. Mallard, who were the newly appointed trustees for that purpose. On the following day Messrs. Warwick wrote :

B The legal estate is still vested in yourself and Olive Priestley, by whom the conveyance must be made, as the proposed appointment is not complete. Mr. Mallard has no interest in the property whatsoever. There appears to be no object in making an appointment of new trustees of the property immediately before the conveyance of the property concerned.

C To this Mr. Priestley answered on Feb. 13 that Mrs. Priestley would not be a party to the conveyance and that the appointment would be completed before the sale to the purchaser. Messrs. Warwick persisted in their objection by letter dated Feb. 14 and on Feb. 19 Mr. Priestley again stated that the appointment would be completed immediately before completion and the Bingley Building Society mortgage discharged so that on the date of the completion the vendors would be in a position to convey the property contracted to be sold free from encumbrances. He asked Messrs. Warwick whether, if the appointment was forthwith completed and stamped, they would then raise any objection and if so what. On Feb. 20 (which was the date fixed for completion by the contract) Messrs. Warwick pointed out that no explanation had been given why it was necessary to appoint new trustees solely for the purpose of the conveyance to their client. They added :

In fact no appointment has been made and the existing trustees are the only persons competent to convey, and they will be shewn as discharging the mortgage.

E Nothing much further seems then to have happened for more than a month, and then, in answer to a letter from Mr. Priestley of Mar. 27, Messrs. Warwick wrote on Mar. 28 that on a certain basis, which is not for present purposes relevant, and

F . . . provided the deed of appointment of new trustees is completed and executed by all three parties and duly stamped, and we are supplied with a full abstract of this deed, together with the address of Mr. Mallard, we will then be in a position to prepare the conveyance in this matter.

G On Apr. 1 Mr. Priestley wrote to say that the deed of appointment of new trustees would be completed and stamped before completion of the sale and would, in fact, probably be done in about a week's time, and on Apr. 17 he wrote further informing Messrs. Warwick that the appointment of Mr. Mallard as trustee was completed and had been dated Apr. 5, 1946. On May 2 Messrs. Warwick wrote to Mr. Priestley that they had received abstract of deed of appointment, duly examined, from their agents, and, subject to outstanding requisitions, they enclosed conveyance for execution by the vendors. Then came the completion statement in which the vendors claimed interest from Feb. 20, and as a result of such claim, which has led to the present summons, it only remains to say that the sale has never been completed.

H It is on the above facts that the question arises whether the delay from and after Feb. 20, 1946, in completing the contract was "attributable to default by the vendors in deducing title in accordance with the contract." Counsel for the vendors argued that it was not. He said that the vendors' obligation was to show title at or before completion of the sale and, provided they did so, they could not be said to be in default. He said that the vendors had abstracted a deed of appointment of new trustees which had already been executed by Mr. Priestley's wife and which would be executed by Mr. Priestley also, and thus perfected, at completion of the sale. Execution by Mr. Mallard was not required to give the deed validity and, in any case, he would be bound to execute it in that he was a party to the contract for sale. Counsel compared the position with that of a sale by a mortgagor free from encumbrances who has to obtain the concurrence of the mortgagee and sufficiently discharges his obligation by obtaining such concurrence at completion. I think these contentions fail to pay due regard to the requirements of the position. As stated in WILLIAMS ON VENDOR AND PURCHASER (4th ed., vol. 1, p. 204), a vendor is under an obligation both to show title on the face of the abstract which he delivers and to prove his title by production of the proper evidence, and both these obligations ought properly to be performed by the vendor well before the day fixed for completion. In the present case the deed of appointment passing the legal estate from Mr. and Mrs. Priestley to Mr. Priestley and Mr. Mallard was obviously of vital importance in this matter, and until it was signed, sealed and delivered both by Mr. Priestley and by Mrs. Priestley it is clear that Mr. Mallard had no interest in the property whatsoever. The only relevant document which existed down to the date fixed for completion, and, indeed, down to some date in Apr., 1946, was an undated and unstamped parchment, purporting to have been executed by Mrs. Priestley and in the custody, apparently, of the mortgagees, but otherwise having no legal effect at all. Accordingly, at no material time did a document conferring title on the vendors exist and it follows that no such document was or could be abstracted prior to Feb. 20. It is no answer, in my judgment, to say that, if the purchaser had attended completion, all would have been well. It might or might not have been, so far as the stamping of the document and its execution by Mr. Priestley were concerned, but the purchaser would have had no previous abstract of the document or opportunity for inspection and consideration. The concurrence of a mortgagee who is immediately redeemable is simply a matter of conveyancing and is not comparable to the due execution of a deed, such as the deed of appointment, which constitutes the very title of one of the vendors and without which he had no interest in the property at all. I am, accordingly, of opinion that the vendors were in default on and after Feb. 20, 1946, in deducing title in accordance with the contract and that this question, therefore, must be answered in favour of the purchaser.

As preliminary to the second point which falls to be considered it will be convenient to refer to the circumstances in which the purchaser was let into possession of the property sold and cl. 6 (2) (d) of the general conditions of sale was agreed to be omitted from the contract. By para. 5 of his affidavit sworn in support of this application Mr. Priestley states as follows:

Concurrently with the said contract it was agreed that the purchaser should be entitled to possession of the said property before the actual date of completion on the conditions following, viz., (a) that the sum of £200 should be deposited in the bank in the joint names of myself and the purchaser's solicitors, Messrs. A. C. Warwick & Co. (b) Purchaser undertaking to complete within one month after taking possession and that time in this respect should be of the essence of the contract. (c) That certain furniture belonging to me should be allowed to remain until completion. (d) That no interest should be payable on the purchase money in respect of such possession before completion, i.e., for the period prior to date fixed for completion by the contract, but it was verbally agreed that the purchaser would pay interest for his occupancy of the premises if the sale was not completed on the appointed day.

Mr. Pook, by his affidavit, denies that it was ever agreed that he should pay interest if the sale was not completed before the date fixed for completion, and, accordingly, counsel for the vendors did not rely on the oral agreement to this effect deposed to by Mr. Priestley. The correspondence discloses that the purchaser was proposing to buy some small articles of property in the house which belonged to Mr. Priestley and that certain furniture should remain there for the time being. The purchaser, who had paid a deposit on the property as early as Dec. 14, 1945, was anxious to go into possession as soon as possible. Mr. Priestley wrote on Jan. 10, saying that, if it would suit Mr. Pook's convenience, he could probably arrange for him to take possession by the end of Jan., and, if they had not been able to complete by then, he (Mr. Pook) could deposit the balance of the purchase money in the joint names of Messrs. Warwick and Mr. Priestley pending completion. On Jan. 14 Messrs. Warwick replied that the financial arrangements which the purchaser had made to cover the purchase would not allow him to deposit the balance of the purchase money except in exchange for the deeds. In those circumstances they suggested that he be allowed to take possession as a tenant at will, he being responsible for the outgoings from the time he should take possession until completion. On Jan. 15 Mr. Priestley wrote :

If your client is having a mortgage on the house I would agree to his taking possession upon his paying into the joint names of yourself and myself the balance of cash that he will be finding and signing the proposed mortgage to enable you to complete, it being stated that he takes possession undertaking to complete the matter within one month thereafter and that time is of the essence of the contract in this respect.

A Apparently, Mr. Priestley and Mr. Pook had a meeting on Jan. 21 and on the following day Messrs. Warwick wrote to Mr. Priestley confirming (inter alia) that :

. . . it was agreed that on our client going into possession before completion no interest would be payable on the purchase money as provided by the conditions. Accordingly we have made provision for the deletion from the contract of cl. 6 (2) (d) which relates to this . . . As arranged we have placed on deposit the sum of £200 in the joint names of yourself and ourselves at Lloyds Bank, Ltd., Sydenham.

B Mr. Priestley replied on Jan. 23, approving Messrs. Warwick's amendment of the contract and saying that he was giving instructions for the key of the house to be handed to Mr. Pook at any time. It was on the arrangements as outlined above that the purchaser shortly afterwards entered into possession of the property. So far as Mr. Pook's liability to pay interest on the purchase money is concerned, such liability is dependent, in my judgment, on the terms of the written contract between the parties which may be read in the light of, but are not (except so far as concerns the further £200 deposit) for present purposes affected by, the arrangements made between them.

C On the question of general principles counsel for the vendors referred me to certain authorities in support of the proposition that prima facie a purchaser in possession is bound to pay interest on any unpaid balance of purchase money. D The cases to which he referred were Fludyer v. Cocker (1), A.-G. v. Christ Church, Oxford (Dean) (2) and Birch v. Joy (3). In the first of these cases SIR W. GRANT, M.R., said with regard to a purchaser who takes possession without a conveyance : (12 Ves. 27) :

E The purchaser might have said, he would not have anything to do with the estate, until he got a conveyance. But that is not the course he took. He enters into possession : an act that generally amounts to a waiver even of objections to title. He proceeds upon the supposition, that the contract will be executed ; and therefore agrees, that from that day he will treat it, as if it was executed. The act of taking possession is an implied agreement, to pay interest ; for so absurd an agreement, as that the purchaser is to receive the rents and profits, to which he has no legal title, and the vendor is not to have interest, as he has no legal title to the money, can never be implied.

F In A.-G. v. Christ Church, Oxford (Dean) (2), SIR LANCELOT SHADWELL, V.-C., directed a purchaser in possession to pay interest on the purchase money " according," as he said (13 Sim. 217), " to the common course of the court." In Birch v. Joy (3) LORD ST. LEONARDS, L.C., said (3 H.L. Cas. 590) :

G There is nothing on the face of this contract to give to the purchaser all the rents of the estate from a given day, and to absolve him from the payment of interest on the purchase money, and therefore, if the purchaser is to find a stipulation of that sort in his favour, he must find it somewhere else ; it is not in this contract. This contract, if it had been executed by a court of equity, would have been executed according to equity and good conscience, and according to the rules of the court, upon which there cannot be a doubt, nor has there been any difference at the Bar. From the time at which the purchaser was to take possession of the estate he would be deemed its owner, and he would be entitled as owner to the rents of the estate, and would have kept them without account. From the same period the seller would have been deemed owner of the purchase money, and that purchase money not being paid by the man who was receiving the rents, would have carried interest, and that interest would have belonged to the seller as part of his property. A court of equity, as a general rule, considers this to follow. The parties change characters ; the property remains at law just where it was, the purchaser has the money in his pocket, and the seller still has the estate vested in him ; but they exchange characters in a court of equity, the seller becomes the owner of the money, and the purchaser becomes the owner of the estate. That is the settled rule of a court of equity ; and in applying that rule to this contract, the court would not have had the slightest difficulty.

Counsel for the vendors contended that these principles apply to the present case subject only to this, that, having regard to the deletion, by express agreement, of cl. 6 (2) (d) of the general conditions, the purchaser was freed from payment of interest from the time he took possession until the date fixed for completion, but that this freedom ceased on that date. He contended, as a different way of putting the matter, that in any case the contract should, if ambiguous, be construed in the light of these general equitable principles. Counsel for the purchaser contended, on the other hand, that this is not an application for relief under the general jurisdiction, but is a claim to 5 per cent. interest under the contract itself, and that, in any event, the parties made a bargain for themselves and that, accordingly, there is no room for the application of any general principles. My view of the matter is that I must look to the contract itself for the elucidation of the problem, but that, if an ambiguity arises out of it, then the prima facie liability of a purchaser in possession to pay interest should be borne in mind. I approach, therefore, the construction of the contract. By cl. 3 of the special conditions the purchaser agreed to pay interest at 5 per cent. on the balance of the purchase money (credit being given for the deposit of 10 per cent. payable on sale) from the date fixed for completion until payment. Condition 6 of the general conditions (as amended by agreement between the parties) imposed on Mr. Pook, as a purchaser taking possession before completion, the obligation, as from the date of taking possession, to keep the property in repair and to pay rents and other outgoings until the time of actual completion. The condition also conferred on him, during the same period, the right to receive the rents and profits. The deletion of cl. 6 (2) (d) freed the purchaser from payment of interest on unpaid purchase money from the date of taking possession, but did not override his liability, imposed by special condition 3, to pay such interest at 5 per cent. from and after the date fixed for completion. Such, then, being the purchaser's rights and liabilities, the question next is how and to what extent they are modified by general condition 7. Condition 7 (1) is clearly directed to purchasers who do not take possession before completion, for the question of interest payable by purchasers who do take possession has already been dealt with by condition 6 (2). By condition 7 (2) purchasers who do not take possession, but not (by reason of the exception contained in the sub-clause) purchasers who do take possession, are entitled to deposit the purchase money in a bank if completion is delayed through no default of their own, and in such case the vendor has to be content with the interest earned by the money deposited. A purchaser in possession, however, has in like circumstances to continue to pay interest on the unpaid balance of purchase money at 5 per cent. per annum. Condition 7 (3) deals with the position where not only is the purchaser not responsible himself for the delay in completion, but such delay is attributable to certain specified defaults of the vendor, and in such cases the sub-clause exempts the purchaser from payment of interest. The question is whether this exemption operates in favour of Mr. Pook, who agreed by special condition 3 to pay interest after the date fixed for completion, and who was entitled both before and after that date to the receipt of the rents and profits by virtue of general condition 6 (2) (c). It was argued that, as the exception in condition 7 (2) does not appear in condition 7 (3), the inference, as a matter of construction, is that the latter sub-clause includes purchasers who take possession as well as purchasers who do not. I think this argument attributes more weight to the exception in sub-cl. (2) than it can properly bear. Sub-clause (2) is merely a proviso to sub-cl. (1) and I have already pointed out that sub-cl. (1) is directed to the case of purchasers who do not take possession as distinct from the case of purchasers who do. I think the exception to sub-cl. (2) was inserted ex abundanti cautela having regard to the apparent generality of the language used in sub-cl. (1). In my judgment, just as sub-cl. (2) is a proviso to, and in reality a part of, sub-cl. (1), so also is sub-cl. (3) referable to sub-cl. (1) and the words "no interest shall become payable by a purchaser" mean "no interest payable under sub-cl. (1) shall become payable by a purchaser," viz., by a purchaser not in possession. This view of the matter is, I think, confirmed by sub-cl. (4), the provisions of which only appear to be applicable to cases where the purchaser has not entered into possession.

I am, accordingly, of opinion that, as Mr. Pook was and is a purchaser in possession, he is not entitled to rely on general condition 7 (3) as freeing him from the liability which he accepted under special condition 3. I am not sorry to arrive at this conclusion because it accords with the principles which have been accepted as fair and equitable in the decisions to which I have referred. These principles were departed from to the extent of exempting the purchaser from payment of interest from the date of taking possession to the date fixed for completion and the reason was that the purchaser made a £200 deposit in the names of agreed stakeholders. I should, however, require much clearer language than any that is to be found in the contract before me to justify the view that the parties to a sale intended to oust these principles of equity altogether. Nor is such justification to be found in the letters to which I have referred and which disclose the general arrangements under which possession of the property was given. I observe that in the completion statement the vendors sought to charge 5 per cent. interest on the whole of the purchase money except the original 10 per cent. deposit of £180. This is wrong as they are clearly not entitled to interest at that rate on the further deposit of £200 to which I have referred.

Declaration accordingly.

Revenue—Excess profits tax—Practice—Appeal to Special Commissioners—Burden of proof—Finance Act, 1941 (c. 30), s. 35 (1)—Finance Act, 1944 (c. 23), s. 33 (2).

In an appeal by the taxpayer to the Special Commissioners against a direction made by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under the Finance Act, 1941, s. 35 (1), as amended by the Finance Act, 1944, s. 33 (2), the burden of proof rests primarily on the commissioners of inland revenue to justify the direction, and it is not, therefore, for the taxpayer to open in the first instance and show a prima facie case in support of his appeal.

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

On an appeal by the taxpayers against a direction by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under the Finance Act, 1941, s. 35 (1) (as amended), the taxpayers submitted that the onus lay on the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to justify the making of the direction and that it was, accordingly, for them to open the appeal and establish the facts necessary for that purpose. The Special Commissioners ruled that it was for the taxpayers to open and establish a prima facie case in support of the appeal. The taxpayers stood on their submission and called no evidence and the Crown did likewise. The Special Commissioners confirmed the direction. The facts appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Apr. 1. ATKINSON, J.: This case raises an interesting question of procedure. The Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 17 (which deals with subsidiary companies in connection with interconnected companies) provides:

(3) If the subsidiary company is a subsidiary of the principal company throughout the chargeable accounting period . . . profits or losses arising from . . . the subsidiary company . . . shall be treated for the purposes of this Part of this Act as if . . . they were . . . profits or losses . . . of the principal company . . . (6) For the purposes of this section, a body corporate shall be deemed to be a subsidiary of another body corporate if and so long as not less than nine-tenths of its ordinary share capital is owned by that other body corporate, whether directly or through another body corporate or other bodies corporate . . .

The Finance Act, 1941, s. 35, provides :

(1) Where the Commissioners [of Inland Revenue] are of opinion that the main purpose for which any transaction or transactions was or were effected (whether before or after the passing of this Act) was the avoidance or reduction of liability to excess profits tax, they may, if they think fit, direct that such adjustments shall be made as respects liability to excess profits tax as they consider appropriate . . . (3) Any person aggrieved by a direction of the commissioners under this section may appeal to the Special Commissioners, whether on the ground that the main purpose of the transaction or transactions was not the avoidance or reduction of liability to tax or on the ground that no direction ought to have been given, or that the adjustments directed to be made are inappropriate.

The Finance Act, 1944, s. 33, extended the Finance Act, 1941, s. 35, by providing that for the words "the main purpose for which any transaction or transactions was or were effected" should be substituted the words "the main purpose or one of the main purposes." Then sub-s. (3) (which is introduced by the rather important words "If it appears") provides :

If it appears in the case of any transaction or transactions . . . one or more of which involves : (a) the transfer or acquisition of shares in a company . . . that, having regard to the provisions of the law relating to excess profits tax, other than the said s. 35 and this section, which were in force at the time when the transaction . . . was . . . effected, the main benefit which might have been expected to accrue from the transaction or transactions during the currency of excess profits tax was avoidance or reduction of liability to the tax . . .

That is the position in which the Commissioners of Inland Revenue are placed. If they are of opinion that "one of the main purposes" of the transaction was tax evasion, or that "the main benefit which might have been expected to accrue" was tax evasion, then they can make a direction under the section.

In this case James Hare, Ltd., owned shares in Dixon & Gaunt, Ltd. On Aug. 30, 1940, they transferred 7,000 shares to a transferee. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue then issued a notice, which is set out in para. 2 of the case :

I am to inform you that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have considered the transaction consisting of the transfer by James Hare, Ltd., of 7,000 shares in the above-named company on Aug. 30, 1940. The commissioners are of opinion that avoidance or reduction of liability to excess profits tax was, or is, under the said s. 33 (3), deemed to have been, the main purpose or one of the main purposes for which the transaction was effected. They have, therefore, directed by virtue of the powers conferred on them by the Finance Act, 1941, s. 35 (1) (as amended) that the excess profits tax liability of Dixon & Gaunt, Ltd., be computed on the basis that the company shall continue to be treated as a subsidiary company of James Hare, Ltd., within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1940, s. 28 and sched. V . . .

Notice of appeal to the Special Commissioners against the direction was sent by the solicitors on behalf of the companies, and three grounds were set out : (1) avoidance of tax was not the purpose ; (2) no direction ought to have been given ; and (3) the adjustments were inappropriate. On the appeal coming on, counsel appearing for the companies submitted :

. . . that the onus lay upon the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to justify the making of the direction, and that it was, accordingly, for their representative in the first place to open and establish the facts necessary for that purpose.

Certain authorities were referred to. The representative of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue opposed this submission and contended that it was for the companies to open their case and call evidence in support of their appeal. Then the Case proceeds :

We, the [Special] Commissioners, ruled that it was for [the companies] to open in the first instance and establish on the evidence a prima facie case in support of the appeal which they had entered. We indicated that, if such a prima facie case were established, the onus might then shift to the Crown, but we did not feel it necessary at that stage to make any decision upon the point. Counsel for the companies there-upon elected to call no evidence, but to stand upon his submission [and the Commissioners of Inland Revenue did the like].

No evidence being called on either side, the Special Commissioners confirmed the direction. They say :

A We held that the companies, having entered an appeal upon certain grounds specified in the letter of Nov. 2, 1945, should have proved before us enough facts to establish a prima facie case in support of such appeal, in accordance with usual practice, and that as they had not done so the appeal failed.

They were asked to state a Case, and they have stated this Case, which raises the question : On whom was the onus of proof—whose duty was it to begin and prove their case ?

The Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 137, provides :

B (4) If, on an appeal, it appears to the majority of the commissioners present at the hearing, by examination of the appellant on oath or affirmation, or by other lawful evidence, that the appellant is overcharged by any assessment or surcharge, the commissioners shall abate or reduce the assessment or surcharge accordingly, but otherwise every such assessment or surcharge shall stand good.

C There was very good ground for putting the burden on the taxpayer of proving that assessments for income tax were too high, because otherwise the taxpayer would only have to keep no books, no banking account, and insist on being paid in Treasury notes, and no one living could ever prove what his income was or establish any liability to income tax.

There is another set of provisions which for my purpose resembles s. 35 of the Act of 1941. The Finance Act, 1922, s. 21, provides :

D With a view to preventing the avoidance of the payment of super-tax through the withholding from distribution of income of a company which would otherwise be distributed, it is hereby enacted as follows : (1) Where it appears to the Special Commissioners that any company to which this section applies has not, within a reasonable time after the end of [the accounting period] distributed to its members in such manner as to render the amount distributed liable to be included in the statements to be made by the members of the company of their total income for the purposes of super-tax, a reasonable part of its actual income from all sources for the said year or other period, the commissioners may, by notice in writing to the company, direct that for purposes of assessment to super-tax, the said income of the company shall . . . be deemed to be the income of the members, and the amount thereof shall be apportioned among the members . . .

E Each member is to be charged in respect of the sum apportioned to him. That section only applied to companies consisting of not more than five members and did not apply to companies which were subsidiaries of a company, to put it shortly, in which the public were substantially interested.

F It is to be observed that the expressions : "Where (or if) it appears," and "may direct," are used in both sections. A right of appeal was given by para. 1 of sched. I to the Act of 1922 :

G A company which is aggrieved by any direction given under s. 21 of this Act may appeal to the Special Commissioners . . . and the commissioners shall hear and determine the appeal . . . and the provisions of the Income Tax Acts relating to appeals against assessments shall, with any necessary modification, apply for the purposes of an appeal under this provision.

H Therefore, you have this distinction between appeals under s. 21 of the 1922 Act and s. 35 of the 1941 Act. There is an express provision incorporating the provisions relating to income tax appeals, true, with the words "with any necessary modification" in the case of an appeal against a direction under s. 21, but there is no similar provision in relation to appeals under s. 35. There are certain provisions dealing with appeals under s. 35 contained in regulations made under statutory authority. The Excess Profits Tax Regulations, 1943, deal with directions given in relation to excess profits tax. Regulation 2 (1) provides :

. . . "Direction" means a direction of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue against which, under any of the enactments relating to excess profits tax an appeal lies to the Special Commissioners.

Regulation 6 is the important one :

The provisions of regs. 5 to 11 of the Principal Regulations shall, with any necessary modifications, apply in relation to any notice of appeal and to the hearing of an appeal against the direction as they apply to a notice of appeal and to the hearing of an appeal against an assessment.

The regulations referred to are contained in S.R. & O., 1939, No. 1734, and relate to excess profits tax. The first regulation is :

Subject to the express provisions of the Act and this regulation, the enactments of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and the Finance Act, 1925, enumerated in the schedule to these regulations shall, with the modification therein described, apply to the assessment and collection of excess profits tax, and the hearing of appeals in connection therewith. A

Be it noted that that does not refer to directions at all, but merely to assessments to excess profits tax, and is not incorporated by the order to which I have just referred. Of regs. 5 to 11 the only one of any importance is reg. 5 :

With reference to any notice of appeal and to the hearing of an appeal, the General or Special Commissioners, as the case may be, shall, subject to the provisions of the Act and to any regulations made thereunder, have all such powers in relation to any matter of appeal as are possessed by them in relation to notices of appeal and the hearing of appeals under any Act for the time being in force relating to income tax. B

It is to be noted that that merely gives the Special Commissioners hearing these appeals the same powers as the commissioners hearing appeals in relation to income tax. No provision anywhere in connection with excess profits tax has been called to my attention which in any way incorporates s. 137 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, where the burden is put on the appellant. C

At this point I ought to add this. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue have very extensive powers of getting all the information they want, e.g., under the Act of 1937, sched. V, pt. III, para. 1 ; s. 35 of the Act of 1941 ; and other provisions. It is quite clear that they have the fullest power of demanding particulars and seeing accounts and books and anything they want. Therefore, it is or ought to be certain that they have in their possession before they make any direction sufficient information to make it appear that a direction should be made. Both s. 21 of the Act of 1922 and s. 35 of the Act of 1941 start with what is in effect a charge of evasion. Under s. 21 it is a charge of not distributing profits to avoid taxation, and, under s. 35, it is a charge of entering into some transaction to evade excess profits tax. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue ought not to make those charges unless they have formed an honest opinion that they are justified. That means that they must have certain facts in their possession on which they have formed their view. There can be no difficulty about placing those facts before the Special Commissioners. They are under no disadvantage if called on to justify their claim. On the other hand, it is not intended that they should be able to say to themselves : " Well, let us draw a bow at a venture and allege that such and such a transaction is intended to evade taxation and then we will try and justify it by cross-examination." That is not the intention of these sections. Quite apart from authority, it seems to me that a man charged with evasion should be told what the facts are on which the Commissioners of Inland Revenue rely, on which they base their opinion and their charge. The question on an appeal is not whether the Commissioners of Inland Revenue had been of that opinion, but whether it appears to the Special Commissioners hearing the appeal that such and such a result must be expected to follow from the transaction. It is a procedure which is intended to get the view and judgment of the Special Commissioners who are hearing the appeal. To my mind, the answer to the question asked in this case must depend on the answer to the question where lies the burden of proof. D

Here I have weighty authority. The first case relied on was Thomas Fattorini (Lancashire), Ltd. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (1). The facts were complicated, but the point for the purposes of the case with which I have to deal was this. A company wished to purchase more investments, and, not having the money, borrowed the necessary sum from the bank. One of the terms on which the money was lent was that the company would distribute nothing in dividends until the debt had been paid off. The company adhered to their bargain, and, instead of distributing dividends among the shareholders, they paid the income, which could have been distributed otherwise, to the bank in discharge or reduction of their liability. They were attacked by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under s. 21 of the Act of 1922 for not having H distributed a reasonable amount of their income. The commissioners said, in para. 24 of the Case Stated (24 Tax Cas. 334) :

We considered that, as the company was an investment company which, after Aug. 24, 1936, held investments producing revenue for which the company had paid £18,000, there was a prima facie case that the reasonable course was that the company should so manage its affairs as to provide for distribution of dividend ; and that the company had not displaced such prima facie case by evidence that this could not have been done without jeopardising the interests of the company, or without making it impossible to acquire the shares which it desired to buy.

They asked in their questions :

Whether the matters set forth in para. 24 are such as to show that we misdirected ourselves as to the onus of proof in a case where it is admitted that an investment company with a substantial income has not distributed any part of it.

In other words, they said : " You have it proved that here is a company receiving a big income. It has distributed nothing. There is a prima facie case. The burden is on the company to prove that what they did was not unreasonable. The Board of Referees found against the company and there were appeals which eventually reached the House of Lords. The Lords decided that the Board of Referees was wrong. I am going to read several passages showing that the opinion of the majority was that all through the burden was on the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to justify the charge of evasion which they had made, and that that burden at no stage was thrown on the company. LORD SIMON, L.C., ended his judgment with these three lines (ibid., p. 348) :

There is no evidence on the matter to be found in the Case and in the absence of material adequate to support the conclusion, I think the House is bound to answer the question put in the negative and to allow the appeal.

So that he is clearly saying there must be material adequate to support the conclusion that the direction given was well-founded. That means that it is for the Inland Revenue Commissioners to provide the material to put before the Special Commissioners, material which is adequate to support the conclusion arrived at that the direction was well-founded. LORD ATKIN dealt with the point (ibid., p. 351) :

It seems clear that the discussion must proceed ab initio on the footing that the action of the directors must be judged by considering what their conduct would reasonably be if no question of sur-tax influenced their decision. Withholding of distribution for the purpose of " avoidance of the payment of super-tax " by shareholders would, if found, obviously negative the reasonableness of any part so withheld. The other general point to be observed is that, as it seems to me, what has to be found is that the company acted unreasonably in withholding some part of its income from distribution. It is not enough to show that a part could reasonably be distributed, if at the same time it could be said, as it well might, that it was equally reasonable to withhold distribution. The section is highly penal, and I feel no doubt that the onus is originally, and remains, on the Revenue to show that the company acted unreasonably in withholding part of its income from distribution . . . From this point of view I am quite unable to agree that the fact that a company, even an investment company, during the year holds income producing investments, raises a prima facie case that the reasonable course for the company is so to manage its affairs as to provide for that income or any part of it to be distributed . . . But I also think that the facts stated by the Board disclose no evidence on which it could be found that the company failed to distribute a reasonable part of its income in the years in question.

He is saying that there must be evidence before the Board to justify the decision against the company. LORD WRIGHT was equally clear. Having read para. 24 of the Case, he says (ibid., p. 355) :

I understand that paragraph to mean that the Board are treating the onus as of an ambulatory or shifting character, so that at a certain stage of the enquiry it finally shifts from the respondents to the appellant. I think that is wrong in law. The Crown set out to prove that the direction of the Board is justified because the appellant company has not distributed a reasonable part of its income within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1922, s. 21. It is obvious that the section is penal in character and in my opinion, the onus is finally on the Crown to prove its right to impose what is a very severe penalty. At the end of the day it is for the Crown to establish the facts necessary to show want of reasonableness on the part of the appellant. I cannot discover in the Case as stated that there are facts found sufficient to justify the conclusion. Nor do I think that the Board would have come to their conclusion if they had not taken the view as to onus expressed in para. 24.

LORD MACMILLAN said (ibid., p. 355) :

It will be observed that the paragraph I have quoted [i.e., para. 24] puts the matter as one of onus. Now it may well be that, when the Special Commissioners make a direction under s. 21 of the Act of 1922, it is for the company to put forward reasons and if necessary evidence to show why the direction is in the circumstances unjustified. Here the appellant put forward its contract with the bank as justifying its having made no distribution of its income in dividends. And the Crown admit that it was quite reasonable for the company to contract to apply its income as it did . . . But when the matter reaches the stage of a Stated Case, the question is not properly one of onus. It is simply a question of whether the facts found and stated afford evidence on which the Board could properly arrive at their conclusion.

It is a little difficult to know exactly what he means by saying, "It may well be," but I suppose there had been some argument about it, and he is saying, "it may or may not be so—I do not care a bit about that." The important passage is at the end—"whether the facts found and stated" afford evidence that the direction was well-founded.

Assuming for the moment that what is said in relation to appeals under that section applies to appeals under the provisions with which I have to deal—and there is no reason for supposing it does not—one asks oneself the question : Where are the facts stated in this Case which entitled the Special Commissioners to say that the direction was well-founded ? They knew no more about the case than the usher in this court. There was no evidence before them, yet they proceed to say the direction is a good one. LORD PORTER did not deal with this point in his judgment in the Fattorini case (1), but I have four Law Lords saying the Case has to state facts found by the commissioners sufficient to justify the direction.

Then there are two cases which refer specifically to the section with which I have to deal. The first is Crown Bedding Co., Ltd. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (2). That was a question affecting the acquisition of certain shares. The facts do not matter. I want to read a few lines from the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., after he had read the section ([1946] 1 All E.R. 453) :

The effect of that is this. Whereas under the original s. 35 of the Act of 1941, even with the amendments introduced by sub-s. 2 of s. 33 of the Act of 1944, it would have been necessary in such a case as this to prove to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, or, on appeal, to the satisfaction of the Special Commissioners, that the main purpose, or one of the main purposes, of the transaction, was in fact the avoidance or reduction of tax liability . . .

In other words, the Master of the Rolls is saying in such a case it is necessary to prove the facts to the satisfaction of the Special Commissioners—not that it is for the appellant to disprove anything, but it is for the Inland Revenue to prove the essential matters to the satisfaction of the Special Commissioners.

In Marshall Castings, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (3), where there was a question arising under these sections, WROTTESELEY, J., said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 21) :

Here the Finance Act, 1944, s. 33 (3), comes in and makes it unnecessary for the Commissioners to be satisfied or to satisfy the Special Commissioners that the main object was avoidance . . . It is no longer incumbent on the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to satisfy themselves or to prove to the Special Commissioners on appeal that tax avoidance was in fact a main purpose of the transaction. It is sufficient that a reasonable man with knowledge of the circumstances and the law should expect it to follow . . .

He is clearly treating the burden of proof as on the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. They have no longer to prove what they had to prove before the 1944 Act, but they have still to prove something.

Therefore, there is clear authority where the burden of proof rests. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue have to put before the Special Commissioners facts sufficient to justify the direction. The Solicitor-General agreed that, at the end of the day, the Special Commissioners must be satisfied affirmatively that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue are right and that the direction is well-founded, but he argued that the appellant must, at any rate, begin and must do something by calling somebody to say : "This charge is not true," or something of that sort. I cannot follow that. The "end of the day" may come quite early in the day. At the conclusion of this case were there any facts before the Special Commissioners to justify their conclusion ? There - was none. It was not the fault of the taxpayers, because the duty was on the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to put the necessary facts before the tribunal. At common law, in the King's Bench Division, the question of the burden of proof and the right or duty to begin frequently arises. It does not mean that the plaintiff has always to begin. One asks the question: If no evidence is given who wins? That settles the question of the burden of proof. It seems to me, on these authorities, the answer to the question is clear, namely,

- A if no evidence is given the taxpayer must win, because the result of the giving of no evidence is that there are no facts before the Special Commissioners to enable them to form any view. In this case there was no material before them which could justify their confirming the direction. I think that covers the ground. The Special Commissioners had no evidence, and there must be sufficient evidence before they can act. They say they confirmed the direction because the companies would not accept the position that it was for them to prove the
- B Inland Revenue Commissioners were wrong. Supposing some evidence had been called and supposing on that evidence the Special Commissioners had confirmed the direction and there was an appeal, the question would still be: "Was there sufficient evidence upon which they could properly come to that decision?" A fortiori, if there is no evidence the result must be the same. Therefore, I think the appeal succeeds. I think the proper order to make is to send it back to the Special Commissioners to hear the appeal recognising
- C where the burden lies.

Order accordingly.

Re BUENOS AYRES GREAT SOUTHERN RAILWAY CO., LTD.,
THE COMPANY v. PRESTON AND ANOTHER

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), March 11, 12, 28, 31, 1947.]

- E Companies—Dividends—Preference shareholders—Right to annual payment of fixed dividend "out of profits of company"—"Profits of the company"—Article authorising directors to carry profits, as required, to reserve fund—Right to carry profits to reserve before paying any dividend on preference shares.

- A company was formed in 1862 with a capital of £750,000 divided into 75,000 shares of £10 each. By art. 29 a reserve fund was to be set aside
- F "for the purpose of the equalisation of dividends and defraying any special or unusual expenditure," and the board was authorised to increase this fund as they should think fit, "and for that purpose to carry to such fund for each year such part of the undivided profits of the company from whatever source arising, as they may think fit." By art. 164, dividends were to be paid "only out of the clear profits of the company." The
- G capital was from time to time increased and, by special resolutions passed in 1889, some of the already existing shares and some new shares were constituted as preference shares, the rights attaching to them being embodied in the company's articles as art. 18A. By cl. 1 of this article, the preference shareholders were to be entitled to receive a fixed dividend of 5 per cent. per annum "out of the profits of the company for each year," on the amount paid up on the shares, "or so much of the said dividend as the said profits shall be sufficient to pay in preference to
- H and before payment of dividends for that year on the ordinary stock or shares of the company." Clause 2 was: "No resolution of a general meeting shall be required for the declaration of the dividend on the preference shares, but the board, if in their judgment the profits for the year are or will be sufficient for the payment of such dividend or some part thereof, shall pay the same by two half-yearly instalments." By cl. 10, the regulations of the company applicable to ordinary shares were to be applicable to the preference shares "except as otherwise provided by or to be reasonably inferred from this article and subject thereto."

For some years the company had made losses on revenue account, but in the year ended June 30, 1945, there had been some profits. The directors considered, however, that it would be imprudent to recommend payment of any dividend before the existing debit balance on revenue had been eliminated. The question was whether they had a right, in priority to the preference shareholders' right to dividend, to carry profits to reserve :—

HELD : (i) "the profits of the company" in cl. 1 of art. 18A were the same profits as would otherwise have been the source of dividend on ordinary shares and meant the profits available for dividend. A

(ii) since the reserve fund was applicable to purposes which were beneficial to the company as a whole, including the preference shares, the mention in art. 29 of one object (i.e., the equalisation of dividends), which was not applicable to preference shares, was not a reason for excluding those objects which were applicable and did not prevent art. 29 from applying to preference shares. B

Bond v. Barrow Haematite Steel Co. ([1902] 1 Ch. 362) followed.

(iii) clause 2 of art. 18A did not dispense with the need for a declaration of a dividend on preference shares, but merely with the need for a declaration by the company in general meeting, and delegated the declaration, in respect of dividend on preference shares, to the board.

Bond v. Barrow Haematite Steel Co. (supra), applied. C

(iv) on the true construction of the company's articles, the rights conferred on the preference shareholders by art. 18A were not such as to displace the operation of art. 29, and the preference shareholders were given a contractual right to be paid a preference dividend, not out of the balance on profit and loss account in each year, but only out of the profits which were available for dividend, i.e., the net profits after any deductions had been made which the directors could properly make for reserve. ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether a company under its articles had a right to carry profits to reserve in priority to the preference shareholders' right to dividend. The facts and the relevant articles appear in the judgment.

T. D. D. Divine for the company.

Gerald R. Upjohn, K.C., and W. Gordon Brown for a preference stockholder. H

Andrew Clark, K.C., and Charles R. Russell for an ordinary stockholder.

ROMER, J. : This is an originating summons taken out by the Buenos Ayres Great Southern Railway Co., Ltd. There are two respondents. One is a representative of the holders of the 5 per cent. preference stock and the 6 per cent. preference stock which has been issued by the plaintiff company and the other respondent is a representative holder of ordinary stock. The summons raises certain questions of construction of the memorandum and articles of association of the company and of certain special resolutions of the company which define the rights to be attached to each class of preference shares.

The first question which I have to decide—which has been elaborately and ably argued on both sides—is, in substance, whether the company or the board have a right, in priority to the preference shareholders' right to dividend, to carry profits to reserve. The facts which are relevant to an appreciation of the position are stated in the affidavit of Mr. Grey, secretary of the plaintiff company. He says :

The company was incorporated in 1862 under the Joint Stock Companies Acts, 1856 and 1857, and its present authorised capital is £50,000,000 divided into £32,000,000 ordinary stock, £8,000,000 5 per cent. preference stock, £8,000,000 6 per cent. preference stock and 200,000 shares of £10 each (all of which shares are at present unissued).

3. The original capital of the company was £750,000 divided into 75,000 shares of £10 each. The capital has been from time to time increased and all shares which have been issued and fully paid up have been converted into stock. Immediately before the passing of the first of the special resolutions hereinafter mentioned the capital was £9,500,000 divided into £3,600,000 stock and 590,000 shares of £10 each. 4. By special resolutions passed and confirmed on Oct. 10 and 25, 1889 : (a) The capital was increased by £2,500,000 divided into 250,000 shares of £10 each. (b) The said 250,000 shares and 50,000 of the already existing shares of £10 each (an aggregate of £3,000,000 in £10 shares) were constituted as preference shares. (c) The rights to be attached to such preference shares (being those hereinafter more particularly stated) were defined. 5. By special resolutions passed and confirmed on Apr. 20 and May 5, 1898, the capital was increased by £4,000,000 divided into 400,000 shares of £10 each of which 100,000 shares were preference shares (ranking pari passu with the existing preference shares) and 300,000 were ordinary shares. 6. By special resolution passed and confirmed on Apr. 18 and May 3, 1901, the capital was increased by £3,000,000 divided into 300,000 ordinary shares of £10 each. 7. By special resolutions passed and confirmed on Oct. 24 and Nov. 8, 1901, the above mentioned resolutions containing the definition of the rights of the preference shares were embodied in the articles of association of the company as art. 18A thereof and certain other alterations (not affecting the respective rights of the two classes of shares) were effected in the articles.

Then a print of the company's articles of association, as the same existed after the passing of the special resolution of 1901, was exhibited.

In para. 16 of the affidavit, Mr. Grey says :

For some years past the company made losses on revenue account and at June 30, 1944, the debit balance on that account amounted to £1,836,538. In the year ended June 30, 1945, the company made profits which enabled this debit balance to be slightly reduced and the debit balance at that date amounted to £1,627,846.

Then he exhibits prints of the company's accounts for the year ending June 30, 1945, with the directors' and auditors' report. Then he says, in para. 17 :

In the directors' opinion it would be imprudent at the present time (even assuming that it is permissible to do so before the existing debit balance on revenue account has been eliminated) to recommend payment of any dividend on any of the stock of the company. They are however advised that it is a matter of doubt whether they have any discretion to set aside profits of the company to reserve or carry the same forward in the accounts so long as dividends have not been paid at the full rate on both classes of preference stock in respect of the year in which such profits were earned and that if they have such a discretion whether such profits (or such amount thereof as is equivalent to any deficiency of such dividends) will be and remain earmarked for distribution exclusively amongst the holders of the preference stocks if and when a distribution thereof is resolved upon.

The resolutions under which the 5 per cent. preference stock was created in 1889, are, so far as material, as follows :

IX. That the holders of preference shares shall (subject to No. XIX of these resolutions), be entitled to receive in respect thereof, out of the profits of the company for each year a fixed dividend of 5 per cent. per annum on the amount from time to time paid up on such shares or so much of the said dividend as the said profits shall be sufficient to pay in preference to and before payment of dividends for that year on the ordinary stock or shares of the company ; but any deficiency in the profits of any year from the amount necessary to pay the preference dividend in respect of that year shall not be made good out of the profits of a subsequent year ; and no greater dividend than 5 per cent. on the amount from time to time paid up on the preference shares shall be paid in respect of them in respect of any year. X. That no resolution of a general meeting shall be required for the declaration of the dividend upon the preference shares, but the board, if in their judgment the profits for the year are or will be sufficient for the payment of such dividend or some part thereof, shall pay the same by two half-years instalments, on such days as they shall appoint . . . XII. That the holders of preference shares shall not be entitled, in respect thereof, to attend or vote at the general meetings of the company, unless and until the preference dividend shall not be paid in full, in which case they shall until payment of the full preference dividend be resumed, be entitled to attend and vote in respect of the said shares in the same way as the holders of the ordinary stock or shares. XIII. That so long as the holders of the preference shares shall not be entitled to attend or vote at general meetings, no notice of the said meetings, nor any copy of the directors' report and accounts, shall be sent to them; but the same shall be sent to them, as to ordinary shareholders, if and so long as they shall be entitled so to attend and vote. XIV. That as soon as the full amount of the preference shares shall be paid up, they shall be converted into stock; and the holding of such stock shall confer similar rights to those conferred by the holding of the preference shares. XV. That the company shall have the right to create and issue further amounts of preference shares of the same kind and conferring the same rights . . . XVII. That any alterations of the rights of the holders of the preference shares in respect thereof may be made by special resolution, if consented to by a resolution passed by three-fourths of the votes given by such of the holders of the preference shares for the time being issued and outstanding as shall be present at a special meeting of such holders, to be convened and held by the board, and at which such holders shall have one vote for every preference share held by them. The regulations of the company for the time being as to general meetings of the holders of the ordinary stock and shares of the company shall apply, mutatis mutandis, to meetings of the holders of the preference shares held under this resolution. XVIII. That, except as otherwise provided by or to be reasonably inferred from the preceding resolutions, and subject thereto, the regulations of the company applicable to ordinary shares or stock shall apply to the preference shares or stock.

Those are the resolutions which defined the rights of the 5 per cent. preference shareholders.

I think it is convenient to refer now to certain of the articles of association of the company which were in force at the time when the 5 per cent. preference shares were created in 1889, at a time when, of course, the whole of the capital of the company was ordinary. By art. 29 it was provided as follows:

The amount not standing to the credit of the reserve fund, and such other portion (if any) of the revenues of the company as general meetings may from time to time determine, shall be set apart as a reserved fund for the purpose of the equalisation of dividends and defraying any special or unusual expenditure, to all or any of which purposes the board from time to time may apply any part of the reserve fund. The board are hereby authorised to increase the reserve fund from time to time to such amount as they shall think fit, and for that purpose to carry to such fund for each year such part of the undivided profits of the company from whatever source arising, as they may think fit.

Then there is a certain authority to the board which I need not read. Arts. 30, 31 and 59 are:

30. The board may establish out of the capital moneys of the company a fund, to be called the working capital fund, of such amount as they shall think fit, to provide for stores in hand and similar purposes. 31. The board may from time to time set apart out of the moneys of the company, such sums as in their judgment are necessary to meet claims on the company. 59. Any ordinary meeting, without any notice in that behalf, may elect directors and auditors, and (subject as to directors to the provisions of art. 113) may fix their remuneration; may receive, and either wholly or partially reject, or adopt and confirm, the accounts, balance-sheets and reports of the directors and auditors respectively; may decide on any recommendation of the directors of or relating to any dividend, and subject to the provisions of these presents, may generally discuss any affairs of or relating to the company.

Art. 61 provides, amongst other things, that the company shall, subject to the provisions of art. 62:

. . . be bound by all their special resolutions under which any shares were issued with special privileges.

Then art. 62 makes provision for resolutions altering the distinctions between the classes of shares. Arts. 164-166 are as follows:

164. Subject to the provisions of the last preceding article, and of arts. 58 and 166, all dividends on shares shall be declared by the first ordinary meeting in each year, and shall be made only out of the clear profits of the company, and (without prejudice to any preferential or guaranteed dividend) no dividend shall exceed the sum recommended to the meeting by the directors. 165. But, in order to provide for the equalisation of dividends, payments may from time to time be made according to these presents out of the reserve fund. 166. When, in the opinion of the board, the profits of the company permit, there shall be a dividend every half-year, and, in order thereto, a dividend may be declared and paid by the board by way of dividend on account in the half year between June 30 and Dec. 31.

The words "in the half year between June 30 and Dec. 31" were deleted from that article by resolutions passed in 1901.

A Having regard to these articles, it is clear that the dividends on the ordinary capital were payable only out of the net profits of the company, in the sense that the powers of the company or the board to carry profits to reserve overrode the rights of the shareholders to dividend. The procedure would be that the board would consider the profits of the company, on the one hand, and its requirements as to maintenance and so on, on the other. Having decided the amount of profit, if any, which was available for dividend, the directors would make the necessary recommendation to the company and the company would consider the matter and decide on it under art. 59 and a dividend would be declared under art. 164. In other words, the dividend would be payable, and payable only, out of "profits available for dividend," in the sense attributed to that phrase in the modern cases, as for example, Long Acre Press, Ltd. v. Odhams Press, Ltd. (1). The express power to carry profits to reserve was originally, under art 29, vested in the company in general meeting and was applicable in relation to "the revenues" of the company. The words C there used, of course, are prima facie very wide. But the reference to the equalisation of dividends which immediately follows, considerably narrows the words, and it may be that they were intended to mean no more than "the undivided profits of the company" in the next part of the article, which was introduced in 1884 and which empowered the board to add to the reserve fund from that source.

D Such being the position, the preference capital was issued in 1889 on the terms laid down in the resolutions which I have read, and those resolutions were incorporated in the new art. 18A. I need not read art 18A. because it faithfully follows the resolutions, for all material purposes, except that, in place of resolution XVIII, which refers to the applicability of the regulations relating to the ordinary shares, cl. 10 of art. 18A was introduced, and is in the following terms :

E Except as otherwise provided by or to be reasonably inferred from this article and subject thereto, the regulations of the company applicable to ordinary shares or stock shall apply to the preference shares or stock.

In the light of that clause, the position would seem to be that the company's articles as a whole were to be applicable to the preference shareholders equally with the ordinary, and that the rights conferred on the preference shares by art. 18A, cl. 1 to 9, would override any regulations applicable to the ordinary shares, but, subject thereto, those regulations would apply. It F is, therefore, plain that the first thing to do is to discover what the rights conferred by cl. 1 to 9 of art. 18A on the 5 per cent. preference shares were. As to these, the arguments of counsel for the preference shareholders were in outline that the resolutions which were embodied in art. 18A contained the terms of the bargain on which the preference shareholders put up their

G money. They were to be entitled to a non-cumulative preference dividend of 5 per cent. out of the profits if the directors adjudged the profits sufficient, or a less dividend if such profits were insufficient. If the dividend was paid in full, they were not to be entitled to attend meetings or to receive accounts. He pointed out that, if the dividend for any reason through insufficiency of profits was not paid, it would never be paid and would be lost to the preference shareholders for ever. He said that those rights, as thus summarised, are clear

H down to cl. 10 and can be only diminished or altered under cl. 9 [see resolution No. XVII]. The question was whether such rights were qualified by cl. 10. Subject to cl. 1 to 9, he said, the company's regulations applicable to ordinary shares should apply to preference shares. Then, as examples of articles which were excluded by virtue of cl. 10, he referred to arts. 59, 164 and 166 (those relating, in effect, to the decision of the company as to and declaration of dividend and interim dividend) because cl. 2 of art. 18A expressly provides that no declaration is required for a preference dividend, and, therefore, those three articles, though applicable to ordinary shares, were excluded from art. 18A by cl. 10. He posed the question whether the effect of art. 29, which is the reserve fund article, was to vary the clear bargain which is found in art. 18A. He said that art. 29 was applicable to the profits available for ordinary shares. With reference to art. 29, he said that the revenues of the company were the same thing as the undivided profits in the next part of the article and that they presumably meant profits available for division among the ordinary shareholders. He said that support for that view was to be found in the fact, first, that the fund contemplated as being carried to reserve was properly applicable for equalising dividends, by which ordinary dividends were indicated and not preference, and, secondly, that the company would normally consider the position of these revenues some months after the close of the trading year, during which year the directors would have been bound to pay the preference dividend out of profits, if any profits were available.

An essential part of the argument of counsel for the preference shareholders, as I have attempted briefly to summarise it, is that the right conferred by cl. 1 of art. 18A or, rather, by the resolution which was passed in the terms to be found there, is a right to receive 5 per cent. out of the credit balance on profit and loss account each year, and is not merely a limited right to receive payment out of profits made available for dividend. The other considerations which were mentioned are auxiliary to or explanatory of this main argument. The argument of counsel for the ordinary shareholders is two-fold. He says, first, that it is necessary to bear in mind that in 1889 a new class of shareholders, namely, the preference shareholders, were coming in for the first time, and one would expect their rights to be moulded in with the existing structure of the company's constitution so as not to disturb it more than necessary, and that this element is relevant when considering the construction of the new art. 18A. In this connection he points to the words "... in preference to and before payment of dividends for that year on the ordinary stock or shares of the company." He contends that those words show that the profits of the company which are referred to immediately before those words mean the same profits as would otherwise have been the source of dividend on the ordinary shares. Secondly, he says that, in any case, on the construction of the articles as a whole "the profits of the company" in cl. 1 of art. 18A mean the profits available for dividend.

On the first point counsel for the ordinary shareholders referred me to a decision of BRANSON, J., in Stewart v. Sashalite, Ltd. (2), the headnote in which is :

In consideration of services rendered and of the transfer of certain rights to the company by him, the company agreed as purchasers "to pay to [the plaintiff] out of the first profits of the purchasers and in priority to all dividends payable in respect of any shares in the purchasers' capital the sum of £1,000." The balance sheet of the company, for the year ending Mar. 31, 1935, showed a profit of £698 11s. 10d., which sum the directors used for writing off preliminary expenses and in making a transfer to certain reserve accounts. The plaintiff contended that the £698 11s. 10d., being the first profit of the defendant company, he was entitled to payment of that sum in part satisfaction of the £1,000; and that the company by the publication of the balance sheet were estopped from denying that the £698 11s. 10d. was a first profit :—
HELD : upon the true construction of the contract the words "the first profits in priority to all dividends" mean profits available for dividends; and the test is whether the purpose to which the directors have applied the sum in dispute is one to which the shareholders could not object if such application deprived them of what would otherwise have been a dividend.

BRANSON, J. stated the points and then said ([1936] 2 All E.R. 1482, 1483) :

The plaintiff says that £698 11s. 10d. has been earned as the first profits of the defendant company, and that he is entitled to payment of that sum as part of the £1,000. The defence is that the true construction of the agreement is not that the defendants shall pay over any sum which results as a profit balance on the profit and loss account, or even any sum which results in a balance taking the various profit and loss accounts which the company has made during its existence. They say that the intention of the agreement is that Mr. Stewart should be the first person to benefit by way of receipt of profits which would, if he were not there, have gone in dividends to the shareholders. Now, the question which I have to decide is, what does this agreement mean? and I find it very difficult to get any help out of the cases which have been cited to me. The actual dispute between these parties is whether the sum of £698 11s. 10d., which is shown as the profit in the balance sheet of Mar. 31, 1935, has got to be paid to the plaintiff, or whether the directors can properly resolve to use it in writing off preliminary expenses and in making a transfer to certain reserve accounts. What is said on the part of the defence is: "This is a reasonable and prudent thing to do. The preliminary expenses are a bookkeeping asset of no value at all, and before one can really say that the company has made a profit they have got to be written off." Also it is said: "The patents and licences are wasting assets, and before it can be said that we have really made a profit, we ought to provide for replacing the waste of capital which is taking place year by year over that asset by effluxion of time." On the contrary, the plaintiff says: "You say in your balance sheet, and you cannot deny that you have in fact made a profit for the year ending in Mar., 1935, of £571, and your previous balance sheet said that you had made a profit of some £126 odd in the year before. That is the first profit that you have made, and I am entitled to have it, by virtue of the agreement."

BRANSON, J. then referred to certain authorities and came to the conclusion that he was driven back to the construction of the particular agreement. He then said (ibid., 1484):

Now it is to be noted that there is a reference to the payment of dividends, which would be quite unnecessary if the contention urged by the plaintiff is correct. He has got to say: "That is merely ex abundanti cautela, or is merely an additional warning to the company that they are not to pay any dividends until they have paid this claim."

I think, in view of the fact that the question of what are the profits of a company or what may be the profits of a company is a question which involves so much difficulty and so many different answers according to the different circumstances in which the question is propounded, that it is essential in this case to look to all the language which the parties have used; and I do not think I can pass over the words "in priority to all dividends," as if they were merely an additional precaution, which was quite unnecessary in the circumstances. Reading the whole of the expression together, I think that the fair meaning to be given to it is that when the directors come to consider the payment of a dividend they have got to pay out of the money which they would otherwise have used for dividends, £1,000 to the plaintiff, before the shareholders get anything by way of dividend. It is said that that is not a fair construction to put upon it, because it would leave the plaintiff at the mercy of the majority of the board, who might postpone the payment of the £1,000 for an almost indefinite period. Mr. McNair would not say "to the Greek Kalends," but he said, "to the Ides of March"; but the answer to it is that this company was floated with the intention that the people who were subscribing money to it should get dividends, and the safeguard that Mr. Stewart was getting was that nobody could get a penny by way of dividend out of this company until the £1,000 had been paid. I think it is quite fair to read the whole clause as one, and to hold that its meaning is, as I think I have already said, that the directors, when they have got profits which they would otherwise distribute as dividends, have got first to pay £1,000 to Mr. Stewart. In other words, I think that the meaning of the words "the first profits in priority to all dividends" is that the profits should be profits available for dividends, in the sense in which that expression was construed in the case of the Long Acre Press, Ltd. v. Odhams Press, Ltd. (1).

Counsel for the preference shareholders says that that case is not decisive of the present case because the facts were different, and, indeed, so was the language. He points out that the funds indicated for payment of the sum which had to be paid to the plaintiff were to be paid from the first profits and he was merely to get a single payment, and not, as the preference shareholders are to have in the present case, a series of payments, and that he was in the position of a man who had got to be paid sooner or later, while the preference shareholders here, if they pass a dividend, lose it for ever. He said that that case does not govern the present case because of those and other considerations. That, of course, is perfectly true. The facts are different and the language is different, but it seems to me that the reasoning and decision of BRANSON, J., in that case are of some assistance to me. It is said that the words "in preference to and before payment of dividends" were merely put in to show that the ordinary shares were to be subordinate to the preference shares and that they were not intended to be indicative of a common fund. The fact that the new shares were to be superior in rights is, however, indicated by the use of the word "preference." I myself think that, following the approach which commended itself on similar words to BRANSON, J., the phrase "in preference to and before payment of dividends for that year on the ordinary stock or shares of the company," does indicate the conception of competition against a common fund, i.e., the fund which was available for the payment of dividends on both classes of shares. It is not a point of construction which can in any sense be elaborated. This was a fund which up to that time was available for payment of ordinary dividend to which the ordinary shareholders alone could look, and I think that, therefore, before that fund could be utilised for the payment of that dividend, this article says that it is to be utilised for the payment of preferential dividend.

If that view of the matter be right, it disposes of the question, because the funds applicable for the ordinary dividend were limited to profits available for dividend and were subject to the operation of art. 29, but I think it would be right, having regard to the argument which has been addressed to the question, for me to consider the second point which counsel for the ordinary shareholders relied on, and this again is a question of construction but of a rather wider scope. First, I should mention a point which, though small, seems to me not without significance. As I have already indicated, the dividends on the ordinary shares were, and are, payable out of profits available for dividend. Those profits were defined in art. 164 as being "the clear profits of the company." The word "clear" was omitted from art. 166, which relates to interim dividend, but by reason of the restriction in art. 164 the word "profits" in art. 166 obviously means the same thing as "clear profits" in art. 164, i.e., profits available for the payment of dividend. Although it contained certain words which were subsequently deleted, art. 166 was for this purpose in being when the preference shares were created in 1889 and it formed part of the constitution of the company. The phrase "the profits of the company" in art. 166 was repeated in the new art. 18A, and, if the meaning of that phrase in art. 18A is doubtful, I should myself think that assistance in its interpretation would be forthcoming from art. 166, where the meaning is clear and would afford a strong indication in itself that in art. 18A "the profits of the company" meant the clear profits of the company or, in other words, the profits available for dividend.

Apart altogether from that point, however, counsel for the ordinary shareholders contends that, where an article provides that a dividend is to be paid out of profits, it does not mean out of any profits whatsoever but, prima facie, out of profits that are available for dividend. One case to which he referred me on that question was Dent v. London Tramways Co. (3). That was an action against the tramway company by the preference shareholders of the company and it came before SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in 1880. In the previous year there had been another action against the company on behalf of the general body of shareholders. That action (Davison v. Gillies (4)), came on by way of a motion for an injunction, in effect, to restrain the directors from paying dividends out of capital. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., said (16 Ch.D. 347, n., 348 n.):

The articles of association, which are binding on the directors and on the company, are very plain. Art. 107 is this: "No dividend shall be declared except out of the profits of the company." A general meeting cannot get over that. The dividend can never be declared but out of profits; and the allegation on the part of the plaintiffs is that this dividend is not declared out of profits at all—that there are no profits available. The right to declare a dividend depends on the facts. The word "profits," by itself, is a word which is certainly susceptible of more than one meaning, and one must ascertain what it means in these articles. Art. 103 says, "The directors shall, with the sanction of the company in general meeting, declare annual dividends, to be payable to the members out of the profits of the company, not exceeding the rate of 6 per centum per annum for each year, on the paid-up capital for the time being of the company, and of one-half the profits of the company above that amount, and they shall declare the other half of such surplus profits to be payable to the scripholders." Scripholders are another class who are not shareholders, who have subscribed moneys and are to be entitled to half the surplus profits. It is quite clear that, whatever these profits are, they are profits of the same kind; half the surplus is to go to the shareholders and the other half to the scripholders. Then the next article is this: "The directors shall, before recommending any dividend, set aside out of the profits of the company, but subject to the sanction of the company in general meeting, such sum as they think proper as a reserve fund for maintenance, repairs, depreciation, and renewals." It is plain that these "profits" mean something after payment of the expenses; because you do not get a reserve fund at all until you have paid your current expenses. It is obvious that the word "profits" means net profits. Then the next article is this: "The directors shall also, before recommending any dividend, set aside out of the profits of the company, a sum equivalent to one per centum per annum on the amount of the paid-up capital for the time being as a contingencies fund." There again "profits" obviously mean net profits. The result, therefore, of the articles, as I read them, is that a dividend shall only be declared out of net profits. Then I have to consider the question, What are net profits? A tramway company lay down a new tramway. Of course the ordinary wear and tear of the rails and sleepers, and so on, causes a sum of money to be required from year to year in repairs. It may or may not be desirable to do the repairs all at once; but if at the end of the first year the line of tramway is still in so good a state of repair that it requires nothing to be laid out on it for repairs in that year, still, before you can ascertain the net profits, a sum of money ought to be set aside as representing the amount in which the wear and tear of the line has, I may say, so far depreciated it in value as that that sum will be required for the next year or next two years.

He then gave an illustration from the case of a warehouse-keeper and continued (ibid. 349 n.):

That being so, it appears to me that you can have no net profits unless this sum has been set aside. When you come to the next year, or the third or fourth year, what happens is this: as the line gets older the amount required for repairs increases.

If you had done what you ought to have done, that is, set aside every year the sum necessary to make good the wear and tear in that year, then in the following years you would have a fund sufficient to meet the extra cost. Now, when I come to look at these articles, I think that is what is intended, and that that is the meaning of the reserve fund. What the company intended to do was this: inasmuch as they knew that maintenance, repairs, depreciation and renewals would be wanted, and inasmuch as they knew that according to the ordinary commercial rules they ought not to calculate the net profits until they had provided for this which was sure to happen, they said,

"We will set aside a sum of money which we will call a reserve fund for this purpose."

Although not expended during the year, it is a reserve fund set aside for expenditure in the following years, taken out of profits before a dividend is made. It appears to me, therefore, that these articles do recognise what seem to me sound commercial principles. That being so, from year to year, as the line got older it would get worse, and would, no doubt, require a larger expenditure every year for repairs and renewals, as a general rule—I say as a general rule, because sometimes the repairs may be so extensive as to make the renewal of a large portion of the line required in one year, and then the next year there might be a falling off in the amount required; but, as a general rule, as the line got older it would require more money.

Then he went into the figures which were in evidence on the motion and said (ibid. 350 n.):

That being so, on the present evidence I am satisfied that there are no profits at present available for division. It may happen that there would have been profits if the company had properly applied the surplus of former years. I must say, looking at the accounts of the company, it appears to be a flourishing company, and I hope nothing I say will damage its future success: but still, I am bound by the articles to say that no dividend is to be paid except out of profits; that there are no profits available, and therefore I grant the injunction asked. At the same time I wish to give the defendants every possible opportunity of shewing that there are profits available, and I also feel that my intervention is likely to be injurious to the company. If the defendants can show me at any time that there are profits available for the purpose of this dividend, I will give them an opportunity of doing so, and therefore I give them leave to move to dissolve the injunction I now grant.

In the following year, the preference shareholders sued the company [Dent v. London Tramways Co. (3)]. The headnote says:

The articles of association of a limited tramway company provided that no dividend should be declared except "out of profits"; that the directors should, with the sanction of the company, declare annual dividends "out of profits"; and that the directors should, before recommending a dividend, set aside "out of profits," subject to the sanction of the company, "a reserve fund for maintenance, repairs, depreciation, and renewals." The company had for several years carried on their business, paying a dividend half-yearly on their ordinary shares; but they failed to set apart a reserve fund adequate for the maintenance of their tramway, which eventually became worn out. The company having again declared a half-yearly dividend on their ordinary shares, and the total sum appropriated for the dividend being, as it appeared, much less than the sum required to reinstate the tramway: HELD, that the company could only declare a dividend out of the net profits, and that the net profits could not be ascertained without first restoring the tramway to an efficient condition, or making due provision for that purpose out of the company's assets. An injunction was accordingly granted restraining the company from paying the half-yearly dividend they had declared, but leave was given them to move to dissolve the injunction, in the event of their being able to satisfy the court that there were profits available for the dividend: HELD, however, that the holders of preference shares, the dividend on which was "dependent upon the profits of the particular year only," were entitled to a dividend out of the profits of any year after setting aside a proportionate amount sufficient for the maintenance of the tramway for that year only ; and were not to be deprived of that dividend in order to make good the sums which in previous years should have been set aside by the company for maintenance, but which had been improperly applied by them in paying dividends.

SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in his judgment, after referring to his decision on the motion which, he said, had apparently been misunderstood, said (16 Ch.D. 353, 354) :

However, the present question is, to my mind, a very simple one. There is a bargain made with the company that certain persons will advance their money as preference shareholders ; that is, that they shall be entitled to a preferential dividend of 6 per cent. over the ordinary shares of the company, " dependent upon the profits of the particular year only." That means this, that the preference shareholders only take a dividend if there are profits for that year sufficient to pay their dividend. If there are no profits for that year sufficient to pay their dividend they do not get it ; they lose it for ever ; and if there are no profits in one year, and 12 per cent. profit the next year, they only get 6 per cent., and the other 6 per cent. goes to the ordinary shareholders. So that they are, so to say, co-adventurers for each particular year, and can only look to the profits of that year. What happened was this. The company improperly allowed their tramways to get out of repair, and paid away their receipts to the ordinary shareholders in the shape of dividends. The result was that on Jan. 1, 1878, the tramways were very much out of repair, and wanted a large sum to put them in a proper state of efficiency. Notwithstanding that, the company did work, and they earned a good deal of money, the profits for the year 1878 being upwards of £14,000 ; and the dividend required being only 6 per cent. on £80,000, it is quite clear that they earned more than sufficient to pay the preference shareholders, supposing these were fairly-earned profits. To see that they were fairly-earned profits, I must look at the report, which I have before me, of an eminent accountant, Mr. Waddell, who says they were. He says, in effect, that, considering the state of the line on Jan. 1 and the state of the line on Dec. 31 in that year, after setting aside sufficient to make good the wear and tear for that particular year, and paying all expenses, there was a net balance of £14,932. That is admitted by para. 20 of the statement of defence, which says, " If a proper proportionate amount had been charged against the revenue of the year 1878 for such maintenance, etc., as aforesaid, the accounts would have shown, as the fact is, that there was a balance of revenue, and, in that sense a net profit in that year of only £14,932 5s. 4d." Therefore if " profits for the year " have any meaning at all, these were the profits for the year. " Profits for the year " of course mean the surplus in receipts, after paying expenses and restoring the capital to the position it was in on Jan. 1 in that year. I have had the advantage of having Mr. Waddell present in court, and ascertaining from him that his report in the sense I have stated is expressed according to his meaning, and that there is no mistake in the admission in the defence ; that is to say, there was an actual net profit for that year of upwards of £14,000. Then what is there to argue ? The argument for the company amounts to this, that inasmuch as they have improperly paid to their ordinary shareholders very large sums of money which did not belong to them, they, the company, are entitled to make good that deficiency by taking away the fund available for the preference shareholders to an amount required to put the tramway in proper order. When the argument is stated in that way, it is clear that it cannot be sustained. The company either have a right to recover back from the ordinary shareholders any sums over-paid or not. If they have a right, they must recover them ; if they have no right to recover them, a fortiori they have no right to recover them from the preference shareholders, and, of course, still less right to take away the dividends from the preference shareholders.

He then said that there appeared to be a misconception of what he was supposed to have decided on the former occasion. I think that case is of some interest, apart altogether from the fact that the undertaking of the company was of a similar character in some respects to the undertaking of the plaintiff company here, but it seems to me reasonably clear that SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., both on the motion and in the action, decided that the profits of the company for dividend purposes meant profits after setting aside for depreciation, although, so far as the preference shareholders were concerned, not arrears of depreciation. I think it is clear that, in the first year, for example, of the company's business, the profits available for the preference shareholders, as for the ordinary shareholders, would have been only the profits of the first year less the amount required to meet the depreciation which the undertaking during that period had suffered.

In Fisher v. Black and White Publishing Co. (5), a question of construction arose, which, I think, sufficiently appears from the headnote :

The memorandum of association of a company provided that, as between the holders of the ordinary shares and the holders of the founders' shares, " the profits from time to time available for dividend" should be applicable as follows: (1) to the payment of a non-cumulative preferential dividend of 15 per cent. per annum on the shares other than the founders' shares; (2) of the surplus, two-thirds should be applicable to the payment of a further dividend on the shares other than the founders' shares, and the remaining one-third should be applicable to the payment of dividend on the founders' shares. The articles of association provided (cl. 1) that, so far as they did not exclude or modify the regulations contained in Table A in sched. I to the Companies Act, 1862, those regulations should, so far as applicable, be deemed to be the regulations of the company. The articles expressly excluded some of the clauses of Table A, but did not expressly exclude cl. 74, which provides that "the directors may, before recommending any dividend, set aside out of the profits of the company such sum as they think proper as a reserved fund to meet contingencies, or for equalising dividends": Held, that cl. 74 of Table A was not in toto excluded by implication, but that it must be taken to form part of the articles; that "profits available for dividend" meant the net profits after making any deductions which the directors could properly make before declaring a dividend, and that the directors were justified, after paying a dividend of 15 per cent. to the ordinary shareholders, in setting aside as a reserve fund to meet contingencies so much of the surplus of the profits of a year as they thought fit.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and ROMER, L.JJ., confined themselves to considering the proper meaning of the phrase "profits available for dividend," but RIGBY, L.J., in addition, after comparing the language used in the memorandum with the language used in the articles and noting their difference, said ([1901] 1 Ch. 179):

C It would be idle, I think, to suppose that there was a deliberate intention to lay down a rule for the division of profits different from that contained in cl. 5 of the memorandum. I should rather assume, and I do so without much difficulty, that it was intended to lay down the ordinary rule, and that when it is provided that a dividend of a specified amount shall be paid "out of the profits," that did not mean that it should be paid out of any profits whatsoever, but only out of those profits that were available for dividend.

D That view, although not repeated by the other Lords Justices, was not commented on by them and justifies me, in my view, in regarding it as an authority.

It is said that EVE, J., came to a different conclusion in Ewing v. Israel & Oppenheimer, Ltd. (6). By cl. 6 of the memorandum of association of the company in that case, it was provided ([1918] 1 Ch. 103):

E The profits of the company in each year shall be applicable as follows: First: in payment of a fixed cumulative preferential dividend at the rate of £7 per cent. per annum on the capital for the time being paid up on the said preference shares. Second: in payment of a cumulative dividend at a rate not exceeding 2s. per share on the capital for the time being paid up on the said ordinary and B shares rateably, without any preference or priority between such shares, and irrespective of the difference in the nominal value of such shares. Third: the surplus (if any) shall be carried and credited to a reserve fund until such reserve fund shall amount to the sum of £25,000. Fourth: subject as aforesaid, and to the provisions of art. 126 of the articles of association, the ordinary shares shall confer on the holders thereof the right to one moiety, and the B shares shall confer on the holders thereof the right to the other moiety of the profits, or other moneys of the company available for dividend, which it shall from time to time be determined to distribute.

F By art. 126 it was provided (ibid.):

G The directors shall set aside out of the profits of the company such sum as is provided for by sub-s. 3 of cl. 6 (3) of the memorandum of association of the company, and may, before recommending any further dividend under sub-s. 4 of the same clause, set aside out of the profits of the company such sum as they think proper as a further reserve fund, which shall at the discretion of the directors be applicable for meeting contingencies, for the gradual liquidation of any debt or liability of the company, or for repairing or maintaining any property of or works connected with the business of the company, or shall, with the sanction of the company in general meeting, be, as to the whole or in part, applicable for special dividends, or for equalising dividends, for distribution by way of bonus among the members of the company for the time being, on such terms and in such manner as the company in general meeting shall from time to time determine. . . . The directors may also from time to time carry forward such sums as may be deemed expedient in the interests of the company.

H It was in relation to those provisions that EVE, J. had to decide the rights of the holders of the ordinary and "B" shares. He said ([1918] 1 Ch. 109):

It is, I think, conceded by the company—but if not conceded I hold that the profits referred to in the opening sentence of cl. 6 of the memorandum are the profits arising from the carrying on of the company's business—in other words, the credit balance in each year's profit and loss account. Not only is this the primary meaning of the words, but in the concluding paragraph of this very clause the words are repeated with the addition "available for dividend," a qualification which clearly shows that where the words are used without it they mean something more than profits available for dividend. The clause therefore deals with the application of the company's profits in the wider sense I have indicated: see Fisher v. Black and White Publishing Co. (5).

I thought at first that EVE, J., might be intending to lay down in general terms that, where you find the phrase "profits of the company" in conjunction with the payment of a dividend, the prima facie meaning of such words is the credit balance in each year's profit and loss account. On considering the matter further, however, I do not think that he intended to lay down any such principle, but was confining his observations to the question which arose before him and to the provisions of the memorandum and articles of association on which the question before him depended. Not only is there the contrast between the use of the words "the profits of the company" in one part of cl. 6 of the memorandum and "the moneys of the company available for dividend" in the other, but also there is the very noticeable fact that, by the provisions which he was construing, the third specified application of the profits was to carry to reserve under art. 126 up to a certain amount, and under art. 126 that power was extended so as to enable the directors to increase the stated amount before paying the final class of recipient any surplus of income. It would be difficult, I think, to arrive at any other conclusion than that expressed by EVE, J., on the meaning of the words "profits of the company" in that particular case and having regard to those particular provisions, namely, that it meant the credit balance to profit and loss account.

Therefore, up to that point, I should conclude that the "profits of the company" in cl. 1 of art. 18A meant profits available for dividend, in which case there would be no ground for excluding art. 29 by reason of cl. 10 of art. 18A. Counsel for the preference shareholders, however, relied on certain other indications in support of the wider meaning of profits for which he contends. First, he says that one of the purposes to which the reserve fund can be put is equalisation of dividends, and (as he said, with truth) such an application of profits would benefit only the ordinary shareholders. It is to be observed that in the Black and White case (5), where the preference shares which were under consideration were non-cumulative preference shares, ROMER, L.J., said ([1901] 1 Ch. 183):

But it is right to say that as at present advised I think that cl. 74 is modified to some extent, for in my view it could not be used for the purpose of creating a reserve fund to be applied in equalising dividends. That is my present view, though I do not express any concluded opinion about it, because the question is not now before us. But I point that out because otherwise it might be supposed that cl. 74 could be used so as to cause what might be an injustice as between the owners of the founders' shares and the owners of the ordinary shares.

Exactly the same point was taken for the same purposes, and was dealt with rather more succinctly by FARWELL, J. ([1902] 1 Ch. 362) in Bond v. Barrow Haematite Steel Co. (7):

It was urged that art. 97 providing for the reserve fund cannot apply to preference shares, because one of its objects is to equalise dividends; but I cannot see that the mention of one object which is not applicable is any reason for excluding those objects which are applicable, and which are really for the benefit of all the shareholders. On the articles as they stand, I have no doubt that the true construction is that which I have stated.

So here, also, the reserve fund is applicable to purposes which are beneficial to the company as a whole, including the preference shareholders, and it appears to me that the reasoning of FARWELL, J. is equally relevant to this point of objection (and I respectfully adopt it), the reason being that the mention of one object which is not applicable is not a reason for excluding those objects which are applicable.

The next point is this. It is said that arts. 59 and 164, which relate to decision and declaration by the company of dividend, are excluded by cl. 10 of art. 18A. That is quite true, they are. It is then argued that this shows that the payment of the 5 per cent. dividend is a matter of contractual right in that no declaration of dividend is required. I think an answer to that is that cl. 2 of art. 18A does not profess to dispense with a declaration of dividend, which is in relation to preference shares just as necessary, in general, as it is in relation to ordinary shares. That that is so was also stated by FARWELL, J. ([1902] 1 Ch. 362), in Bond v. Barrow Hæmatite Steel Co. (7) :

A It is argued that the provisions as to the declaration of a dividend do not apply to shares on which a fixed preferential dividend is payable. In my opinion this is not so. The necessity for the declaration of a dividend as a condition precedent to an action to recover is stated in general terms in LINDLEY ON COMPANIES, 5th ed., p. 437, and, where the reserve fund article applies, it is obvious that such a declaration is essential, for the shareholder has no right to any payment until the corporate body has determined that the money can properly be paid away. It is urged that this puts the preference shareholders at the mercy of the company, but the preference shareholders came in on these terms, and this argument does not carry much weight in an action such as this, where bona fides is conceded. The opposite conclusion might enable the preference shareholders to ruin the company, and would certainly lead to great inconvenience in enabling them to compel the payment out of the last penny without carrying forward any balance.

B That, admittedly, was a case where preference shares were cumulative, but, as a question of construction, cl. 2 of art. 18A does not, in my view, dispense, at all events by express terms, with the declaration of a dividend. All that it does dispense with is the need for a declaration by the company in general meeting. The declaration, so far as the dividend on the preference shares is concerned, is delegated to the board. The language of cl. 2 of art. 18A is :

C No resolution of a general meeting shall be required for the declaration of the dividend upon the preference shares.

It is to be noted there that, apart from the fact that it says, not that "no declaration of a dividend shall be required," but that "no resolution of a general meeting shall be required," it is not in relation to a declaration of dividend, but the declaration of the dividend on the preference shares. I cannot myself attribute very much weight, therefore, to that argument. Then

D reliance is placed on the phrase :

... but the board, if in their judgment the profits for the year are or will be sufficient for the payment of such dividend or some part thereof, shall pay the same by two half-yearly instalments, on such days as they shall appoint.

It is said that this shows that the directors are only concerned with actual profit after necessary expenses and contingencies have been provided for, and that it is followed by the imperative words "shall pay." It is argued that it

E was the board's duty to have paid two half-yearly preference dividends long before the fund available for ordinary dividend is, or could be, ascertained. This argument is dependent on the view that art. 18A has already conferred on the preference shareholders the contractual right contended for, and as already stated I do not think it does confer such a right. In any case, I think the argument puts too much weight on the word "judgment," which means, I think, no more than the word "opinion" in the parallel art. 166.

F On the whole, and for the various reasons which I have indicated, I have come to the conclusion that the rights conferred by art. 18A are not such as to displace the operation of art. 29, that the two can quite consistently be read together, and that the preference shareholders were not given a contractual right to be paid a preference dividend, out of the balance on profit and loss account in each year, but only out of the profits which are available for

G dividend in the sense indicated in Fisher v. Black and White Publishing Co. (5) and Long Acre Press v. Odhams Press (1). As to the 6 per cent. preference shareholders, their rights to all intents and purposes are the same as the rights of the 5 per cent. shareholders to which they are subject, and it was, I think, conceded that, if I came to a conclusion adverse to the holders of the 5 per cent. preference shares on this question, that decision would be equally applicable to the 6 per cent. preference shares.

H Declaration that the fixed dividends for each year on the 5 per cent. preference stock and the 6 per cent. preference stock were payable only out of such part, if any, of the profits of such year as might be remaining and available for dividend after setting aside to reserve or carrying forward in the accounts such amounts as the directors of the company might think proper. Costs of all parties to be paid by the company as between solicitor and client.

MANN, CROSSMAN & PAULIN, LTD. v. COMPTON (INSPECTOR OF TAXES). SAME v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Atkinson, J.), March 24, 25, 31, 1947.]

Income Tax—Deductions against profits—Repairs to premises—Premises kept open for business during rehabilitation work—Increased cost of work.

Revenue—National defence contribution—Deductions against profits—Repairs to premises—Premises kept open for business during rehabilitation work—Increased cost of work. A

A brewery company decided to rehabilitate a large number of their licensed houses. To avoid loss of trade, they refrained from closing the houses while the new work which was necessary was in progress, with the result that the duration of the work was extended and the cost increased. The company claimed to deduct this extra cost in computation of its trade profits for purposes of income tax and national defence contribution. It was agreed that the decision with regard to income tax should govern the position of the company with regard to national defence contribution.

HELD: (i) the question whether the additional expenditure was chargeable to capital and not to revenue was one of fact;

(ii) the immediate object of the additional payment was the acquisition of a capital asset for the enduring benefit of the trade, and the additional expenditure was, therefore, capital expenditure;

(iii) it was none the less so because the trade which was benefited included that being carried on during the process of the work.

CASE STATED BY Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

The question for decision was whether the increased cost incurred by keeping open licensed houses during the progress of rehabilitation of those houses represented expenditure of a revenue nature to maintain the company's trade or whether it was expenditure of a capital nature to improve the houses.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 31. ATKINSON, J.: The appellants, a brewery company, were assessed to income tax for the six years 1937-1938 to 1942-1943 in estimated sums amounting to very large figures and in three of the years amounting to £250,000. They appealed to the Special Commissioners, and the appeal raised an important and interesting question of law, if it be law and not fact. The Special Commissioners decided the point against the company, and the amounts of the assessments were agreed on the basis of the decision being right. A Case was obtained to test the principle on which the decision was based.

The company carries on the trade of brewers and owns a large number of licensed houses. Over a period of years 238 of these houses fell into decay, with adverse effects on the company's trade, and in 1938 the company decided to carry out a large scheme for their rehabilitation. This scheme involved alterations to meet the up-to-date demands of the public which had grown more exacting. The primary question for the company to consider was whether a house should be shut down or kept open during its rehabilitation. The Case states: "As a matter of policy the company had always aimed at getting houses near the licensed premises of some other brewer or as far from one of its own as possible." If, therefore, one of its houses was shut down during rehabilitation no beer would be sold there, and the competing brewer would, consequently, gain an advantage. Against this had to be balanced the obvious fact that to keep the house open during the work on it would add considerably to the cost of the work which had to be arranged (and very often stopped entirely) so as not to interfere with the trade. If the houses had not been kept open for trade in this way, the additional cost would not have been incurred. The company decided it was to the best advantage of its trade to keep its houses open. The consequence was that in due course, the houses were rehabilitated at a greater cost than would otherwise have been incurred. The commissioners state :

The question of principle for our determination was whether the difference or excess cost represented expenditure of a revenue nature for the purpose of maintaining the company's trade, as contended for the company, or whether it was expenditure of a capital nature for the purpose of improving the houses, as was contended for the Crown. It was not contested that the money was laid out wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the company's trade.

To raise the question to be determined, the figures relating to nine houses were subjected to a minute analysis, and a table showing the results was agreed and is annexed to the Case. That table gives in relation to each of the nine houses in the first column the total expenditure which was incurred partly in repairs and partly on new work. There never has been any question but that the company were entitled to debit to revenue the cost of repairs. Part of the cost of the new work consisted of the additional expense in keeping the houses open to maintain the trade. That figure is agreed with regard to each of these nine cases. Under the heading : " Cost of keeping house open to maintain trade," it had nothing to do with repairs, but was merely the excess cost which was incurred through the new work, i.e., the improvements, having to be done in a particular way.

The sums which are in dispute are arrived at in this way. Excavations for new work cost a certain percentage more than they otherwise would have cost, and so with concreting. The brickwork cost 15 per cent. more than it would otherwise have cost. The drainage, the carpenters' work and the finishers' work all cost more. The contention of the company is that the question whether expenditure incurred wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the trade is to be deemed of a capital nature or of a revenue nature depends on the purpose of the expenditure, and the purpose here was the maintaining of the company's trade and making profits during the period of the expenditure. The company argue that, if that principle is applied here, this extra cost of the new work ought to be allowed as a revenue expense.

I was referred to Atherton v. British Insulated & Helsby Cables Ltd. (1), where £31,000 had been set aside to form a nucleus of a pension fund, and the question was whether that was an admissible deduction in arriving at the company's assessable profits. It was held it was not. The following passage in the opinion of VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., (10 Tax Cas. 192), was relied on :

But when an expenditure is made, not only once and for all, but with a view to bringing into existence an asset or an advantage for the enduring benefit of a trade, I think that there is very good reason (in the absence of special circumstances leading to an opposite conclusion) for treating such an expenditure as properly attributable not to revenue but to capital.

That is the test. Is the expenditure to bring into existence either an asset or an advantage for " the enduring benefit " of the trade ? It is argued that the expenditure in the present case was not bringing into existence an asset which was for " the enduring benefit " of the trade, but was merely for the temporary benefit of the trade then being carried on. It may be observed that the institution of the pension fund in the case referred to would incidentally benefit the trade then being carried on, because it would result in better work being obtained from more satisfied servants.

In Mitchell v. Noble (B.W.), Ltd. (2), a company made a payment of £19,000 to get rid of a director whom they thought it desirable to be rid of, and it was decided that that could be deducted as a revenue expenditure.

I think the passage mainly relied on by the company is where LORD HANWORTH said (11 Tax Cas. 420) :

It is a payment made in the course of business, dealing with a particular difficulty which arose in the course of the year, and was made not in order to secure an actual asset to the company but to enable them to continue, as they had in the past, to carry on the same type and high quality of business unfettered and unimpaired by the presence of one who, if the public had known about it, might have caused difficulty to their business and whom it was necessary to deal with and settle with at once.

The words emphasised were "a payment dealing with a particular difficulty which arose in the course of the year." It is said here that this expenditure was to deal with a difficulty arising in the year in which it was incurred, the difficulty of enabling the trade to be carried on. LAWRENCE, L.J. was not very happy about this. He said (ibid. p. 423) :

I agree that the sum in question was wholly and exclusively expended by the company for the purpose of its business, in the sense that the sole object with which the company made the payment was to enable the company to continue to carry on and earn profits in its business. On the question whether the sum is a capital or revenue expenditure, a point upon which the commissioners have given no express finding, I confess to having entertained doubts, which are not yet wholly resolved. I am not fully convinced that the payment was not made to secure "an advantage for the enduring benefit of a trade" within the meaning of that expression used by LORD CAVE . . .

In Mallett v. Staveley Coal & Iron Co., Ltd. (3), a sum was paid to secure the surrender of certain burdensome mining leases, and it was held that that was capital expenditure. Two passages are relied on. LORD HANWORTH M.R. said (13 Tax Cas. 785) :

The case is undoubtedly a difficult one, because one has to appreciate very exactly for what purpose the payment was made.

LAWRENCE, L.J. said (ibid. p. 788) :

Whatever may be the accurate description of the payment, it seems to me that it is a payment made in respect of the company's fixed capital and not a payment made for the purpose of its trade of winning and selling coal so as to form a proper debit item against the incomes of that trade.

Be it observed there that the trade actually being carried on was being benefited, but it was an enduring benefit, and, therefore, it was held to be a capital expenditure.

In Atherton's case (1) LORD CAVE said that the question was one of fact. In Mallett's case (3) it was said to be a question of mixed law and fact. In Anglo-Persian Oil Co. v. Dale (4), it is stated that the question is one of fact. There £300,000 was paid to get rid of a very expensive agency, and it was held that that was an admissible deduction. This case was strongly relied on here. ROWLATT, J. asked himself (16 Tax Cas. 261) :

Is what is got rid of an annual expense which is chargeable against revenue ? But it does not do quite to stop there, because one has to put in this cautionary observation that of course you must get rid of a charge against revenue simply by a payment, and not by the acquisition of a capital asset which puts your business on another footing and enables you to give the go-by to, or to do without, that sort of annual payment. In other words, you cannot charge against profits the cost of labour-saving machinery by showing that it reduces your annual labour bill. It is just necessary to state that, although it is so obvious that it is hardly necessary of course to state it.

ROMER, L.J. said (ibid. p. 274) (having quoted LORD CAVE, L.C. in the Atherton case (1), and read the passage which I have already read) :

It should be remembered, in connection with this passage, that the expenditure is to be attributed to capital if it be made "with a view" to bringing an asset or advantage into existence. It is not necessary that it should have that result. It is also to be observed that the asset or advantage is to be for the "enduring" benefit of the trade. I agree with ROWLATT, J., that by "enduring" is meant "enduring in the way that fixed capital endures." An expenditure on acquiring floating capital is not made with a view to acquiring an enduring asset. It is made with a view to acquiring an asset that may be turned over in the course of trade at a comparatively early date.

This being the test to be applied in such cases as the present, it is obvious that the question whether an expenditure made once and for all is to be treated as chargeable to capital and not to revenue is one of fact only. I do not think one can get away from that. Henderson's case (5) was referred to, but I do not think that helps. It merely repeated that the question in each case is what is the object of the expenditure.

The expenditure in the present case was incurred to get the work done. True it was to get the work done in a particular way, but still it was part of the cost of work which was going to be "an enduring benefit to the trade." It resulted in the acquisition of an asset, albeit acquired in an expensive way.

A Suppose the price of a new machine for delivery in three months were X-pounds and the premium for immediate delivery Y-pounds, the total cost being, therefore, X plus Y, could Y be said to be a revenue expense because it was paid to enable profit to be made during the period of the three months? The immediate object of the extra payment would be the acquisition of a capital asset. It would be, in fact, part of the price. So, here, the expenditure was part and parcel of the expenditure incurred in bringing the improvements into existence.

B Margrett v. Lowestoft Water & Gas Co. (6), cited by the Crown, is, I think, helpful on the point. There the question was quite simple. The existing reservoir wanted considerable expenditure on repairs, but the water company thought it would be much wiser to build a new reservoir altogether, and they did so. It cost a large sum of money, and they claimed that they ought to be allowed to treat as revenue the cost that would have been incurred if they had merely repaired the old reservoir. They would, of course, have been entitled to bring into their revenue account for the year expenditure on such repair. The water company contended that part of the new expenditure had saved them that necessary revenue expenditure and claimed to be allowed to apportion the cost. FINLAY, J., however, did not take that view. He said (19 Tax Cas. 488):

D I think that the expenditure on the new reservoir was a perfectly simple example of capital expenditure and was not in any sense an expenditure upon repairs. If they had repaired the old reservoir they would have incurred a certain amount of expense, but it seems to me that that does not make it possible to dissect the capital sum which they spent upon the new reservoir and to say that that amount which would have been spent in repairing the old reservoir can notionally be treated as being a sum expended for repairs. The answer is that that is not what happened. They have chosen not to repair the old but to build a new reservoir, and that is just capital expenditure.

E It is not quite the same point, of course, but, still, the company here are seeking to do something very similar to what it was sought to do in that case. They spent this money on new work. It seems to me it is very difficult to say that they are entitled to dissect that and attribute part of it to some revenue purpose. If the question is one of fact, I think there was ample evidence to support the finding of fact. If it is a question of law for me, I have come to the conclusion that the extra expenditure, being part of the cost of bringing into existence an asset "for the enduring benefit of the trade", was a capital expenditure, and none the less a capital expenditure because the trade benefited included that being carried on during the process of the work. The expenditure was not incurred in the trading or in the earning of profits, but to make the trading and earning of profits possible, which, after all, is the object of all capital expenditure. That difference must be borne in mind. A company incurs expenditure on an enduring asset that profit may be made. That is capital expenditure. A company incurs expenditure in the making of profit. That normally would be revenue expenditure. The present expenditure was not incurred in the making of profit, but was incurred so that profit could be made. Further, the expenditure was clearly also "for the enduring benefit of the trade" in that it protected and prevented the loss of goodwill, which is, undoubtedly, a permanent asset. In protecting the trade something was protected which was of "enduring benefit to the trade"—the goodwill was maintained intact. In my judgment, the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Theatres and Places of Entertainment—Professional contracts—“Run of play”—Right of owner or producer to determine—Custom of profession.

The plaintiffs, who were musicians, were engaged by the defendant, the producer of a play, under a written agreement in the following terms: “I engage and you agree to accept an engagement to play . . . for the production . . . for a salary of . . . per performance for the run of the play. It is also agreed that you will receive £2 per week as an allowance during the provincial tour prior to London production and commencing on or about (in the provinces) June 22, 1942 . . .” After an 11 weeks’ run in the provinces the defendant gave the plaintiffs fourteen days’ notice of the termination of the run of the play and of their engagements and sold the play to another producer who produced it in London without the services of the plaintiffs.

HELD: (i) in the absence of a term in the contract to the contrary, the producer or owner of a play could terminate the play by notice and the run then came to an end.

ACTION for damages for breach of contract. The facts appear in the judgment.

A. M. Lyons, K.C., and W. B. Franklin for the plaintiffs.

Sir Valentine Holmes, K.C., and T. G. Roche for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

CASSELS, J.: Involved in this case is the construction of a contract between the plaintiffs, as musicians, and the defendant, as the producer of a play. The main dispute has arisen about the meaning of the phrase “the run of the play.” The question is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to damages for breach of contract, the defendant having terminated the run of the play by a fortnight’s notice at the end of the provincial tour and sold the production to another producer for presentation in that producer’s London theatre.

The plaintiffs were engaged by the defendant by a document dated June 5, 1942. The document, in the case of the first plaintiff, reads as follows:

June, 1942. Dear Mr. Gubertini, I engage and you agree to accept an engagement to play drums for the production Let’s Face It for a salary of £1 10s. 0d. per performance for the run of the play. It is also agreed that you will receive £2 per week as an allowance during the provincial tour prior to London production and commencing on or about (in the provinces) June 22, 1942. It is understood that you are not to use a deputy. All other clauses to be subject to the rules of the Musicians’ Union. Yours sincerely, Jack Waller. Read and agreed. R. Gubertini.

The second plaintiff played the saxophone, and other instruments, and the engagement in his case was worded accordingly. The defendant, a producer of plays for 25 years, acquired this play in June, 1942, from the International Play Bureau, Ltd. Originally the play came from America. His agreement required him to produce, or cause the play to be produced, in a first-class theatre in the West End of London on or before Sept. 10, 1942, and, should a first-class theatre not then be available, the defendant might obtain a four weeks’ extension of time.

The play opened at Manchester on June 21, and went to a number of provincial towns. The defendant was trying to get a London theatre, but none suitable was available. Negotiations began early in September between the defendant and Mr. Black, of Moss Empires, Ltd. At that time there was being performed at the London Hippodrome a play entitled Get a Load Of This. Mr. Black and Moss Empires were not prepared to let the Hippodrome to the defendant for the production of Let's Face It, but they were prepared to buy the defendant's rights in the play, with his dresses and his scenery, and to produce the play themselves. The defendant was faced with the alternative of selling his play or losing it under his agreement with International Play Bureau, Ltd. He sold for £6,000.

On Saturday, Sept. 5, 1942, the defendant caused to be posted the following notice at the Glasgow theatre, where the company was then playing :

Will the ladies and gents of Let's Face It company please note that the run of the play will terminate after the evening performance on Saturday, Sept. 19, 1942, when the engagements (unless otherwise arranged) will cease. For and on behalf of Jack Waller and Tom Arnold. Sydney Porter, general manager.

On Sept. 19, the play passed into the possession of George Black and Moss Empires, Ltd., for production, but they did not produce it until Nov. 19, and then it was with a cast which included some, but not all, of the defendant's artistes, and with musicians among whom were not included the plaintiffs and some others who had been on the provincial tour. The plaintiffs were out of employment on arriving in London. They did not apply for employment in the Hippodrome production. Claims are made in this action by the first named plaintiff for £370 15s. 0d., and by the second named plaintiff for £363, being the difference between what each did earn and what they would have earned if they had been employed at the Hippodrome during the 30 weeks that Let's Face It ran there. They base their claim on two grounds—damages for breach of contract and damages for fraud.

[HIS LORDSHIP held that fraud had not been established and continued] : The real issue in the case is whether the defendant has broken his contract with the plaintiffs by giving 14 days' notice on Sept. 5, to bring the run of the play to an end on Sept. 19, which had the effect of terminating the plaintiffs' employment. The defendant ran the play in the provinces from June 22 to Sept. 19, and Mr. Black and Moss Empires, Ltd. ran it in London from Nov. 19 for 30 weeks. The contention on behalf of the plaintiffs was that this was a continuous run of the play and that the defendant, having put it out of his power himself to run the play by selling it to another producer, was still liable to the plaintiffs under their contracts.

I have to deal with the contract of June 5, 1942, and no other. It is in writing. What does it mean ? It is true that it contains the phrase "provincial tour prior to London production," but only in reference to an extra payment of £2 a week during the provincial tour. I do not think that it is contended by the plaintiffs that the defendant was by contract bound in any event to produce in London. The play might have been a complete failure in the provinces. In fact, it was a success, but if it had been a failure in the provinces it would never have been produced in London. The plaintiffs say that the contract means that by whomsoever the play was produced in London they were entitled to be employed or to receive damages, and that the phrase "run of the play" involves that. This phrase is well-known and much used in the theatrical profession in contracts. I can repeat what MCCARDIE, J. said in Clayton-Greene v. De Courville (1) (36 T.L.R. 790), viz. :

The law has long recognized that the theatrical profession can possess its own customs and enforce its own established usages.

He found in that case, where an artiste was engaged for a part in a play at a West End theatre, that the engagement was for the run of the piece unless there was a stipulation to the contrary. That decision was followed in George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre), Ltd. v. Comber (2), where an injunction was granted restraining an actor from going elsewhere during the run of the play. These cases, however, are not particularly helpful in the present case, because here the play was passed from one producer to another.

The evidence for the plaintiffs and for the defendants on the meaning to be attached to the phrase "run of the play" was not in agreement. [HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence and continued:] I find it established that where a musician is engaged for the run of the play the producer or owner can terminate the play by a fortnight's notice, and the run then comes to an end. I cannot see how it could be otherwise in practice. A producer or owner of a play who carries all the financial responsibility must be allowed to be the judge of when he will bring the run of the play to an end. There may be a term in the contract which would have a contrary effect, but, in the absence of such a term, that is the rule. Further, the custom of the profession provides for a fortnight's notice of the termination of the run of the play, and that was given in this case. Many things may cause the producer or owner to bring the run of the play to an end, apart from failure. There may be national mourning, a spell of extraordinarily bad weather, a fire or a flood, or the refusal of the renewal of a lease of a theatre. In all these circumstances the producer must be the judge whether he can continue or must close down. The result is that this action fails, and there must be judgment for the defendant with costs.

HEALD v. MINISTER OF PENSIONS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Denning, J.), March 24, 1947.]

Royal Forces—Pensions—Appeal to High Court—Notification of leave—Retraction—Chairman of tribunal unable to state Case—Reasons of tribunal in lieu—Pensions Appeals Tribunals (England and Wales) Rules, 1943 (S.R. & O., 1943, No. 1757/L. 39), r. 23.

Once notification has been issued by the proper authority that leave has been granted to appeal to the High Court against a decision of a pensions appeal tribunal, such leave should not, in any circumstances, be retracted.

Where, owing to resignation, illness, or other reason, the chairman of an appeal tribunal is unable, as required by the Pensions Appeals Tribunal Rules, 1943, r. 23, to state a Case, the reasons of the tribunal, given orally or in writing, should be treated as the Case Stated. No persons other than those who constituted the tribunal and heard the evidence can find the facts so as to state a Case.

[FOR THE PENSIONS APPEALS TRIBUNALS (ENGLAND AND WALES) RULES, 1943, r. 23, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 36, p. 747.]

APPEAL from a decision of a pensions appeal tribunal.

G. H. Crispin for the appellant.

H. L. Parker for the Minister of Pensions.

DENNING, J.: In this case the appellant appeals on the ground of an error in law by the tribunal.

The case has a curious history. The appellant was notified by the proper officer of the tribunal that leave to appeal had been given. Subsequently, however, after the chairman of the tribunal had resigned owing to ill-health, it was said that that notification of leave had been issued in error since the other two members were unwilling to grant leave. I desire to say that, in my opinion, once notification has been issued by the proper authority that leave has been granted, it would not be right that that leave should subsequently be retracted, whatever the reasons underlying the retraction. The question arose as to the stating of a Case. The chairman had resigned owing to illness, and so he could not deal with it. The Pensions Appeals Tribunals Rules, 1943, r. 23, provides that the chairman is to state a Case. In the circumstances, the President of the Pensions Appeals Tribunals himself stated a Case as best he could from the materials available to him. Although the document may be useful as a summary, it cannot be considered properly as a Case Stated because only those persons who constituted the tribunal can find the facts so as to state the Case. No person other than those who heard the evidence can do so. So, in this case I have adopted the same course as that which I have said should be applied in other cases where there is a difficulty owing to a chairman of a tribunal being ill or resigning, viz., that the reasons of the tribunal given orally or in writing in accordance with the rules should be treated as the Case Stated, and I deal with the case on that footing.

His Lordship then dealt with the case and allowed the appeal.

Appeal allowed.

A died on Aug. 22, 1932, and Mrs. A died on Mar. 29, 1941. In the events which happened, certain members of the board of the company became entitled to a share of the accrued interest as trustees for beneficiaries under A's will. The company ultimately ceased to carry on business, and, liability for the capital having been admitted, the personal representatives claimed payment of the interest.

D

Held: (i) the effect of the agreement was that payment of interest should be postponed until the company was in a position to pay the interest out of income, so long as it carried on, but, as soon as it ceased business the agreement terminated and the whole of the interest became due.

(ii) as the interest did not become due and payable until the condition of ability to pay was fulfilled, the Limitation Act began to run only when the company ceased to carry on.

E

(iii) the agreement was a binding contract since the offer contemplated legal relations, and the consideration for it was the company continuing to carrying on.

G

(v) as regards the interest accrued due to A before 1927, in view of the fact that the amount outstanding as shown in the accounts included such interest, and as those accounts had been passed by the company annually since 1927, it was impossible to say that, because during the last six years the acknowledgments had been made by a board to estates of which they were trustees, the board was acting without the authority of the company.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 21. ATKINSON, J.: In 1910 the defendant company was formed to carry on business by way of running a cattle ranch in the Argentine. A Mr. T. F. Agar was a founder, and he was the chairman, of the company until his death. In 1920 nearly £20,000 profit was made, and £10,000 was distributed by way of dividend. Then the company began to lose money, and for ten years it did very badly. In 1923 and 1924 it lost over £12,000 in each year. Mr. Agar and his wife came to the rescue. On Jan. 3, 1924, the wife, Mrs. Clara Agar, lent to the company £5,500, and on June 19 in the same year another £2,000, making £7,500 in all. Those sums were lent on the terms that 7 per cent. interest was paid. I doubt whether any interest was ever, in fact, paid. She was credited with the interest in the company's books, and by July 31, 1927, besides the capital there was a sum of £1,538 14s. 8d. owing for interest after deduction of tax. On Feb. 25, 1925, Mr. Agar advanced £800, and by July 31, 1927, there was £94 5s. 11d. due to him for interest after deduction of tax. On Apr. 2, 1928, Mr. Agar advanced £4,000, making him a creditor at that moment for £4,800. In Oct., 1930, to encourage the company to go on, and as a condition of their going on, Mr. and Mrs. Agar each signed a document in the same terms:

With reference to my loan to you, which carries interest at 7 per cent. per annum, less income tax. I hereby waive my payment of interest due me since July 31, 1927, until such time as the company is in the position to pay the interest.

On Oct. 21, 1930, there is a resolution of the company:

The secretary laid on the table letters from Mr. Thomas F. Agar and Mrs. Clara Agar, waiving payment of interest on their respective loan accounts since July 31, 1927, until such time as the company were in a position to pay the interest. This offer was accepted and the secretary was instructed in the meantime to cancel the amounts credited to their accounts for interest since July 31, 1927.

Interest up to that date seems to have been capitalised and treated as part of the capital debt owing.

The company carried on. Mr. Agar had to come to their help twice to a small extent. On Nov. 14, 1930, another £100 was lent on the same terms as the previous loan and on Jan. 22, 1931, £300 was lent. The accounts of the company showed these debts year after year. Looking at the accounts at July 31, 1930, which are in evidence, we see in an abstract from the profit and loss account this entry: "Interest paid on loans in London not meantime provided for." In the balance sheet one sees, "Mr. and Mrs. Agar, £13,933 0s. 7d. Note: Interest is in arrear since July 31, 1927"; and, in the third document, which seems to be a "combined abstract balance sheet"—I do not know what the difference is—"Loans, London, £13,933 0s. 7d. Note: Interest is in arrear since July 31, 1927." We find, when we come to 1939, that these loans are being treated in the same way, and I draw the inference that throughout this period the debts had appeared with words indicating that the interest was in arrear.

Mr. Agar senior died on Aug. 22, 1932, and his executors were his wife, Clara; and his son, Mr. Agar junior; his daughter, Mrs. Keith; her husband, Mr. Keith; and a Mr. Brookes. Clara died on Mar. 29, 1941. Her executors were Mr. Agar junior and Mr. and Mrs. Keith. I should point out that Mrs. Keith was a shareholder, but that Mr. Keith and Mr. Brookes were not. The next thing that happened was that on Nov. 9, 1941, Mr. Agar junior died. He appointed the first set of plaintiffs, Mr. Ledingham, Mr. Brookes and Mr. Patrick Agar, his executors. These executors began to press for the settlement of these debts. To enable them to bring pressure to bear on the company, they insisted on an assignment to them of Mr. Agar junior's third share in his father's and mother's estate. His trustees were then in the position of being creditors of the company. They began to press for their money, and, no doubt, as a result, the company realised that they could not go on, and on Mar. 12, 1945, they came to a decision to sell their Argentine assets. On Apr. 20, 1946, the cattle were sold to the government for a large sum which was remitted here, and by July, 1945, over £20,000 was in this country available for distribution. The requisite demands for payment were made, and this action was then brought.

A The trustees of Mr. Agar, junior, issued their writ on Mar. 14, 1946. It will be observed that that was after the resolution to cease to carry on, but before the actual cessation of business. After the sale, on July 10, 1946, the executors of Clara and Mr. Agar, senior, issued their writs, claiming the money due to them, and interest up to date. After the proceedings started the money that had been actually advanced was paid by the company, but the question arose what was the company's position with regard to the interest. The plaintiffs claimed that this interest was all due and payable. The company contended B that the interest had been completely waived. Alternatively, they pleaded the Statute of Limitations.

The first question to decide is: What was the bargain? The plaintiffs say the bargain was that payment was merely to be postponed until a certain event. The company say: "No; interest was altogether waived until the happening of that event." We are driven back to the two letters of Oct. 1930, because that C is the only bargain that was made, and it is agreed that, whatever this bargain means, the further loan must be deemed to have been on the same basis. When one reads it carefully, it is difficult to see that there can be any doubt about what it means.

With reference to my loan to you, which carries interest at 7 per cent. per annum, less income tax. I hereby waive my payment of interest due to me since July 31, 1927, until such time as the company is in the position to pay the interest.

D I quite agree that if it was: "I waive payment of interest on my loan until the company is in a position to pay" it would be very arguable that that meant: "I am going to cancel the interest until that date," but that is not what it says. The contract is dealing with the particular interest which has accrued since July, 1927, and it waives payment of that interest, not altogether, but "until such time as the company is in a position to pay." It is not wiped out. It is not waived in that sense. It is merely postponed until such time as the company E is in a position to pay the interest. Then it was asked: "What is the condition of postponement? What does the document mean when it says 'until such time as the company is in the position to pay the interest'?" I have no doubt that that meant was, "until the company is in a position to pay it out of income." If it merely meant "until the company is in a position to pay it out of their capital assets," they were in a position to pay it that day if they had proceeded to sell. So it is quite clear—especially when one bears in mind that F the whole object of the loan was to enable and induce the company to carry on—that what is meant is "until the company can pay this out of its receipts, out of its income." The further point then arises: What is the position when the company ceases to carry on? My interpretation of the agreement is that it is a waiver until the company is in a position to pay the interest so long as the company carries on, but, if it ceases to carry on, then, treating the G carrying on as the consideration for the promise, the whole basis of the bargain has gone, the reason for it has gone, the consideration for it has gone. Therefore, when the company ceases to carry on, the bargain ends and payment becomes due. That is my interpretation of this agreement, and I have no doubt that this is consistent with what everybody understood. [His LORDSHIP examined the accounts and correspondence and continued:—] H The accounts are all consistent only with the view that the interest was not waived in the sense of being struck out altogether. There it was, year after year. The shareholders were all told: "There is this interest still to be paid or to be dealt with at some time." The importance of this is that the Statute of Limitations cannot begin to run until the happening of one of the events upon which interest would become due and payable. Everybody agrees that the company never was in a position to pay interest out of income, and, therefore, no action could have been brought and the interest did not become due and payable until the company ceased to carry on. It was contended that that meant until "the resolution to cease to carry on." I think it meant "ceased to carry on," and that all this interest became due when the sale was made on Apr. 20, 1946, the result being that the statute cannot arise in connection with this interest until that date.

The next question to deal with is whether or not this agreement had any legal effect, because the point was raised that it was only a voluntary promise which created no legal bar to proceedings, and, therefore, the money could have been sued for at any moment and, the statute applied. There are two cases which seem to me to make it quite clear that this bargain had a legal effect. The first case I refer to is Re William Porter & Co. Ltd. (1). There, in Feb., 1934, at the suggestion of the governing director of a limited company, a resolution was passed by the directors that no fees should be paid to the directors from Oct. 1, 1933, until it should be resolved otherwise. A minute of this resolution was read and confirmed on May 7, 1934, and it was acted on by the company. F. having subsequently become bankrupt, and the company having passed a resolution that it be voluntarily wound up, the trustee in F.'s bankruptcy sought to prove in the liquidation for F.'s fees as a director subsequent to Oct. 1, 1933. It was argued that there was a purely voluntary promise to forego the fees, there being no consideration for it. SIMONDS, J., said that the resolution was intended to induce the company to carry on its business, and, the company having carried on its business in reliance on the resolution, no claim could be made by a director in respect of his fees. In other words, he said that a bargain of that sort, if it was intended to induce the other side to do something and they did that something, was a promise to which they must be held. He says ([1937] 2 All E.R. 363):

That resolution was a resolution necessarily brought to the notice of all persons in the company who were concerned with the conduct of the company's business. In fact, Mr. Fontannaz himself was the governing director. Nothing could have been done without his assent, and he could veto anything of which he disapproved. That resolution was intended to induce the company to take a certain course of action. Waiving their remuneration was not an act of benevolence on the part of the directors. It was an act intended to induce the company to take a certain course of action, to carry on its business, to enter into transactions and to incur obligations which, but for that resolution, it might not have done. It appears to me that there is some direct evidence here, and, in my judgment, I am entitled to apply the rule, stated nowhere better than in the old case of Cairncross v. Lorimer (2). . . . [And he comes to the conclusion] upon the materials before me that the directors, by assenting to the postponement or abrogation of their legal right to claim remuneration due to them under the articles, did induce the company to a course of conduct from which it might have abstained, and the trustee is not now entitled to assert his claim.

That seems to me to be exactly this case—a promise made to induce the company to carry on. It did carry on, and incurred liabilities and the like, and on that decision Agar and his wife would be held bound by it.

Then there is Central London Property Trust, Ltd. v. High Trees House, Ltd. (3), where DENNING, J., was dealing with this position. In 1937 a lease was created of a block of flats for 99 years at £2,500 a year. In the early part of 1940, owing to the war conditions, very few of the flats were let and the defendants could not pay the rent. Discussions took place, and the lessors wrote a letter saying that the rent of the premises would be reduced from £2,500 to £1,250 as from the beginning of the term, and thereafter the reduced rent was paid. When the war ended and all the flats were let at good rents, the lessors said: "The basis of our bargain has now gone. The whole idea was to enable you to carry on when you had got empty flats. Now they are full again, you have got to pay" The lessors further took up the position that it was only a voluntary promise for which there was no consideration, that they were not bound by it, and, therefore, they could recover on the basis of the old rents. DENNING, J. said ([1947] 1 K.B. 134):

But what is the position in view of developments in the law in recent years? The law has not been standing still since Jorden v. Money (4). There has been a series of decisions over the last fifty years which, although they are said to be cases of estoppel are not really such. They are cases in which a promise was made which was intended to create legal relations and which, to the knowledge of the person making the promise, was going to be acted on by the person to whom it was made, and which was in fact so acted on. In such cases the courts have said that the promise must be honoured [and he cited a number of cases, one of which was Porter's case (1)]. As I have said they are not cases of estoppel in the strict sense. They are really promises—promises intended to be binding, intended to be acted on, and in fact acted on . . . In each case the court held the promise to be binding on the party making it, even though under the old common law it might be difficult to find any consideration for it. The courts have not gone so far as to give a cause of action in damages for the breach of such a promise, but they have refused to allow the party making it to act inconsistently with it. It is in that sense, and that sense only, that such a promise gives rise to an estoppel.

- A He went on to hold that the obvious intention of the letter was that it was merely to assist the lessees while their rents were very low or did not exist and that, when the basis or the reason for the promise disappeared, there was nothing to justify the lessees refusing to pay the old rent. It seems to me that those two cases really settle this point, and that this was a promise to which the company could be held in law and, therefore, as I say, the statute could not arise at all.
- B [HIS LORDSHIP said that, as to the interest which accrued due up to July 31, 1927, and which was not within the bargain, the accounts of the company for 1939 (within the material period of six years) included the following acknowledgments of the debts: "Loans. The executors of the late Thomas F. Agar, £5,294" and "Mrs. Clara Agar, £9,038 14s. 8d." a sum which includes this £1,500 odd of interest in dispute. HIS LORDSHIP continued :—] That acknowledgment gets rid of the difficulty as regards Clara.
- C That leaves me to consider the matter in connection with the £94 interest in respect of Mr. Agar's debt. I have been referred to Re Coliseum (Barrow), Ltd. What is the point of that decision? I think the point of the decision is correctly stated in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND (2nd ed., vol. 5, p. 309, note (b)). Thus, a balance sheet of a company which shows that fees are due to the directors and which is signed by those directors does not amount to an acknowledgment by the company, as the directors have no authority in such circumstances to bind the company. The directors there were making an acknowledgment of fees due to themselves, and MAUGHAM, J., said that that could not be relied upon because they could not make a bargain with themselves for their own benefit. There are a good many distinctions between that case and this, but the ground on which I think that case cannot be relied on here is that it is impossible to say that the directors who made the acknowledgments in the balance sheets in 1940, 1941, 1942 and 1943, had no authority to make them so as to bind the company. The company had passed accounts year after year acknowledging this very interest as being a debt due, and, merely because the acknowledgments in the last six years have been made by a board of directors to themselves as trustees of the creditor estate, it is, in my opinion, impossible to say that the board were acting without the authority of the company. I, therefore, hold that there was an acknowledgment in all these various accounts, and that at the end of the company's career these acknowledgments can be relied on by the plaintiffs.
- F There is this further point. It is said that MAUGHAM, J., was dealing with an acknowledgment that had to be one from which a promise to pay could be inferred. The Limitation Act, 1939, has made a mere acknowledgment sufficient, and it is said: "There is a difference now because all you want now is an acknowledgment and you have not to consider whether the circumstances are such as to amount to a promise to pay. You do not need the promise to pay. It is only an acknowledgment, an acknowledgment made to the creditor, and upon that the principle of that decision ought not to apply." I have difficulty in seeing the distinction there. I think that, if a trustee cannot rely on a promise to himself, it would be difficult to say he could rely on an acknowledgment which he makes to himself. So I am not disposed to draw that distinction, but these acknowledgments have been made in balance sheets and accounts. They clearly were made to the creditors because they received the accounts. I think it is impossible to say they were not made with the authority of the company, and, therefore, they are binding. The first plaintiffs are thus entitled to a declaration that they are entitled to interest on the principal sum owing to Mr. Agar junior's estate—I say a declaration because they issued their writ before the actual cessation of the carrying on of business—and the plaintiffs in the second and third claims are entitled to judgment for the proper amount. The loans have been paid, so they are entitled to simple interest at 7 per cent. from the date of the loans until Apr. 20, 1946, when the interest became payable.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), March 17, 18, April 25, 1947.]

Emergency Legislation—War damage—Cost of works—"Direct result" of enemy action—Structural damage to defective walls—War Damage Act, 1943 (c. 21), ss. 2 (1) (a), 6, 8 (2), 10 (1), sched. III, 3 (1). B

In 1940, after the explosion of an enemy bomb the stability of the front walls of certain houses was found to be seriously affected. The houses were old, and, before the bomb fell, the front walls were in bad condition, due mainly to the inherent nature of the brickwork. These pre-existing defects were accentuated by the blast of the bomb, but there was no evidence that they occasioned the instability or were such as to render the walls unsound. No repairs were effected at the time, but in 1943 the walls were condemned as dangerous structures and it became necessary to rebuild them either wholly or in part :—

HELD : the rebuilding was the direct result of the explosion of the bomb, and, therefore, "the direct result of action taken by the enemy" within s. 2 (1) (a) of the War Damage Act, 1943, and the War Damage Commission was responsible for 100 per cent. of the cost thereof.

Decision of VAISEY, J. ([1946] 2 All E.R. 658), affirmed.

[EDITORIAL NOTE. It should be noted that this decision is confined to the particular case. On the facts proved here, the War Damage Commission is held responsible for 100 per cent. of the cost of the rebuilding, but the court specifically keep open the point whether in some other case the facts may not justify an apportionment.]

APPEAL by the War Damage Commission from a decision of VAISEY, J., dated Nov. 22, 1946, and reported [1946] 2 All E.R. 658.

F

The Commission determined that, as the walls of certain buildings damaged by a bomb were defective before the bombing, the proportion of the cost of rebuilding to be borne by the Commission should be 40 per cent. (subsequently reduced to 33½ per cent.). On an appeal by the claimant under the War Damage Act, 1943, s. 32 (2), VAISEY, J., held that where works were made necessary by war damage to reinstate a building in its pre-existing form, the whole cost of such works must be borne by the Commission, except where the building would, at the time of the war damage, have had to be reinstated (not repaired) in any case, and, as the rebuilding in the present case was the direct result of the explosion, the Commission was responsible for 100 per cent. of the cost. The Commission appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Apr. 25. COHEN, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This appeal raises a question as to the true construction of the War Damage Act, 1943. We were told that it is the first case under that Act and is intended to be in the nature of a test case, but for reasons which will appear later in our judgment, we think the decision of it turns on its own facts.

It will be convenient first to refer to the relevant provisions of the Act. Section 1 (1) provides that there shall be made, subject to and in accordance with the provisions of pt. I of the Act, payments by the Commission out of the moneys provided by Parliament in respect of war damage to land occurring during the risk period therein mentioned. Section 2 defines war damage. So far as material to this case it is in the following terms :

A (1) In this Act the expression "war damage" means (a) damage occurring (whether accidentally or not) as the direct result of action taken by the enemy, or action taken in combating the enemy or in repelling an imagined attack by the enemy. . . .

I turn to pt. I of the Act. Section 5 defines the hereditaments that are to be units for payment in respect of damage to land and distinguishes in sub-s. (2) between (a) buildings (excluding certain classes of buildings) or parts thereof and the sites of such buildings or of part thereof and (b) other land. It defines B a hereditament that comprises a building falling within para. (a) of the subsection or a part of such a building as a "developed hereditament". Section 6 defines the nature of payments to be made in respect of damage to land and distinguishes between a cost of works payment and a value payment. So far as material it is in the following terms :

C (1) Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, a payment to be made thereunder shall be of one or other of the following kinds, that is to say, (a) a payment of costs of works, being a payment of an amount determined by reference to the cost of works executed for making good the damage, as provided by s. 8 of this Act ; or (b) a value payment, being a payment of an amount determined by reference to the depreciation in the value of the hereditament caused by the damage, as provided by s. 10 of this Act.

D Section 7 lays down rules for the determination of the question whether a payment to be made shall be a cost of works payment or a value payment. Sub-section (1) (a) provides that in the case of a developed hereditament (and the hereditaments with which we are dealing are developed hereditaments) the payment shall be a payment of cost of works unless the war damage involved total loss. Sub-section (2) lays down the rules for determining whether the war damage involves a total loss and is in the following terms :

E War damage to a developed hereditament shall be deemed to involve total loss if, and only if, it is such that the proper cost, ascertained as at the thirty-first day of March, nineteen hundred and thirty-nine, of such works as would be required for reinstating the hereditament in the form in which it existed immediately before the occurrence of the damage would be likely to be more than the difference between the amounts respectively, ascertained by reference to prices current at that day, which the fee simple in the hereditament might have been expected to realise—(a) on a sale thereof in the state in which it would be after the execution of those works, and (b) on F a sale thereof as a site and with the damage not made good, being in each case a sale such as is specified in paragraph 1 of sched. II to this Act made on that day.

Then follows a proviso which it is unnecessary to read. Section 8 lays down rules as to the calculation of the amount of the cost of works payment. Sub-sections (2), (3) and (4) are in the following terms :

G (2) If the war damage is made good by reinstating the hereditament in the form in which it existed immediately before the occurrence of the damage, the amount of the payment shall be an amount equal to the proper cost of the works executed for the making good thereof : Provided that if the reinstatement of any part of the hereditament could have been omitted without detracting from the value of the hereditament, or the omission thereof would have increased its value, the amount of the payment shall be reduced to what it would have been if that part had not been reinstated. In this Part of this Act the expression "the permissible amount" means, in relation to a payment of cost of works, the amount that is payable by virtue of this subsection or that would have been payable if this subsection had had effect in relation to the payment. (3) If the war damage is made good by works, which include H alterations or additions to the hereditament, the amount of the payment shall be an amount equal to so much of the proper cost of the works executed for the making good of the damage as falls within the permissible amount. (4) The preceding provisions of this section shall have effect subject to the provisions of sched. III to this Act as to deductions in respect of the value of materials, of failure to take steps to minimise war damage, of physical changes not directly attributable to war damage occurring between the occurrence and the making good of war damage, and of the cost of works which contribute to the making good of war damage occurring on two or more occasions.

It will be convenient here to refer to sched. III to the Act. It is divided under three heads. The first head is not material. The second head deals with deductions from payments for failure to minimize the damage after the happening of the event. The third head deals with the deductions where damage other than war damage or repeated war damage is sustained. Paragraph 3 (1) is in the following terms :

The amount of a payment of cost of works shall be reduced by any amount by which the proper cost of the works executed for making good the war damage is increased by reason of any physical change in the hereditament not directly attributable to war damage (other than ordinary wear and tear) occurring between the time of the occurrence of the damage and the time when it is made good. A

It is to be observed that neither here nor in s. 8 is there any provision for a deduction in respect of damage already existing at the time of the occurrence of the event which caused the war damage.

Section 10 lays down rules for the calculation of the amount of a value payment. Sub-section (1) is in the following terms : B

Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, the amount of a value payment shall be an amount equal to the amount of the depreciation in the value of the hereditament caused by the war damage, that is to say, the amount by which the value of the hereditament in the state in which it was immediately after the occurrence of the damage is less than its value in the state in which it was immediately before the occurrence of the damage. C

It is to be noted that in this section an express reference is made to the state, as distinct from the form, in which the building was before and after the accident. The only other section to which we need refer is s. 32, under which the claimants brought the matter before the court. Section 32 is to the effect that any question arising in carrying out the provisions of ss. 6 to 8 or s. 10 and certain other sections and provisions of the Act, shall be determined by the Commission with a right (under sub-s. (3)) for any person aggrieved by any such determination—with certain exceptions—to appeal therefrom on any question of law to the High Court. The making of rules of court is authorized by the same section and this has been done by R.S.C., Ord. 55c. This case came before VAISEY, J., as a nominated judge within the meaning of s. 4 of the Act. D

I turn to the circumstances which led to this appeal. The claimants owned, with a large number of neighbouring properties, four houses in the metropolitan borough of Stepney, known as 36, 38, 40 and 42, Jamaica Street. During the Battle of Britain a bomb fell in the neighbourhood of these houses and damaged, among other things the front walls. No repairs were effected at the time, but in 1943 these walls were condemned as dangerous structures and it became necessary to rebuild them either wholly or in part. The claimants sought to recover from the Commission the cost of such repair as a "cost of works payment" under the Act. Prolonged negotiations took place between the claimants and the Commission. On Oct. 30, 1945, the claimants' solicitors wrote to the Commission a letter in which they claimed to be entitled to receive from the Commission the whole of the cost of the repair works and intimated that, unless their contention was admitted, an appeal would be lodged. Further correspondence ensued, and on Feb. 14, 1946, the Commission notified the claimants that, after careful consideration, they were still of the opinion that the whole of the repair works to the properties in question were not made necessary by war damage, and the Commission could not, therefore, agree to the claimants' contention as set out in the letter of Oct. 30, 1945. The claimants, considering themselves aggrieved by the determination thus expressed, decided to appeal therefrom pursuant to s. 32 (3) of the Act, and in accordance with the rules contained in Ord. 55c served an originating notice of motion on Mar. 24, 1946. In that notice of motion they alleged that the said determination was wrong in law on grounds which may be summarised as follows : (1) there was no evidence to support the findings of fact on which the Commission sought to avoid payment to the claimants of the full cost of the works done to the front walls ; (2) the cause and the sole cause of the said walls being condemned as dangerous structures was the explosion of the bomb, and, accordingly, the Commission misdirected themselves in finding that the works were more than was necessary to make good the damage. That notice having been served, it became the duty of the Commission under Ord. 55c, r. 2 (4), to state a Case, E F G H setting forth the facts on which their determination was based and to file the case in the action department of the Central Office. The Commission complied with this obligation on May 24, 1946.

The relevant facts are found by the Commission in para. 3 (h) of the Case, where they set forth and adopted a report by one of their technical officers dated May 27, 1943. So far as material that report is in the following terms :

A Jamaica Street, E.1. In response to Messrs. Rawlence & Squarey's letter of the 10th inst., I met Mr. Yeo and inspected 13 houses which have been structurally damaged. A bomb fell on the opposite side of the road demolishing several houses, and has seriously affected the stability of the front walls of the houses inspected, in varying degrees. These houses are old, and the front walls are in a bad condition due mainly to the inherent nature of the brickwork. However, these defects have been accentuated by blast effect, and the front wall will have to be rebuilt, as scheduled below. As the walls were defective prior to the bombing, the proportion of the proper cost to be borne by the Commission has been agreed by me as detailed in the schedule.

B The schedule indicated that three-quarters of the fronts of Nos. 36 and 38 and the whole of the fronts of Nos. 40 and 42 required rebuilding. It also indicated that in the view of the writer, the proper percentage of the cost of such rebuilding to be borne by the Commission was 40 per cent., but gave no indication of how that percentage was calculated. As we read this statement, it is saying that

C (1) the bomb seriously affected the stability of the front walls of the houses, (2) the houses were old and before the bomb fell the front walls were in bad condition due mainly to the inherent nature of the brickwork, (3) the defects thus existing in the front walls were accentuated by the blast of the bomb, (4) as a result of the bomb, the front walls will have to be rebuilt to the extent indicated in the schedule. We are unable to read into the technical officer's report a statement that the pre-existing defects occasioned the instability or

D were such as to render the walls unsound, nor can we find any statement to this effect in any other part of the Case. This was clearly the view taken by VAISEY, J., where he said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 661) :

E In the present case, three-quarters of two of the walls and the whole of the other two, have had to be pulled down and rebuilt, and for myself I cannot see how it could ever be known whether the same or a less amount of work would have had to be done if the four walls had just previously to the time when the bomb exploded, been free from all structural defects. There is no finding to the effect that the walls would have fallen down within any measurable distance of time if no enemy action had injured them.

F In the result, VAISEY, J., found that the Commission was responsible for 100 per cent. of the cost of the works in respect of the rebuilding of the walls since the rebuilding was the "direct result" of the explosion. With this conclusion we entirely agree.

The Attorney-General suggested that this conclusion was not open to VAISEY, J., nor to us, in view of the purported finding of fact in para. 5 of the Stated Case, where the Commission say :

The Commission were of opinion and decided that, as a matter of fact, the whole of the works executed to the four properties were not necessary to make good war damage.

G He is, however, we think, in a dilemma since either, as VAISEY, J., said (ibid., 660), this purported finding of fact is not a pure finding of fact, but involves a question of law, viz., the construction of the Act itself, or, if it is a finding of fact, there is no evidence to support it. VAISEY, J., did not, however, base his decision purely on the finding of fact, for he went on to say (ibid., 662) :

H . . . the explosion was (in other words) the proximate or immediate cause of the damage, and not merely a contributory cause acting in conjunction with the structural defects as another contributory cause ; and even if (which is by no means shown to be the case) those defects constituted a causa sine qua non, the enemy action was none the less the sole causa proxima, which is to my mind only another way of saying that the damage occurred as its direct result.

The Attorney-General at one stage in his argument accepted the view that the causa proxima is the sole governing factor and suggested that the true analogy was to be found in certain marine insurance cases : see e.g., Yorkshire Dale Steamship Co. v. Minister of Transport (1). Mr. Montagu, on the other hand, argued that a better analogy was to be found in workmen's compensation cases :

see Wilson v. Chatterton (2); and that, accordingly, the claimants would be entitled to recover the full costs of the work unless enemy action was to no extent responsible for the works having to be carried out. We think it better not to decide this point until a case comes before us in which it arises for direct decision. We must, however, point out that neither argument leads to an equitable result, for the Attorney-General was compelled to admit that, if this argument of his was well founded, the Commission should have rejected in toto the claimants' claim, although their expert attributed one-third of the cost to enemy action, while Mr. Montagu admitted that, if his argument was well-founded, the claimants would have been entitled to succeed had the walls been condemned as dangerous structures before the bomb fell. The Attorney-General, realising that his first argument carried him too far in view of the determination of the Commission, abandoned it so far as this case was concerned, and argued in the alternative that the cost of works should be apportioned. This argument is conveniently stated by VAISEY, J., where he says ([1946] 2 All E.R. 661):

If the unsoundness of the building was of such a character that the war damage was greater than it would have been if the building had previously been perfectly sound, then the Commission should not be called on to pay more towards the cost of reinstatement than they would have had to pay to reinstate the hypothetically sound building.

VAISEY, J., rejected this argument, saying (ibid.):

My difficulty in accepting that is two-fold: first, I cannot find that the Commission have ever applied any such formula to the present case, and secondly, it would be impossible to apply it to any case without some sort of inquiry which could rarely, if ever, be satisfactorily answered, for it is well known that a well-built rigid structure may suffer greater damage from "blast" than an old building possessing qualities of suppleness, resilience and flexibility.

The first reason given by VAISEY, J., for rejecting this argument is, in our opinion, conclusive. The facts as found do not afford a basis on which the argument can stand. We desire, however, to keep open the point whether in some other case the facts may not justify an apportionment, for instance, to take one of the hypothetical cases propounded by the Attorney-General, suppose the only visible damage due to enemy action was broken windows, but when it was sought to replace the broken windows, it was found that, owing to the defective condition of the frames and surrounding brickwork, the glass could not be put back without fitting new frames and making good the defective brickwork. If the defects in the frames and brickwork were not due to any extent to the enemy action, there would be strong ground for the argument that the claimant could not recover the cost of repairing the brickwork or fitting new frames. For these reasons, we are of opinion that the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Cohen and Wrottesley, L.JJ.), April 15, 16, 17, 18, 1947.]

Trade—Restraint of trade—Reasonableness—Covenant by doctor in "assistant-ship" agreement—Covenantees general practitioners—Covenant not to "practise . . . in any department of medicine surgery or midwifery nor accept nor fill any professional appointment" within 10 miles for 5 years—Onus of proof—Special circumstances justifying restraint.

The plaintiffs, who were general medical practitioners in partnership in Okehampton, engaged the defendant as their medical assistant, the agreement providing: "The assistant agrees . . . that he will not during this contract of service save in the employ of the principals nor within the space of 5 years thereafter practise or cause or assist any other person to practise in any department of medicine surgery or midwifery nor accept nor fill any professional appointment whether whole time or otherwise whether paid by fees salary or otherwise or whether honorary within a radius of 10 miles from 11, East Street, Okehampton . . ."

HELD : the covenant was invalid as being in restraint of trade because (i) the restriction that the defendant was not to "practice . . . in any department of medicine surgery or midwifery" was wider than was justified for the protection of the plaintiffs' business because it covered, inter alia, practice as a consultant which could not reasonably be considered likely to cause detriment to the plaintiffs' practice.

(ii) the stipulation against accepting "any professional appointment" was also wider than was justified for the protection of the plaintiffs' practice, since it would cover such an appointment as medical officer of health which could not affect the plaintiffs.

(iii) all restraints on trade, if there is nothing more, are contrary to public policy, and, therefore, void, unless there are special circumstances to justify them, and the onus of proving such special circumstances must rest on the party alleging them.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decision of EVERSHERD, J., dated Dec. 21, 1946, and reported ante, p. 179.

The plaintiffs, general medical practitioners, sought an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendant, formerly employed as an assistant in their partnership business, from committing breaches of a covenant contained in the agreement under which he had been employed. At the hearing of the motion the parties requested the court to treat the motion as the trial of the action and EVERSHERD, J., held that the covenant was wider than was necessary to protect the plaintiffs' practice and was an illegal restraint of trade. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R.

Montgomery White, K.C., and H. C. Dickens for the plaintiffs.
Salt, K.C., and Lindner for the defendant.

LORD GREENE, M.R. : This is an appeal from a judgment of EVERSHERD, J., On the view I take of the case, the matter is comparatively simple. The plaintiffs were two medical men carrying on their profession in partnership in Okehampton and district. They engaged the defendant as their medical assistant, and the terms of the engagement were set out in a written agreement dated Dec. 31, 1943, the plaintiffs being described as the principals and the defendant as the assistant. All three of them are described as registered medical practitioners and the practice of the plaintiffs was described in the recital as follows :

Whereas the principals are now engaged in general medical practice in partnership together at Okehampton aforesaid under the style or firm of "Routh & Wilson . . ." The defendant was engaged "to assist them in the said practice," and cl. 12 of the agreement provided :

The assistant agrees with the principals that he will not during this contract of service save in the employ of the principals nor within the space of 5 years thereafter practise or cause or assist any other person to practise in any department of medicine surgery or midwifery nor accept nor fill any professional appointment whether whole time or otherwise whether paid by fees salary or otherwise or whether honorary within a radius of 10 miles from 11 East Street Okehampton aforesaid. And if the assistant shall so practise or cause or assist any other person to practise within the radius aforesaid or in any way violate this provision he shall forthwith pay to the principals or as they shall direct or to their successors in title the sum of £100 for every month or part of a month during which he shall violate or continue to violate this provision as ascertained and liquidated damages and not by way of penalty and without prejudice to the rights of the principals . . . to obtain an injunction . . .

The employment was terminated and after an interval the defendant who, according to his evidence, had not been able to set himself up in practice elsewhere or obtain a position as an assistant, decided to set up in practice in Okehampton as a general medical practitioner. He informed the plaintiffs that it was his intention so to do. It is curious that the one thing against which the plaintiffs were, undoubtedly, entitled to protect themselves by a properly framed covenant is the one thing which the defendant was proposing to do. The plaintiffs issued their writ and served their notice of motion claiming an injunction to restrain the breach of the covenant. The defendant obtained from EVERSHED, J., the dismissal of the action on the ground that the covenant, as framed, was in illegal restraint of trade. EVERSHED, J., took the view that the covenant could be severed into two branches, one the branch against practising, or causing or assisting any other person to practise in any department of medicine, surgery or midwifery, and the other the restriction against accepting professional appointments, but he found that in both those branches there was a vital defect in that each of them involved a restriction which went further than was reasonably necessary for the protection of the practice which the plaintiffs were entitled to protect by a properly framed covenant.

A good deal of argument has been put before us on the familiar question of the severability of covenants. On the assumption that vice was to be found in this covenant, it was said that the vicious part could be severed from the good part. I do not find it necessary to decide that question. From that it must not be taken that I am expressing any view favourable or unfavourable to the opinion of EVERSHED, J., on the question of severability. The two branches of the covenant to which I have referred I shall continue to describe for convenience of reference as being, respectively, the first branch and the second branch without thereby by implication making any suggestion on the question of severability.

There is one small point which I may mention on the construction of this covenant. It arises in this way. The covenant refers to space and to time. The reference to space appears at the beginning, the reference to time appears at the end. It was suggested that the covenant might be bad because the reference to space only refers to the first branch of the covenant leaving that branch unlimited as to time, and the reference to time only refers to the second branch leaving that branch unlimited as to space. I do not think that is the true construction. The covenant is not artistically drawn and the grammar leaves something to be desired, but, in my opinion, the whole of the covenant in both its branches is restricted by the space and time limits which are specified.

I turn to the principal point in the case—whether either or both of the branches of the covenant are bad as going beyond what is reasonably necessary for the protection of that goodwill—it is sometimes referred to as “goodwill” as a useful word to use, though, perhaps, not always quite accurately—which the plaintiffs were entitled to protect by a properly framed covenant. It is not disputed that the type of professional activity in which they were engaged was one of those in which the association in that activity of an assistant gives him the opportunity of obtaining a knowledge of the patients and so forth which, if used by him thereafter, would detrimentally affect the plaintiffs, and it is not suggested that they were not entitled to protect themselves against it. The ground on which that principle is founded is stated in many cases, but I have before me the words of LORD BIRKENHEAD in Fitch v. Dewes (1) where he says ([1921] 2 A.C. 164) of a solicitor’s managing clerk :

Such a covenantee [i.e., the employer] is taking into his employment in his firm a young man in circumstances which make it certain that the latter will acquire a close personal acquaintance with the clients from whom, and from whom alone, the business of the firm arises . . . What was it that in such a case the protection of the covenant rendered reasonable? He might claim, in my judgment, for his protection, that that business which was his, and to which he had admitted the appellant in the manner defined by the successive agreements, should continue to be his, and that if at any time the contract of employment between himself and his employee came to an end, on such determination the latter should not be in a position to use the intimacies and the knowledge which he had acquired in the course of his employment in order to create a practice of his own in that same place and by doing so undermine the business and the connection of the respondent.

- The judge there uses the phrase "intimacies and knowledge." The knowledge is not, in my opinion, the professional skill that he has acquired, nor, in my opinion, does it cover his reputation as a skilful professional man. The knowledge there referred to is the knowledge of the clients of the practice, their peculiarities, and so forth. It may well be that one cannot effectively give adequate protection in a case of that kind without at the same time giving the employer the benefit of a measure of protection against competition. Protection against competition as such is the one thing which an employer is not entitled to stipulate for, but the fact that a legitimate covenant may also operate to prevent competition does not mean that the covenant is a bad one. The essential thing against which protection can be claimed is what I have mentioned.
- The first step is to ascertain what is the particular business or professional activity which the covenantee is carrying on at the time of the covenant. That does not mean what particular things he has done, but what is the general scope of his business, even although at the moment the covenant was entered into he has not embarked on some of the ordinary branches of it. Here the plaintiffs' activity was that of general medical practitioners. There is no evidence of what that phrase comprises. The definition which counsel for the plaintiffs asks us to accept he formulated in this way: A general medical practitioner is one who holds himself out as prepared to treat any patient for any disease, ailment or injury normally to be met with in the country where he practises.
- I cannot accept that in the absence of evidence, and counsel invited us to apply our own personal knowledge of what a general medical practitioner is normally thought to be. I think it very inconvenient that the court, on a question of that kind, should have to fall back on some knowledge which may not necessarily be the same for each member of the court, but I should have thought it is notorious that the phrase "general medical practitioner" by itself excludes a consultant. It may also exclude a specialist in some particular treatment, but is not a consultant in that he accepts patients who come to him direct, whereas a consultant, in the strict sense of the term, only accepts a patient who is brought to him for consultation with the patient's own medical attendant.
- The covenant here is not confined to prohibition against general medical practice. A covenant confined to that would, I think, unquestionably be good. Counsel for the plaintiffs argued with great force that the covenant would not enable the plaintiffs to protect their general medical practice if it was in terms so limited. The language of the covenant is wide enough to shut out the defendant from any practice of any branch of the medical art. He could not use his medical knowledge in any way whatsoever. The plaintiffs maintained that anything short of that could not effectively protect the goodwill, or the quasi goodwill, of their general medical practice.

- Without going into the question of highly specialised forms of medical practice, such as deep ray therapy, I am quite prepared to think that the protection of a general medical practice might require a prohibition against the carrying on of a specialised practice in cases where the patient could go to the specialist direct and not through another medical man. I can quite see the force of the argument that a specialist who was prepared to accept a patient direct might, by the knowledge and intimacy he acquired with the plaintiff's patients, attract them by his specialised form of treatment as against their less specialised form of treatment, and it may well be that they could be shown to be entitled to that measure of protection. I need not go into that. I am simply saying this by way of caution, and I am not in any way holding that the covenant is bad merely because it might prevent the defendant from setting up as a specialist. EVERSLED, J. gave a list of specialised forms of medical practice which he thought would be prohibited by the covenant as, indeed, they would be, and he thought that the prohibition, so far as it prevented such forms of specialised practice, would be bad. On that I am not prepared without further consideration in a proper case with proper evidence to express an opinion, save what I have already said. I confine myself to the one case of the consultant in the true sense. Can it be said that, if the defendant set up as a consultant in the prohibited district or practised as a consultant by going there two days a week, he would be doing something which would be likely to damage the general medical practice of the plaintiffs? It seems to me that such a prohibition is not reasonably necessary to protect their general medical practice. If a patient were brought to the defendant while he was practising as such a consultant, ex hypothesi he would be brought by another doctor. If he were brought by the plaintiffs, no harm would be suffered by them. If he were brought by another doctor whose patient he was, how could that affect the general medical practice of the plaintiffs?

It was suggested that, if the defendant was not practising as a consultant there, the plaintiffs might be called in by another doctor as consultants with him. That seems to me to be a far-fetched idea, and I cannot myself see on the evidence, at any rate, as it stands, and it would require very strong evidence to displace the view I have formed, how practice as a consultant could injure the general medical practice of the plaintiffs. In my view, a restriction which extends to a consultant's practice is one which is not reasonably necessary for the protection of the plaintiffs' practice. If that be right, it is sufficient to vitiate the whole of the relevant part of the first branch of the covenant. It would be impossible to suggest (and it has not been argued) that the first branch of the covenant could be so severed as to divide medical practice into two branches—consultant practice and general practice—so as to leave the covenant good so far as general practice was concerned, but bad so far as regards a consultant's practice. Therefore, if the view I have suggested is right, the whole of that part of the covenant goes.

I now turn to the second branch of the covenant which covers every professional appointment, and that I read as meaning a professional appointment of a medical man for medical purposes. The covenant prohibits the defendant from accepting any professional appointment whether whole time or otherwise, and whether paid or honorary. Of course, both parts of the covenant apply, not merely when the engagement has come to an end, but during the time when it is alive, and while the engagement is alive such a covenant is quite unobjectionable because the assistant is engaged to give his services to his employers and they are entitled to stipulate that he shall not take other work which would interfere with the fulfilment of his duties. Therefore, during the engagement itself, such a covenant cannot be assailed, but when the engagement comes to an end, can it be said that such a restriction as is contained in the second part of the covenant is reasonably necessary to protect the goodwill of the practice of a general medical practitioner? It would prevent the defendant from becoming medical officer of health. I ask myself how could the defendant, if he were the medical officer of health, use his knowledge to injure the goodwill of the plaintiffs' general medical practice? The only suggestion that counsel for the plaintiffs could make was that, so long as the defendant is there in the neighbourhood occupying a post of a medical nature, he would be keeping himself before the public and at the end of the five-years period would be able to use his particular knowledge of the patients of the plaintiffs. Therefore, what is contemplated is that use of that knowledge at the end of the time stipulated for would operate to the detriment of the plaintiffs. That, of course, is really giving to the covenant an extent in point of time longer than the covenant itself specifies, but, apart from that, it seems to me hopelessly far-fetched to suggest that because a general medical officer of health holds that office in this neighbourhood he would be keeping himself before the public in a manner which would enable him when the five years restriction comes to an end to set up as a general practitioner and take away patients from the plaintiffs. Counsel for the plaintiffs suggested that the defendant might accept some sort of ostensible appointment of that kind and simply use it to keep up his popularity in the neighbourhood with a view to seducing away the patients of the plaintiffs. I think myself that goes far beyond anything reasonably necessary for the protection of that which the plaintiffs are entitled to have protected. I have taken the case of a whole time appointment, but the same point seems to me to apply with regard to a part-time appointment. Suppose the defendant only took a part-time appointment in a hospital, how would that enable him to get away from the plaintiffs' patients of theirs? I cannot see it. That part of the covenant also appears to me to be bad. If I am right in my view as to both branches of the covenant, the whole covenant fails, and, as I have said, there is no necessity to go into the question of severability.

A There was, however, one point which was mentioned, and I think it desirable to express an opinion about it, namely, what is called the onus of proof. It was suggested that it was for the defendant to produce grounds for showing that the covenant was a bad one and not for the plaintiffs to produce grounds for showing that it was a good one. On that point there has been a difference of judicial opinion. Counsel for the plaintiffs relied on a passage ([1921] 2 A.C. 162) in a speech of LORD BIRKENHEAD, L.C., in Fitch v. Dewes (1) :

The agreement then into which he entered, and in respect of which he has accepted for a lengthy period the consideration which was to move from the covenantee towards himself, will naturally stand unless he satisfies your Lordships that it is bad as being in restraint of trade.

C There are other observations in other cases to the same effect. On the other hand, when I come to Herbert Morris, Ltd. v. Saeleby (2), I find in the speech of LORD PARKER of WADDINGTON, this passage ([1916] 1 A.C. 706), referring to what LORD MACNAGHTEN said in the Nordenfjelt (3) case :

D As I read LORD MACNAGHTEN's judgment, he was of opinion that all restraints on trade of themselves, if there is nothing more, are contrary to public policy, and therefore void. It is not that such restraints must of themselves necessarily operate to the public injury, but that it is against the policy of the common law to enforce them except in cases where there are special circumstances to justify them. The onus of proving such special circumstances must, of course, rest on the party alleging them. When once they are proved, it is a question of law for the decision of the judge whether they do or do not justify the restraint. There is no question of onus one way or another.

E I think there are other passages to the same effect in the House of Lords in other cases. I am not sure that LORD HALDANE did not express the same opinion. It is clearly being said there that, if the covenantee alleges that a covenant in restraint of trade is good owing to special circumstances, he must prove the special circumstances on which he relies. It is then for the judge, as a matter of law, to decide whether those special circumstances are sufficient to justify the restraint. In Attwood v. Lamont (4), YOUNGER, L.J., in a judgment in which ATKIN, L.J. concurred, said ([1920] 3 K.B. 587) :

F First, it is the covenantee, the respondent here, who has to show that the restriction sought to be imposed upon the covenantor goes no further than is reasonable for the protection of his business.

G If it is open to me to choose between the two views, I choose that of LORD PARKER accepted as being good law by YOUNGER, L.J. and ATKIN, L.J. The paucity of the evidence in the present case, in so far as it fails to prove special circumstances justifying a restraint as extended as this restraint, must penalise the plaintiffs and not the defendant. It was for them to prove the special circumstances which would justify a restraint as wide as this. They have failed to do so, and in saying that I do not in any way resile from what I said before, that it would require evidence of the very strongest character to my mind to justify a restraint which would cover a consultant's practice or the case of the acceptance of such an appointment as that of a medical officer of health. There is no such evidence here, and, in my opinion, the appeal must fail and be dismissed with costs.

H COHEN, L.J. : I agree. The plaintiffs cannot succeed unless they can satisfy us that the covenant by the defendant not to practise in any department of medicine, surgery or midwifery was reasonable for the protection of their general medical practice, and it was frankly admitted by counsel for the plaintiffs that the ban imposed on the defendant by cl. 12 went beyond a ban on practising as a general practitioner. Indeed, counsel agreed it was intended to bar the defendant from practising the medical art in any capacity whatever. Counsel argued, and I think he may well be right in his argument, that to secure reasonable protection for a general medical practice some fringe extending beyond the walls of general medical practice is reasonably required for the protection of the practice, but I agree with the MASTER OF THE ROLLS that the onus of proving the necessity of the particular fringe which it is desired to justify rests on the plaintiffs seeking to enforce the covenant. I also agree with the MASTER OF THE ROLLS that the plaintiffs have completely failed to bring before us any evidence which would justify us in holding that this covenant restraining, as it would, the defendant from acting as a consultant, in the strict sense of the word, was reasonably required for their protection. I would only add that, supposing the onus was the other way, in my view, the defendant has discharged that onus, for, admittedly, the restriction would debar the defendant from practising in the strict sense of that word, and such a restriction is, in my view, prima facie unreasonable and the onus would be shifted on to the plaintiffs. For the reasons I have already given they have, in my opinion, failed to discharge that onus. On the second branch of the covenant I desire to add nothing to what has been said by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS. In conclusion I would only like to say that, while not expressing any opinion on the question of severability, I am not sure, as at present advised, that I should be prepared to agree that the covenant was severable even to the extent allowed by EVERSHED, J. For these reasons, I agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

WROTTESELEY, L.J.: I agree. It is not enough to put forward a contract of this kind and prove the breach. Such contracts are, prima facie, not enforceable at common law, as LORD PARKER pointed out in the passage in Herbert Morris, Ltd. v. Saxelby (2), already referred to by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS. Therefore, if the legality is challenged, and here it was challenged, the plaintiff must show that, although in restraint of trade, it is not void because in the circumstances it is necessary for the protection of his business and does not go beyond what is reasonable for that purpose. Regarding this covenant as a whole, there was not before the trial judge, as I think, anything to justify a covenant so wide that it would prevent the defendant, inter alia, from acting as a consultant in the prescribed area, that is to say, advising other doctors as to patients in the area. On this ground alone, if the covenant is regarded as a whole, the plaintiffs fail to discharge the onus on them. If considered in its two parts, the first part is bad, or, at any rate, not proved to be good. As to the second part, there was, in my judgment, nothing to show that it was necessary to protect the practice of the plaintiffs that the defendant should be prevented from holding a whole time appointment in the area for five years. On this narrow ground I agree that the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

APPEAL of the defendant, Edith Constance Daoust, from a decision of EVERSHED, J., dated Nov. 20, 1946.

The testator, by his will, gave the residue of his property to an adopted son, John Abbott Donald, for life, and, in the event of the death of John Abbott Donald without issue, to all or any of his [the testator's] nephews or nieces living at the death of John Abbott Donald, and to all or any of the children, living at the death of John Abbott Donald, of any of the nephews or nieces "who shall have died in the lifetime of John Abbott Donald." Edith Constance Daoust, a daughter of William Donald, a nephew of the testator, who had died six months before John Abbott Donald was born, claimed to be entitled to take under the will. Other defendants were David Hepburn, a living nephew of the testator, and Winifred Isabella Handy, a daughter of a niece who had died during the lifetime of John Abbott Donald. EVERSHED, J., giving the phrase "who shall have died in the lifetime of John Abbott Donald" its natural, prima facie meaning, held that the defendant, Edith Constance Daoust, was not entitled to take under the will, since her father died, not during the lifetime of John Abbott Donald, but before he was born. Edith Constance Daoust appealed.

Michael Albery for the defendant, Edith Constance Daoust.

B. S. Tatham for the defendants, David Hepburn and Winifred Isabella Handy.

LORD GREENE, M.R. : This case is not without difficulty, but, in my opinion, the learned judge did not come to the right conclusion. I sympathise with him because, to come to a contrary conclusion, it is necessary to find in this will a sufficient context to justify the court in reading its language in something different from its ordinary meaning.

The testator had an adopted son, John Abbott Donald, who was born on June 10, 1919, and is presumed, by an order of the learned judge, to have died on or shortly after June 21, 1941. The testator also had a number of nephews and nieces. He made his will on Mar. 14, 1930, and died on Apr. 26, 1930. Among his nephews and nieces was one William Donald, who was the father of the present appellant. William Donald died on Jan. 6, 1919, that was, about six months before John Abbott Donald was born. William Donald, therefore, was a nephew of the testator who died before the birth of John Abbott Donald. By his will the testator gave a life interest in his residuary estate to John Abbott Donald and made provision for the children of John Abbott Donald after his death, should he have any. He had no children. By cl. 14 of the will the testator provided as follows :

In the event of the said John Abbott Donald dying without leaving any issue surviving him then subject to any life or lesser interest he may have appointed to his wife if he shall have married and also to payment of the said annuities and the income tax thereon my trustee shall under such circumstances from and after his death hold my residuary estate and the income thereof or so much thereof as shall not have been applied under any of the trusts or powers herein contained In trust in equal shares for all or any of my nephews and nieces children of my brother Thomas Donald and of my sister Isabella Hepburn living at the death of the said John Abbott Donald who being male attain the age of twenty-one years or being female attain that age or marry and for all or any of the children or child living at the death of the said John Abbott Donald who being male attain the age of twenty-one years or being female attain that age or marry of any of my said nephews and nieces who shall have died in the lifetime of the said John Abbott Donald but so that the children of any of my said nephews and nieces who shall have died as aforesaid shall take equally between them only the share which their parent would have taken if he or she had survived the said John Abbott Donald and attained a vested interest.

The defendant, Edith Constance Daoust, being a daughter of William Donald, who died before John Abbott Donald was born, would not appear to take under the natural, prima facie meaning of the words used, because the children of nephews and nieces who are to benefit are confined to the children of nephews and nieces who shall have died in the lifetime of John Abbott Donald. The question, therefore, is whether, on the true construction of this will, a child of William Donald who died before John Abbott Donald was born can take. A number of cases have been cited. I find no assistance in scrutinising the exact language of those cases and comparing it with the language used in this case. In cases dealing with the construction of wills a comparison in, so to speak, parallel columns between the language used in wills which have been the subject of decided cases and that used in the will before the court does not often lead to a useful result. On the contrary, it very often tends to confuse, but I do find in those cases a principle, if I may so call it, and it is this. Quite apart from and beyond the ordinary rule that ambiguous phrases must be construed in accordance with the context, I find that the court has been ready to discover that testators have fallen into a trap, which it is quite easy to fall into, of using tenses ungrammatically and making references to time inaccurately. The question, of course, always is, in any case where such a question arises, whether there is a sufficient indication of intention to be found in the will as to justify the court in saying that the testator has inaccurately used a tense or made some reference to time which fails to carry out his real intention. One thing one is not entitled to do and that is to guess, but there are some matters in this will which I think the court is bound to take into consideration, and it is not, I think, guessing to say that the exclusion of the children of one of the testator's nephews or nieces who happened to die shortly before and not shortly after the birth of John Abbott Donald would, on the face of it, be curious and unexpected. It is true that a testator may desire to exclude certain persons, or he may have used language which is too strong to be overcome, but I think I am entitled to start my examination of this will with the prima facie impression, at any rate, that a provision of that kind is not the sort of provision that one would have expected to find in a comprehensive class gift of this character.

The next thing which strikes me about this will is this. The testator has, first, given the residue, in the event contemplated, viz., of John Abbott Donald having no children, to nephews and nieces of his own living at the death of John Abbott Donald. That is the class. When one reaches that point anyone familiar with wills naturally expects to find that the testator is going presently to deal with a class which does not fulfil that description, namely, children not living at the death of the praepositus. One would expect that that was the division in his mind—those who are living at a particular date and those who are not living at a particular date. When he comes to deal with the contrasting class he alters his phraseology. He goes on to say :

... all or any of the children or child living at the death of the said John Abbott Donald who being male attain the age of twenty-one years or being female attain that age or marry of any of my said nephews and nieces who shall have died in the lifetime of the said John Abbott Donald.

He, therefore, describes the first class as those "living at the death of the said John Abbott Donald," but, when he comes to describe the next generation, he says : "who shall have died in the lifetime of the said John Abbott Donald."

If the words be read in an absolutely literal sense, the clear result is that the precise contrast which one would expect the testator to have been contemplating and which the words "living at the death of the said John Abbott Donald" prepared one to anticipate has not been expressed in the way that one would have expected. In those circumstances, unless the words are moulded so as to provide the proper pendant in the latter clause to the phrase "living at the death" in the former clause, there is a gap in the testator's thoughts. He has not provided an exhaustive alternative. If that be right, and if the principle I find in the cases cited to us entitles me to give effect to it, I think I can find a sufficient context to justify me in giving to the phrase in question a meaning which will carry out what my impression tells me is the probable intention of the testator—an impression which I am not entitled to follow unless it is properly supported. If a complete contrast between the two phrases I have mentioned had been clearly used by the testator, when he came to the second phrase he would have said "children . . . of my said nephews and nieces who shall not be living at the death of the said John Abbott Donald." That, of course, would have included William, who died before John Abbott Donald was born.

The submission of counsel for the defendant, Edith Constance Daoust, was that the phrase "who shall have died" ought to be read in this context as meaning "who shall be dead," and he said that a nephew or niece "who shall be dead" in the lifetime of William Donald was a nephew or niece of the testator of whom it might properly be said that he or she was dead in the lifetime of John Abbott Donald. I do not myself very much like that way of putting it, because it is not a very happy use of the English language to speak of a person, A., who pre-deceased another person, B, by saying that he was dead in the lifetime of B. If the phrase be read as I have suggested it should be read, as equivalent to "who shall not be living at the death"—and if I should be justified in so reading it—the difficulty is cleared away. Counsel for the other defendants pointed out that there is a difference between "dying" and "being dead"—that "dying" is, so to speak, an act and "being dead" is, so to speak, a state, and that the testator has used a phrase much more appropriate to the act of dying than to the state of being dead. I have given, I hope, full force to that argument in considering this case, but, in my opinion, it is really calling for a greater accuracy in the use of phrases such as these than the court is compelled to look for. As I have said, these references to time are traps in which a very small error of draftsmanship can produce a totally different result. One must not speculate. One must construe, and I find here sufficient context to produce the result which I have stated. In my opinion, the appeal succeeds and the appropriate declaration should be made.

MORTON, L.J.: I agree. Having studied this will carefully, I feel a conviction that the testator did not intend to exclude from the class of beneficiaries the children of his nephew, William Donald. Now, is that conviction based on guesswork as to the testator's intention, or is it based on the language which he has used? I think the latter. It is based on the scheme of the will as a whole and, in particular, on the joint effect of cl. 13 and 14. Clause 14 has already been read by my Lord and I shall not read it again. Clause 13 immediately follows a clause which confers a power of appointment on John Abbott Donald, and it is as follows:

And in default of and subject to any such appointment as aforesaid my trustee shall on the death of the said John Abbott Donald stand possessed of the capital and future income of my residuary estate subject to payment of the said annuities in trust for all or any of the children or child of the said John Abbott Donald who shall be living at his death and being male attain the age of twenty-one years or die under that age leaving issue or being female attain that age or marry and any child or children of the said John Abbott Donald who may have died in his lifetime leaving issue living at his death if more than one in equal shares and so that the share hereby expressed to be given to any such deceased child as aforesaid shall vest in his or her representatives as part of his or her personal estate in the same manner as if he or she had survived the said John Abbott Donald and died immediately after him having attained a vested interest.

The contrast in that clause is between the children of John living at John's death and the children of John dying before John's death. There could not, of course, be a child of John who died before John was born. In my view, when we come to cl. 14 the testator intended the same contrast as regards his nephews and nieces, although he employed some inept words. I would, of course, agree that in its more natural meaning the phrase "who shall have died in the lifetime of the said John Abbott Donald" applies only to those nephews and nieces who (a) were living when John was born, and (b) died before John died. But, in my view, what the testator really had in mind was (a) nephews and nieces who survived John and (b) nephews and nieces who predeceased John, quite irrespective of whether the nephews and nieces who predeceased John died before or after John was born. That latter point is wholly irrelevant to what the testator, in my view, had in mind. He is looking to the death of John and he intends that living nephews and nieces shall take and the children of dead nephews and nieces shall also take. He echoes in cl. 14 the phrase "who shall have died in the lifetime," intending to produce by these words the same contrast in cl. 14 as was produced in cl. 13. I feel that, if the testator had intended to cut out William's children, he would have used some such phrase as was used in Re Birchall (1), and expressly excepted William Donald from the class of nephews and nieces whose children he intended to benefit. I do not believe that the testator used the words which he has used in cl. 14 as a method of excluding William's children from taking. I think that this case is one to which the observation in THEOBALD ON WILLS, 9th ed., p. 544, is applicable:

There is another class of cases in which, though the contingency is penned in such a way as not in terms to include the events which happens, yet the court will consider what was the contingency really contemplated by the testator, and will give effect to the will if that contingency happens.

I agree that it serves no useful purpose to compare the facts of other cases with the facts of the present case and to scrutinise narrowly the words of other wills and compare them with the words of this will, but I think I might usefully quote some observations of FRY, J., in Davies v. Davies (2). In that case the relevant words of the will were "in case of my wife dying within twelve months of my own decease." FRY, J. said this (30 W.R. 919):

That undoubtedly, in my judgment, contemplates two things: first, the wife surviving the testator, and, secondly, her dying within the twelve months. I come to that conclusion because, according to my understanding of the words, a person dying within the twelve months does not literally mean a person dying at some time before the end of the twelve months, but it means being alive at the beginning and dead at the end of the period.

The wife, in fact, died before the testator. FRY, J. goes on:

That observation does not conclude the matter because in all these cases the court has to enquire what is the real meaning and object of the clause—what, as has been said in several cases, is the contingency guarded against. Now what, I ask myself, is the contingency guarded against here: is it the contingency of the wife living after the testator and then dying within that period or is it the contingency of the wife not being alive at the expiration of that period?

In the present case I think the contingency contemplated is that of a nephew and niece not being alive at the time when John Abbott Donald died. In my opinion, by allowing this appeal, we shall be giving effect to the real intention of the testator manifested, although somewhat imperfectly expressed, in the words which he has used.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I also agree. During much of the argument I doubted whether there was anything in the context of this will sufficient to displace the plain primary meaning of the disputed words, which seem to me in themselves to be quite unambiguous, but the judgments that my Lords have delivered have, to my relief, dispelled these doubts. I say "my relief" because the literal construction of the words creates an utterly capricious dichotomy between the children of a nephew who died before John Abbott Donald was born and the children of a nephew who died after that date. I entirely concur with the reasoning of my Lords.

Appeal allowed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Cohen and Asquith, L.J.J.), March 19, 20, 1947.]

Bankruptcy — Discharge — Suspension — Jurisdiction — Exercise of discretion — Bankruptcy Act, 1914, (c. 59), ss. 26, 108.

On July 11, 1939, the application for discharge by a bankrupt, whose adjudication had taken place on Dec. 8, 1938, was refused. On Jan. 14, 1947, on a further application, the registrar ordered that the discharge be suspended for 3 years from Oct. 22, 1946. The bankrupt's assets were not of a value equal to 10s. in the £ on the amount of his unsecured liabilities; he had contracted debts provable in the bankruptcy without, at the time of contracting them, having any reasonable or probable ground of expectation of being able to pay them; he had brought on or contributed to his bankruptcy by rash and hazardous speculation and unjustifiable extravagance in living; and he had on a previous occasion been adjudged bankrupt:—

HELD: the decision of the registrar violated no principle, there was no misdirection of law, and the suspension ordered was not so excessive or severe as to justify the court in interfering with the registrar's exercise of his discretion.

Per curiam: (i) In spite of the language of the Bankruptcy Act, s. 26, which requires the court, in the circumstances therein stated, either to refuse or suspend the discharge for a period or deal with it in other certain specified ways, the registrar, who had refused the discharge on the original application, would have had ample jurisdiction on the second application, had he thought proper, to order an immediate discharge under s. 108.

(ii) The Court of Appeal will always be alive to the fact that bankruptcy registrars have great experience in bankruptcy matters and have before them continuously a great variety of cases in which circumstances differ. They are pre-eminently a tribunal whose discretion will not be interfered with unless there exists some good ground. The protection of the public is a matter to be taken into account when the length of suspension of a bankrupt's discharge is being considered, but no rule can be laid down regarding the length of suspension which would be applicable to every class of case. The whole circumstances of the bankruptcy must be regarded to see whether the date to which the discharge of the bankrupt is ultimately remitted is excessively remote. The court will interfere only where it comes to the conclusion that the discretion has been unconscionably exercised in the matter of the length of suspension of discharge, but no court has jurisdiction to bind the [discretion of its successors in bankruptcy jurisdiction in any way.

APPEAL by a bankrupt from an order of a registrar suspending his discharge for 3 years. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R.

Andrew Clark, K.C., and G. F. Kingham for the bankrupt.

R. E. Seaton for the trustee.

LORD GREENE, M.R.: This is an appeal by the bankrupt from an order of the registrar dated Jan. 14, 1947, whereby he ordered that the discharge of the bankrupt be suspended for 3 years from Oct. 22, 1946. The application was made under s. 108 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, under which the court has power to review its previous orders. The adjudication took place as long ago as Dec. 8, 1938. The bankrupt applied for his discharge soon after the adjudication. The registrar refused that application for discharge by an order dated July 11, 1939. At that time the trustee had not completed his investigations, but it is clear to me that, even if those investigations had been completed, the registrar would have regarded the facts as sufficient to justify him in refusing the discharge. The facts as found are very serious. They were these :

That the bankrupt's assets are not of a value equal to 10s. in the £ on the amount of his unsecured liabilities ; that the bankrupt has contracted debts provable in the bankruptcy without having at the time of contracting them any reasonable or probable ground of expectation of being able to pay them ; that the bankrupt has brought on or contributed to his bankruptcy by rash and hazardous speculation and by unjustifiable extravagance in living ; that the bankrupt has on a previous occasion been adjudged bankrupt.

When the present application came before the registrar, he referred to his previous order, and in his judgment there is a suggestion that it might not be open to him under s. 108 to grant an immediate discharge. He doubted whether he would have power to grant an immediate discharge, having regard to the language of s. 26, which requires the court, in the circumstances stated, either to refuse or suspend the discharge for a period or deal with it in other certain specified ways. I do not think that that doubt which he expressed about his powers to grant an immediate discharge is justified by the language of the statute. I think he would have had ample jurisdiction on this application, had he thought proper, to order an immediate discharge. That, however, is not the reason on which his decision is grounded. He does not ground it on lack of jurisdiction, about which he expresses no more than a doubt. He grounds it on the facts of the case. His language with regard to those facts is very strong, but I do not think it is the least bit too strong. He said that the conduct of the bankrupt had been unsatisfactory throughout the whole of the case and that in his public examination and possibly at other times he had not shown the frankness that he ought to have shown. That is a minor point, but the registrar describes the bankrupt in these words :

I think he is an adventurer. He has been bankrupt before. I think he entered into this speculation with a view to saving the shares of the three companies in which he and his family were interested and took over these liabilities without the slightest prospect of being able to meet them. That is the essence of the bankruptcy offence, taking over liabilities without any reasonable or probable ground of expectation of being able to meet them. It did not matter that he did not expect to be called upon. The point was that, if he were called on, could he meet them ? He could not. It is a bad case in that respect.

The registrar said—and it does not surprise me—that, in his opinion, the bankrupt wanted teaching a thorough lesson. The salient points on which the registrar based his judgment were, first, the previous bankruptcy, and, second, the bankruptcy offence of contracting debts which the bankrupt had no reasonable or probable ground of expectation of being able to pay. That particular charge is linked up with, and, indeed, is based on the same set of facts as, the charge of rash and hazardous speculation. I do not propose to go into the question of what those speculations were. They are set out in the Official Receiver's report, and I am bound to say for myself that the description of them is amply justified. The speculations were undoubtedly rash and hazardous. He had no reasonable or probable ground of expectation of being able to pay the liabilities he had contracted which are referred to and the figures are very large. By these operations he has brought financial disaster on a number of innocent people, and the position of his other creditors is grievously affected by his liabilities having been so enormously increased by his taking on his shoulders the burden which is derived from these operations. It is sufficient to say that the charges are entirely proved and the case is, in my opinion, a very bad one. The partly secured creditors are going to be left under a very heavy loss ; the unsecured creditors are going to get not one penny. The previous bankruptcy has a very important bearing on the question that we have to decide. The bankrupt had been adjudicated bankrupt on Jan. 3, 1922. In that bankruptcy it was found that he had been guilty of the same conduct as he was found guilty of in this bankruptcy, viz., rash and hazardous speculation. He obtained his discharge on Nov. 28, 1922, subject to a 3 years' suspension. In so far as suspension of discharge on that occasion was to be looked on as a curative medicine, it seems to have had very little effect, because here he is again, on a very much increased scale, indulging in rash and hazardous speculations. It was perfectly legitimate, and, indeed, I think, necessary, for the registrar, when deciding what suspension, if any, he should impose on this occasion, to bear in mind that the curative effect of a 3 years' suspension in the previous bankruptcy appears to have been nil.

A The statute has given to the registrar a discretion and this court will always be alive to the fact that the bankruptcy registrars have great experience in bankruptcy matters and have before them continuously a great variety of cases in which circumstances differ. They are pre-eminently a tribunal whose discretion will not be interfered with by this court unless there exists some good ground. The principles affecting that question of good ground, of course, are well known.

B Counsel for the bankrupt urged that the length of the suspension is unconscionably severe, because it would result in 10 years elapsing between the adjudication and the final discharge. He referred to one case in which a Divisional Court had, on an appeal from a county court, reduced a suspension of 5 years to 2 years and had expressed the view that suspension for 5 years should be reserved for very bad cases. No rule as to length of period, for the purpose of judging its severity, can, I think, be laid down so as to be applicable to every class of case. One has to look at the whole circumstances of the bankruptcy and see whether the date to which the discharge of the bankrupt is ultimately remitted is excessively remote. There, C again, I think it is a question of discretion, subject to this, that the court will always interfere where it comes to the conclusion that the discretion has been unconscionably exercised in the matter of the length of the suspension. I do not take the remarks of the Divisional Court in Re Swabey (1), which counsel relies on, as laying down any sort of rule to bind the discretion of the court on future occasions. The court had no jurisdiction, if I may respectfully say D so, to bind the discretion of its successors in bankruptcy jurisdiction in any such way. Every case has to be decided on its merits. Whether or not I personally should have imposed such a long period is neither here nor there. It is sufficient for me to say that the period which the registrar thought fit is not one that, in my opinion, is so unconscionable as to justify us in interfering with his discretion.

E The other point on which counsel relied was this. He said there are certain general principles laid down by the judges in the past on which the discretion ought to be exercised. I myself always hesitate to extract from observations on the exercise of a discretion general principles which will operate to fetter that discretion in the future. We have been warned many times, especially in recent years, of the impropriety of attempting to lay down principles which would fetter a discretion in dealing with the facts of some individual case. Counsel took as the starting point of his general principles F some observations in Re Gaskell (2), a case in this court, in which VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., said ([1904] 2 K.B. 482) :

G After all, the overriding intention of the legislature in all Bankruptcy Acts is that the debtor on giving up the whole of his property shall be a free man again, able to earn his livelihood, and having the ordinary inducements to industry. Sometimes it is not right that the bankrupt should be free immediately ; he must pass through a period of probation ; and theoretically there may be cases in which he ought not to be free at all, but prima facie he is to give up everything he has, and on doing that he is to be made a free man.

H It may well be that that was a helpful angle from which to regard the facts of that case, but, with all respect, it gives me no great assistance in dealing with the facts of this case, because when one says that the overriding intention of the legislature is that the bankrupt shall become a free man again when he gives up his property, one is really saying no more than that, subject to anything which the Act may provide, that is what the court has got to do, viz., set him free. The question then is : Do the qualifying provisions in the Act apply in the present case, and how ought they to apply ? In solving that problem, the reference to overriding intention, however helpful it may have been in that case, does not appear to me to lay down any general rule by which we are helped in this case, nor do I see how it could be applied to such a case as the present.

The other matters of principle which counsel says were laid down were that the jurisdiction to suspend a discharge is a penal jurisdiction, that the refusal to grant a discharge operates as a punishment, that there is no reason to continue the punishment after its object has been effected, and that to continue it after the necessity for it has ceased is unnecessary from the point of view of the bankrupt and detrimental to the public. I put all those together, although counsel divided them into separate propositions, but they are all based on what was said by a Divisional Court in Re Tobias (3). There CAVE, J., with whose judgment VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., concurred, said this in reference to the facts of that case ([1891] 1 Q.B. 465):

In such a case as this, however, where the refusal of the discharge operates as a punishment on the bankrupt, there can be no reason why the punishment should not be remitted at any distance of time, if it can be shown that the object of the punishment has been effected. No one is affected by the modification or rescission of such an order except the bankrupt himself, and to some extent society at large, which is benefited by the infliction of a punishment just in proportion to its justice and necessity, and is therefore injured and not benefited by the continuance of a punishment after the necessity for it has ceased.

The first question one asks oneself in reference to that language is: How is it shown in the present case that the object of the punishment has been effected? The object of the punishment of refusal of discharge is, looked at from that angle, to reform the bankrupt. How can we say that this bankrupt has given up his tendency to rash and hazardous speculation when we find that precisely the same offence as on the previous bankruptcy, punished by a 3 years' suspension, has cropped up again in his subsequent transactions? In fact, the task of discovering whether the object of the punishment has been effected in the sense of reforming the bankrupt may in many cases be almost impossible, and whether or not it has had that effect must be a matter very largely of speculation. It stands out here that the habits of this bankrupt were not affected for the better by his previous experience.

Then the observations of CAVE, J. deal with the position of the public. It is, I think, a little misleading to concentrate too much on the penal aspect of the power to refuse or postpone discharge. It has several aspects. The committal of any of the various misdeeds referred to in s. 26 qualifies the right of the bankrupt to obtain the full advantage which bankruptcy legislation has conferred on him, viz., the right, in proper circumstances and subject to the proper conditions, to rid himself of the burden of debt which is weighing him down. There is another aspect of it which is, as COHEN, L.J., pointed out during the argument, inherent in what CAVE, J. said, that, if a bankrupt has become to a greater or less extent a danger to the public, that would be a very good reason for extending the period of suspension. That, I think, is to be found in the reference to the benefit to the public by the infliction of a punishment in proportion to its necessity. It seems to me that that is a matter which ought to be taken into consideration by the tribunal in deciding whether or not the bankrupt should be kept away from the public for an extended period of time. I can quite imagine cases where the tribunal would be justified in saying: "This man shall never have a discharge, because he is an incorrigible public danger and it is necessary for the protection of the public to see that he never has the opportunity again." That, of course, would be a very extreme and rare case. I am not sufficiently familiar with what happens in these cases to know whether in practice it ever does happen, but in theory it would be a perfectly proper thing to do in a suitable case.

In my opinion, the decision of the registrar does not violate any principle. I can find no misdirection by him of himself in law. The suspension which he has ordered does not appear to me to be so excessive and severe as to justify this court in interfering with what he has done. In the result, the appeal must be dismissed.

COHEN, L.J.: I agree so entirely both with the conclusion which LORD GREENE, M.R., has reached and with the reasons he has given for it that I do not desire to add any words of my own.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I also entirely agree.

Appeal dismissed.

TWYFORD v. PUNTSCHART AND OTHERS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Atkinson and Oliver, JJ.),
April 18, 1947.]

Medicine and Pharmacy—Dentist—Practice of dentistry by unregistered person —“Advice . . . in connection with the fitting . . . of artificial teeth”— Alteration to denture—Dentists Act, 1921 (c. 21), ss. 1, 14 (2).

A By the Dentists Act, 1921, s. 1, it is an offence for any person not registered as a dentist under the Dentists Act, 1878, to practice dentistry, and by s. 14 (2) the practice of dentistry includes “the performance of any such operation and the giving of any such treatment, advice, or attendance as is usually performed or given by dentists, and any person who performs any operation or gives any treatment, advice, or attendance on or to any person as preparatory to or for the purpose of or in connection with the fitting, insertion, or fixing of artificial teeth shall be deemed to have practised dentistry within the meaning of this Act.” A shop assistant, who was not a registered dentist, told a customer that her teeth were all the same size and looked too artificial and could be improved. She suggested that the customer should exchange the teeth and offered to supply six plastic teeth for £3 3s. and gold fillings to take away the artificial look. On an appeal from a decision of justices that this was not the practice of dentistry,

C HELD: “advice . . . in connection with the fitting, insertion, or fixing of artificial teeth” meant in connection with the fitting to the mouth itself and did not cover an alteration to an existing denture, and the shop assistant was not, therefore, carrying on the practice of dentistry as defined in s. 14 (2).

E CASE STATED by Southport justices.

The first respondent was charged under an information that she, not being registered as a dentist under the Dentists Act, 1878, unlawfully did practise dentistry, and the second respondents, her employers, Jay & Pariser, Ltd., were charged with aiding and abetting her in the practise of dentistry. The magistrates dismissed the information and the appellant, a solicitor acting on behalf of the Dental Board of the United Kingdom appealed. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

F

J. D. Casswell, K.C., and D. C. Bartley for the appellant.

D. J. Brabin for the respondents.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The Dentists Act, 1921, s. 14 (2) provides:

G For the purposes of this Act, the practice of dentistry shall be deemed to include the performance of any such operation and the giving of any such treatment, advice, or attendance as is usually performed or given by dentists, and any person who performs any operation or gives any treatment, advice, or attendance on or to any person as preparatory to or for the purpose of or in connection with the fitting, insertion, or fixing of artificial teeth shall be deemed to have practised dentistry within the meaning of this Act.

The magistrates' finding was:

H Puntschart told Dunn her teeth were all the same size and looked too artificial and could be improved. Puntschart suggested that Dunn should exchange the teeth and offered to supply Dunn with six plastic teeth for £3 3s. 0d. and gold fillings for others of her teeth to take away the artificial look.

It is admitted on behalf of the appellant that a dental mechanic may, without committing any offence, repair a denture which is brought to him. If he may repair a denture that is brought to him, it is obvious he may make a repair which involves replacement of teeth affixed to the denture. There is no reference to a denture in the sub-section. When we find the facts that are found by the magistrates here—and in every case it must be largely a question of fact whether what was done amounted to “treatment, advice, or attendance on or to any person as preparatory to or for the purpose of or in connection with the fitting, insertion, or fixing of artificial teeth”—I cannot think that because a dental mechanic says to a person who comes into the shop in which she is employed that the customer’s looks could be improved if her teeth were not all of the same size and offers to fix some teeth—not to make a denture, nor to interfere with the existing denture, but to replace one, two or more teeth on the denture with others which are of different colour or size—that that is in any sense an offence against this section. I think the magistrates’ conclusion was a perfectly proper conclusion on the facts they found and that this appeal fails.

ATKINSON, J. : I agree. In Hennan & Co., Ltd., v. Duckworth (1), a man who was not a dentist sued for the price of a set of teeth which he had supplied to the defendant. In that case he had actually made a set of teeth and fitted them, and the defence was that the fee could not be recovered because it was for the performance of a dental operation or for dental attendance or advice. LORD ALVERSTONE said (90 L.T. 548) :

The language used in s. 5 [of the Dentists Act, 1878] is that the unregistered person shall not be entitled to recover any fee or charge “for the performance of any dental operation, or for any dental attendance or advice.” In my opinion, prima facie certainly, the words in that section “dental operation” mean operation upon the person—on the mouth of the patient; “dental attendance” would mean advising in respect of the condition of the mouth, or as to what should be done, and “advice” would, of course, mean something of the same character. If it had been intended by the legislature that the section should go on and say: “And nothing supplied by the dentist in pursuance or in consequence of such advice shall be charged for”; I think we should expect to find those words there.

WILLS, J., said (ibid., p. 548) :

I do not think that it is possible to say that making the teeth can come under “dental attendance or advice.” Therefore, we are really driven to the question whether the words “dental operation” are sufficiently large to include such work as this. It seems to me that a dental operation—an operation in respect of the teeth—really means an operation in a surgical sense, something that is to be done, not upon the false teeth, but upon the living person, and that what really is charged for here is that which was not done upon the person, but was done upon the incomplete set of false teeth, in order to make them fit . . .

Since then, the definition of the offence has been enlarged, but there are no words which extend the meaning of “advice.” The legislature must be presumed to have known what the law was at that time, and if it had been intended to make it an offence to do work on an existing denture, something would have been put in the section to make that clear. There is no extension of the word “operation,” which is one of the dominant words in the section. Therefore, we are not entitled to give a different meaning to the word “operation” than that attributed to it in the case I have mentioned, and when one comes to the words: “in connection with the fitting, insertion, or fixing of artificial teeth,” I can see no reason why the argument which prevailed in that case should not prevail here, viz., that these words mean the fitting, insertion or fixing of artificial teeth in connection with the mouth itself. Merely altering an existing denture seems to me to be something which is not covered by the section, but, apart from that, it must be a question of fact in each case, dependent on the circumstances, whether an offence has been committed. The justices here did not find that “advice” had been given. What the first respondent did was merely to suggest that there should be an alteration in the denture. I think there is evidence to justify their conclusion, and the appeal fails.

OLIVER, J. : I agree that on the facts found in this case, the magistrates came to a correct conclusion. Had there been any finding of fact that any part of the fitting to the patient’s mouth was to be affected by the advice given, I would have come to a different conclusion, but there is no such finding.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Highways—Diversion—Powers of quarter sessions—No appeal against diversion order—Highways Act, 1835 (c. 50), ss. 84, 85.

A A certificate in relation to the diversion of a highway lodged with the clerk of the peace in accordance with s. 85 of the Highways Act, 1835, showed that all formalities with regard to notices, view by the justices, etc., had been complied with, but, in the view of quarter sessions, the proposed new road was less commodious than the old one because it contained two new right-angled turns and debouched into another road in an unsatisfactory way. Quarter sessions, accordingly, held that the certificate was bad on the face of it, and refused to enrol it. On an application by the local authority for an order of mandamus directing quarter sessions to enrol the certificate and make the necessary order :—

B HELD : Quarter sessions had no jurisdiction to go into the question of the convenience or adequacy of the proposed new highway ; their duty, if there was no appeal, was to satisfy themselves that the statutory provisions had been complied with, and, that on the face of the certificate, the proceedings were in order, and, if satisfied, to enrol the certificate and make the necessary order ; and, therefore, an order for mandamus would be made.

MOTION for an order of mandamus directing the Essex Quarter Sessions to enrol a certificate of justices diverting a highway under the Highways Act, 1835, ss 84-85. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

E H. C. Leon and I. H. Jacob for the applicant.

The respondents were not represented.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : The applicants move for an order of mandamus directed to the quarter sessions for the county of Essex directing them to enrol a certificate of justices diverting a highway under ss. 84 and 85 of the Highways Act, 1835. The road in question is in the county borough of East Ham, and when the matter came before the quarter sessions, the court said they were satisfied that all formalities with regard to the notices, view by the justices, etc., had been complied with, but they declined to enrol the certificate, because, in their opinion, the new highway was not more commodious than the old highway, for reasons which they gave. These reasons were that the new highway set out on the plan involved two right-angle turns instead of a straight road through, and they thought that where the traffic taking those turns would debouch into another road the position was unsatisfactory as compared with that afforded by the old road. On those grounds they expressed the opinion that the certificate was bad on its face, and, accordingly, they refused to enrol it, at the same time saying they would welcome the guidance of the High Court on the matter.

H The Highways Act, 1835, provides what is to be done where it is proposed either to stop up or divert a highway, I need not go through all its various provisions, but, if two justices, who have to view the highway under ss. 84 and 85, approve the application, a certificate is prepared which must show that the justices have been satisfied and all the various steps and conditions precedent to quarter sessions enrolling the certificate have been properly carried out. Provision is also made for the depositing with the clerk of the peace of the certificate and the plan before the application comes to quarter sessions, so that any person who is aggrieved may appeal to the sessions. The only ground on which, apparently, the quarter sessions can refuse to enrol the certificate, where there is no appeal, is if they see on the face of the certificate that the proceedings have not been in order.

It is their duty, as pointed out by COLERIDGE, J. in R. v. Worcestershire, JJ. (1), to satisfy themselves that the provisions of the statute have been complied with, and, if they are satisfied that the provisions of the statute have been complied with, it is not for this court or any other court to question their decision on those matters. The only way in which the certificate can be attacked is by a notice of appeal being served, and the quarter sessions have then to empanel a jury to decide whether or not the road is equally convenient, or more or less convenient, and generally whether or not it is desirable in the public interest that the closing order or diversion order should be made. The matters on which the quarter sessions acted in this case are matters on which they would have had to have taken the opinion of a jury, if anybody had appealed, but, in fact, nobody did appeal. One point that occurred to me in the course of the case, and about which I felt considerable doubt, was that it seems to me, that the plan which has been deposited and has to be enrolled in the county records along with the certificate in certain respects does not comply with the section. If the quarter sessions had taken that point and refused to enrol the plan, I do not think this court could have interfered, but a statement of the decision of quarter sessions which has been submitted to the chairman shows that quarter sessions declared themselves satisfied with the plan and that all necessary preliminaries and conditions precedent had been complied with.

That being so, the only question that is left is whether it was a good ground on which quarter sessions refused to enrol the certificate. For the reasons I have given, it seems to me it is not, because the quarter sessions cannot decide the question of convenience or adequacy. That is a question which can only be decided by the jury. I have had some doubt whether we ought to order a plan which, in my opinion, does not comply with the provisions of the statute, to be enrolled, but the matters in which the plan does not comply with the statute are trifling, and no point has been taken by quarter sessions. It appears that the plan adequately represents that which is proposed to be done, and gives adequate information to the public who choose to investigate it, though I do not suppose they will. In those circumstances, an order of mandamus will go.

ATKINSON, J.: I agree. The duty of the justices when a certificate is lodged with the clerk of the peace is clearly defined in R. v. Worcestershire, JJ. (1) where COLERIDGE, J., said (3 E. & B. 489, 490):

This certificate, when lodged with the clerk of the peace in order to inspection (sic.) and subsequent enrolment, may be either appealed against or not. If the latter, s. 91 of the statute comes into operation, and the justices at sessions must make their order for diverting or stopping up as the case may be.

Then he proceeded to deal with the position if the certificate did not clearly cover all the ground—for instance, if the plan did not contain the necessary measurements—and he goes on:

These consequences are so serious, that we conclude that it is the duty of the sessions, where there is no appeal, to be satisfied that the certificate comes before them correct on its face, and accompanied by plan and proof, such as the statute requires. Unless this be done, neither the public, nor interested individuals, will have the protection which the statute intended. But, if this be the duty of the justices at sessions and within their competence, when there is no appeal, how can it be maintained that, when there is an appeal, it is less a part of their duty, and not within their competence, to decide upon the very same questions if presented to them by the appellant. It must be trusted to the court to determine what apparent defects are merely formal and no grievance, and what are substantial . . .

In R. v. Surrey JJ. (2), CHANNELL, J. said ([1908] 1 K.B. 377):

Moreover the question whether the certificate and plan, which they are asked to enrol, comply with the requirements of the section is a matter which the magistrates have to inquire into. And therefore, even if in our opinion they had been wrong, the case would not be one for a mandamus.

That means that the view of quarter sessions is final in matters of that sort. It seems to me that, once quarter sessions had expressed the view that the certificate and plan were in accordance with the requirements of the Act, their duty was to order the enrolment of the certificate and they had no power to consider whether or not they agreed with the opinion formed by the two justices who had viewed the highway. I agree that this mandamus ought to go.

OLIVER, J. : I agree. Once it is established that the certificate, the plan and the notice which came before quarter sessions are in order, then, if there is no appeal, by virtue of s. 91 of the Act, quarter sessions have no option to do anything else except enrol the certificate. I agree that the mandamus should go.

Order for mandamus.

ANDREWS v. CORDINER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Atkinson and Oliver, JJ.), April 16, 1947.]

Evidence—Admissibility—Documentary evidence—Regimental record—Bastardy proceedings by married woman—Evidence of non-access by husband—Evidence Act, 1938 (c. 28), s. 1.

A married woman in bastardy proceedings brought by her, sought to give as evidence her husband's regimental record to prove that there was no possibility of access by him during the period of gestation.

HELD : a regimental record, produced from the proper custody and by the officer in custody of it, was admissible evidence under the Evidence Act, 1938, s. 1.

[EDITORIAL NOTE. It is interesting to compare the present case (which is a civil matter to which the Evidence Act, 1938, applies) and the decision in Pettit v. Lilley ([1946] 1 All E.R. 593; 110 J.P. 218), which was a criminal case, and so not affected by the Act of 1938. In Pettit v. Lilley, in registering the birth of a child, the respondent had given her husband's name as the father. She was convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction of having made a false statement, contrary to the Perjury Act, 1911, s. 4, on the ground that her husband was overseas on military service at the time that the child was conceived. She appealed to quarter sessions, and at the hearing of the appeal, to prove non-access the prosecution sought to put in evidence certain regimental records relating to the husband, and the officer in charge of the records was called as a witness. He stated that the records in question were official records and documents, kept by a government department and preserved at the Regimental Records Office, but they were not documents to which the public had access, nor were they kept for the use or information of the public. The recorder of Cambridge held that the records were not admissible under the common law, and, since there was no other evidence, he found that the case was not proved and quashed the conviction. On appeal to the High Court, it was held that regimental records were not public documents because they were not documents to which the public could have access and were kept, not for the use and information of the public, but for the information of the Crown and the Executive. They were, therefore, confidential documents which the Crown could refuse to produce, and so not admissible as evidence. In an Editorial Note to Pettit v. Lilley it was pointed out that it was clear on authority that it was essential for the admissibility of public documents as such, that the public should have access to them and they had no such right in the case of Army records. The present case illustrates how the Evidence Act, 1938, has changed the common law in civil cases.

FOR THE EVIDENCE ACT, 1938, s. 1, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 31, pp. 145, 146].

CASE STATED by East Coquetdale Ward, Northumberland, justices.

In bastardy proceedings by a married woman, the justices held that the husband's regimental record was admissible evidence under the Evidence Act, 1938, s. 1, and was sufficient evidence of non-access by the husband to enable them to make the bastardy order. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by OLIVER, J.

John Charlesworth for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear, and was not represented.

OLIVER, J., delivered the following judgment of the court. This case raises the question whether in bastardy proceedings the justices were entitled to treat as admissible in evidence a certain regimental record, which purported to show that the husband of the respondent, a woman who was taking bastardy proceedings against the appellant in this case, had had no chance of access to her during the period of her gestation preceding the birth of the child in question. I may mention in passing that, where a married woman brings bastardy proceedings, she cannot succeed unless she proves affirmatively that there was no possibility of access by her husband during the period of gestation. To satisfy the justices of non-access, one James Scringeur was called, who deposed that he was a warrant officer in the records office of the Royal Air Force at Gloucester, that it was part of his duty as such to take charge of the service records of various personnel in the Royal Air Force, and that those records showed (inter alia) the dates of departure from and return to the United Kingdom of members of the Royal Air Force. He produced the permanent record relating to Corporal David Cordiner, the husband of the respondent. The record disclosed that Corporal Cordiner proceeded to the Middle East on May 17, 1943, and served continuously overseas until Nov. 19, 1945, and that at no time during that period of service was he granted leave to the United Kingdom. The child was born on March 10, 1945. The record produced by the witness was said to be the property of the Air Ministry and a Crown privileged document. The question for our decision is whether the justices were entitled to take that evidence of Scringeur into consideration in coming to their decision. They decided that it was admissible and was sufficient evidence of non-access to enable them to make the bastardy order.

There is no direct authority on this matter, but the point argued by counsel for the appellant was that the justices were wrong in holding that that evidence was admissible under the Evidence Act, 1938. It is conceded by counsel for the appellant that the document in question, the regimental record, falls within the definition in s. 1 (1) (i) of the Act of 1938 :

... if the maker of the statement either—(a) had personal knowledge of the matters dealt with by the statement ; or (b) where the document in question is or forms part of a record purporting to be a continuous record, made the statement (in so far as the matters dealt with thereby are not within his personal knowledge) in the performance of a duty to record information supplied to him by a person who had, or might reasonably be supposed to have, personal knowledge of those matters . . .

Counsel for the appellant agrees that this regimental record is such a document as that. The sub-section proceeds :

Provided that the condition that the maker of the statement shall be called as a witness need not be satisfied if he is dead, or unfit by reason of his bodily or mental condition to attend as a witness, or if he is beyond the seas and it is not reasonably practicable to secure his attendance, or if all reasonable efforts to find him have been made without success.

Not much of the proviso applies to this case, except that there is certainly a reasonable inference that one or more of the presumably numerous makers of entries in this regimental record are, or have been at material times, abroad.

Section 1 (2) provides :

In any civil proceedings, the court may at any stage of the proceedings, if having regard to all the circumstances of the case it is satisfied that undue delay or expense would otherwise be caused, order that such a statement as is mentioned in sub-s. (1) of this section shall be admissible as evidence or may, without any such order having been made, admit such a statement in evidence.

That gives an exceedingly wide power, and it is on that power, certainly in part, that the justices appear to have acted :

... if having regard to all the circumstances of the case it is satisfied that undue delay or expense would otherwise be caused. . .

If everyone who had made an entry in a regimental record of this sort must be brought from abroad to give evidence about it, it would be difficult to imagine a case in which more undue delay and expense would probably be caused.

Counsel for the appellant relied mainly on s. 1 (4) which provides :

For the purposes of this section, a statement in a document shall not be deemed to have been made by a person unless the document or the material part thereof was written, made or produced by him with his own hand, or was signed or initialled by him or otherwise recognised by him in writing as one for the accuracy of which he is responsible, and said that there was no evidence that any of those matters existed in this case, but my Lord pointed out the following sub-section as extricating the matter from difficulty :

(5) For the purpose of deciding whether or not a statement is admissible as evidence by virtue of the foregoing provisions [including sub-s. (4)] the court may draw any reasonable inference from the form or contents of the document in which the statement is contained, or from any other circumstances . . .

A How could any document have greater probability of accuracy—and that is, after all, the reason for which it is relied on—and how could any evidence come from a more compelling source than a regimental record of this nature? There is the nature of the document, the fact that it comes from the proper custody, the fact that it is produced by the officer in custody of it, the fact that there is no temptation on anyone's part to record entries falsely, and the consequent probability that the entries are true. In these circumstances, the court thinks that the justices acted very properly in this matter, and the appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

R. v. WEYMOUTH CORPORATION, Ex parte TELETAX (WEYMOUTH), LTD.

C [KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Atkinson and Oliver, JJ.), April 16, 1947.]

Street and Aerial Traffic—Hackney carriage—Licence—Change of ownership of licensed hackney carriage—New owner's right to amendment of licence and register—Town Police Clauses Act, 1847 (c.89), s. 37.

D The licence in respect of a hackney carriage granted under the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, s. 37, is granted to the carriage and not to the owner of the carriage, and, therefore, if a change of ownership takes place during the time for which the licence is valid, the new owner is entitled to have his name entered on the licence and the register of licences in place of that of the former owner.

MOTION for order of mandamus.

F The applicants had acquired five taxicabs which were licensed by the Weymouth Corporation under the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, s. 37, the licences being current. They applied to the corporation to recognise and give effect to the change of ownership by substituting their name for the names of the former owners on the licences and the register of licences, but the corporation refused the application. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

J. T. Molony for the applicants.

Vernon Gattie for the respondents.

G LORD GODDARD, C.J.: In my opinion, this mandamus must go. The question that is raised is one of considerable importance to local authorities who are entrusted with the duty of granting licences in respect of hackney carriages under the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, and it is, apparently, a question which has never yet been the subject of a decision in this court.

H The facts necessary to be stated are few. Some time in the summer of 1946, the applicants for this mandamus, a company called Teletax, Ltd., acquired five taxicabs from different persons in the borough of Weymouth, which taxicabs at that time had been licensed for one year at the general licensing meeting held for that purpose by the corporation of Weymouth. The licences would not expire until April 30, 1947. Having acquired those taxicabs, the applicants applied to the town council for the licences which had been granted in respect of those taxicabs to be transferred to them.

The matter was the subject of several debates. The watch committee, to whom these applications go in the first instance, reported to the council against the application, and the council affirmed the watch committee. At a later date, the watch committee advised that licences should be issued to the applicants, but the council declined to adopt that recommendation and refused the application. The precise nature of the application which the applicants desired to make was put forward in a letter from their solicitors, dated Dec. 16, 1946, saying :

We think it well, therefore, for you to know that our clients' counsel has advised that your council, under the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, are bound, by necessary implication to consider and give effect to changes in owners of licensed vehicles, and that mandamus will lie to compel them so to act and to exclude irrelevant matters from their consideration. A

When the application for leave to move was made, the relief that was claimed was :

... an order for mandamus to the Weymouth Borough Council to hear and determine according to law the application of the applicants to recognise and give effect to the change of ownership of the said 5 hackney carriages by amendment of the licences and the council's register of licences, or, alternatively, the issue of new licences in the name of the applicants. B

The matter depends on the true construction of certain sections in the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, for it is under that Act that local authorities grant hackney carriage licences. In my opinion, the sole question is whether or not licences are granted in respect of cabs or in respect of proprietors of cabs. Before a vehicle can be on the road to ply for hire a licence must be obtained, no matter who the driver is, whether he is a licensed driver or not, because I shall show that by s. 46 of the Act of 1847 the licensing of drivers is with regard to the driving of licensed cabs. C

The commissioners may from time to time licence to ply for hire within the prescribed distance, or if no distance is prescribed, within 5 miles from the general post office of the city, town, or place to which the special Act refers, (which in that case shall be deemed the prescribed distance,) such number of hackney coaches or carriages of any kind or description adapted to the carriage of persons as they think fit. D

That seems to be a reasonably clear section, and, if we give it the ordinary meaning which the English language bears, it is clear that the commissioners are to license a vehicle as a hackney carriage. It seems plain that Parliament had in mind that it was desirable that the commissioners should be able to control the number of carriages which plied for hire in a given area and should also be entitled to prescribe the kind and the description of the carriages. No doubt, the local authority would have power to refuse to grant a licence if they thought that the construction of the cab, to use the common expression, was not satisfactory. I have no doubt that they could take that matter into consideration just as they could take into consideration the number of cabs which were already licensed, so that there would not be an undue number. E F

Section 38 provides what vehicles are to be considered hackney carriages. By s. 40 :

Before any such licence is granted a requisition for the same, in such form as the commissioners from time to time provide for that purpose, shall be made and signed by the proprietor or one of the proprietors of the hackney carriage in respect of which such licence is applied for ... G

Observe here that there is no direction in this section that the proprietor has to make an application for a licence for himself. The requisition is to be filled in and signed "by the proprietor of the hackney carriage in respect of which such licence is applied for." That appears to show that it is the vehicle which is licensed, and not the person owning the vehicle. Section 40 continues :

... and in every such requisition shall be truly stated the name and surname and place of abode of the person applying for such licence, and of every proprietor or part proprietor of such carriage, or person concerned, either solely or in partnership with any other person, in the keeping, employing, or letting to hire of such carriage ... H

Section 41 seems to be also of considerable importance :

In every such licence shall be specified the name and surname and place of abode of every person who is a proprietor or part proprietor of the hackney carriage in respect of which such licence is granted, or who is concerned, either solely or in partnership with any other person, in the keeping, employing, or letting to hire of any such carriage, and also the number of such licence which shall correspond with the number to be painted or marked on the plates to be fixed on such carriage, together with such other particulars as the commissioners think fit.

There, again, the section contains a clear statement that it is the hackney carriage that is licensed. It would have been simple in that section (as, indeed, in s. 37 or in any other section of this part of the Act) to refer to the licensing of the proprietor to keep a particular carriage if Parliament had so intended.

- A Parliament, however, seems to have emphasised in the sections I have read that the licensing is the licensing of a carriage, and not of any particular person.

Section 42 is :

Every licence shall be made out by the clerk of the commissioners, and duly entered in a book to be provided by him for that purpose ; and in such book shall be contained columns or places for entries to be made of every offence committed by any proprietor or driver or person attending such carriage ; and any person may

- B at any reasonable time inspect such book, without fee or reward.

The object of this section seems clear. It gives the public a right to inspect the register of hackney carriages which must state who the proprietor is, so that, if the public have reason to bring an action for personal injury or otherwise, they may see who the proprietor is who can be sued. By s. 43 :

- C Every licence so to be granted shall be under the common seal of the commissioners . . . or . . . be signed by . . . the commissioners . . . and shall be in force for one year only from the day of the date of such licence, or until the next general licensing meeting, in case any general licensing day be appointed by the commissioners.

Section 44 provides that notice shall be given by the proprietors of hackney carriages of any change of abode. I think s. 45 ought to be noted :

- D If the proprietor or part proprietor of any carriage, or any person so concerned as aforesaid, permits the same to be used as a hackney carriage plying for hire within the prescribed distance without having obtained a licence as aforesaid for such carriage, or during the time that such licence is suspended as hereinafter provided, or if any person be found driving, standing, or plying for hire with any carriage within the prescribed distance, for which such licence as aforesaid has not been previously obtained. . .

- E he shall be liable to a penalty. Contrast these sections with s. 46 :

No person shall act as driver of any hackney carriage licensed in pursuance of this or the special Act to ply for hire within the prescribed distance without first obtaining a licence from the commissioners . . .

- F In my opinion, the effect of the sections clearly shows that the licence is granted to the carriage and that it remains in force for a year from the time when it is granted or until the next annual licensing meeting of the commissioners. What then is to happen if during that year a change of proprietorship takes place ? There is the vehicle, which has its licence attached to it. There is nothing in this Act which provides that the vehicle may not be sold, or may only be sold with the consent of the council. There is no provision here to say that, if a person has obtained a licence for a cab and disposes of it, or dies, he must surrender his licence. What is necessary is that the register should be kept in order and kept up to date. Therefore, it seems to me that, by necessary implication, a person who buys a cab which has been licensed is under a duty to go to the authority and say : " I am now the proprietor of this cab which you licensed for a year. Please, therefore, enter me in the register as the proprietor, and enter my name on the licence granted in respect of the cab, instead of that of the earlier proprietor." We are not concerned to consider
- G whether or not Parliament might have made different provisions. Parliament seems to have said that a licence to a cab, if the commissioners grant it, is to be given for a year. I cannot think it was meant—and I think the necessary implication is the other way—that, if that cab is sold during the year, the person who buys it is not to be allowed to use it during that year. He may not get his licence renewed, but that raises entirely different questions. Once the licence expires, as it will do, at the end of the year, then he will have to put in a requisition in respect of the cab which he wishes to use as a hackney carriage.
- H

In my opinion, the council have viewed this matter from a wrong angle. One of the councillors, I noticed, did raise this question in an acute form at one of the meetings. He said he wanted to be advised whether the licence was to the cab or the man with the cab. Had it been pointed out then, or had this court given a decision then, that the licence attached to the cab and not to the man, I think it is possible that the council might have come to a different conclusion. I think also the council had probably been misled to some extent by the form of the licence which they had been in the habit of issuing. It is to be noted that the section in the statute does not prescribe any particular form of licence, nor, indeed, does it prescribe any particular form of requisition for a licence, Section 40, as I have already said, provides that the requisition is to be in such form as the commissioners shall from time to time provide for that purpose, but the form of licence which is used in the borough of Weymouth reads in this way :

We, the corporation of the borough of Weymouth and Melcombe Regis, in the county of Dorset, by virtue of the provisions in that behalf of the Public Health Act, 1875, and all other powers enabling us in that behalf do hereby licence — of Weymouth, the owner of the hackney carriage numbered — to stand and ply for hire with the said carriage, within the said borough, subject to the provisions of the said Acts, and to such by-laws relating to hackney carriages as are, or may from time to time be, in force in the said borough.

We are also told in a note to the form of licence set out above : " This licence is not transferable." Merely stated in that way, I think it is right. If a licence is granted in respect of cab A., it cannot be transferred to cab B. That is clear, but what we have to consider is quite a different matter, and that is whether or not, when cab A, which has been licensed, is sold to another owner, that other owner is entitled to have his name substituted for that of the previous owner, and, in my opinion, he clearly is.

Certain other questions have been raised by counsel for the applicants in support of his application for a rule. It is said here that the mandamus ought to go because persons took part in the debate—although they did not vote—who were interested parties. The court does not propose to give any decision on how far the mere fact that persons who were interested took part in the debate would vitiate a decision of the council, if it were otherwise unobjectionable, because we have already said enough to decide this case on different lines, but I think it desirable that the councillors of the borough of Weymouth should be reminded of the express words of the Local Government Act, 1933, s. 76 (1), which says :

If a member of a local authority has any pecuniary interest, direct or indirect, in any contract or proposed contract or other matter, and is present at a meeting of the local authority at which the contract or other matter is the subject of consideration, he shall at the meeting, as soon as practicable after the commencement thereof, disclose the fact, and shall not take part in the consideration or discussion of, or vote on any question with respect to, the contract or other matter.

The court observes with concern that two members who did disclose that they had an interest, in that they were, apparently, (or desired to be), competing owners of taxicabs, nevertheless took part in this discussion, one of them taking a very prominent part and using arguments and language which we can only say should be strongly deprecated. The result is that this mandamus will go, with the usual results as to costs.

ATKINSON, J. : I agree. There is one consideration, however, which I think assists the applicants here, and that is the position of the proprietor who has sold his hackney carriage. He must be entitled to have his name removed from the register, and, I imagine, from the licence which has been granted. If he gave notice to the commissioners, similar to the notice required by s. 44, I should have thought that, if they refused to remove his name from the register, he could come here for mandamus to make them do so. That seems to indicate that they must be bound to take notice of changes of ownership and to keep their register accurate in accordance with the true position, and, if the old proprietor has a right to have his name removed, I should have thought it was equally clear that the new proprietor has a right to have his name inserted in place of that of the old proprietor.

OLIVER, J. : I agree with every word that has fallen from my Lords. I only wish to add that I am in the fullest agreement with the strictures which have been passed on the behaviour of two of the councillors concerned in the debate, one of them, in particular, a man openly interested and openly advocating his own financial interest in the debate on a public matter.

Order for mandamus.

MARTIN v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL

B [KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Henn Collins, J.), April 15, 16, 17, 1947.]

Negligence—Bailee—Hospital—Patient's property deposited on admission—Liability of hospital for loss—Measure of damages.

A local authority, who were under a statutory duty to maintain a hospital and to admit patients thereto, but were empowered to recover all the expenses to which they were put (including the cost of looking after patients' property), admitted a patient into the institution and took possession of certain jewellery and a cigarette case which she had in her handbag. They were unaware at the time that the articles were of value, but shortly afterwards they received a letter from the patient's sister asking for confirmation of the contents of the patient's handbag and referring to diamonds. They did not reply. The articles were entered in a book and stored with hundreds of others in envelopes on the floor in a room which a burglar would have had no difficulty in breaking into. They were not put into a safe even after receipt of the letter, and they disappeared, presumably being stolen. In an action against the authority for the return of the chattels or their value, and damages for their detention, and, alternatively, for damages for conversion, negligence, or breach of duty :—

HELD : (i) the local authority were bailees, but not gratuitous bailees, and so had a higher duty of care than that required from a gratuitous bailee.

E (ii) they were not entitled to assume that a patient's property was of no value, and they were negligent in not storing the property in a safe, particularly after the receipt of the letter drawing their attention to its value.

(iii) in arriving at the value of the property to determine the damages, purchase tax should be taken into consideration.

F [EDITORIAL NOTE. This case is of particular interest by reason of the measure of the damages awarded by the judge. In actions of trover and conversion the long established general rule is that the damages awarded should be the value of the thing taken : Finch v. Blount ((1836), 7 C. & P. 478). The judge here assumes the value of the lost jewellery to be the cost of replacement (as to which, see Hall (J. & E.), Ltd. v. Barclay ([1937] 3 All E.R. 620)) and he includes in that cost the amount of the purchase tax. There appears to be no previous reported case in which the amount of the tax has been so included, but the principle on which damages for conversion are awarded is the compensation of the owner of the goods for their loss, and in their replacement value the amount of purchase tax must be included since a purchaser is liable for purchase tax on a purchase of goods : B. Morris, Ltd. v. Lunzer ([1942] 1 All E.R. 77).

E. Holroyd Pearce, K.C., and Roger F. Ormrod for the plaintiff.

Leon Maclaren for the defendants.

HENN COLLINS, J. : The plaintiff sues by the Official Solicitor as her next friend to recover from the defendants the value of certain jewellery and a cigarette case of which the defendants took possession when the plaintiff was admitted as a mental patient to St. Pancras Hospital, an institution which the defendants maintain in pursuance of their statutory duty in that behalf. The defendants have satisfied me that that jewellery was stolen from them while it was in their custody, probably by a burglar from without, and in those circumstances the questions which arise for my decision are (i) to what degree of care were the defendants bound in respect of the plaintiff's property; (ii) did they exercise that degree of care; and (iii) if they did not, to what compensation is the plaintiff entitled.

The first of those questions—i.e., the degree of care to which the defendants were bound—depends primarily on whether they could properly be described as gratuitous bailees or whether they were in a higher category and bound to a higher degree of care. If they were gratuitous bailees, it is clear that they would be liable only for that degree of negligence which earned the epithet of "gross." I do not know that that can be accurately defined, but it means some sort of carelessness which appeals to the plain man of common sense as being gross. If, on the other hand, they were not gratuitous bailees, they would be bound to take a higher degree of care, again not susceptible of accurate definition, but something appropriate to the circumstances in which the bailee is given something for the pains to which he is put in keeping the articles. I think that the defendants fall within the latter category and were not gratuitous bailees. They were under a statutory duty to receive the plaintiff into their institution, and it was a necessary precaution on their part to take possession of all the property which she brought there with her. The burden was in that sense put on them, but they are in a position to recover all the expenses to which they have been put, and that, no doubt, includes the expense of keeping safely the property which they had taken into their possession. The practice was to make entries in books of the property received from patients. That necessitated the use of a certain amount of stationery and clerical help, and I have no doubt that that all forms part of the expenses of the hospital. The property was put in envelopes appropriate for the purpose, the cost of which, again, I have no doubt forms part of the expenses of the hospital. As gratuitous bailee gets no recompense of any sort. If he is compensated for his pains, he ceases to be a gratuitous bailee and is bound to a higher degree of care, such at least as men of common prudence would take in regard to the class of article which falls into their possession.

What degree of care is indicated in the circumstances of this case? I think the defendants themselves have provided a measure of that care. I am told, and believe, that, if they had realised at the time that these articles were of anything like the value which, in fact, they were, they would have put them in the safe. I think it was wrong for the defendants to assume, as seems to have been the practice, that the articles which they received were all trumpery. They receive into their institution people of all classes, of the higher as well as the lower income groups, and there is no presumption that the property brought in by patients is not of value. If they choose, as it seems to me, to treat it as being worthless or as offering little temptation to thieves, that is a risk which they are taking on themselves. If they are going to err, it appears to me they ought to err on the side of safety, seeing that they are in possession of other people's property which has ultimately to be returned or accounted for. In saying that, I do not mean that they must treat every article that falls into their hands as of great value. No doubt, a good deal of property which falls into their hands is obviously of little value and they can deal with it as they please, but what is a reasonable degree of care in the case of articles which offer little temptation is not reasonable where such articles do so or may do so.

It is, however, not necessary to decide this case on generalities because in this particular instance the defendants were apprised by a letter dated Dec. 15, 1943—which is well before the date when the theft was perpetrated—that these articles were, or at any rate might be, diamonds, because the plaintiff's sister, who so describes herself in her signature, asks in that letter for confirmation as to the contents of her sister's handbag, giving some intimation as to what was in it, and says: "I would be obliged to you for a reply as soon as possible. Also a diamond ring and clip, etc. Would you please let me know where these things are deposited?" The writer of that letter obviously thought, putting it no higher, that the ring and clip contained real diamonds and were of value. To that letter no answer was vouchsafed. The view, apparently, taken was that it is not the practice of the hospital to give receipts in respect of property taken, and that, that being so, the letter did not require an answer. But there was a plain intimation, if it penetrated to the right source, that it was, at any rate, worth while looking to see whether these articles, in fact, were not trumpery in value, but contained diamonds.

A In those circumstances it seems to me that there was some failure in the administration which prevented notice reaching those concerned that these articles either were diamonds or must be considered to be of value, with the result that the articles in respect of which the plaintiff sues were stored with hundreds of other articles in envelopes stacked on the floor in a room to which an expert burglar, according to the police evidence, given sufficient agility and perseverance, would have no particular difficulty in entering. I am satisfied that that is what did happen, that a thief did enter the room in which the plaintiff's jewels were stored through a window which was insufficiently secured, and that the jewellery went out through that window into the wider world outside. In those circumstances I think the defendants are liable.

B The next question is the amount of compensation to which the plaintiff is entitled. There is, first of all, a difficult question about purchase tax. It is suggested on behalf of the defendants that, in assessing the value of these articles, purchase tax must be disregarded. I think that must be wrong. You cannot buy the articles retail unless you pay purchase tax, which has, in effect, been added to the intrinsic value of the article. A person who has bought an article before purchase tax came into force may, perhaps, even feel flattered to think that in value it has gone up 100 per cent. merely by the imposition of the tax which he has not paid, but, if he is deprived of that article and seeks to replace it, he finds that there is an unfortunate reality about what he thought was a very pleasant accretion in value. In my view, the tax is a real addition to the price which is to be paid, and I, therefore, take it into account. I think the proper value of the ring is £700 and that of the clip £900, to which must be added an agreed price for the gold cigarette case of £40, making in all £1,640, for which I give judgment in favour of the plaintiff.

DUNGEY v. TUNBRIDGE WELLS PROPERTIES, LTD.

F [CHANCERY DIVISION (Evershed, J.), March 4, April 2, 1947.]

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Lease for duration of hostilities—Lessee's option for further term—Time for exercise of option—Validation of War-Time Leases Act, 1944 (c. 34), ss. 1, 3 (3), 7.

G An underlease of premises from Aug. 29, 1942, until the cessation of hostilities between Great Britain and Germany and a period of six months thereafter contained an option clause which provided that the landlords would, on the written request of the tenants made 3 months before the expiration of the term thereby created, grant to the tenants a lease for a further term of 14 years from the expiration of the war period. By a letter dated Nov. 21, 1945, the tenants called for a renewal of their lease for 14 years, and on Mar. 23, 1946, the landlords gave notice to quit which expired on May 1, 1946. The tenants claimed specific performance of the option clause:—

H HELD: (i) by the Validation of War-Time Leases Act, 1944, ss. 1 and 7, the underlease must be treated for all purposes as though from the commencement there had been substituted for the contractual habendum the statutory habendum of 10 years, subject to the right of either party to determine the term earlier by serving one month's notice after the termination of hostilities, viz., May 9, 1945.

(ii) treating the option clause as one which related to the tenancy and reading it in conjunction with the habendum clause as amended by the Act, the clause operated so as to entitle the tenants to a term of 14 years from the period which was ended by the service of notice following the termination of the war, viz., from May 1, 1946.

Cur. adv. vult.

EVERSHED, J. : This action raises the question of the effect on an underlease, and particularly on an option for renewal in that underlease, of the Validation of War-Time Leases Act, 1944.

The tenants carry on a cake and confectionery business on the premises in question, which are lock-up shops. The underlease is dated Aug. 29, 1942, and the habendum, as expressed in this contract, is as follows :

To hold the same to the tenants from June 24, 1942, until the cessation of hostilities between Great Britain and Germany as evidenced by an Order in Council made by His Majesty and a period of 6 months thereafter.

There then follows in parenthesis : " hereinafter called ' the war term ' ." With regard to the parenthesis, I observe that the draftsman, having taken much care to define in that way the term created by the lease, never again in the document, so far as I am aware, from beginning to end uses the phrase, " war term." Other phrases are used, and when I come to the option clause, the formula " war period " is found. Therefore, in the view I take, it will be necessary for me to say what the phrase " war period " means when I come to it in the option clause ; but, so far as this habendum is concerned, though it was faintly suggested that this case differed from those which the decision in Lace v. Chantler (2) affected, that suggestion has not been pressed, and there is no doubt that this is an underlease which, according to the law of England before the passing of the Validation of War-Time Leases Act, 1944, was invalid to create a term. It has been saved by the operation of that Act. Therefore, putting it briefly, and as I read the decision of the Court of Appeal in M.W. Investments, Ltd. v. Kilburn Envoy, Ltd. (1) the result of ss. 1 and 7 of the Act of 1944 is that one must for all purposes treat this underlease as though from the start there had been substituted for the contractual habendum, which I have read, the statutory habendum, i.e., to hold for 10 years subject to the right of either party to determine earlier by serving one month's notice after the termination of hostilities, which, for present purposes, has been defined as May 9, 1945. Either party could, by one month's notice in writing served on the other party, at any time after May 9, 1945, earlier determine the lease, but unless such notice of determination was given it would remain, and must be deemed always to have been, a 10 years term.

I do not propose to go through all the clauses of the lease, but I do observe, by way of illustration of the language used, that there is a reference in the covenants by the tenants expressed thus :

And particularly in a workmanlike manner during the sixth year of the said term, . . . which must mean what had been called earlier the " war term " as conceived by the draftsman, and must now mean the statutory term which is provided by the Act. In the tenants' covenants, one also finds the phrase :

To yield up the demised premises at the determination of the term hereby created . . .

again, a slight change of language, but, in my judgment, plainly meaning the term created by the habendum. Then we come to the landlord's covenants.

Covenant (a) states :

That the tenants paying the rents reserved and observing and performing the several covenants and stipulations herein on their part contained shall hold and enjoy the demised premises during the said term without any interruption by the landlord . . .

There is a covenant against competitive trades "during the term hereby created." Then, by way of slight variation, the draftsman, who was, apparently, never very attached to one single form of expression, varies it by saying : "That the landlord will during the tenancy."

As I have said, in my opinion, all those formulae mean one and the same thing, viz., the term created by cl. 1.

I now come to the most material clause, cl. 5, which, so far as is material, is as follows :

It is mutually agreed that the landlord will on the written request of the tenants made three months before the expiration of the term hereby created and if there shall not at the time of such request be any existing breach or non-observance of any of the covenants on the part of the tenants hereinbefore contained at the expense of the tenants grant to them a lease of the demised premises for the further term of fourteen years from the expiration of the war period at a certain rent which is then specified. The phrase "war period" is a new variation, but I have no doubt that it means the same thing as the other formulae, "the term hereby created," or "war term"; and "war term" has been defined as meaning a term referable to the duration of the war plus six months. Therefore, once the statutory habendum is substituted for the contractual habendum, there is, in my judgment, no difficulty. The "term hereby created" and the "war period" mean, as I think, the term of years which this document was apt to create, which was a period of 10 years determinable by notice after the cessation of hostilities. As it turned out, that was after May 9, 1945. I think it is possible that the "war period" in cl. 5 may be confined to the period which is strictly referable to the war, or to a notice given following the termination of the war, and not to the whole period of 10 years, had that been allowed to expire; but, in the events which have happened, nothing turns on that, and I am satisfied that the "term hereby created" and the "war period" mean the period which ended on May 1, 1946. I say that, because it is agreed that by an appropriate notice the term created by this document, as amended by the Act of 1944, was validly determined by a notice which expired on May 1, 1946. It is also conceded that the tenants had duly complied with and observed all their covenants in accordance with the conditions attaching to an effective notice 3 months before the expiration of this tenancy calling on the landlords to grant them an extended term.

Having regard to the construction which the Court of Appeal in M.W. Investments, Ltd. v. Kilburn Envoy, Ltd. (1) have indicated should be put on a document of this kind, to which the Act applies, I have no doubt that the result is that cl. 5 of the option clause takes effect in the way I have indicated, viz., gives the right to the tenants to the further term of 14 years from May 1, 1946, they having exercised the option in the appropriate way.

There only remains one point on which I desire just to add a few sentences. In M.W. Investments, Ltd. v. Kilburn Envoy, Ltd. (1) ([1946] 2 All E.R. 570), one reason which VAISEY, J., gave why he felt that the option clause could not survive was, to use his own language, "because it relates to the duration of the tenancy within the meaning of s. 3 (3) of the Act." That sub-section reads as follows :

Nothing in the said s. 1 shall affect any provision of an agreement to which that section applies, being a provision which does not relate to the duration of the tenancy, and any such provision shall continue to apply in relation to the tenancy as it takes effect under that section.

Section 1 is the section which requires the court to substitute for the contractual habendum the statutory habendum. The other reason given by the learned judge was one peculiar to the construction of the document, and upon that other reason I would only say that the present case appears to be one much more favourable to the tenants than was the one before VAISEY, J. On the question of law, the learned judge gave no reason why he thought that the option clause would be defeated if it was related to the duration of the tenancy, and LORD GREENE, M.R., in his judgment in that case on appeal ([1947] 1

All E.R. 710), expressed his concurrence with the opinion of VAISEY, J., that the option clause there was one which related to the tenancy. LORD GREENE, M.R., said he disliked substituting one form of words for another, but he did say that, in his opinion, "relating to the tenancy" meant "is conditioned or affected by the habendum," and, following that expression of view, it is plain that the present option clause relates to the tenancy. But the Court of Appeal also expressed quite clearly the view that the fact that the option clause related to the tenancy, so far from being a ground for invalidating and rendering ineffective the option clause, had, indeed, the opposite effect. LORD GREENE, M.R., (ibid., 712), expressed the opinion that the option clause, being a clause which is related to the tenancy, must be read as though the original habendum had been expressed in the form which the statute required, and, in so doing, in that case he had no difficulty in coming to a conclusion favourable to the tenants. Treating this option clause as one which relates to the tenancy and reading it in conjunction with the first clause as amended by the statute, I am in no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that it takes effect, and the events which have happened, as I have said, operate so as to entitle the tenant to a term of 14 years from the period which ended by the serving of notice following the termination of the war, viz., from May 1, 1946.

Having regard to the fact that the landlord and the tenants are going to remain in reasonably close contractual association for a period of 14 years, I do not want to make a decree for specific performance unless that becomes necessary. What I propose to do is to declare that, on the true construction of cl. 5 of the underlease, dated Aug. 29, 1942, and in the events which have happened, and having regard to the effect of the Validation of War-Time Leases Act, 1944, the tenants are entitled to a further lease of the demised premises for 14 years from May 1, 1946, at the rent and subject to the terms and conditions stated in cl. 5 of the original underlease, and I propose to give the parties liberty to apply in case there is some dispute, or hitch, in giving effect to that declaration. The tenants are entitled to recover their costs of the action, and I shall order that the landlords pay the tenants' costs of the action, such costs to be taxed between party and party. The counter-claim will be dismissed with costs.

Declaration accordingly.

HOGG v. SCOTT.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Cassels, J.), March 26, 27, 28, April 1, 2, 1947.]

Police—Metropolitan Police Force—Summary dismissal—Power of Commissioner—Officer convicted of theft—Metropolitan Police Act, 1829 (c. 44), s. 5—General Orders of Metropolitan Police Force, s. 5 (9).

Limitation of Actions—Public authority—Commissioner of Metropolitan Police—Dismissal of police officer—Claim by officer that dismissal illegal—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), s. 21.

In Sept., 1942, the plaintiff, an inspector in the Metropolitan Police Force, pleaded guilty to three charges of stealing and was sentenced to a month's imprisonment. He was forthwith dismissed from the Force by the Commissioner of Police without being informed in writing on a misconduct form of the charge against him, without being supplied with copies of the reports on which the charge was founded, without being invited to give his explanation in writing or being given an opportunity of putting forward his explanation personally, and without a disciplinary board. He was subsequently allowed to appeal out of time against his dismissal to the Home Secretary, by whose order, made in Mar., 1943, he was reinstated in the Force with the rank of constable. In Mar., 1946, he brought an action for a declaration that he held the rank of inspector and had been entitled to the privileges and emoluments attaching thereto since he was dismissed, on the grounds inter alia that the statutory requirements of the Police Act, 1919, and of regulations made under s. 4 of that Act had not been complied with in relation to his dismissal.

HELD : (i) the Commissioner had power under the Metropolitan Police Act, 1829, s. 5, and the General Orders of the Metropolitan Police Force, s. 5 (9), without following the ordinary disciplinary procedure to dismiss the plaintiff on the ground that he was unfit to hold office by reason of his conviction and imprisonment, and that power was properly exercised.

(ii) the plaintiff had waived his right to succeed in the proceedings by appealing to the Home Secretary in 1943 and accepting and acting on his decision for three years.

(iii) the action was barred by the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21, it being brought against a public authority charged with a public duty in respect of something done in the discharge of that public duty more than a year before the issue of the writ.

ACTION for a declaration that the plaintiff held the rank of inspector in the Metropolitan Police Force and was entitled to the privileges and emoluments attaching thereto, despite his purported summary dismissal by the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police. The facts appear in the judgment, and are summarised in the headnote.

D. A. Scott Cairns for the plaintiff.

Sir Valentine Holmes, K.C., Geoffrey Howard and Stabb for the defendant.

CASSELS, J. : The plaintiff seeks a declaration that, although he is serving with the rank of a police constable in the Metropolitan Police, he really holds the rank of inspector, and is entitled to the privileges and emoluments attaching thereto, and has been so entitled for the last 4½ years.

The plaintiff is 47 years of age. He was demobilised in 1919 after distinguished service in the forces during the first world war. For two years he had civilian employment, and in Feb., 1922, he entered the Metropolitan Police Force. He was promoted sergeant in 1931, station sergeant in 1933, and inspector in 1939, and he received commendation. Until 1942 there was nothing against him. In Sept., 1942, three charges of theft were made against him—charges of stealing six pieces of glass mirror from a building and of stealing a leather purse and a hat which had been entrusted to his possession as a police officer. The mirrors came from a building which had been damaged by enemy action. The purse and the hat were lost property. The offences may appear to be trivial, but, committed by a police officer in the course of his duty, they assume a serious aspect. He was arrested and charged. On Sept. 24 he was suspended from duty. On Oct. 7 he appeared before a metropolitan police magistrate at the Lambeth police court. He pleaded guilty to each charge, and was sentenced to a month's imprisonment. On the following day the Commissioner of Police, Sir Philip Game (not the defendant), dismissed the plaintiff from the Metropolitan Police Force. The plaintiff served 28 days in Wormwood Scrubs prison, and on being released obtained civilian employment. On Dec. 2, 1942, the plaintiff began the task of getting himself reinstated into the police force. He wrote a long letter to the then Commissioner, urging that dismissal from the Force was harsh, coming on top of his imprisonment. This action is brought against Sir Harold Scott, the present Commissioner.

The plaintiff wished to appeal to the Home Secretary, as he was entitled to do under the provisions of the Police Appeals Act, 1927, and the rules made thereunder. He was, in fact, out of time, but, thanks to the good offices of Sir Philip Game, the Home Secretary extended the plaintiff's time and agreed to consider the appeal. A complete statement of the case was presented. Sir Philip Game, in a letter to the Home Secretary, dated Feb. 25, 1943, said that, had the case been tried by a disciplinary board (that means, I take it, had the original charges of theft against the plaintiff been tried by a disciplinary board) and had a sentence of dismissal or enforced resignation been imposed, he would, if the plaintiff had appealed to him, have felt that he was in some difficulty as he regarded the action of the plaintiff as more in the nature of "scrounging" than of theft, and, while he would have found it impossible to retain the plaintiff as an inspector, he would, taking the whole of the circumstances into consideration, have reduced the sentence to reduction to the rank of police constable. The Home Secretary considered the matter and on Mar. 30, 1943, directed that the plaintiff should be reinstated in the force with the rank of constable, with pay at the rate of 90s 0d. a week (the plaintiff was getting £7 a week as inspector), and that the period from Sept. 24, 1942, to the date of the order should reckon for pension. On Apr. 6, 1943, the plaintiff expressed a desire to re-serve in accordance with the order of the Home Secretary, and on Apr. 12, he was reinstated, with the rank of police constable. That rank he has held since, and still holds, with credit. In fact it can be said that the plaintiff, apart from the three offences to which he pleaded guilty at the Lambeth police court, was, and is, a police officer of good repute throughout his service.

The plaintiff, however, questions the power of the Commissioner to dismiss him in the circumstances. His claim is that he has never properly been dismissed from the Force, and that he is still entitled to retain the rank of inspector and to have the emoluments of that rank. The grounds on which he bases this claim are that the statutory requirements of the Police Act, 1919, and of the regulations made under s. 4 of that Act, and the requirements of the General Orders by which the Metropolitan Police are governed, have not been complied with. A further ground is that the Home Secretary exceeded his jurisdiction and powers.

Under the Police Appeals Act, 1927, s. 2, the Secretary of State can, by order, either (a) allow the appeal, (b) dismiss the appeal, or (c) vary the punishment by substituting some other punishment which the disciplinary authority might have awarded. The plaintiff received a communication from the Home Office dated Apr. 1, 1943, stating that the Secretary of State, after full consideration, had decided to allow the appeal, and enclosing the order made under s. 2 of the Act to which I have referred. When that order is examined, it shows that what the Secretary of State did was to vary the punishment. There is nothing in the order which said that he allowed the appeal. The plaintiff says that the Home Secretary could allow the appeal or dismiss the appeal or vary the punishment, but he could not allow the appeal and vary the punishment because then he would be doing two things when he only had the power to do one, and, further, that, if he did allow the appeal, he had no power to reinstate the plaintiff as a police constable, for the act of allowing the appeal automatically reinstated the plaintiff as an inspector. I must be guided by the order which was actually made, and not by what someone in the Home Office has said that the Secretary of State did. The Home Secretary did not exceed his jurisdiction or powers. There is no substance in this point, and it fails.

The plaintiff further says that the action of the Home Secretary is of no consequence because he varied a punishment which (says the plaintiff) the Commissioner had no power to impose, because the Commissioner had not complied with the requirements of the Police Act, 1919, and the regulations made thereunder, or the General Orders. The plaintiff submits that he was dismissed without being informed in writing on a misconduct form of the charge against him, without being supplied with copies of the reports on which the charge was founded, without being invited to give his explanation in writing or being given an opportunity of putting forward his explanation personally, and without a disciplinary board. None of the steps mentioned was taken. The Commissioner just dismissed the plaintiff from the Force, the reason being that the plaintiff was convicted at the Lambeth police court on Oct. 7, 1942, of larceny, and sentenced to one month's imprisonment. Assuming that the Commissioner had power to dismiss, it would certainly seem that he had grounds. On his own confession the plaintiff had been convicted of felony and had been sentenced to a term of imprisonment. The plaintiff's contention, however, is that the dismissal was a nullity because the Commissioner did not take the step of bringing the plaintiff, or the matter, before a disciplinary board after the usual preliminaries.

By the Police Regulations, 1920, made by the Secretary of State under the Police Act, 1919, provision is made that in the case of the Metropolitan Police the procedure in discipline cases shall be as specially approved by the Secretary of State and published in the General Orders of that force. The police authority for the Metropolitan Police District is the Secretary of State himself: see Police Act, 1919, s. 12, and Police Act, 1890, sched. III. The Secretary of State makes regulations, which have been before the court in this case in the book containing the General Orders. As regards discipline and punishments, on such matters as supplying the accused officer with reports and giving him an opportunity of making his explanation and calling witnesses, the regulations in regard to the metropolis are substantially the same as they are elsewhere.

Under the heading of "Liability to dismissal," para. 9 of s. 5 of those Orders provides:

An officer is liable to immediate dismissal for unfitness, negligence or misconduct, independently of any other punishment to which by law he may be subject. The Commissioner may also remove him from the service by dismissal or otherwise without assigning any reason, and the Disciplinary Code, No. 275, para. XVII provides:

Any member of the Force also commits an offence against discipline, and shall be liable to punishment, if he is guilty of an offence which is punishable on conviction, whether summarily or on indictment.

The Metropolitan Police Force has been in existence as a police force for 118 years. It began with the passing of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1829. The police at that time were under justices. Section 5 of that Act provides:

The said justices may from time to time, subject to the approbation of one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, frame such orders and regulations as they shall deem expedient, relative to the general government of the men to be appointed members of the police force under this Act; . . . and the said justices may at any time suspend or dismiss from his employment any man belonging to the said police force whom they shall think remiss or negligent in the discharge of his duty, or otherwise unfit for the same . . .

By the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, s. 4, the justices were replaced by Commissioners of Police. By the Metropolitan Police Act, 1856, s. 1, the number of Commissioners for the Metropolitan Police was reduced to one, and one it has remained ever since. Here, then, is a power of dismissal in the hands of the Commissioner, without any reference to a disciplinary board and without any compliance with the requirements set forth in regard to what I may call an ordinary matter of discipline or breach of the Disciplinary Code. The first defence to this action is that the Commissioner had the power to do what he did. He came to the conclusion that, having been convicted and sentenced to a term of imprisonment, the plaintiff was unfit for the discharge of his duty. Section 5 of the 1829 Act has not been repealed.

In the case of a borough police force, where the watch committee is the police authority and the disciplinary authority, the power to suspend or dismiss is reserved by the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 191. This has not been repealed: see Cooper v. Wilson (1). That was a case of a dismissal by the watch committee of a police officer who had actually resigned before he was dismissed, and the Court of Appeal held that what the watch committee had done was beyond their powers, but GREER, L.J., said ([1937] 2 K.B. 316):

. . . the power to make regulations under the Police Act, 1919, s. 4 (1), does not impliedly repeal s. 191 (4) of the Act of 1882.

In the case of county police, where the standing joint committee is the police authority and the chief constable is the disciplinary authority, the power to dismiss is contained in the County Police Act, 1839, s. 6. In the case of the City of London Police, where the Common Council of the City of London is the police authority and the Commissioner is the disciplinary authority, the power to dismiss is contained in a private Act intituled the City of London Police Act, 1939, s. 14. It will, therefore, be seen that throughout the country the statutory provision remains in force for the dismissal of an officer considered by the disciplinary authority to be unfit for the discharge of his duties. Here, the Commissioner acted under the powers which he has under the Act of 1829 and the General Orders. He is not obliged to put into operation the whole of the machinery in such a case. The plaintiff was considered by the Commissioner to be unfit, by reason of his conviction and imprisonment. That such a situation has to be dealt with by the Commissioner is indicated by reg. No 311 (i), which provides :

If, during the proceedings of any disciplinary board, facts emerge which establish a prima facie criminal case, the board will forthwith adjourn and seek the instructions of the Commissioner.

Then there is reg. No. 320 :

When an officer is convicted of any criminal offence, the question of his retention in the service will be referred to the Commissioner.

The contention of the plaintiff that his dismissal is a nullity because procedural requirements were not complied with does not prevail. I find that he was regularly and legally, and on good and proper grounds, dismissed. If it were otherwise, the position would be difficult to maintain. Splendid as the police force is, it is a fact that occasionally, though very rarely, a member of it is convicted of a criminal offence and sentenced to a term of imprisonment. It would amount almost to a farce to say that in such circumstances the Commissioner was powerless to dismiss unless he had set in motion the procedure applicable to a case of insubordination. Some cases in which the Police Regulations of 1920 were dealt with have been cited. In Kilduff v. Wilson (2), TUCKER, J., said (103 J.P. 73) :

I think that the breaches of these regulations, or the non-compliance with these regulations are mere procedural matters, which did not go to the root of the jurisdiction of the watch committee . . .

In Noakes v. Smith (3) LEWIS, J., followed Kilduff v. Wilson (2), and held that the plaintiff, a police sergeant, failed to establish that an adverse decision of the watch committee was illegal, null and void, because he had not been ordered to appear before the chief officer of police in accordance with reg. 18.

My decision, therefore, that the Commissioner, in dismissing the plaintiff, acted regularly and legally, would conclude the matter in favour of the defendant, but I think I ought to deal briefly with the other grounds which are raised.

I think the plaintiff may be said to have waived his right to succeed in these proceedings by appealing to the Home Secretary and accepting and acting on the decision of the Home Secretary for three years. The writ was not issued until Mar. 28, 1946. The Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21, is also raised, the defendant, as Commissioner, being a public authority charged with a public duty, and this action being in respect of something done in discharge of that public duty. The same defence was successful in Coventry v. Wilson (4), where it was held by TUCKER, J., and affirmed by SCOTT, L.J., in the Court of Appeal, that an action founded on an alleged wrongful act more than a year earlier was barred. This action is in respect of acts done more than a year before the writ was issued, and I hold that the plaintiff was barred by the statute.

Declaratory judgments are in the discretion of the court. There has been considerable delay on the part of the plaintiff in bringing his proceedings. He was dismissed on Oct. 8, 1942, and he started these proceedings, as I have said, on Mar. 28, 1946, nearly three years after he was reinstated. On that ground alone I should not have been prepared to give a decision adverse to the plaintiff, but I think I should have taken into consideration the circumstances of the war, and the fact that the plaintiff had to prepare his own case until he consulted solicitors in September, 1945.

In the circumstances there must be judgment for the defendant.

Judgment for the defendant with costs.

COLLINS v. COLLINS AND DOVE.
REEVES (E.A.M.) v. REEVES (T.A.).

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Wallington, J.), October 24, 1946, March 21, 1947.]

Divorce—Costs—Poor person—Liability of poor person to pay or right to receive costs—Security for costs—Order against poor person—R.S.C., Ord.16, r. 28 (1) —Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1944, (S. R. & O., 1944, No. 389), r. 74 (2) (b) and (4).

Under R.S.C., Ord.16, r. 28 (1), no party to a divorce suit who has been granted a poor person's certificate is liable to pay or entitled to receive costs until the court or a judge shall otherwise make an order under the rule. The jurisdiction is discretionary and the order may be made by a registrar.

A wife who is not proceeding as a poor person has the right to apply, under the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1944, r. 74 (2) (b) and (4), for security for costs against her husband, who is proceeding as a poor person.

SUMMONSES adjourned into court.

In these two cases the wives petitioned for decrees of divorce on the grounds that their husbands were guilty of adultery and desertion respectively. The husbands obtained poor persons' certificates. The wives were successful in their petitions and in both cases they obtained from the registrar orders against their husbands for costs. In Reeves v. Reeves the wife obtained from the registrar a further order that her husband should lodge a sum of money as security for her costs. The husbands appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 21, 1947. WALLINGTON, J. read the following judgment. These two cases raise questions of practice under the rules relating to poor persons. The cases were separately argued before me when sitting in chambers last term, and at the conclusion of the arguments counsel and the solicitors appearing before me invited me to adjourn the summonses into court. To this I assented, and I now propose to state my opinion on the various points raised.

The main question to be determined is whether any, and, if so, what, liability with regard to costs rests on the possessor of a poor person's certificate in respect of matrimonial proceedings. It is obvious that the special position in which a wife petitioner or respondent stands in this class of proceedings is one which creates problems that, broadly speaking, are absent from any other kind of proceeding. The rules as to taxation and payment of costs, and also with regard to security for the wife's costs, whether she be petitioner or respondent, do not give rise to any special difficulties in interpretation in cases where neither party is a poor person. Questions have, however, arisen in cases in which the husband or wife, or both, or a co-respondent or party cited, at or before the commencement, or during the pendency, of the suit are or become poor persons. In any such cases these rules have to be operated in such a manner as to give to the poor person the rights conferred by the Poor Persons' Rules. Rule 74 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1944, is in part (cl. 3 of the rule), directed to this matter. Bound up with the question of costs and taxation of costs is also the right of a wife to security for her costs, and the extent to which, if at all, this right is affected in the case of a wife or a husband who is a poor person.

During the period preceding the second "world war," despite the large growth in the number of matrimonial proceedings that began after the first "world war," the number of persons obtaining poor person's certificates was relatively small. In these latter days, however, when the number of suits, instead of being counted in hundreds, is reaching tens of thousands, the number of poor person's certificates in force is so great that their effect on costs and security for costs has become a matter of very great importance.

The Rules of the Supreme Court (Poor Persons), 1920 (S.R. & O., 1920, No. 2325), the Rules of the Supreme Court (Poor Persons), 1928, (S.R. & O., 1928, No. 566), and the rules contained in Ord.16, rr. 22 to 31 (H), both inclusive, are the rules which are, and have been, in force during the period covered by the few authorities to which I shall have to refer. The rules particularly affecting the matters with which I have to deal are to be found in Ord.16, r. 28, (1) (2) (3) and (4). The rules previously in force, although in slightly different language, were to the same effect. The poor person's certificate is in one of a number of forms, dependent on whether it is issued under one of the two branches of r. 23, or under r. 23 (a). Rule 23 (a) is with regard to the special certificate issued to a member of the armed forces of the Crown, or the wife of any such person. Looking at the rules and the certificate, it is manifest that the object of the poor persons procedure is to enable one who is a poor person within the meaning of the rules (and found so to be by the committee issuing the certificate), to have the benefit of the poor persons' rules with regard to costs from the moment that he or she obtains the certificate.

Until the present system of poor persons procedure was set up, there was no necessity, and, therefore, no provision, for the filing of a poor person's certificate in the Divorce Registry. The existing poor persons' rules contained in R.S.C., Ord.16 came into operation on Apr. 6, 1926, and necessarily provided for the filing of the certificate in the registry. I understand that a practice has grown up of taxing against a poor person a wife's bill of costs up to setting down on a full paying basis in respect of all items imbursement up to the date of filing (latterly the date of obtaining) the poor persons' certificate. This practice seems to me, if I may respectfully say so, inconsistent with the true interpretation of r. 28 (1) of the Supreme Court Rules. Rule 28 (1) provides :

... after such filing the poor person named in the certificate shall not be liable for any court fees and unless the court or a judge shall otherwise order no poor person shall be liable to pay costs to any other party or be entitled to receive from any other party any profit costs or charges.

I am of opinion that no party to a suit can become "liable to pay" or "entitled to receive" costs until an order to pay has been made. In other words, no such liability to pay or title to receive costs arises merely because (or at the time when) costs have been incurred. Accordingly, assuming the certificate to be in existence down to the conclusion of the suit, the poor person will become "liable to pay" or "entitled to receive" (as the case may be) only after and in consequence and to the extent of any such discretionary order.

In my opinion, r. 28 (1) contains two separate parts. The first part enables the poor person to escape payment of court fees from the date of filing the certificate. The second part is independent of the first part (despite the conjunction "and" after the words "court fees"). This second part does not depend on, and has no connection with, the date of the filing of the poor persons' certificate. The filing of the certificate proves to the court that the person named in it has the status of a poor person and is entitled to all the benefits and privileges conferred by the rules on a poor person. The provision contained in the second part of the rule, beginning with the word "unless," is twofold, namely (a) the poor person is not to be made liable to pay costs to any other party nor entitled to receive from any other party any profit costs or charges, and (b) the only exception to the operation of the rule in that sense is such a discretionary order as the court or a judge may make either against or in favour of the poor person. In other words, the poor person neither pays costs nor receives profit costs or charges in the absence of a discretionary order. Any other form of order in favour of a poor person cannot be effective except to the extent of his actual and proper "out-of-pocket." Rule 31B (1) also deals with out-of-pocket expenses. Incidentally, I may mention in passing that r. 31B (2) and (3) gives to the court or a judge power to make discretionary orders as to costs. See also r. 31B (5) which restricts the right to enforce those discretionary orders. No difficulty arises as to these orders and I refer to them only to show that I have not forgotten them.

A In my view, if a poor person who commenced a suit as a paying litigant desires to recover from another party any profit costs incurred during the period in which such poor person was not the holder of a poor person's certificate, such desire cannot be satisfied except on a successful application to the trial judge for a discretionary order under the rule. Such an application must be based on facts fit for the consideration of the judge when he is invited to exercise the discretion conferred by the rule. For the purpose of interpreting that part of r. 28 (1) with which I am dealing, I am of opinion that the words "court or a judge" include a registrar, though the number of cases in which he would have before him the material on which such a discretion could properly be exercised must necessarily be very small. The trial judge will either have made a discretionary order as to costs or will not have done so and, in either event, there can be no room for such an order to be made by the registrar. It is conceivable that in some matters, such as maintenance, before the registrar, when he comes to making an order, he might feel it right to exercise this discretionary power (I mean by "this discretionary power" the power given by r. 28 (1)) for what appeared to him sufficient reasons, but those cases must be very small in number indeed. The principles that I have ventured to hold to apply to a poor person who is either petitioner or respondent in a suit will, of course, have the same effect on the position of a co-respondent or an intervener or party cited in a suit.

C I now come to the particular matters in the two cases with which I am now dealing.

D COLLINS v. COLLINS AND DOVE.

In this case the wife's petition for dissolution on the ground of her husband's adultery with Joan Mary Dove, the intervener, was signed and filed on Sept. 11, 1945, the petitioning wife not being at any time a poor person. The petition prayed for the exercise of discretion in respect of the petitioner's adultery. On Sept. 27, 1945, the husband entered an appearance, and on Oct. 9, 1945, obtained a poor person's certificate. On Dec. 10, 1945, the intervener obtained leave to intervene, and on Dec. 11, 1945, she entered an appearance. From that date the case proceeded in the ordinary way, and on Feb. 28, 1946, the cause was set down for trial. On Mar. 6, 1946, the wife filed her bill of costs, up to setting down, for taxation. On Mar. 18, 1946, it seems that the husband's poor person's certificate was placed on the file of the proceedings. It is marked "duplicate" which suggests that the original had been destroyed or lost, but its fate is not known. On Mar. 25, 1946, the costs were taxed and allowed at £46 17s. 9d. On an appeal to me from this order allowing the taxation of costs at £46 17s. 9d., on Apr. 9, 1946, the only question submitted for my decision was whether the certificate was in law effective from its date of issue or from the date of its filing. For what I considered good and sufficient reasons I then held that the husband was entitled to the protection afforded by the poor person's certificate (although it was not filed until after the bill of costs had been lodged) and the order for payment was discharged. I was not then asked to decide the questions now before me. On May 23, 1946, the suit was tried by STABLE, J. He found both adultery and desertion against the husband and granted a decree nisi and condemned him in the costs incurred and to be incurred on behalf of the wife. The order as to costs made by the trial judge is in the ordinary form. There is nothing to suggest that it is or was intended to be a discretionary order under r. 28 (1). The learned judge also gave to the wife the custody of the one child of the marriage. On Aug. 13, 1946, the decree nisi was made absolute.

H On Oct. 1, 1946, the wife's (petitioner's) costs of the suit were taxed and allowed at £18 4s. 3d., and the district registrar made an order for the payment of that sum by the husband (respondent). This taxation extended from the commencement of the suit down to the date of the poor person's certificate on a full basis, and thereafter included out-of-pocket payments only. The husband now appeals against this taxation and order to pay on the ground that on the date on which the order was made he was, in fact, a poor person, and that, on the proper interpretation of Ord. 16, r. 28 (1), no such order can be made except it be a discretionary order under that rule, and this order does not purport to be, and was by the registrar not intended to be, a discretionary order. The submission made on behalf of the husband was that the effect of this rule is retro-active, and that once the certificate has been filed the rule extends to cover the whole proceeding and to include immunity from all costs whether incurred before or after the date of the filing of the poor person's certificate or the date of the certificate as the case may be. On behalf of the wife it was submitted by her solicitor that the order was right, and he based his submission on the fact that the course adopted by the district registrar in this case was in accordance with the practice as to these matters that had been adopted and acted on for many years. In my opinion, the order appealed from is wrong for the reasons that I have given and must be set aside. I make no order as to costs.

Order set aside.

REEVES v. REEVES.

In this case the wife filed her petition (dated Feb. 8, 1946) on Feb. 14, 1946, praying for the dissolution of the marriage on the ground of her husband's cruelty. The husband was in the services and abroad, and on Mar. 22, 1946, an order was made dispensing with personal service of the petition. On Apr. 18, 1946, the petition was served by post, and on May 22, 1946, an affidavit of service was made and filed. On May 21, 1946, the respondent husband obtained a poor person's certificate, which was granted to enable him to defend the proceedings in this suit. This certificate was, on May 28, 1946, duly filed in the registry. On June 4, 1946, an order was made giving to the husband leave to enter appearance and file an answer out of time, and on June 7, 1946, he filed an answer containing a simple denial of the cruelty alleged in the petition. By an order of July 10, 1946, the venue was fixed at Bristol, and on July 11, 1946, the cause was set down for trial. On Sept. 10, 1946, the wife lodged her bill of costs up to setting down, and on Sept. 26, 1946, those costs were taxed and allowed at £19 5s. 9d., and an order was made by the registrar for payment by the husband of that sum within 7 days, and for the lodgment of security to the amount of £9 for the wife's costs of the hearing. On Oct. 24, 1946, I heard in chambers an appeal from both portions of the order.

The grounds put forward for the appeal against the costs were similar to those in Collins v. Collins and Dove. The wife's solicitor sought to support the order on the ground that it did not contain any charges after the date of the certificate, that the husband was liable for costs up to that date, and that the wife's solicitor was entitled to protection to that extent. As to the order for security, it was urged that such an order was contrary to the provisions of Ord. 16, r. 28 (1), as placing on the poor person a liability to pay costs. The argument in support of the order for security was based on what was said to be the practice of the courts, and Smith v. Smith and Rutherford and others (1), was relied on. In this case also I was invited to deliver my judgment in court. I deal, first, with the question of costs. If the view that I have expressed in the earlier part of my judgment covering both cases is correct, it follows that the taxation and order for payment of the costs, the subject of the appeal, ought not to stand, as it imposes a liability on the poor person husband from which Ord. 16, r. 28 (1), frees him. There does not appear to me to be any ground for supposing that the registrar, in making the order, was intending to make, or that there was any material before him on which he could have made, a discretionary order for payment within the meaning of the rule. Accordingly, the order as to costs appealed from must be set aside.

On the question of security, I intend to deal only with the point raised on this appeal, namely, do the Poor Persons Rules allow, or do they in any way affect the jurisdiction of, the court to order security for his wife's costs against a poor person, whether petitioner or respondent? In this case the petitioning wife was not proceeding as a poor person, and, therefore, the provisions of r. 74 (2) (b) and (4) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1944, apply to this case, and prima facie give to the wife a right to apply for security. There is no express provision in either the Poor Persons Rules or in r. 74 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules relating to the question that I have now to decide.

I am of opinion that the wife in this case was entitled to apply for security for her costs, and that the amount of the security to be ordered by the registrar should, as in every other case, be fixed by him at such a sum as is reasonable in the circumstances. I can see no reason why the holder of a poor person's certificate, having been relieved of the expense of prosecuting or defending a petition, should not give security for his wife's costs according to his means and having due regard to his wife's financial position and any other circumstances

A which, in the opinion of the registrar, ought to affect the amount of the security to be ordered. Grinham v. Grinham and Pascoe (2), and Smith v. Smith and Rutherford and others (1), clearly justify the view that such an order is proper, and indicate the circumstances to which attention should be paid when considering the propriety of making the order, or the amount of the security to be provided. I, therefore, dismiss the appeal as to security.

On Nov. 22, 1946, this case was tried by Mr. Commissioner Wethered, at

B Bristol. The record of the trial which is kept in the registry indicates that the commissioner found the petitioner's case proved, granted a decree nisi, gave to the petitioner the custody of the two children of the marriage, and "condemned the said respondent in the costs incurred and to be incurred on behalf of the said petitioner in this cause." The record in the registry to which I have referred indicates that this order was made because "respondent

C not now a poor person," which I understand to mean that in some way or other which does not appear, the respondent had in the meantime lost the benefit of his poor person's certificate. On the material before me it is impossible to ascertain how this came about, or what were the facts before the commissioner on which he made this order. So far as the documents recording the grant of the decree nisi and the other orders made by the commissioner at the same time, and recorded in the same document, afford any information,

D it appears that the order as to costs is in the ordinary form applicable to a case in which the husband has not at any time during the existence of the suit been a poor person. If this alone appeared, it would, in my view, be impossible to treat such an order as a discretionary order within the meaning of Ord. 16, r. 28 (1), with the result that it would be ineffective as against the respondent because made without jurisdiction, contrary to an express provision contained in that rule. On the other hand, the finding of the learned

E commissioner that when the case was before him the respondent had ceased to be a poor person opened the way for the making of the order for costs that the commissioner made. This order obliges the respondent to pay all the petitioner's costs of the suit.

I need only add that a further consequence of this opinion is that, although when the matter was before me in Oct., 1946, I had come to the conclusion

F that the registrar's order for payment of the wife's costs up to setting down must be set aside, this will not make any difference to the petitioner's rights against the respondent as to costs, because the commissioner's order at the trial will, as I have said, include the whole of the costs. In this case also I do not make any order as to costs.

Order as to costs set aside. Order as to security to stand.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Atkinson, J.), March 20, 21, 24, 1947.]

Revenue—Excess profits tax—Profits arising from a trade or business—“Trade or business”—Sand and gravel merchant—Royalties received by him from licensees permitted to win gravel from his land—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939 (c. 109), s. 12 (2).

The taxpayer carried on the business of sand and gravel merchant on certain land and at the same time he granted licences to three firms to enter his land and win gravel for themselves in return for which he received from them a royalty for each cubic yard of gravel taken away.

HELD: the royalties were not part of the profits of the business because, in granting the licences, the tax-payer was exploiting his rights of ownership in the land and was not carrying on his business of a sand and gravel merchant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 24, 1947. ATKINSON, J.: In 1945 Mr. Frederick Henry Victor Iles was assessed to excess profits tax in respect of his business profits for the year ending Mar. 31, 1942, in the sum of £240, and for the following year in the sum of £2,166. He appealed on the ground that £809 in the first year and £1,288 in the second year had been wrongly included in the computation of his profits. He succeeded on his appeal, and the Inland Revenue Commissioners obtained a Case with which I have now to deal.

Mr. Iles owns certain land at Lechdale on which there is gravel and other ballast, and he carries on business as a sand and gravel merchant. Before and during the war he carried on this business by obtaining the gravel, washing it, and selling it for 3s. 6d. per cubic yard loaded on the purchaser's lorry. There is no doubt that his trade is one to which the provisions relating to excess profits tax apply. When the war came there was a great demand for gravel, and Mr. Iles, in addition to working and selling gravel himself, permitted three other firms to take gravel from his land in the following circumstances. Taking the first company, Kent and Sussex Contractors, Ltd., on Oct. 20, 1941, that company wrote to Mr. Iles:

We have pleasure in accepting your offer to allow us to excavate for and remove ballast from your pit at Lechdale, we to pay you 9d. per cubic yard for all ballast removed by us.

A day or two later the second company wrote:

We accept the prices contained in your quotation . . . We to remove the top soil and stack and in due course throw back into pit. We to compensate the farmer for damage to land and loss of crops . . . We to pay you 9d. per yard royalty on all gravel taken away by us.

A letter, written by Mr. Iles, to the third company, states :

You to be allowed the right to dig and take away gravel from my pit and to pay royalty of 10d. a yard for all gravel removed . . . I am responsible for compensation to farmer, rates and taxes and all other assessments. You to load my lorries for local requirements at the rate of 6d. per cubic yard when required. I to let you have the use of my man, so long as required, you to pay him at the rate of 1s. 6d. per hour.

It is common ground that these agreements provide for payment of royalties in respect of each yard of gravel taken. During the currency of the agreements which were all proceeded with Mr. Iles continued working his pit in the same way as before. None of the other three had any exclusive right to work. They all worked at the same time. There was one excavation which was being worked, but it was extended by the additional excavations made by the three licensees on the land.

The question in the case is whether the royalties payable by these three companies were profits from the trade or business of a merchant carried on by Mr. Iles. Mr. Iles contends that what was done by these three firms was done in their trade or business, not in his. If he had ceased to carry on his business at any time, the existence of these licences would not have been affected. The licensees would have continued to get what gravel they wanted, and the royalties would have come in in precisely the same way. Mr. Iles says that his business was that of a merchant getting and selling gravel, and that permitting other people to carry on their trade on his land was no part of his business. He contends that the profits in question were made, not in any sense from or by the carrying on of his business, but from the exploitation by him of his rights of property, and that such profits would be covered by assessments under sched. A, or, possibly, sched. B, but for s. 21 of the Finance Act, 1934, which specifically made rent and royalties subject to tax. Another contention was that the land, quite properly, could be regarded as an investment, and royalties paid by other people for working on the land would be income arising from the investment. The Inland Revenue Commissioners merely affirm that the royalties were ordinary trading receipts of the business carried on by Mr. Iles. For Mr. Iles it is said that the question is one of fact, and that question of fact has been determined by the commissioners. Their finding was :

Having considered the evidence and arguments addressed before us we were of opinion that the respondent's appeal should be allowed as we felt the case had not been proved, and gave our decision accordingly.

Two cases were relied on. The first case, Croft v. Sywell Aerodrome Ltd. (1), was dealing with the question whether receipts coming in from licences granted by the aerodrome company were part of their profits. I need not trouble with the facts of that case, but what is relied on is the law laid down there as being of general application. LORD GREENE, M.R., says ([1942] 1 All E.R. 113) :

The questions raised by the appeals call for some re-examination of certain features of the Income Tax Acts which relate to assessments under sched. A and sched. B. If I may begin with a commonplace, income tax is a tax on income, and this observation applies equally in the cases of sched. A and sched. B and in those of the other schedules. There is, however, this difference. Whereas the other schedules deal only with income actually received (calculated, it is true, in accordance with the relevant rules), in the case of sched. A and sched. B the actual perception of income is not necessary in order to attract the tax. The owner of lands is deemed to obtain income from his mere ownership, and the occupier of lands is deemed to obtain income from his mere occupation. The measure of the income so deemed to be derived is, in the ordinary case, determined by reference to the annual value as defined. To quote the language of LORD DUNEDIN in Fry v. Salisbury House Estate, Ltd. (2) ([1930] A.C. 439) : "The result is that by the operation of the assessment under sched. A which is made imperative by the statute . . . the income of the assessee is so far dealt with and cannot be dealt with again." The same is true of income which is assessed under sched. B. Where, therefore, in respect of any particular land, tax has been assessed (as it must be) both in respect of the property in the land under sched. A and in respect of the occupation of the land under sched. B, no further tax is exigible in respect of any income referable to that property or that occupation, even if such actual income greatly exceeds the value upon which the tax is calculated. Similarly, apart from specific provisions, the taxpayer who derives from his property or his occupation an actual income which falls below the assessed value can obtain no reduction of tax. It is perhaps not unnatural that the Revenue authorities, finding in certain cases a very large excess of actual income over the assessed value, have endeavoured to levy tax on that excess by treating it as referable to a trade under sched. D, Case I, or to a profit under Case VI. Instances of these endeavours are to be found, in the case of sched. A, in Fry v. Salisbury House Estate, Ltd. (2), and, in the case of sched. B, in Glanely (Lord) v. Wightman (3). The effect of these decisions is that, where profits are referable to property or occupation, the Crown, like the subject, is bound by the statutory measure in accordance with which such profits fall to be ascertained. A further principle, I think, also emerges—namely, that, even if the profits in question are made by means of a highly organised commercial operation, such as in ordinary parlance would be described as a trading operation, the relevant schedule, be it sched. A or sched. B, must be applied. Once a profit is referable to property or occupation, it must remain in that category. It cannot be taken out of that category by calling the operation which gives rise to it a trading operation.

On p. 116 he says :

When the owner of land grants a licence to another to come on his land, he is exercising his rights of property just as much as when he is granting a lease. It is by virtue of his proprietary rights that he has power to grant the licence, and this is equally true whether he is a freeholder or a leaseholder. The fact that a licensee carries on a trade on the strength of his licence has nothing whatever to do with the owner who grants the licence. It does not convert him for tax purposes into a person carrying on a trade, any more than in the case where a tenant carries on a trade. The fact that the land is peculiarly suitable for carrying on the trade, whether under a lease or a licence, will, or should in the long run, be reflected in its annual value for tax purposes.

I will read one more passage on p. 118 :

... I cannot myself see that a person who leases the land to others, or grants licences to others to come upon it, is doing anything more than exploiting his own rights of property, even if the tenant or licensee is, by the terms of the lease or licence, entitled himself to carry on a trade on the land.

Mr. Iles says that what happened here is precisely governed by those words, that he was merely exploiting his rights of property by letting other people come and excavate for gravel.

One other case was relied on by Mr. Iles, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Broadway Car Co. (Wimbledon), Ltd. (4). There the company carried on a business of motor car agents and repairers on land which they held on a 20 years' lease at an annual rent of £750. By 1940 that business had dwindled under war conditions to such an extent that no more than one-third of the land was required. In those circumstances the remainder was sub-let for 14 years at a rent of £1,150 a year. The General Commissioners decided that the difference of £400 between the £750 rent paid and the £1,150 rent received was income received from an investment and was, therefore, not taxable. There was an appeal by the Crown, and it was claimed that this was not money derived from an investment, but was really part and parcel of the profits of the business carried on. The decision of the commissioners was reversed by MACNAGHTEN, J., but on appeal to the Court of Appeal the commissioners were upheld, it being held that it was a question of fact and that there was ample evidence to support their finding. SCOTT, L.J., said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 609) :

The appellant company was assessed in the sum of £2,500 on the profits of their business. They appealed to the general commissioners, and the latter held that a part of their income amounting to £400 net was income from an investment within the meaning of para. 6 (2) of pt. I of sched. VII to [Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939], and that, the company not being a company of one of the special kinds made liable for investment income in that sub-paragraph, the income in question ought to be excluded from the assessment . . . The argument of the Crown is that the wording of the commissioners' finding, in the Case Stated shows error. According to that finding (1) the income "did not arise in the ordinary course of the company's business," and (2) "was income from an investment." I cannot see how that was wrong. The commissioners rejected the contention of the Crown, so far as it was fact, that the rent "arose in the ordinary course of the business," if, by that, was meant as an ordinary transaction or operation of a motor car agent's business, and rightly rejected it because there was no evidence to support it . . . The question for the commissioners was one of mixed fact and law, the law being as to the meaning of the word "investment." In my opinion, as I have said, there was evidence to support the finding of fact and no error of law.

TUCKER, L.J. (at p. 611), said the same thing and made some remarks about Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Desoutter Bros., Ltd. (5).

Therefore, it seems clear—and Gloucester Railway Carriage & Wagon Co., Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (6) is to the same effect (see the judgment of WARRINGTON, L.J., in 12 Tax. Cas. 720, at pp. 742, 743)—that the question whether or not these profits arise from a business is a question of fact, and the court cannot interfere if there is any evidence to support the decision of the commissioners. The Broadway Car Co. case (4) is interesting in the respect that there the company leased a part of the land which had been their business premises, and yet it was held that that did not make the rent they received rent receivable in the course of their business.

As I understand it, it was conceded that, if Mr. Iles had leased part of his land or had granted licences, as he did, to work some part of his land which did not adjoin or touch the excavation which was being worked by him, it would be difficult to say that these royalties were part of the profits of Mr. Iles' business. I cannot see what difference it makes that the receipts granted are in respect of land bordering on the area being dealt with. The land which was being dealt with was in a sense virgin land. One of these agreements speaks of what is to be done with the "top soil." The work was not going to be in a pit actually being worked. It is as if Mr. Iles started at point A and worked westwards and said to one of the licensees: "You start working away to the north"; and to another: "You work to the east"; and to another: "You work to the south." They are to excavate the land and remove the top earth and arrange with the farmers, and so on. It is not that they should proceed to work in the very pit which was being worked by Mr. Iles. They are delving into the land afresh. Surely it cannot make any difference whether those excavations join the existing excavation, or whether they begin 10 yards, 20 yards, or half a mile away. That is the case for Mr. Iles.

The first complaint of the Crown was on the wording of the finding of fact. It is a commonplace when an assessment has been made that it is for the taxpayer to prove it is wrong. Counsel for the Crown said that the words of the finding indicate that the burden has been put on the wrong shoulders, because the General Commissioners say: "Having considered the evidence and arguments addressed before us, we were of opinion that the respondent's appeal should be allowed as we felt that the case had not been proved, and gave our decision accordingly. Counsel says that that suggests that the commissioners thought it was for the Crown to prove that the decision of the assessing commissioners was right. I do not think that is what was meant. One must not be too hypercritical in dealing with the words of findings of this character. They were saying: "We think the appeal should be allowed. We think the decision was wrong. We think that these were not profits from the trade or business." I think it is plain they meant that, on the evidence, in their view, these receipts were not profits from a trade or business. It may be it is not expressed very happily, but they certainly were of opinion that these receipts were not profits of the business.

Then it was argued that, if that properly describes their finding, there was no evidence to support it, and the facts were such that there was only one conclusion possible. I cannot agree with that. On the contrary, in my opinion, if the commissioners had found these were profits from the trade carried on by Mr. Iles, there would have been a very strong case for saying there was no evidence to support it. I start with a finding of what the business was, a finding that the business was that of a merchant getting, washing and selling gravel. Not one of those operations was performed by Mr. Iles in this connection. Rent from the lease of part of his land, royalties from a licence to get gravel from part of his land, would indisputably be an exploitation of his rights of ownership. I repeat it was very half-heartedly contested, if not conceded, that, if the land had not been contiguous to this excavation, the royalties would not be profits from the business. The receipt of these royalties in no way depended on the continuance of Mr. Iles' business. They formed no part of it. What difference can it make that part of the land included in the lease or licence was contiguous to that part of the land which was being excavated by the owner?

Then it was suggested by counsel for the Crown that the case was like the Desoutter case (5), where it was held that, if you make use of a patent in your business and also receive royalties from the use of the patent by others licensed to use it, those royalties cannot be regarded as receipts from an investment. In other words, the door has to be either open or shut. A patent is either an investment or it is not. The suggestion was that freehold land is in the same position, and if you carry on business on part of it whatever you do with the rest by way of licensing or letting cannot be regarded as producing income from an investment. That, however, is dead in the teeth of the judgment in the Broadway Car Co. case (4). The same argument was tried there, but TUCKER, L.J., said he thought the Desoutter case (5) had very little to do with it, as there was a great difference between land and a patent, and he did not think the Desoutter case (5) threw any light on the matter. In the Broadway Car Co. case (4) it must be remembered they actually leased two-thirds of their business premises, but that did not make the rent the company received profits of their business. A patent is quite different from freehold land. If the argument of counsel for the Crown were carried to the extreme, it would mean that the mere fact that a man carries on business on one corner of his land would make all the rents and all the royalties received from the use of the rest of the land ordinary trade receipts of his business. That, of course, is an impossible contention. I think there was ample evidence to support the view taken by the general commissioners. The view they intended to express, I think, was that they were satisfied that the rents were not part of the business, and I am of opinion that their decision should stand.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

POTTER & CLARKE, LTD. v. PHARMACEUTICAL SOCIETY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), March 25, 26, 27, April 25, 1947.]

Medicine—Disclosure of composition—Sale by unauthorised persons—"Substance recommended as a medicine"—Substance known to public as supposed remedy for particular ailment—Name of substance and dosage given on label, but no reference to any ailment—Pharmacy and Medicines Act, 1941 (c. 42), ss. 11 (1), 12 (1), 17.

Where a substance is sold in a wrapper or container bearing a label on which, after the name of the substance, there are instructions regarding the dose to be taken (with, or without, a reference to the British Pharmacopœia), but there is no reference whatever to the nature of the ailment or ailments for which it is to be taken, the substance is not a "substance recommended as a medicine" within the meaning of that expression as defined in the Pharmacy and Medicines Act, 1941, s. 17, and, accordingly, it can lawfully be sold by unqualified persons, notwithstanding s. 12, and its composition is not required to be disclosed under s. 11. Although words relating to dosage indicate that a substance is a medicine, to bring it within the definition in s. 17 the written terms in which the substance is referred to must specify the particular ailment or group of ailments for the prevention or treatment of which the substance is appropriate, and it is immaterial that the general public or a particular consumer knows that the substance in question is supposed to be a remedy for a particular ailment.

Decision of WYNN-PARRY, J., ([1946] 2 All E.R. 561) reversed.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of WYNN-PARRY, J., dated Oct. 25, 1946, and reported [1946] 2 All E.R. 561, on the construction of certain provisions of the Pharmacy and Medicines Act, 1941. Cur. adv. vult.

Apr. 25. ASQUITH, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment of WYNN-PARRY, J., on an originating summons raising for the determination of the court certain questions relating to the construction of the Pharmacy and Medicines Act, 1941, ss. 11, 12 and 17. The litigation is friendly litigation, the issues are difficult, and the result important. This is a test case. It affects vitally the respective rights, in relation to the sale of medicines, of qualified dealers (e.g., chemists) and unqualified dealers (e.g., grocers), and also the extent of the obligation resting on both to disclose the composition of medicines sold.

C The relevant provisions of the Act are as follows. Section 11 (1) provides :

Subject to the provisions of this Act, no person shall—(a) sell by retail any article consisting of or comprising a substance recommended as a medicine; or (b) supply any such article as a sample for the purpose of inducing persons to buy by retail the substance of which it consists or which it comprises; unless there is written so as to be clearly legible on the article or a label affixed thereto, or, if the article is sold or supplied as aforesaid in a container, on the container or a label affixed thereto, or, if the article is sold or supplied as aforesaid in more than one container, on the inner container or a label affixed thereto—(i) the appropriate designation of the substance so recommended, or of each of the active constituents thereof, or of each of the ingredients of which it has been compounded; and (ii) in a case where the appropriate designation of each of the active constituents or the ingredients is written as aforesaid, the appropriate quantitative particulars of the constituents or ingredients.

Section 12 (1) provides :

E Subject to the provisions of this Act, no person shall sell by retail any article consisting of or comprising a substance recommended as a medicine unless he is—(a) a registered medical practitioner or a registered dentist; or (b) an authorised seller of poisons; or (c) a person not being a registered medical practitioner or a registered dentist or an authorised seller of poisons, but being a person who—(i) has served a regular apprenticeship to a registered pharmacist, or to a body corporate authorised to sell poisons by virtue of s. 9 of the [Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933]; and (ii) is at the date of the passing of this Act carrying on on his own account a business which comprises the retail sale of drugs.

Section 12 (3) provides :

If any person sells an article in contravention of any of the preceding provisions of this section, he shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be liable on summary conviction—(a) in the case of a first conviction, to a fine not exceeding £20; and (b) in the case of a subsequent conviction, to a fine not exceeding £100, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 3 months, or to both such a fine and such imprisonment.

G Sub-sections (4) and (5) need not be read but will be referred to later. Section 14 abolishes certain stamp duties imposed by the Medicines Stamp Act, 1802, the Stamp Act, 1804, and the Medicines Stamp Act, 1812. Finally, s. 17 contains a definition of “substance recommended as a medicine,” which is important, because the whole case turns on the meaning of that expression. The definition is as follows :

H “Substance recommended as a medicine,” in relation to the sale of an article consisting of or comprising a substance so recommended, means a substance which is referred to—(a) on the article, or on any wrapper or container in which the article is sold, or on any label affixed to, or in any document enclosed in, the article or such a wrapper or container; or (b) in any placard or other document exhibited at the place where the article is sold; or (c) in any advertisement published after the passing of this Act by or on behalf of the manufacturer of the article, or the person carrying on the business in the course of which the article was sold, or, in a case where the article was sold under a proprietary designation, the proprietor of the designation; in terms which are calculated to lead to the use of the substance for the prevention or treatment of any ailment, infirmity or injury affecting the human body, not being terms which give a definite indication that the substance is intended to be used as, or as part of, a food or drink, and not as, or as part of, a medicine.

In the originating summons the plaintiffs submitted for the determination of the court two questions, of which the second is not involved in this appeal. The first is as follows :

Whether upon a true construction of the Pharmacy and Medicines Act, 1941 (and on the agreed facts of this case) any and which of the substances specified in the first column of the first schedule hereto, when sold in a wrapper or container labelled as described opposite each in the second column of the said schedule, are substances recommended as a medicine.

The first substance referred to is as follows : Senna Pods : Label :

Senna Pods, Potter & Clarke, Ltd., Viaduct House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

The second substance is "Fluid Extract of Cascara Sagrada." The label is

Trade Mark: Winged Lion Brand. Fluid Extract of Cascara Sagrada. British Pharmacopoeia. Dose: Half to one teaspoonful in half a wineglass of water.

The third substance is "Lemon and Squill Linctus." The label is :

Lemon and Squill Linctus. Potter & Clarke, Ltd., Viaduct House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

The fourth substance is "Compound Rhubarb Pills" and the label is :

Compound Rhubarb Pills. Dose: One or two at bed time. Parkinsons, Ltd., Burnley.

Lastly, the substance is "Effervescing Powders" and the label :

Extra strong Effervescing Powders. Prepared by Carter & Sons, Sheffield, a war-time substitute for Seidlitz Powders. Carters. Dissolve the contents of the blue paper in half a tumbler of water, and then add the powder in the white paper and drink while effervescing. Take first thing in the morning on an empty stomach.

Then follows Carter & Sons' address at Sheffield.

According to one construction of the words "substance recommended as a medicine"—that contended for by the defendant society—the preparations named in the schedule with the respective labels therein described are such substances, and can by virtue of s. 12 (1) only be sold by qualified vendors, e.g., chemists and the other classes of persons described in that sub-section. According to the alternative construction, contended for by the plaintiffs, they are not such substances and may lawfully be sold by unqualified persons as well. In relation to the first substance, senna pods, labelled eo nomine, the trial judge has held in favour of the plaintiffs, and the defendants do not appeal against this decision. In regard to the third, lemon and squill linctus, he held in favour of the defendants, and the plaintiffs, the appellants, do not seek to disturb this finding. The appeal is, accordingly, limited to the other three substances in the schedule, namely, fluid extract of cascara, compound rhubarb pills and effervescing powders. In regard to these he has adopted the construction for which the defendant society argued. He has held, in other words, that these substances, labelled as they are, are "substances recommended as medicines" within s. 17, with the corollary that under s. 12 (1) they can only lawfully be sold by qualified persons, and under s. 11 (1) must have their composition disclosed. The decision proceeded on agreed facts contained in an affidavit by Richard Charles Wren, the material passages in which are set out in the judgment of the trial judge and will be referred to when necessary in this judgment.

The two rival constructions of "substances recommended as a medicine" are as follows. In the definition it will be remembered that such a substance means a substance which is "referred to" in writing the various forms of which are set out in (a) (b) and (c) of the paragraph containing the definition :

... in terms which are calculated to lead to the use of the substance for the prevention or treatment of any ailment, infirmity or injury affecting the human body ...

The plaintiffs argue that the written terms must specify the particular ailment or group of ailments for the prevention or treatment of which the substance is appropriate, and that, if the written terms are silent as to such ailment or ailments, the substance is not a "substance recommended as a medicine" within the definition. The defendants, for their part, argue that the definition is complied with, though the label mentions no specific ailment or ailments, provided it is common knowledge that the substance in question is in fact used for the prevention or treatment of a specific ailment or group of ailments. In the case of a consuming public armed with that knowledge, for example, with the knowledge that fluid extract of cascara is a remedy for constipation, the written terms, though they do not mention constipation but are simply the correct name of the preparation offered, may nevertheless be "calculated" (so the argument runs) "to lead to the use of" fluid extract of cascara sagrada for the prevention or the treatment of constipation. The judge has accepted this contention as regards the three substances under appeal. It should be mentioned that in respect of each of those three substances the effect of the agreed evidence is that the public knows that the substance is, or is supposed to be, a remedy for a specific ailment, namely, constipation. The affidavit states, for example, (a) in the case of cascara sagrada: "It is a popular mild laxative . . . when purchased by retail customers cascara is purchased for human use as a laxative"; (b) in the case of compound rhubarb pills: "a well-known household remedy as a vegetable laxative"; (c) in the case of the effervescent powders (war-time substitute for seidlitz powders): "seidlitz powder is a well-known mild purgative."

In these circumstances it may be convenient to inquire, first, what meaning a court should attach to the words of the definition, if it limits its purview to the four corners of the definition itself. If that meaning is wholly clear, no other question arises. But if or in case that meaning is open to doubt or ambiguity, it will be convenient, secondly, to consider whether any clear policy can be discerned underlying the Act, in the light of which the obscurity or ambiguity might be resolved and a different meaning possibly attached to the disputed words from that which on the surface they bear. In some cases it is possible to deduce the "policy" of an Act from its preamble or from its other provisions alone. When these are in themselves neutral or unilluminating, it may be helpful to consider the substratum of law and fact, relating to the trade or other subject-matter in question, which obtained when the Act was passed, on which the Act was superimposed, and in relation to which a "policy" may be spelt out. Such matters as the general lay-out of the trade in drugs before 1941 (any legal or de facto delimitation, for instance, of provinces or lines of business between the qualified and unqualified dealers) might, viewed side by side with the provisions of the Act, indicate the mischief at which the Act struck and thus assist in its interpretation. But the first step is to construe the relevant words in abstraction from this background, to construe them, as it were, in vacuo. So regarded, their true construction appears to this court to be that favoured by the plaintiffs. We base this view on the following considerations. In the first place, it is the "terms" of the reference (inscribed on what will be called for short "the label")—it is these terms themselves which must be "calculated to lead to the use" of the substance for the prevention or treatment of any ailment, not the knowledge which the public happens to possess about its efficacy for any ailment, nor yet an amalgam or conglomerate of those terms and that knowledge. Secondly, (a consideration tending the same way) this is a statute which affects with criminal liability unqualified persons selling "substances recommended as medicines." Parliament would not, we think, have desired to impose on the vendor the duty of gauging to a nicety how far it is within the knowledge of the general public that a particular medicine is a remedy for a particular ailment, and to make criminal liability vel non depend on the accuracy of what may be a highly speculative computation. For the purposes of the criminal law persons are presumed to know (and to know that others know) the meaning of plain English, but they are not presumed to know how far others know the therapeutic purposes to which particular medicaments are put. If, however, the defendants' construction is right, the vendor is required at his peril to know this, and, indeed, to do more, namely, to divine the state of knowledge of the individual customer, for the question whether the terms of the label are "calculated to lead to the use" covers "use" by that customer, and so far as it does so, it is the knowledge of that customer which is relevant. The words are not limited to use by the public at large. It is surely sensible to suppose that Parliament intended the vendor to apply a test less conjectural, less problematic, more objective. Such a test is available and can be applied quite simply, if what the vendor has to consider is, not the assumed knowledge of the general public or individual numbers of it, but the actual contents of the label. This he can read, and tell beyond a peradventure whether it does or does not specify an ailment or group of ailments for which the substance is recommended. Indeed, if the contrary criterion is assumed, importing the knowledge of the consumer and spelling out a "recommendation" from the aggregate of this knowledge plus the written terms, singular consequences follow. On this assumption, liability to a £20 fine may result from the unqualified vendor's act in simply labelling a bottle of, say, aspirin with the word "aspirin," provided the general public or the particular customer knows that aspirin is good for headaches. A bald accurate description of the substance sold, without more, would, if the consumer's knowledge derived aliunde is suffered to eke it out, amount to a "reference" to it in "terms which are calculated to lead to" its use for the purpose described in the definition. We cannot believe that the legislature intended such grave consequences to follow from calling a spade a spade, and the judge manifestly thought the same when dealing with the case of the senna pods described on the label as "senna pods" without more.

For these reasons the court is of opinion that the words of the definition (construed by themselves, in abstraction from any legislative or factual context) are not satisfied unless the written terms indicate that the substance is a remedy for an ailment or ailments specified in such written terms, and that, if all that the written terms contain is an accurate description of the substance or of its ingredients, it is not a "substance recommended" within the definition. When this canon is applied to the three substances under review it would appear in each case to rule them out of that category, since in each case the written "terms" are purely descriptive. In the case of fluid extract of cascara sagrada, the label contains the inscription "B.P." and prescribes the dosage. If the consumer's knowledge is excluded, this means merely that the preparation is compounded according to the formula and standard of purity set out in the British Pharmacopœia, one of the monographs of which is headed "Liquid Extract of Cascara Sagrada" and sets out the ingredients of this substance together with a maximum or minimum dose. This monograph itself is simply a description of what constitutes "liquid" or "fluid" extract (the two are stated in the text to be synonymous) of cascara sagrada. The reference to proper dosage on the label and to maximum and minimum dosage in the British Pharmacopœia certainly imply that the substance is to be used as a medicine for some ailment or ailments, but neither on the label nor in the Pharmacopœia is there the smallest hint as to the nature of the ailment or ailments for which it is to be used. So again with "Compound Rhubarb Pills. Dose: One or two at bedtime," plus the name of the suppliers. The "B.P." is not referred to in this case. But here, as before, while the words relating to dosage imply that the substance is a medicine, there is nothing to indicate for what it is a medicine. In the third case the label contains the words: "Extra strong effervescing powders. Prepared by Carter & Sons, Sheffield, a war-time substitute for Seidlitz Powders." The same considerations apply here also. Moreover, such a label stands on precisely the same footing for present purposes as a label simply marked "Seidlitz Powders." If it had been so marked, it would have been the barest of bare descriptions, like a label marked "Senna Pods" without more. In the case of senna pods the judge himself excluded the knowledge of the public. The principle on which he did so logically extends to the case of the seidlitz powder substitute, and, indeed, in our view, to all the three disputed cases. Either the consumer's knowledge can be prayed in aid in supplement of the written "label," or it cannot. If it cannot, the defendants fail. If it can, a mere descriptive word—say "Aspirin" without more—on the label (plus the consumer's knowledge) is enough (just as sufficient as that word plus something about dosage or the British Pharmacopœia) to impress the medicament with the stamp of a substance recommended as a medicine. Once the consumer's knowledge is assumed to be a relevant supplementary factor, there can be no material distinction between a label which reads "Aspirin" simpliciter, and one which adds information as to dosage and the like.

In our opinion, therefore, there is no real doubt or ambiguity as to the meaning of the relevant words, but let us assume that there is room for such doubt or ambiguity and proceed to the second factor which would then have to be considered, namely, matters extrinsic to the definition but possibly affecting its interpretation. Prominent among these (but not exhaustive of them) is the condition of the law and practice in relation to the exaction of customs duties on the sale of medicines previous to 1941. What was this condition? Was it such as should lead the court to revise the construction of the words "substance recommended as a medicine" provisionally arrived at on the basis of the bare language of the Act of 1941, either by pointing to a specific policy underlying the material provisions of that Act, or otherwise? We must go back to the Medicines Stamp Act, 1812, but need not go back further. This Act was in force for over a century until repealed by the Act of 1941. It charged with duty the substances named or described in its schedule. The schedule begins with a list of specific preparations. Then follow words charging generally all substances which fall within certain named categories. The general charging provision can, in part, safely be paraphrased. The subject-matter of the charge consists of all "pills powders," etc., "to be used . . . as medicines . . . for the prevention, cure or relief of any disorder or complaint . . . affecting the human body . . . vended . . . by any . . . persons whatsoever," provided they fall into any of four named categories. These categories are (i) occult or secret remedies, (ii) proprietary remedies, (iii) patented remedies, (iv) and (most material) remedies which in certain terms (public notices or advertisements, labels and the like) are :

. . . held out or recommended to the public by the makers, vendors or proprietors thereof as nostrums or proprietary medicines, or as specifics, or as beneficial to the prevention, cure or relief of any distemper, malady, ailment, disorder, or complaint incident to or in any wise affecting the human body.

We are concerned, first, with the question whether under this provision duty would have been legally exigible, or would in fact and in practice have been exacted, by the customs authorities before 1941 in respect of the three substances involved in this appeal, bearing the labels which they in fact bore. As a matter of legal construction, we are of opinion that the words "held out or recommended . . . as beneficial to the prevention, cure or relief of any . . . ailment" are not satisfied unless the label or other written terms specify the particular ailment or ailments concerned. The matter can be tested in this way. If the question were asked: "Did the label recommend the substance as beneficial for the relief of any ailment?" an affirmative answer, surely, could only truthfully be given if the label indicated a particular ailment or ailments for which the substance was recommended as beneficial. There is no clear-cut authority on the construction of these words which recur without any material alteration in the Venereal Disease Act, 1917, s. 2 (2). But, on principle, in the case of both Acts, we think the construction above indicated is right. In the case of the provision in the Venereal Disease Act, 1917, if the alternative interpretation prevailed, any seller of, say, mercurial ointment, advertised simply as such, would be criminally liable, because it is known to purchasers (or some of them) to be used in the treatment of venereal disease, although it has other uses too.

But whether or not the duty would have been legally exigible on the true construction of the Act of 1812 in respect of the substances under review, is, perhaps, less material than whether duty would in practice have been exacted in respect thereof by the stamp authorities. On this we are assisted by a statement agreed between counsel which reads as follows :

It is agreed that the passage in ALPE'S HANDY BOOK OF MEDICINE STAMP DUTY beginning at p. 78, line 1, represents the practice of the commissioners in enforcing the medicine stamp duties until their repeal.

The passage in ALPE reads :

It is a good general rule that a medicine is liable to duty if the description is one that would enable a purchaser unacquainted with the virtues and efficacies of the drugs of which it is composed to doctor himself for any ailment, or class of ailments.

The holding out or recommendation may be conveyed by the title, as "corn cure," or in the body of the description, or even in the directions for use. The holding out or recommendation must be for some ailment, or class of ailments; that is to say, some ailment or class of ailments must be indicated or mentioned.

The statement agreed between counsel continues :

It is also agreed that packages bearing the labels exhibited for fluid extract of cascara sagrada, and compound rhubarb pills, would not have been required by reason of the labels to be stamped.

(It will be seen that for some reason this specific admission does not extend to the "Effervescing Powders" though the approved passage from ALPE would seem clearly to cover this substance also).

[MR. BLANCO WHITE : I have since found out that seidlitz powder is a patent medicine. It was patented in 1823, and, therefore, would, or ought to, bear stamp duty.

LORD GREENE, M.R. : It would have been liable to tax under the head of "patent," and not under the head of "recommended" ?

MR. BLANCO WHITE : That I do not know, but it would, I think, have been liable to tax as a patent medicine.]

ASQUITH, L.J. : This, then, was one leading feature of the status quo on which the Act of 1941 supervened. The second was that, under the third exemption in the schedule to the Act of 1812, as construed in Farmer v. Glyn-Jones (1), qualified dealers were exempt from stamp duty on sales of certain "known, admitted, and approved" medicines, sales of which by unqualified dealers attracted the duty. In practice this discrimination squeezed the unqualified dealer out of this field. The exempting paragraph in question relieved of duty "mixtures," etc., vended by qualified dealers, and by such dealers only, in the event, and in the event only, of such mixtures being "known, admitted, and approved" remedies. The exemption is denied when the mixtures, etc., are (a) occult, (b) proprietary, (c) patented, or (d) "held out or recommended" (by its label or other specified written media) by the "owners, proprietors . . . or first vendors" (these words are different from the corresponding words in the charging section) "as beneficial for the . . . relief of any . . . ailment." In Farmer v. Glyn-Jones (1) a retail chemist had affixed to a bottle a label reading :

Ammoniated Tincture of Quinine. B.P. A well-known and highly recommended remedy for influenza and colds.

This was a "known, admitted and approved remedy"—its composition was notorious. The chemist was held on a Case stated by magistrates not liable to duty because the preparation was not occult, proprietary, or patented, and because, although it was recommended by him, it was not recommended by the "owners, proprietors or first vendors" (the latter being the wholesale supplier, who had not affixed the label). Henceforward a retail chemist, in the case of a whole range of remedies whose composition was disclosed, could sell them duty free, notwithstanding that he labelled them as remedies for named complaints.

We may now summarise the salient features of the position on the eve of the enactment of the Act of 1941, under the following heads. (i) Qualified and unqualified persons alike were in law free to sell any medicines they chose, nor were they bound in law to disclose the composition of such medicines. The discrimination between the two operated not through any one-sided prohibition of sales, but through the differential incidence of the stamp duties. (ii) Up to a point there was no discrimination at all. When the label, etc., did not specify an ailment or class of ailments, duty was in practice exacted from neither. (iii) It was expressly agreed by counsel that neither qualified nor unqualified dealers would have been liable to duty in respect of two of the three substances in dispute in this case, and the passage in ALPE'S HANDY BOOK OF MEDICINE STAMP DUTY, seems clearly to cover the third. (iv) Neither qualified nor unqualified dealers could escape duty on proprietary medicines. But (v) under the law as declared in Farmer v. Glyn-Jones (1), retail chemists might lawfully sell (duty-free) a large range of "recommended" medicines if their composition was disclosed, whereas grocers were subject, in respect of such sales, to duties of prohibitive weight (for example, 3*d.* in the shilling, and the like). This confined a very substantial class of business in practice to qualified dealers.

Such are the relevant antecedents of the Act of 1941. Do the terms of that Act, in the light of these antecedents, disclose any distinct "policy"? Apart from the regulation and restriction of the sale of poisons and the prohibition of advertisements relating to certain diseases (ss. 1-10) and the requirement in s. 11 that all "substances recommended as medicines" (a category which, on either construction, admits of many exceptions) should have their composition declared, the Act has, in our view, no coherent governing aim. For instance, if the policy had been to prevent unqualified persons from recommending substances as remedies, why are all persons, unqualified as well as qualified, left free to give any oral recommendations they choose? Why again, when the sale of "substances recommended" is limited by s. 12 (1) to qualified persons, is it made possible by s. 12 (5) for grocers or other unqualified persons (subject to certain conditions) to escape this limitation by selling such substances under a "proprietary description"—a perfectly easy thing to do? Why prohibit them from selling "Liver Pills" but leave them free (subject to certain conditions) to sell "Smith's" or "Jones'" Liver Pills? And why are unqualified dealers by s. 12 (4) enabled to escape it when selling herbs? These provisions, far from suggesting any consistent policy of inhibiting unqualified persons, suggest rather an intention merely to preserve or to establish a certain balance between the various interests involved, chemists, grocers, herbalists and so on, and, if the changes wrought by the Act divest any such interest of advantages previously enjoyed, to see that such interest is (in meal or in malt) compensated for its sacrifice. For instance, the Act (by s. 14) sweeps away the old stamp duties which over the preceding century had been found, administratively, a troublesome impost. If the Act had stopped there, the pre-existing equilibrium between the interests would have been gravely disturbed. Before the Act the exemption from duty of qualified dealers in respect of "known, admitted, and approved" remedies, coupled with the liability of unqualified ones to a duty of crushing severity in respect of such remedies, had vested, within that field, a de facto monopoly in the former. A simple repeal of the duties, without more, would have destroyed this monopoly and swept a mass of business out of the hands of the chemists into those of the grocers. Hence, a compromise. Under the Act, on the one hand, the previous de facto monopoly of the qualified in the sphere of "known, admitted, and approved" medicines is replaced by a legal monopoly of "substances recommended as medicines"; but, on the other hand, the unqualified are within limits empowered to do what they could never do before without paying a prohibitive duty, namely, to sell recommended medicines with a "proprietary designation" (or to sell herbs without). To prevent a mere repeal of the duty conferring a windfall bonus on the unqualified at the expense of the qualified, the latter are given a nominal monopoly, which offsets that bonus. Then, to compensate the unqualified, loopholes and leaks are opened in the monopolistic structure, whereby in some form and degree these benefits (or equivalent ones) percolate back to them —to grocers under s. 12 (5), to herbalists under s. 12 (4). This parcelling out of benefits, spheres of influence and consolation prizes is stamped with the hallmark of practical compromise, and is utterly repugnant to the operation of any clear-cut principle or policy.

A comparison, therefore, of the Act with the status quo on which it was superimposed, in our view, does nothing to displace the meaning of the disputed words as deduced from the bare terms of the definition in the Act of 1941, if this were in doubt. It is true that the words of that definition differ from the corresponding words ("held out or recommended," etc.) in the charging provision of the Act of 1812. But, if the new formula had been intended by Parliament to be radically different from the old formula as understood and enforced for over a century under the Medicine Stamp Act, 1812, nothing would have been easier than for Parliament to make this plain, for example, by adding to the definition some such words as "whether or not such ailment is specified in such label, advertisement," and so on. Indeed, the difference in language admits of a simpler explanation. No doubt, it was desired to substitute for the sprawling inartistic draftsmanship of the schedule to the Act of 1812 and something shorter and tidier.

Can any light be thrown on the formula in the definition by reference to its occurrence elsewhere in this or similar Acts? The identical words "terms . . . calculated to lead," etc., occur in ss. 8 and 9 of the same Act and in s. 4 of the Cancer Act, 1939. Section 9 of the Act of 1941 does not, perhaps, help, but s. 8 of that Act and s. 4 of the Cancer Act, 1939, seem to support the construction propounded above. In the latter, case, for instance, the section reads:

(1) No person shall take any part in the publication of any advertisement . . . (b) referring to any article, or articles of any description, in terms which are calculated to lead to the use of that article, or articles of that description, in the treatment of cancer.

If the defendants' argument is well founded, it logically carries them as far as to say that an advertisement simply of "radium" for sale would involve a criminal offence if it were common knowledge that radium is used in the treatment of cancer. This, we feel, cannot be right. Similar considerations apply to s. 9 of the Act of 1941. If the defendants are right, an advertisement of "Lung Tonic" which does not designate any of the ailments enumerated in the section would be an offence, vis-a-vis a purchaser who thought lung tonic was a remedy for, say, tuberculosis, which is one of the ailments therein enumerated.

Finally, there is a decided case on the meaning of the definition which, though not binding on this court, is in consonance with our conclusions. In Nairne v. Stephen Smith & Co., Ltd. and Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain (2), ATKINSON, J., in construing the definition in s. 17, accepted the view that the words "any ailment" means some specific ailment, and held that bottles of "Hall's Wine," labelled in terms recommending it as a remedy for "all run-down conditions," were substances recommended by the label for a specific "ailment" within the definition. For these reasons we think that the three substances, labelled as they were labelled, were not "substances recommended as medicines" within the Act, with the consequences that they can lawfully be sold by unqualified persons notwithstanding s. 12, and that their composition is not required to be disclosed under s. 11. The appeal must be allowed.

KELLEY v. GOODWIN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cohen and Evershed, L.J., and Lynskey, J.), April 24, 1947.]

Landlord and Tenant—Rent restriction—House "reasonably required by the landlord . . . for occupation . . . for himself"—Part of house only required—Hardship—Financial position of tenant—Steps taken by tenant to obtain accommodation—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 3 (1), sched. I, para. (h).

The landlord let a controlled dwelling-house to the tenant for the duration of the war, and, the tenancy having been determined by the landlord by notice to quit, the tenant became statutory tenant of the premises. The landlord was living in one room and paying 30s. a week rent, which was more than that paid to her by the tenant, who was earning about £1,000 a year. The tenant spent most of his time in London, but the house was also occupied by his wife and daughter. He had adequate means to buy a house, but there was no evidence that he had attempted to do so or to find any other accommodation. The landlord required the premises for her own occupation, and had offered to let part of the house to the tenant after she had regained possession, but the offer was refused. She applied to the court for possession under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3 (1), and sched. I, para. (h).

HELD: although the landlord only required part of the premises for accommodation, the county court judge was justified in finding on the evidence that "the dwelling-house [was] reasonably required by the landlord . . . for occupation as a residence for [herself]", and, on the question of hardship, he was entitled to have regard to the financial means of the tenant by reason of which he was in a position to obtain accommodation, not merely by renting a house, but by buying one, and also to the fact that the tenant had taken no real steps to provide himself with alternative accommodation.

[EDITORIAL NOTE.] The cases in which it was laid down that the burden of proof on the question of greater hardship lies on the tenant were Sims v. Wilson ([1946] 2 All E.R. 261); Fowle v. Bell ([1946] 2 All E.R. 668); and Robinson v. Donovan ([1946] 2 All E.R. 731).

APPEAL by tenant from an order of His Honour JUDGE ARCHER, K.C., at Brighton and Lewes County Court, dated Oct. 11, 1946.

The county court judge held that the landlord reasonably required the premises for her own occupation, and, taking into account the financial means of the tenant, that the tenant had failed to prove greater hardship. An order for possession was, therefore, granted. The facts appear in the judgment of LYNSEY, J.

Heathcote-Williams for the tenant.

Pensotti for the landlord.

COHEN, L.J. : I will ask LYNSEY, J. to give the first judgment in this case.

LYNSEY, J. : This is an appeal from the judgment of His Honour JUDGE ARCHER, whereby he adjudged that the landlord should have possession of the dwelling-house and premises known as 54, Harrington Road, Brighton. After the outbreak of war the landlord joined the services and had no need to use the premises as a residence, and on Aug. 28, 1941, she let the premises to the tenant for the duration of hostilities. That tenancy was duly determined by notice to quit and as from Aug. 28, 1946, the tenant occupied the premises as a statutory tenant. The landlord, who was then occupying one room for both sleeping and living, wished to obtain possession of the premises. She consulted her solicitors and tried to induce the tenant to come to some agreement. The negotiations, however, broke down, and the landlord took proceedings for possession.

The claim was made under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3 (1), and sched. I, para. (h). Section 3 (1) provides :

No order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply or for the ejectment of a tenant therefrom shall be made or given unless the court considers it reasonable to make such an order or give such a judgment, and either—(a) the court has power so to do under the provisions set out in sched. I to this Act . . .

Schedule I provides :

A court shall, for the purposes of s. 3 of this Act, have power to make or give an order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply or for the ejectment of a tenant therefrom without proof of suitable alternative accommodation (where the court considers it reasonable so to do) if . . . (h) the dwelling-house is reasonably required by the landlord (not being a landlord who has become landlord by purchasing the dwelling-house or any interest therein after the eleventh day of July, 1931) for occupation as a residence for—(i) himself . . . Provided that an order or judgment shall not be made or given on any ground specified in para. (h) of the foregoing provisions of this schedule if the court is satisfied that having regard to all the circumstances of the case, including the question whether other accommodation is available for the landlord or the tenant, greater hardship would be caused by granting the order or judgment than by refusing to grant it.

On the question of greater hardship, this court has decided that the burden of proof that greater hardship would be caused by granting the order than by refusing it is on the tenant. According to the evidence before the county court judge, the landlord, who was living in one room for which she paid 30s. on a weekly tenancy, was receiving as rent for these premises, less than the rent she had to pay for her own accommodation. She said: "The tenant is an engineer working in London and only here for week-ends. He is only paying pre-war rent. I did not snap up any increase of rent. I now require possession for my own occupation." It was obviously, on that evidence, open to the county court judge to find that she wanted these premises for her own occupation. She goes on to say: "I would like to let the upper part of the house. I am willing that the tenant should have another room beyond what I have already offered him." In other words, in addition to accommodation which she had offered, she was prepared to give the tenant another room so as to provide him with accommodation in that house if he could not obtain accommodation elsewhere. That, however, was not accepted by him. The tenant, in his evidence, said he had a wife, aged 48, who was not in good health. He has a daughter of 14 who is to go to the High School until she is 18. He is an engineer and is in London most days. His income is approximately £1,000 a year. He says: "I have nowhere else to go. I want three bedrooms. I want attendant for wife. I can find smaller accommodation, but not suitable for me, as there is only one bedroom. I sold my house in Birmingham with the intention of buying a house in London but I did not because of the blitz." In cross-examination he said: "My business is in London. During war I spent only week-ends in London. Now I come frequently all the week. I could pay £3,000 for a house. I would give that price for landlord's house. I think that £2 is standard rent. You can buy houses, but not easy to get four bedrooms."

The county court judge had to apply his mind, first, under s. 3 (1) itself to whether it was reasonable to make an order. As to the application of his mind to that particular requirement and as to applying that requirement to the facts of this case no objection is taken by the tenant before us. Then he had to consider whether the dwelling-house was reasonably required by the landlord for occupation as a residence for herself, and, if so, whether, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, greater hardship would be caused by granting the order than by refusing it. It is clear that he did apply his mind to both those questions. That being so, we have to apply what, in my view, is a correct statement of the law in Smith v. Penny (1), in which SOMERVELL, L.J. said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 673):

It is necessary for the tenant to show that the county court judge misdirected himself or that he based his judgment on some finding of fact of which there was no evidence.

Applying that test and looking at the county court judge's judgment, the first question is: Was there evidence to support his finding that the landlord reasonably required these premises as a residence for herself. It was argued by counsel for the tenant that she does not bring herself within the provisions of para. (h) of the schedule, because she does not reasonably require these premises as a residence. It is suggested she only requires part of them and, therefore, is not within the ambit of para. (h). In our view of the matter, on her evidence and on the facts before him, the county court judge was justified in finding that she did require these premises as a residence for herself and that she reasonably required them.

The next matter one has to consider is whether there was evidence on which the county court judge could come to the conclusion that there would be greater hardship in making the order than not making the order. He has taken into account, in relation to that question, first, the position of the landlord, and, secondly, the position of the tenant. He has taken into account the financial means of the tenant. It is argued before us that he was wrong in doing that. In my view, he was quite entitled, in considering hardship, to have regard to the financial means of the tenant in considering whether he could obtain other accommodation because, by reason of his means, he was in a position, not merely to rent premises, but to buy a house. It seems to me also that, on this question of hardship, the judge was entitled to take into account the fact that the tenant had taken no real steps to try and find other accommodation or no real steps to buy a house. The judge took the view on the evidence that the tenant had not discharged the onus which lay on him of proving that greater hardship would be inflicted by making the order than by not making the order. It was said he ought to have disregarded the means of the tenant because he had no evidence of the means of the landlord, but the onus was on the tenant. The landlord was called, and no question was put to her about the matter.

For these reasons, in my view, there was ample evidence from which the county court judge could draw the inference that he did. We ought not to interfere unless we can say there was no evidence from which he could draw that inference or that he misread the evidence in some way in drawing the inference that he sought to do, and therefore, the appeal should be dismissed.

COHEN, L.J. : I agree, and I only desire to add one word. Counsel for the tenant, suggested that the function of this court in cases of this kind was rather wider than that defined in the passage in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J., which LYNSKEY, J., has read. He relied on some philosophical observations of SCOTT, L.J. in Chandler v. Strevett (2), which might have a wider import than, I think, SCOTT, L.J., intended. When these are read in connection with their context and taking into consideration the ground which SCOTT, L.J. gave in the last paragraph of his judgment for the conclusion which he reached, he was, on his earlier observations, I think, doing no more than pointing out how fine was the border-line between fact and law in complicated questions of this kind. I do not think he was in any way dissenting from the principle stated by SOMERVELL, L.J. in Smith v. Penny (1) a principle which I think has been for many years accepted in this court.

I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

EVERSHED, L.J. : I also agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

R. v. STEANE.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Atkinson and Cassels, JJ.), April 15, May 1, 1947.]

Criminal Law—Assisting the enemy—Intent—Duress—Burden of proof—Direction to jury—Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (S. R. & O., 1939, No. 927), reg. 2A.

Where the essence or a necessary constituent of an offence is a particular intent, that intent must be proved by the Crown just as much as any other fact necessary to constitute the offence, and the burden of proving that intent remains throughout on the prosecution.

If the prosecution prove an act the natural consequences of which would be a certain result and no evidence or explanation is given, then the jury may, on a proper direction, find that the accused is guilty of doing the act with the intent alleged, but if on the totality of the evidence there is room for more than one view as to the intent of the accused, the jury should be directed that it is for the prosecution to prove the intent to the jury's satisfaction, and if, on a review of the whole evidence, they either think that the intent did not exist or are left in doubt as to the intent, the accused is entitled to be acquitted.

Where acts are done by a person in subjection to the power of another, especially if that other be a brutal enemy, an inference that he intended the natural consequences of the acts must not be drawn merely from the fact that he did them. A guilty intent cannot be presumed and must be proved.

Before the war the appellant, a British subject, was employed as a film actor in Germany, where he resided with his wife and two children.

At the outbreak of war he was arrested and, according to his own evidence, his first interview on Sept. 11, 1939, ended with the order: "Say Heil Hitler, you dirty swine," which he refused to obey. He was thereupon knocked down, losing several teeth, and was then interned. Just before Christmas, 1939, he was sent for by Goebbels who asked him to broadcast and, on his refusing to do so, was warned that he was in an enemy country and that they had methods of making people do things. Subsequently, hints were dropped by officials as to German methods of persuasion and in consequence he submitted to a voice test, trying to perform as badly as he could. Next day he was ordered to read news three times a day and continued to do so until Apr., 1940, when he refused to do any more. "G men" called on him and said: "If you don't obey, your wife and children will be put in a concentration camp," and later he was badly beaten up by more "G men" one ear being partly torn off. He agreed to work for his old employers helping to produce films, but there was no evidence that the films were or could be of any assistance to the Germans or harmful to this country. He swore that he never had the slightest idea or intention of assisting the enemy, that what he did was done to save his wife and children and not to assist the enemy. On an appeal on the ground of misdirection against a conviction, under the Defence (General) Regulations, reg. 2A, of doing an act likely to assist the enemy with intent to assist the enemy:—

HELD: the proper direction to the jury would have been that it was for the prosecution to prove the criminal intent, and that, while the jury would be entitled to presume that intent if they thought that the act was done as the result of the free, uncontrolled action of the accused, they would not be entitled to presume it if the circumstances showed that the act was done in subjection to the power of the enemy or was as equally consistent with an innocent intent as with a criminal intent, e.g., a desire to save his wife and family from a concentration camp, and that the jury should convict only if satisfied by the evidence that the act complained of was, in fact, done to assist the enemy.

[EDITORIAL NOTE.] LORD GODDARD, C.J., points out that where an intent is a necessary ingredient of the offence charged, the burden of proving that intent remains throughout on the prosecution. It would seem, however, that if prima facie proof of the intent be given and the defence wish to set up duress, the burden of proving duress would then shift to the defence. In many cases the facts constituting the res gestae must include those giving rise to the alleged duress, in which event the attempt of the prosecution to make out a prima facie case of intent may fail. The jury must say, on the whole of the facts, whether the act done was the free action of the accused or whether it was done in subjection to superior power.

APPEAL against a conviction, before HENN COLLINS, J., at the Central Criminal Court, for doing acts likely to assist the enemy with intent to assist the enemy, contrary to the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 2A. The facts appear in the judgment of the court read by LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 1. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the judgment of the court. The appellant was convicted at the Central Criminal Court before HENN COLLINS, J. on an indictment which charged him under the Defence (General) Regulations, reg. 2A, with doing acts likely to assist the enemy with intent to assist the enemy. He was convicted on the first count of the indictment, and the jury were discharged from returning a verdict in respect of the other eight counts which the indictment contained. He was sentenced to 3 years penal servitude and on Mar. 31 last obtained leave to appeal on the ground of misdirection. This court heard and allowed the appeal on Apr. 15, and discharged the appellant, and now proceeds to give the reasons for so doing.

The count on which he was convicted charged him with entering the service of the German Broadcasting System on a date in Jan., 1940, and it was common ground and admitted by the appellant that he did so enter that service and on several occasions broadcast certain matters through that system. The evidence called by the prosecution was that of one witness who did not carry the matter very far beyond proving that the appellant did in fact broadcast, but also said that he had seen a telegram in the appellant's possession signed "Emmie Goering" which stated that he could expect to be released and be home very shortly. The principal evidence against him was a statement taken from him by an officer of the British Intelligence Service in Oct., 1945, which purported to give an account of his activities in the German Broadcasting Service. It is to be observed that this statement concludes in this way :

I have read this statement over and to the best of my knowledge and belief it is all true, and must request it to be used in conjunction with my written report, dated July 5, 1945, to the American C.I.C., in Augsburg.

This previous statement or report was, however, not produced. This was, no doubt, inevitable, but none the less unfortunate, especially as the appellant in his evidence before the jury maintained that many matters were contained in that report which he, accordingly, did not re-state in the statement which he made to the intelligence officer. It seems, and this again was common ground, that before the war he was employed in Germany as a film actor and was so engaged when the war broke out. His wife and two sons were then living in Germany. The appellant was at once arrested and taken to Berlin and his wife and two sons remained in Oberammergau. The only other evidence in the case was that of the appellant himself. It was to the effect that he was at once arrested and questioned, and that the interview ended with the order :

"Say Heil Hitler, you dirty swine." He refused and was thereupon knocked down, losing several teeth, and was then interned. This was on Sept. 11, 1939. Just before Christmas he was sent for by Goebbels who asked him to broadcast. He refused. He was thereupon warned that he was in an enemy country and that they had methods of making people do things. A week later an official named von Bockman saw him and dropped hints as to German methods of persuasion. A professor named Kossuth also warned him that these people could be dangerous with those who gave trouble. In consequence of these matters he submitted to a voice test, trying to perform as badly as he could. The next day he was ordered to read news three times a day, and did so until April. In April he refused to do any more broadcasting. Two "G men" called upon him. They said : "If you don't obey, your wife and children will be put in a concentration camp." In May three "G men" saw him and he was badly beaten up, one ear being partly torn off. He agreed to work for his old employers helping to produce films. There was no evidence that the films he helped to produce were or could be of any assistance to the Germans or at all harmful to this country. He swore that he was in continual fear for his wife and children. When the Americans overran the part of Germany in which he was, he reported to them—giving, on Aug. 5, 1945, a statement of his history during the war. In Oct., 1945, an English official, Captain Shorter, saw him and to him the appellant made another statement. The appellant also asserted again and again and said that he had done so in the written report of July 5, which, as we have already said, was not produced, that he never had the slightest idea or intention of assisting the enemy and what he did was done to save his wife and children, and that what he did could not have assisted the enemy except in a very technical sense. Unlike the evidence which has been adduced in many other similar cases, there was no record of the actual broadcasts made by the appellant. This again was, no doubt, inevitable, but unfortunate, as the actual tone of the broadcast might have thrown some light on the motives and intentions of the appellant, but, in the opinion of the court, there was undoubtedly evidence from which a jury could infer that the acts done by the appellant were acts likely to assist the enemy.

The far more difficult question that arises, however, is in connection with the direction to the jury with regard to whether these acts were done with the intention of assisting the enemy. The case as opened, and, indeed, as put by the learned judge, appears to this court to be this :—A man is taken to intend the natural consequences of his acts. If, therefore, he does an act which is likely to assist the enemy, it must be assumed that he did it with the intention of assisting the enemy. Now, the first thing which the court would observe is that where the essence of an offence or a necessary constituent of an offence is a particular intent, that intent must be proved by the Crown just as much as any other fact necessary to constitute the offence. The wording of the regulation itself shows that it is not enough merely to charge a prisoner with doing an act likely to assist the enemy. He must do it with the particular intent specified in the regulation. While, no doubt, the motive of a man's act and his intention in doing the act are in law different things, it is none the less true that in many offences a specific intention is a necessary ingredient and the jury have to be satisfied that a particular act was done with that specific intent, although the natural consequences of the act might, if nothing else was proved, be said to show the intent for which it was done. To take a simple illustration, a man is charged with wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm. It is proved that he did severely wound the prosecutor. Nevertheless, unless the Crown can prove that the intent was to do the prosecutor grievous bodily harm, he cannot be convicted of that felony. It is always open to the jury to negative by their verdict the intent and to convict only of the misdemeanour of unlawful wounding. Or again, a prisoner may be charged with shooting with intent to murder. Here, again, the prosecution may fail to satisfy the jury of the intent, although the natural consequence of firing, perhaps at close range, would be to kill. The jury can find in such a case an intent to do grievous bodily harm, or they might find that, if the person shot at was a police constable, the prisoner was not guilty on the count charging intent to murder but was guilty of intent to avoid arrest. The important thing to notice in this respect is that where an intent is charged in the indictment, the burden of proving that intent remains throughout on the prosecution. No doubt, if the prosecution prove an act the natural consequences of which would be a certain result and no evidence or explanation is given, then a jury may, on a proper direction, find that the prisoner is guilty of doing the act with the intent alleged, but if, on the totality of the evidence, there is room for more than one view as to the intent of the prisoner, the jury should be directed that it is for the prosecution to prove the intent to the jury's satisfaction, and if, on a review of the whole evidence, they either think that the intent did not exist or they are left in doubt as to the intent, the prisoner is entitled to be acquitted.

In many offences it is unnecessary to allege any particular intent. The commonest case is in larceny where the prisoner is simply charged with stealing. If the evidence shows that the prisoner picked a person's pocket, there is no necessity to prove that he intended to steal, although he may give some evidence in defence which would lead the jury to believe that he was not acting with a felonious intent, but we repeat that, where a particular intent must be laid and charged, that intent has to be proved. An illustration given by the learned judge in the course of his rather brief summing-up related to what are commonly called the "blackout regulations." He pointed out to the jury that, if a person accidentally omitted to put up his blackout curtains or left some gap in them, although he was doing an act likely to assist the enemy, as it was accidental he would not be committing the offence with intent to assist the enemy. Matters which involve accidental acts are, perhaps, not altogether a happy illustration. A nearer case would be if a person deliberately took down his blackout curtains or shutters with the result that light appeared on the outside of his house, perhaps during an air raid. It might well be that, if no evidence or explanation were given and if all that was proved was that during that raid the prisoner exposed lights by a deliberate act, a jury could infer that he intended to signal or assist the enemy, but if the evidence in the case showed, for instance, that he or someone was overcome by heat and that he tore down the blackout to ventilate the room, the jury would certainly have to consider whether his act was done with intent to assist the enemy or with some other intent, so that, while he would be guilty of an offence against the blackout regulations, he would not be guilty of an offence of attempting to assist the enemy.

In this case the court cannot but feel that some confusion arose with regard to the question of intent by so much being said in the case with regard to the subject of duress. Duress is a matter of defence where a prisoner is forced by fear of violence or imprisonment to do an act which in itself is criminal. If the act is a criminal act, the prisoner may be able to show that he was forced into doing it by violence, actual or threatened, and to save himself from the consequences of that violence. There is very little learning to be found in any of the books or cases on the subject of duress and it is by no means certain how far the doctrine extends, though we have the authority both of HALE and of FITZJAMES STEPHEN, that, while it does not apply to treason, murder and some other felonies, it does apply to misdemeanours, and offences against these regulations are misdemeanours. But here again, before any question of duress arises, a jury must be satisfied that the prisoner had the intention which is laid in the indictment. Duress is a matter of defence and the onus of proving it is on the accused. As we have already said, where an intent is charged on the indictment, it is for the prosecution to prove it, so the onus is the other way.

Another matter which is of considerable importance in this case, but does not seem to have been brought directly to the attention of the jury, is that very different considerations may apply where the accused at the time he did the acts is in subjection to an enemy power and where he is not. British soldiers who were set to work on the Burma road or, if invasion had unhappily taken place, British subjects who might have been set to work by the enemy digging trenches would, undoubtedly, have been doing acts likely to assist the enemy. It would be unnecessary surely in their cases to consider any of the niceties of the law relating to duress, because no jury would find that merely by doing this work they were intending to assist the enemy. In our opinion, it is impossible to say that where acts were done by a person in subjection to the power of another, especially if that other be a brutal enemy, an inference that he intended the natural consequences of his acts must be drawn merely from the fact that he did them. The guilty intent cannot be presumed and must be proved. The proper direction to the jury in this case would have been that it was for the prosecution to prove the criminal intent, and that, while the jury would be entitled to presume that intent if they thought that the act was done as the result of the free, uncontrolled action of the accused, they would not be entitled to presume it if the circumstances showed, that the act was done in subjection to the power of the enemy or was as equally consistent with an innocent intent as with a criminal intent, e.g., a desire to save his wife and children from a concentration camp. They should only convict if satisfied by the evidence that the act complained of was, in fact, done to assist the enemy and if there was doubt about the matter, the prisoner was entitled to be acquitted. It is to be observed also in this case that in summing-up the learned judge did not remind the jury of the various threats to which the prisoner swore he had been exposed. The jury might of course have disbelieved his evidence. The matters of these threats depended upon his evidence alone and, while it is fair to say that he does not appear to have been in any way shaken in cross-examination on these matters, the jury were not necessarily bound to believe it. But we do not think that the summing-up contained anything like a full enough direction as to the prisoner's defence. The defence must be fully put to the jury and we think they ought to have been reminded of various matters upon which the accused relied as negating the intent. The jury may well have been left under the impression that, as they were told that a man must be taken to intend the natural consequences of his acts, these matters as to which he had given evidence were of no moment.

On both these grounds, therefore, we were of opinion that the conviction could not stand and accordingly quashed it.

Appeal allowed.

R. v. BALL.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Atkinson and Oliver, JJ.), April 28, 1947.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Probation—Breach of recognisance—Sentence of one days' imprisonment instead of fine—Sentence of Borstal detention for original offence—Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914 (c. 58), s. 10 (1)—Criminal Justice Act, 1925 (c. 86), s. 7 (4).

A girl was charged before a magistrate with stealing, and, on her consenting to be dealt with summarily, she was found guilty of the offence, but was discharged under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, conditionally on her entering into a recognisance to reside at Leicester where her mother lived. On her committing a breach of recognisance for the second time, the magistrate sentenced her to one day's imprisonment, cancelled the probation order, recorded the conviction of the original offence, and committed her to quarter sessions for sentence, with a recommendation for detention in a Borstal institution. On appeal to the Court of Criminal Appeal from the sentence of Borstal detention passed by quarter sessions, it was contended on her behalf that the penalty of one day's imprisonment imposed by the magistrate must have been in respect of the original offence because, under the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, s. 7 (4), the magistrate had power to impose only a fine for breach of recognisance, and he had no power to send her to quarter sessions to be sentenced for the same offence :—

HELD : (i) the sentence of one day's imprisonment was imposed, not for the original offence, but for the failure to observe the condition of the recognisance, and was technically wrong and could have been quashed on certiorari.

(ii) the magistrate was entitled to convict the girl and send her to quarter sessions for sentence and, on the facts of the case, quarter sessions was justified in thinking it a proper case for detention in a Borstal institution.

APPLICATION for leave to appeal against a sentence of detention in a Borstal institution passed by London Quarter Sessions.

The applicant, who had been charged before a metropolitan magistrate with larceny and found guilty of the offence, was discharged conditionally under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907. On her committing a breach of recognisance, she was sentenced by the magistrate to one day's imprisonment, the probation order was cancelled, a conviction of the original offence was recorded, and she was committed to quarter sessions for sentence, with a recommendation for detention in a Borstal institution. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J.

S. H. Noakes for the applicant.

J. H. Buzzard for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. [delivering the judgment of the court] : On June 19, 1946, the applicant was charged before a magistrate at Clerkenwell Police Court with stealing two coats and other property valued at £10, contrary to the Larceny Act, 1916. On her consenting to be dealt with summarily, the magistrate bound her over in the sum of £5 for 12 months, placing her under the care of the probation officer, and making a condition that she should reside where the probation officer should direct, and he directed her to reside at Leicester where her mother lived. In so doing, the magistrate, under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, refrained from proceeding to conviction. The effect of the binding over was that, if the applicant broke her recognisance, she would have to come up before the court again, and the court, having been satisfied that she was guilty of the offence, would then proceed to conviction without further proof of guilt. She committed a breach of that recognisance by not residing at Leicester. She was brought before the magistrates there and was fined the sum of 10s., but she again committed a breach of recognisance, and on Jan. 8, 1947, she was brought before a magistrate at Clerkenwell and charged with a failure to observe the condition of her recognisance, to which she pleaded guilty. The minute of adjudication by the magistrate was: "One day"—which, of course, is a purely nominal sentence—"Probation order cancelled. Committed to sessions on conviction for original offence, recommended for Borstal." The recommendation for Borstal was made under the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914; s. 10 (1), which provides:

- A Where a person is summarily convicted of any offence for which the court has power to impose a sentence of imprisonment for one month or upwards without the option of a fine, and . . . (c) it appears to the court that by reason of the offender's criminal habits or tendencies, or association with persons of bad character, it is expedient that he should be subject to detention . . . it shall be lawful for the court, in lieu of passing sentence, to commit the offender to prison until the next quarter sessions and the court of quarter sessions shall inquire into the circumstances of the case, and, if it appears to the court that the offender . . . should be subject to such detention . . . shall pass sentence of detention in a Borstal institution . . .

B A highly technical point was taken on behalf of the applicant. It is provided in the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, s. 7 (4):

A court before which an offender is brought or appears under s. 6 of the [Probation of Offenders Act, 1907] for failing to observe the conditions of his recognisance may, instead of sentencing him for the original offence under sub-s. (5) of that section or remanding him to custody or on bail under sub-s. (3) of that section, as the case may be, and without prejudice to the continuance in force of the recognisance, impose on him in respect of such failure a penalty not exceeding £10.

C Section 6 of the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, provides:

(1) If the court before which an offender is bound by his recognisance under this Act to appear for conviction or sentence, or any court of summary jurisdiction, is satisfied by information on oath that the offender has failed to observe any of the conditions of his recognisance, it may issue a warrant for his apprehension . . . (5) A court before which a person is bound by his recognisance to appear for conviction and sentence, on being satisfied that he has failed to observe any condition of his recognisance, may forthwith, without further proof of his guilt, convict and sentence him for the original offence . . .

D That was done in this case. On the applicant being brought before the court on Jan. 8, 1947, the magistrate recorded the conviction of the original offence of which she had already been found guilty, but with regard to which the magistrate had refrained from proceeding to conviction. It is said that the vice of the magistrate's order is that, in imposing a penalty of one day's imprisonment, he must have imposed that penalty in respect of the original offence, because, if he was imposing a penalty for failing to observe the terms of probation, he had only power to impose a fine. In the opinion of this court, the imposition of one day's imprisonment was technically wrong and could have been quashed on certiorari, because the magistrate had no power to pass a sentence of one day for a breach of recognisance, though he could have fined the applicant. So far as the original offence is concerned, he convicted her and sent her to the sessions for sentence. We think that he was entitled to take those steps, although technically he ought not to have imposed a penalty of one day's imprisonment for the failure to observe the conditions of the recognisance. No harm has been done to the applicant because she has not served the sentence of one day. She has been detained in prison under s. 10 (1) of the Act of 1914 (supra) which enables the magistrate to send her to quarter sessions for sentence to Borstal detention and provides for committal to prison during the time which elapses between appearance before him, and the holding of the sessions.

E There is nothing, we think, wrong in the sessions having dealt with this case if its circumstances justify the sentence of Borstal detention. Clearly, in the applicant's own interests, detention in a Borstal institution is the satisfactory way of dealing with her case, if the conditions in the statute are satisfied and it is shown that at any time she had been an associate of prostitutes or living a life of prostitution. It may well be that when she was before the magistrate in June, 1946, he would not have been able to send her to the sessions merely because she had been associating with prostitutes. Once she has been properly sent to sessions, however, the sessions can take the whole of her history into account. As associating with persons of bad character is one of the matters which the court can take into account when considering whether Borstal treatment is suitable, it was proper to call evidence to show that before the applicant was charged in 1946 she had been associate of prostitutes. Then she showed herself to be a thoroughly naughty girl because she had to be dealt with at Leicester for a breach of recognisance, and was fined there, but that had no effect on her. She still persistently refused to perform the condition of the recognisance, and quarter sessions thought it was a proper case for Borstal detention. So does this court, and, therefore, this application, which we have treated as an appeal, is dismissed. The time will run from the date of conviction.

Application dismissed.

WILTSHIRE COUNTY VALUATION COMMITTEE OF THE WILTSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL v. BOYCE. WILTSHIRE COUNTY VALUATION COMMITTEE OF THE WILTSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL v. RATING AUTHORITY FOR THE MARLBOROUGH AND RAMSBURY RURAL DISTRICT AND ANOTHER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Atkinson and Oliver, JJ.), D
April 30, 1947.]

Rates and Rating—Exemption—Lands belonging to a vicarage—Exemption from parochial rates under Inclosure Act—Exemption from general rate imposed by Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 2—Rating and Valuation Act, 1925 (c. 90), ss. 2 (1) (2) (3) (a), 64 (1) (b), (2) (a) (b).

By the (local) Ramsbury Inclosure Act, 1777, it was provided that all the lands belonging to the vicarage of Ramsbury should be exempted from all parochial taxes and duties so long as the vicar should perform the offices of the church as vicar for the poor of the parish without fee or reward. The question was whether this exemption operated to exempt lands of the vicarage from the general rate levied under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 2, and, if so, whether the exemption applied to land which had been let on a 999 years' lease to the rural district council:—

HELD: (i) the provision of the Act of 1777 exempted the lands of the vicarage from the general rate levied by the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925.

(ii) until a scheme had been made under s. 64 (2) of the Act of 1925 by the rating authority or the Minister, the exemption must continue.

(iii) the exemption extended to the lands of the vicarage which were let on a 999 years' lease to the rural district council, because the land still "belonged" to the vicarage even though a long leasehold interest had been imposed on the freehold interest.

CASE STATED by Appeals Committee of Wiltshire Quarter Sessions to determine whether exemption from parochial taxes and duties conferred by the Ramsbury Inclosure Act, 1777, in respect of lands belonging to the vicarage of the parish operated to exempt such lands from rates levied under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, and, in particular, from the general rate. The facts and the relevant sections of the Acts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

A Harold Williams for the appellants.

Gilbert Dare for the respondent, M. E. Boyce.

G. R. Blanco White, K.C., and M. McGougan for the respondents, the rating authority for the Marlborough and Ramsbury Rural District and Joseph Orchard.

B LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This Special Case raises the question whether, by virtue of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, a certain exemption from rating which applied to the lands belonging to the vicarage of Ramsbury in Wiltshire has ceased to be effective, and whether, in consequence, those lands are now liable to be rated.

C It appears that in 1777, when the inclosure of open lands and common lands was a common feature in England, certain lands which were liable to tithes in favour of the incumbent of Ramsbury were inclosed under a private Act, the Ramsbury Inclosure Act, 1777. That Act provided, among other things :

D . . . that all the lands tenements tithes hereditaments rights and properties within the parish of Ramsbury aforesaid which shall belong to the vicarage of the same parish shall from and immediately after the date and execution of the award of the said commissioners to be made as hereinbefore directed be and for ever remain free from and discharged of all parochial taxes and duties whatsoever so long as the vicar of the said parish for the time being shall do and perform all the offices of the church as vicar for the poor of the said parish who shall receive alms without fee or reward and no longer.

The object of this provision, no doubt, was to give the vicar a quid pro quo for the extinction of certain tithes and to make the exemption conditional on his performing the offices of the church for the poor without receiving any fee, such as a burial or mortuary fee or, I suppose, a fee for marriage.

E Under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, it was provided, so far as rural districts are concerned, by s. 2 (2) :

As from the appointed day the rating authority of each rural rating area shall, in lieu of making a poor rate for each parish, make and levy a general rate for the whole of the district.

F Pausing there for a moment, it is clear, as is well known, that, before the Act of 1925, in deciding the amount of the poor rate, many other matters had to be taken into account as well as the amount required merely for the relief of the poor. In modern times the expenses of the old board of guardians, who were responsible for the relief of the poor, were often quite a minor part of the poor rate. Such things as the education rate were all levied as part of the poor rate because a county rate had been set up in the reign of George II [County Rates Act, 1738], under which the county authorities issued a precept to the overseers of the poor in any parish showing how much they required from that parish as a contribution to the general county expenses. The general county expenses included such matters as main roads, police, prosecution of offenders, and various other county purposes, but it seems clear that from quite an early time, although the poor rate might be levied to raise a sum of money which would be applied to these various other matters, it none the less remained a poor rate. That was decided in 1846 in R. v. Aylesbury-with-Walton Inhabitants (1), and I think, from the point of view of this court, the matter is put beyond controversy by the decision of the House of Lords in Associated Newspapers, Ltd. v. London Corpn. (2), where it was held that a private Act conferred on certain lands exemption from any further rates levied in respect of that land and collected as part of the general rate, and one had not to consider whether or not the further rate was a new class of rate which was not in existence when the exempting Act was passed.

It seems, therefore, on those authorities that an exemption granted from parochial rates will confer exemption in respect of any rates which are levied together with, and as part of, the ordinary poor rate. In the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 2 (2), the rate is no longer called a poor rate; it is called a general rate. That seems to me a mere change of name, because in the general rate are included all the matters which were formerly dealt with in the poor rate.

Then s. 2 (3) (a) provides:

In the case of any general rate made in a rural rating area in respect of any period before the date of the first new valuation, the rating authority shall, notwithstanding anything in this sub-section, give effect in the collection of the rate to any exemption or abatement to which any person would have been entitled in respect of any hereditament if the rate had been a poor rate.

That obviously is a temporary provision made in respect of the first new valuation. The person who has had exemption in the past is still to get exemption, and that looks as though Parliament contemplated some further action in the future. The further action contemplated is, no doubt, that contained in s. 64.

Section 64 (1) provides that nothing in the Act shall affect:

(b) any exemption from or privilege in respect of rating conferred by any local Act or Order on the occupiers of hereditaments in any particular part of a rating area or on the occupiers of any particular hereditaments.

Section 64 (2) provides:

For the purpose of securing the continued operation, notwithstanding the passing of this Act, of any such privilege or exemption as aforesaid—(a) the rating authority of every area in which immediately before the passing of this Act any such privilege or exemption was in force shall, before the appointed day, submit to the Minister [of Health] a scheme making provision, whether by deductions to be made from the net annual value or otherwise, for the purpose aforesaid; (b) if no such scheme is submitted by the rating authority before the appointed day, the Minister may himself make a scheme for the purpose aforesaid. . . . Provided that the rating authority and all persons interested in the hereditament may agree that the privilege or exemption shall be surrendered and extinguished in consideration of such payments as may be agreed between them.

So the ratepayer can sell the benefit or relinquish it on the payment of a sum of money. It is not necessary to speculate on the reasons for these schemes or what they should contain. It may be that a scheme could provide that the exemption granted by an Act should not extend to the full amount of the general rate, in view of the varied and new matters with which the general rate may be made to deal. In the present case—and this is why it comes before the court—no scheme has been made. Neither the rating authority nor the Minister has ever made a scheme. If no scheme has been made, it seems to follow that the exemption must continue. The exemption has been given by an Act of Parliament, and it has never been terminated. I have already said that the general rate now made only takes the place of the poor rate which previously existed, and it is shown that, a poor rate being one and indivisible, as was said in the House of Lords [by LORD SUMNER in London Corp'n. v. Associated Newspapers, Ltd. (3)], any purpose for which that rate is made and which leads to certain sums being included in that rate, makes no difference. It is all part of the poor rate.

One consideration which I must say appeals to me in this matter is that it is possible for the rating authority to prepare a scheme, but not possible for the ratepayers to do so. If, therefore, there is no scheme prepared, it would seem in the highest degree unjust to take away the exemption because a scheme had not been prepared and submitted by the only people who can submit it or by the Minister on whom the statutory duty was placed but who has not performed that statutory duty. I think, therefore, that, until a scheme is made and submitted—as to which it is not necessary to express any opinion—the exemption given by the Act applies and the lands remain exempted from the general rate.

The only other point which has been argued is this. In respect of one of the hereditaments with which we are concerned, the Old Vicarage at Ramsbury, which is occupied by a Miss Boyce, there is no question that that was part of the ancient glebe of the benefice. It still belongs to the vicar and churchwardens, and is leased on a short lease. But with regard to the other land, which is the land which became the property of the vicarage, to use the words of the Ramsbury Inclosure Act, 1777, which of course in strictness means the vicar and churchwardens, by virtue of the award, that land has been let on a 999 years' lease to the rural district council in consideration of a rent of some £26, and we are invited to say whether, in those circumstances, the land still belongs to the vicarage. I think it clearly does. I think the word "belong" in this case must indicate the person who has the legal title to the land as freeholder, and the vicar and churchwardens undoubtedly have that.

- A There are reversions vested in them. On breaches of covenant or failure to pay the rent they would be entitled to take action notwithstanding that the lease is for 999 years. I find it impossible to hold, merely because there is a leasehold interest imposed on the freehold interest, that that prevents the land from belonging to the vicarage. It may be that, if this sort of point had been visualised, some provision would have been made in the Act about these very long leases, but, as it has not been, I think we are bound to give effect to the plain words of the Act and hold that both these hereditaments belong to the vicarage and are exempt from rating, and the question put to the court must be answered in that sense.

ATKINSON, J. : I agree. The question asked is whether the exemption from parochial taxes and duties conferred by the Ramsbury Inclosure Act, 1777, in respect of the lands belonging to the vicarage of the parish operates to exempt such lands from rates levied by virtue of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, and, in particular, from the general rate.

- C The argument is that the general rate quite clearly includes something more than a parochial rate, that it includes the county rate, and that the words of the exemption were merely "free from and discharged of all parochial taxes and duties whatsoever." It was argued that merely because there was an exemption from the poor rate, or the purely parochial rate, one cannot extend that into an exemption to include the county rate. The answer to that, I think, was provided in R. v. Aylesbury-with-Walton Inhabitants (1), in the two opening lines of LORD DENMAN's judgment (9 Q.B. 269) :

The poor rate is the fund which raises, in the different parishes, the county rate. That means that the county rate was always raised by being included in the poor rate and was, in fact, part of the poor rate. Therefore, if you were exempted from the poor rate, automatically you were also exempted from that part of it which might be spent on county purposes. In London Corpn. v. Associated Newspapers, Ltd. (3), LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON said ([1915] A.C. 697) :

It is true that the moneys now leviable by means of such rate [i.e., the poor rate] are applied for a variety of statutory purposes, but the rate remains the same.

- F That explains the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 2 (1), which says :

As from the date of the first new valuation, the rating authority of each urban rating area, in lieu of the poor rate and any other rate which they have power to make, shall make and levy for their area a consolidated rate which shall be termed "the general rate."

This obviously treats the general rate as co-extensive with the poor rate and including any other parochial rate.

- G That the old rate included everything covered by the general rate seems to me the answer to the question, and, therefore, the exemption covers the general rate that is levied to-day.

OLIVER, J. : I agree and cannot usefully add anything.

Order accordingly.

LABRUM v. WILLIAMSON.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Atkinson and Oliver, JJ.), April 29, 1947.]

Street and Aerial Traffic—Motor vehicle—Insurance against third-party risks—Causing a motor vehicle to be used on the road without a policy of insurance being in force—Disqualification for holding licence—"Special reasons" for refraining from disqualification—Assured misled as to effect of policy—Proposal form signed for general cover—Temporary general cover certificate issued, but policy limited to named driver—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 35 (2).

A garage proprietor made a proposal to an insurance company for general cover for all his trade vehicles. A temporary cover note was issued to him covering "third party risks for any vehicle used in connection with the motor trade," and the company undertook to inform the assured if his proposal was declined. The policy which was subsequently sent to him and which he did not read was, however, on a "named driver" basis.

HELD: the assured having been misled by the insurance company, it was reasonable for him to believe that his proposal for general cover was accepted, and there was a "special reason" within s. 35 (2) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, why he should not be disqualified for holding a licence on his being convicted of using a motor vehicle when there was not in force in relation to its user a policy of insurance against third-party risks.

Rennison v. Knowler, [1947] 1 All E.R. 302, distinguished.

[EDITORIAL NOTE. In Rennison v. Knowler (1) LORD GODDARD, C.J., emphasised (and he again emphasises it in the present case) that it was the "obvious duty" of the owner of a motor vehicle to see that he was insured and to that end "to make himself acquainted with the contents of his policy." His LORDSHIP went on to indicate that, if an assured was misled as to the terms of his policy, that might constitute a "special reason" within s. 35 (2). The present case is an illustration of an assured being misled. The circumstances are obviously unusual, and the case necessarily depends on its own facts, but it is a valuable guide to the principles on which the court will act when considering cases under s. 35 (2).

CASE STATED by Northampton Quarter Sessions.

The Recorder of Northampton held that the assured had been misled by the insurance company into thinking that he had secured general cover in respect of his motor vehicles, and that these circumstances constituted "special reasons" for the purposes of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (2). The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

A. P. Marshall for the appellant.

The respondent was not represented.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The facts of this case are that the recorder has found that a garage proprietor, the respondent in this court, "made a proposal for a general trade cover for all vehicles used in connection with his aforesaid trade to the Road Transport and General Insurance Co., Ltd., and received a cover note dated Oct. 5, 1945, from the said company holding him insured against third party risks for any vehicle used in connection with the motor trade." The cover note was produced to us. The proposal form was not, but we have a finding of the recorder that the respondent made a proposal for a general trade cover, and it would be a very remarkable thing if a garage proprietor did not make a proposal of that nature. The respondent received a cover note from the insurance company which covered in the widest possible terms any vehicles used in connection with his trade, whether they were being driven by himself or by anybody else. It appears, however, that for some reason, the policy which was subsequently sent to the respondent was on the "named driver" basis. Motor policies may be obtained from insurance companies at a lower premium if it is warranted that the car will only be driven by a named person, and if a motor car owner takes out one of those policies he must not allow somebody other than the named driver to drive. If he does, the vehicle will not be insured and an offence against the Road Traffic Act will have been committed. It is clear that the policy which the respondent received was not a policy which conformed with the cover note.

A The cover note stated that the respondent

... having made a proposal to insure the undermentioned risks in respect of the motor vehicle referred to and any vehicle used in connection with the motor trade is hereby held insured in respect of such risks until a policy is prepared and payment of the premium demanded, but in no case exceeding 30 days from the date hereof, subject to the terms exceptions and conditions of the company's policy for the class of risk to be covered. If such proposal be accepted by the directors, a policy and a detailed certificate of insurance to run to the expiry date of the policy will be prepared in due course, but if it should be declined the liability of the company shall cease upon notice being given to the proposer or his agent and a proportionate charge will be made for the period during which the company has accepted liability under this cover note.

B The risks which are covered are "Third Party (Damage to Property and Personal Injuries)." There is nothing on the face of this cover note to say that it is in any way limited to a named driver.

C When the policy was received by the respondent, he did not read it. I think the recorder has found special circumstances in this case because he was of opinion that the respondent was misled by the insurance company's issuing him a cover note and then, having undertaken to tell him if they declined the proposal, his proposal being for a general cover, sent him a policy which, for some reason, was limited to a named driver.

D I do not resile in the smallest degree from what I said in Rennison v. Knowler (1), in which case the questions were very much the same, but a judgment must always be read in the light of the facts of the particular case. It is perfectly true that I said in that case that it was the obvious duty—and I repeat it—of people to make themselves acquainted with their policies and, as I said also in that case, if they do not understand them, it is their duty to take advice. Rennison v. Knowler (1) was also a case of a named driver policy,

E but there was no suggestion there that the assured had made a proposal for a general cover, and had received a policy which was not a general cover—still less that he had received a cover note which had given him a general cover and a policy which one would naturally expect would follow the cover note but did not follow the cover note. In the present case the recorder has found that the respondent was misled into believing that he was covered. I should be sorry if it was thought that Rennison v. Knowler (1) had laid down that in

F no case where a man was misled by the contents of his policy, or, perhaps, had received wrong advice as to the legal effect of the policy, could that be treated as a special circumstance. I think that what happened here can properly be regarded as a special circumstance. It is not a circumstance which refers to every sort of case under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35. If the facts here had simply been that the respondent, having made a proposal, got a policy and did not look at it, I should have said that the decision of Rennison v. Knowler (1) applied also in this case, but he received a cover note which told him in substance that he would get a policy in accordance with the cover note or the directors would inform him that they did not accept the proposal in accordance with his terms. Therefore, I think there were grounds here on which the recorder could say there was a special reason in this case because

G this man had been misled.
H If an ignorant man who has a motor bicycle gets a policy and is puzzled by its terms and he goes to some person who it would be reasonable to suppose would be able to give him proper information about the effect of the policy and that person gives him advice which turns out to be wrong, nothing I have said in Rennison v. Knowler (1) was intended to cover that sort of case. That might be an excuse. In Rennison v. Knowler (1) the assured had made no enquiry. He had taken out a policy which covered the use of his motor cycle while he himself and no other person was driving it. He let a friend drive the motor cycle and there was an accident. He was not insured and he said he had taken no step to find out what the effect of his policy was. He had the policy for which he had applied, and he had no reasonable ground for believing that it would cover the circumstances which actually occurred. In the present case I think there were circumstances which would lead the respondent to think that, having made a proposal for a general cover and having received a cover note giving him a general cover, he would receive a policy providing general cover. He might well be excused for not having read the policy and found out that it had not been issued in accordance with the proposal. In these circumstances I am not prepared to say that there was no evidence on which the recorder could come to the conclusion that there was a special circumstance in this case. I look on this as an entirely exceptional case, and the fact that it is an exceptional case is a ground for saying that there was a special reason here.

ATKINSON, J. : I agree. I call attention to the words in the cover note :

If such proposal be accepted by the directors, a policy and a detailed certificate of insurance to run to the expiry date of the policy will be prepared in due course, but if it should be declined the liability of the company shall cease upon notice being given to the proposer

It is not suggested that any notice was given to the proposer that the directors had not accepted his proposal. I do not know why he should be regarded as to blame, when he receives as a policy something for which he has not asked, for not looking to see if the insurers had done what they had contracted to do. I agree with everything my Lord has said as to respondent's duty to make sure, but here he was misled in the sense that he is told that the protection for which he has asked will only cease on notice being given to him. I should have thought that there were plenty of circumstances on which the recorder was entitled to find that there were special reasons within the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35.

CASE STATED by Acton (Middlesex) justices.

A The respondent was charged with wilfully pretending to be qualified to act as a solicitor, contrary to the Solicitors Act, 1932, s. 46 (as amended by the Solicitors Act, 1941, s. 22, sched. III.) The justices found that the offence had been committed, but dismissed the information under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, s. 1, on the ground that the matters which constituted the offence "appeared to be isolated matters." The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

B J. R. Cumming-Bruce for the appellant.
Alan S. Trapnell for the respondent.

C LORD GODDARD, C.J. : The question raised by this Case is whether, when the justices convicted the respondent of wilfully pretending to be qualified to act as a solicitor, they could treat the case as one which was properly within the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, s. 1 (1), and not register a conviction, but dismiss the summons on payment of costs.

D In my opinion, it was not open to the justices to do such a thing. Wilfully pretending to be a solicitor is treated by the law as a serious offence. Where a man has been on the roll of solicitors and has either been struck off the roll or has had his practising certificate suspended, and he deliberately—because that is what "wilfully" means—acts as a solicitor, he has committed a very serious offence. He has defied the tribunal which has been appointed by Parliament to deal with the discipline of solicitors. In the present case the respondent was practising as a solicitor at Chiswick, and early in 1945, he was consulted by a client, a Mrs. Cullum, in connection with some matter of personal injury. In July, 1945, he was suspended from practice by an order of the Disciplinary Committee of the Law Society for professional misconduct. In April, 1946, he interviewed Mrs. Cullum and acted for her. On Apr. 1, 1946, E he wrote in respect of this claim for personal injuries to the Assistant Director of claims of an insurance company on letter paper which was headed "Henry N. Jordan & Co., Solicitors and Commissioners." There he was wilfully pretending that he was a qualified solicitor. He stated in this letter—which is the sort of letter which a solicitor retained in such a matter would write and is headed, "Without prejudice." :

F It would appear from our records that you were considering a proposal which you would make without prejudice to settle this matter. I should be glad to hear from you accordingly.

Anyone receiving that letter would think it was a letter from a solicitor. The next letter he wrote was only headed "Henry N. Jordan & Co." but again it was stated to be "without prejudice," and was written in the same way as the other letter :—

G I have now seen Mrs. Cullum and she is quite agreeable to your proposal for a settlement of this matter.

Then the terms of settlement were set out, the third being : "To pay costs £5 5s." Again, anyone receiving that letter would assume that it was from a solicitor. The justices have found that the respondent was guilty of the offence charged which is punishable by a fine not exceeding £50, (which shows that the legislature considered it a serious matter), but they say :

H We found that the offences were proved, and being of the opinion that these appeared to be isolated matters in all the circumstances, we held that these summonses should be dismissed under the Probation of Offenders Act on payment of five guineas costs on each summons.

It has been held over and over again—both under s. 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, which enabled justices to dismiss cases if they were of opinion that they were trivial and so forth, and under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907—that a proceeding of this sort on the part of the justices can be reviewed in this court. In Phillips v. Evans (1), a case under s. 16 of the old statute, where this court held that the offence of keeping a dog without a licence could not be treated by magistrates under s. 16 as a trivial offence, and in White v. Hurrell's Stores, Ltd. (2), where justices dismissed a case under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, but this court held that the offence was not of a trivial nature, this court has held that such procedure was an improper exercise of the discretion of the justices and sent the case back to the justices with a direction to convict. Again, in Oaten v. Auty (3), a case in which a man had been charged with failure to comply with the provisions of the Military Service Acts and the justices acted under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, it was held that that was wrong.

The Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, by s. 1 (1) enables the court to dismiss an information if they find circumstances which justify their doing so :

... having regard to the character, antecedents, age, health, or mental condition of the person charged, or to the trivial nature of the offence, or to the extenuating circumstances under which the offence was committed. . .

If, on consideration of those circumstances, they think it is inexpedient to inflict any punishment or any other than a nominal punishment, "they can dismiss the information," but all that the justices say here is that the matters to which I have referred which constituted the offence appeared to be "isolated matters." I do not know what that means except that it was a first offence and that the respondent was only acting in respect of one client, but he committed the offence, and he committed it deliberately. How can it be said that wilfully pretending to be a solicitor is a trivial offence, more especially in the case of a man who was a solicitor and who has been suspended from practising? This is a worse case than if a man who has never been a solicitor acts as one because the respondent was not only committing an offence against the statute. He was also setting at defiance the sentence of his own professional tribunal which had passed sentence on him.

In my opinion, this is a case which cannot possibly be properly dealt with under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907. There is no ground for saying that it is a trivial offence. It is a serious offence. There are no extenuating circumstances. Indeed, one of the matters which the justices find is an aggravating circumstance, because, having received this amount of £25 for the woman who had met with the accident, he at once borrowed the money from her. The case must go back to the justices with a direction that it is not one suitable to be dealt with under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, but is a case in which they must convict. The matter of penalty is for them.

ATKINSON, J. : I agree. I would only like to emphasise that the ground on which the justices have purported to exercise the discretion given to them by s. 1 is not one of the grounds set out in that section. They have not ventured to find that the offence was trivial. They have not suggested that there were any extenuating circumstances. Therefore, on the face of it, they have exceeded the jurisdiction given by the section.

A On an information under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 15 (1), charging the respondent with being in charge of a motor vehicle in a public place, when under the influence of drink, the justices found that the respondent while under the influence of drink, put his car in an enclosure at the rear of an inn at the side of which an open gateway gave access to the enclosure, and that cars had access to the enclosure and were actually parked there, but they dismissed the information:—

B HELD: the enclosure, being a place to which the public had access, was a "public place" within s. 15 (1) of the Act, and the respondent was guilty of an offence under that section.

CASE STATED by Otley (Yorkshire) justices.

D The respondent was charged on an information with being, when in charge of a motor vehicle in a public place, unlawfully under the influence of drink to such an extent as to be incapable of having proper control of the vehicle, contrary to s. 15 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. The justices dismissed the information. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Withers Payne for the appellant.

C. P. Harvey for the respondent.

E LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The justices dismissed an information preferred against the respondent charging him, when in charge of a motor vehicle in a public place called the Fox and Hounds Inn Car Park, Church Hill, with being under the influence of drink to such an extent as to be incapable of having proper control of the vehicle, contrary to s. 15 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. The justices have found that the respondent was under the influence of drink, and that he put his motor car in an enclosure at the rear of the Fox and F Hounds Inn, and they state:

At the side of the inn there is a well-defined parking ground from which an open gateway gives access to the said enclosure. Cars have access to the said enclosure and do actually park there.

In other words, this enclosure is part of a car park. The licensee invites people to go there, and people do go and park there.

G The section refers to "a road or other public place." I emphasise the word "other." "Road" is defined in s. 121 of the Act, and one must have regard to that definition when considering the meaning of the words "public place," because the two things are treated ejusdem generis. "Road" means "any highway and any other road to which the public has access," and so includes every road over which the public passes. Having regard to the definition of "road," "public place" for the purposes of this section must be read as H meaning a place to which the public have access, i.e., have access in fact. In this case it is expressly found that cars have access to the enclosure.

The case is, however, concluded by R. v. Collinson (1), which is indistinguishable in principle, though it may be distinguishable in detail, from the present case. There a man who was charged with being in charge of a car while under the influence of drink was in a car which was in a field to which at the relevant time the public were invited to watch some point-to-point races. It was a private field, and no doubt it could have been closed in at any time, and I have no doubt that the proprietor of the field could have objected to any particular person going into it. The public had not a legal right which they could enforce of access to the field, but it was a public place for the purposes of this section because at the relevant time the public were being invited to use it. That is the ratio decidendi of the case, and so long as that case stands it is clear that, in circumstances such as those found here by the justices, they had no option but to find that this car park was a public place. Accordingly, we must remit this case to the justices with the intimation that on the facts proved an offence had been committed.

EDWARDS v. JONES.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Atkinson and Oliver, JJ.).
April 24, 1947.]

Magistrates—Summary jurisdiction—Information—Two or more offences charged in one information—"Defect in substance or form"—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (c. 43), ss. 1, 10.

Street and Aerial Traffic—Offences—Two offences in one information—Dangerous driving and driving without due care and attention—Procedure—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), ss. 11, 12 (1)—Road Traffic Act, 1934 (c. 50), s. 35.

The provision in s. 1 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, that no objection as to the substance or form of an information is to prevail does not entitle justices to proceed to hear an information which, contrary to s. 10 of the Act, charges more than one offence at the same time.

Rodgers v. Richards ([1892] 1 Q.B. 533) not followed.

Where, contrary to s. 10 of the Act, an information contains more than one offence, the justices should take steps to see that it is amended. The prosecutor should be invited to decide on which offence he elects to proceed, and, on such election being made, the remaining offence or offences should be struck out. If the prosecutor refuses to elect, the information should be dismissed.

Johnson v. Needham ([1909] 1 K.B. 626) explained and followed.

The appellant was charged with dangerous driving, contrary to s. 11 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and, in the same information, with driving without due care and attention, contrary to s. 12 (1) of the Act. At the hearing before the justices it was submitted on behalf of the appellant that the information was bad and that the prosecution should elect which offence should be proceeded with. The prosecution refused to elect on the ground that they were asking for a conviction of one offence only. The justices held it was for them to decide, after hearing the evidence, which offence had been proved, and, after hearing the whole of the evidence, announced they would not convict on the charge of dangerous driving, but would convict on the charge of driving without due care and attention :—

HELD : (i) the procedure and formalities prescribed by the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, had not been fulfilled in that the appellant had been called on to answer two charges at the same time, and the conviction must be quashed.

(ii) the proper procedure to have followed was that specially provided by s. 35 of the Road Traffic Act, 1934, viz., to charge the appellant with dangerous driving and, if that charge had not been made out, to have directed or allowed a charge of driving without due care and attention to be preferred.

[EDITORIAL NOTE.] A practice of somewhat long standing, based on Rodgers v. Richards (2) and statements in various text books, appears to have grown up by which justices, in such a case as the present, hear all the evidence and then determine which of the two offences charged in the information has been proved. It should be noted that this decision makes it clear that this practice can no longer properly be followed.

CASE STATED by Llandudno (Carnarvonshire) justices.

The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

- B H. Emlyn-Jones and J. F. Copleston Boughey for the appellant.
Arthian Davies for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This Case Stated raises a question with regard to what should happen where more than one offence is contained in an information which is preferred before magistrates. I desire to say at once that the point with which we are now dealing is one which in some respects may be described as technical, and it must not be thought that I am in any way reflecting on the justices in this case because they are lay justices. It is the duty of the prosecution to assist the justices, and the duty of their clerk to keep them right on these matters. The only surprise I feel is that the respondent, an experienced police officer, should have thought that it was possible at this time of day to include two charges in one information, but that is what was done.

- D An information was preferred against the appellant for two offences—dangerous driving, contrary to s. 11 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and also driving without due care and attention, contrary to s. 12 (1). It appears from the facts which the justices state that at the outset it was submitted to them on the appellant's behalf that the information was bad as being for two offences, and the appellant definitely said that the respondent ought to elect for which offence he was proceeding. The respondent stated that he would not elect because he was only asking for a conviction on one charge and not on two charges, but he did not say for which offence he was seeking a conviction. The appellant was, therefore, in the position of having to defend himself, not on one charge, but on two charges at the same time. The justices held that it was for them to decide, after hearing the evidence, which offence had been proved, and they invited the appellant's solicitor to apply for an adjournment, stating that they were prepared to grant an adjournment in which event the respondent could amend his information. The respondent did not say whether he was going to amend his information, and, in fact, he did not amend it. Thereupon the justices heard the whole of the evidence and announced that they would not convict on the charge of dangerous driving, but would convict on the charge of driving without due care and attention.

- G It appears to me that the procedure adopted in this case was quite wrong and that the justices ought to have been advised that they could not proceed in this way. Under s. 10 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, it is laid down that an information shall be for one offence only. There is also a provision in s. 1 of that Act that no objection as to substance or form is to prevail, but that does not mean that, where the statute provides that an information shall be for one offence only, the justices can proceed to hear an information which charges two offences at the same time.

- H What the justices ought to do in such a case—and I state this for the information of justices generally—is this. If an information is preferred which contains two offences and not one, they should take steps to see that it is amended. According to the authorities the way they should do this is by asking the prosecutor on which offence he elects to proceed. The prosecutor can then elect to proceed on one offence, and thereupon the information should be amended by striking out the other offence or offences charged, as the case may be, so that the defendant is only called on to answer to the one offence. On the other hand, if the prosecutor declines to elect, the information is bad, and the justices should dismiss it. Any conviction which takes place on such an information would be bad for duplicity.

I think that is really all this court decided in Johnson v. Needham (1). The judgment in that case, which was delivered by LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., must not be considered to be an authority that justices can proceed on a bad information and hear two or three offences at the same time and then elect to convict on one. The information in Johnson v. Needham (1), charged three offences, and the prosecutor was called on to elect on which offence he would proceed. He declined to elect, the justices dismissed the summons, and this court held that they were right in doing so. If that case is properly understood, it shows that the procedure which I described a moment ago is the correct procedure and has been so recognised by this court. There is no ground for saying that, if an information discloses two offences, the justices can hear the two offences together and then say: "We will convict on one." That would be giving the go-by to the provisions of s. 10 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, which makes it perfectly clear that in a justices' court a defendant can only be called on to answer one charge at a time. If there are two informations against a defendant, on which the facts are very much the same, it is, of course, open to the defendant to agree to the two summonses being heard at once. That is constantly done. In this case the appellant did not agree to anything of the sort. He took the objection that the information was bad, and so it was. No agreement by him could put that right. The information could have been amended by striking out one of the charges. A charge could then have been preferred under the other section, and the appellant could have said: "Well, I want one heard first and see what happens to that, and then I will consider what I will do with regard to the second charge."

Another point that I think has to be remembered is this. A special provision has been made in the Road Traffic Act, 1934, s. 35, with regard to the offence of dangerous driving. It might have been a useful amendment of the law if the Act of 1934 had provided that where a person is charged with the offence of dangerous driving it should be open to the justices to convict him, on the same information, of the offence of driving without due care and attention, just as, by virtue of s. 34 of that Act, if a person is charged on indictment with manslaughter through the dangerous driving of a car, he may be convicted of the lesser offence of dangerous driving, on the same principle as a jury, on a charge of attempted murder, can find a man guilty of wounding with intent to commit grievous bodily harm without any separate count in the indictment, or, on an indictment of attempting to commit grievous bodily harm, can find him guilty of unlawful wounding.

Section 35 of the Act of 1934 provides:

(1) Where a person is charged before a court of summary jurisdiction with an offence under s. 11 of the [Road Traffic Act, 1930] (which relates to reckless or dangerous driving) and the court is of the opinion that the offence is not proved, then, at any time during the hearing or immediately thereafter, the court may, without prejudice to any other powers possessed by the court, direct or allow a charge for an offence under s. 12 of the [Act of 1930] (which relates to careless driving) to be preferred forthwith against the defendant and may thereupon proceed with that charge, so however that he or his solicitor or counsel shall be informed of the new charge and be given an opportunity, whether by way of cross-examining any witness whose evidence has already been given against the defendant or otherwise, of answering the new charge, and the court shall, if it considers that the defendant is prejudiced in his defence by reason of the new charge being so preferred, adjourn the hearing.

Observe the careful provision which is made in that section to prevent the two charges being heard together. The justices have to come to a conclusion, first, that the dangerous driving charge is not made out, and then a separate charge may be preferred of driving without due care and attention. That emphasises the point which I have been making that the defendant is never to be called on to answer two charges at the same time unless there are two separate informations and he consents to their being heard together.

I ought to say one word with regard to Rodgers v. Richards (2). In that case the charge was for unlawfully using a place for the purpose of fighting two dogs and encouraging and assisting at the fighting of such dogs. Again, two offences were included in the information. It is to be observed there that the stipendiary magistrate held that the objection taken that the information disclosed two offences was good, but he refused to amend the information and summons for reasons which I need not go into, and the prosecutor took a Case to this court. I should have no hesitation, if necessary, in differing from the decision in that case, not merely because we are sitting now as a court of three, and that was a court of two, but also because the case was not argued for the defendants, who did not appear, and when a case has been argued only on one side, it has not the authority of a case which has been fully argued.

A I certainly find the judgment of HAWKINS, J. somewhat difficult to follow. He says ([1892] 1 Q.B. 556):

By s. 1 [of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848] no objection is to be allowed to any information for any defect in substance or in form, or for any variance between it and the evidence adduced. Now, was the irregularity in this information a defect in substance or in form? In my opinion it was a defect in substance because the charging of two offences in one information is forbidden by statute. No objection, therefore, to the information ought to have been allowed on such a ground.

B If he means it was not open to the defendant to object, with all respect to that learned judge, I entirely differ. The objection was one which it was, of course, right to take because the information was not in accordance with s. 10 of the Act. The judge continues:

C In the case of a variance between the charge and the evidence adduced, the justices are empowered to adjourn the case, but this is only in the case of variance. Where the objection is for a defect in substance or in form, there is no such power. It seems only good sense to say that if the information charges two offences, the defendant must be prepared to meet both.

With that statement of the law—again I say with all respect—I emphatically differ. He goes on:

D He may rightfully object to being sued on more than one charge, and it would be competent to the justices to say whether the information in fact disclosed more than one offence.

There I quite agree, but, although he had said that the defendant might rightfully object to being proceeded against on more than one charge, the learned judge proceeds:

E In the present case it is admitted that two offences were charged. That is, as I have said, a defect in substance, in respect of which no objection should have been allowed, and the case must therefore, be remitted to the magistrate.

I think the judgment of WILLS, J., is much more easily understood. That learned judge said (ibid 557):

F The justices, no doubt, if two offences are charged in one information, may decline to allow the prosecutor to proceed on both; but it is impossible to say that because one such charge is discarded, the other cannot be proceeded with.

G I think, in saying "may decline to allow the prosecutor to proceed on both," the learned judge meant to say, "must decline to allow the prosecutor to proceed on both," and then, if one charge is discarded, the other can be proceeded with. Of course it can, but in the present case throughout there was no amendment of the information or discarding of the one charge. Therefore, it seems to me that the procedure and the formalities prescribed by the Summary Jurisdiction Act have not been followed and the appellant has been called on to answer two charges at the same time, which is exactly what the provisions of the Act are designed to prevent. For these reasons, I think that the appeal must be allowed and the conviction quashed.

H I might just add this, which is another reason which seems to me to be a compelling reason in this case. If a conviction has to be drawn up for the purposes of an appeal, it must follow the information. If the conviction here showed two findings, one of Not Guilty on one charge and one of Guilty on another, it would at once appear that there was duplicity in the information and the conviction would be bad. If, on the other hand, the conviction was drawn up in relation to one charge only, it would not be following the information, and again it would be bad. I do not think, therefore, that in this case it would have been possible to have properly drawn up a conviction which could have stood, and that is another ground why this appeal must succeed.

ATKINSON, J.: I only want to add one word with reference to Rodgers v. Richards (2). It is interesting to see that the argument for the prosecutor puts my Lord's judgment in a nutshell. It was this ([1892] 1 Q.B. 555):

Admitting that the information disclosed two offences, the magistrate ought not to have dismissed the summons. He ought to have amended the information and summons by calling on the prosecutor to elect on which charge he would proceed.

I think that one must read what WILLS, J. said, substituting the word "must" for "may," "The justices, no doubt, if two offences are charged in one information, must decline to allow the prosecutor to proceed on both"—that had been conceded by the prosecutor—"but it is impossible to say that because one such charge is discarded the other cannot be proceeded with."

OLIVER, J.: I agree. By s. 10 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, it is laid down in terms that every information shall be for one offence only. In this case the information deliberately charged two offences. If we are to uphold this conviction there is no reason that I can see why an information should not contain 50 or any other number of different offences. To my mind, it is fundamental in summary jurisdiction procedure that an information should contain only one offence. Our attention has been drawn to the provisions of s. 1 of the Act which are that no objection is to be taken or upheld with regard to substance or form. All I take that to mean is that no information is to be summarily dismissed because it is defective in form or in substance, but it must be put in a condition in which it is not in complete violation of s. 10 before it is determined. On that I agree with every word which has fallen from my Lord.

I also agree with him that the effect of what was done in this case is to produce this position. Here is an information charging two different offences. One of them has been found proved. The other has been found disproved. If a conviction is to be drawn up, how is it to be done? The information has to be dealt with as a whole. It has either to be found proved and so a conviction recorded, or it is to be found disproved and a dismissal recorded. To split it into halves and say that one half is proved and the other half is disproved involves an operation which is, perhaps, even more difficult to perform than the splitting of the atom. It cannot be done. There is no adjudication on part of the information as it was drawn. I agree with what has fallen from my Lord and ATKINSON, J. about Rodgers v. Richards (2). I find myself quite unable to follow the reasoning of the judgment of HAWKINS, J. More particularly, I select the sentence: "It seems only good sense to say that if the information charges two offences, the defendant must be prepared to meet both." It would seem to be equally good sense to say if you charge 100 offences the same result would follow. I cannot agree with that statement. I also agree with my Lord and my brother about the judgment of WILLS, J. which I think expressed the true view. I further associate myself with the view expressed by my Lord that it would have been far better if the Road Traffic Act, 1934, had empowered justices, on a charge of dangerous driving, to convict of a lesser offence, a power which has been conferred on the courts in a number of other cases which have been alluded to.

Appeal allowed with costs.

DENERLEY v. SPINK.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Atkinson and Oliver, JJ.),
April 23, 1947.]

Medicine and Pharmacy—Chemists and druggists—Offence—Title or description calculated to suggest qualification—Business carried on as “Spink’s, the Chemists”—No qualified chemist at branch shop—Card displayed stating no qualified assistant in charge—Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933 (c. 25), s. 3 (2).

By the Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933, s. 3 (2): “It shall not be lawful for a person to use in connection with any business any title, emblem or description reasonably calculated to suggest that he or anyone employed in the business possesses any qualification with respect to the selling, dispensing or compounding of drugs or poisons other than the qualification which he in fact possesses.”

A registered and qualified chemist and druggist owned eleven chemist’s shops which he carried on under the name of “Spink’s, the Chemists.” Qualified assistants were in charge of ten of them, but the eleventh shop was under the control of unqualified assistants. The chemist exhibited in the window of this shop a card stating that, owing to war circumstances, there was no qualified assistant in charge of the shop and medicines could not be dispensed:—

HELD: (i) apart from the placard, the words “Spink’s, the Chemists” represented only that the shop belonged to a Mr. Spink, who was a qualified chemist, and not that there was necessarily a qualified chemist in control at the branch, and, therefore, there was no offence against s. 3 (2).

(ii) when the word “Chemists” over the shop was read in conjunction with the announcement contained in the placard, the word “Chemists” was not reasonably calculated to suggest that anyone employed in the business possessed the qualification of a registered chemist.

CASE STATED by Wilton Beacon (Yorkshire) justices.

The justices dismissed an information preferred by the appellant, an inspector of the Pharmaceutical Society, against the respondent charging him with unlawfully using in connection with his business a description, “chemists,” reasonably calculated to suggest that he or some one employed in the business possessed a qualification with respect to the selling, dispensing or compounding of drugs or poisons other than that which he, in fact, possessed, contrary to the Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933, s. 3 (2).

Blanco White, K.C., Cyril Morgan and J. Sopher for the appellant.

W. A. L. Raeburn for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The facts found by the justices are that the respondent, Spink, owns eleven chemist’s shops in various places, including one at Pocklington, carried on under the name of “Spink’s, the Chemists.” The respondent himself is a duly registered and qualified chemist and druggist. Qualified assistants were in control of ten of the respondent’s shops, but, owing to the shortage of qualified assistants, there was no such assistant at the Pocklington shop, which at the relevant time was under the control of unqualified female assistants. The respondent exhibited a card in the window of this shop informing the public at large that, owing to war circumstances, there was no qualified assistant in charge of the shop and that medicines could not be dispensed. The appellant bought at the shop an innocuous substance called glycerine and rose water, and on the bottle was a label with the name “Spink’s, Chemists.” It was suggested that in those circumstances an offence had been committed against the Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933 s. 3 (2), which provides:

It shall not be lawful for a person to use in connection with any business any title, emblem or description reasonably calculated to suggest that he or anyone employed in the business possesses any qualification with respect to the selling, dispensing or compounding of drugs or poisons other than the qualification which he in fact possesses.

There are two preliminary remarks I would make. In the first place, we are dealing with a penal section and we have, therefore, to construe it strictly and are not entitled to read into it words which are not there to create an offence which the statute would not otherwise create. Secondly, the Pharmacy Acts have been in existence since 1852, and been the subject of constant amendment and expansion by Parliament until 1933, when the Act with which we are now dealing was passed. Parliament has had every opportunity of amending the Acts and remedying any defects in them which may have appeared from cases in the courts. The Pharmaceutical Society, who may be supposed to promote the Acts, have also had every opportunity of dealing with this matter. We are not concerned here with the policy of the Acts, except in so far as one gives a reasonable construction to an Act having regard to its nature and policy. We have only to see whether the statute causes to be an offence the facts which are proved. A

It is argued by counsel for the appellant that the use of the word "chemists" must be calculated to suggest that a person in the shop or the person in control of the shop is a registered chemist. In other words, he would ask the court to read the words "he or anyone employed in the business possesses any qualification with respect to the selling, dispensing or compounding of drugs or poisons other than the qualification which he in fact possesses," as though the words of the section were "he or any person in control of premises where the business is carried on." I am unable to read such words as those into the section, more especially when I find that, while there is no prohibition in express language of the use of the word "chemist," but only a description reasonably calculated to suggest what the Act is aimed against, it is provided in the very same section : B

For the purposes of this subsection the use of the description "pharmacy" in connection with a business carried on on any premises shall be deemed to be reasonably calculated to suggest that the owner of the business and the person having the control of the business on those premises are registered pharmacists. C

Speaking for myself, I should decide this case mainly on a different ground from that which commended itself to the magistrates, because it seems to me that it is clear from the sections of the Act, and also from s. 3 of the repealed Poisons and Pharmacy Act, 1908, that Parliament has always had in mind that chemists' businesses may be carried on at more than one set of premises, but they have not, in the subsection with which we are dealing, dealt with any premises in which the business is carried on. They have made it unlawful for a person to use in connection with any business a title which suggests that he or anyone—not "and anyone"—employed in the business possesses a qualification which, in fact, he has not got. D

Whose business was this? The business belonged to the respondent, Spink. Spink was a chemist, and, therefore so long as the business is his and he is carrying it on, although he may not be in control of the particular premises in the sense of his being personally there, the business is his, and the title represents only, as it seems to me : "This is a shop belonging to Mr. Spink, who is a chemist." When you contrast the language of s. 10 of the Act of 1933 with the language of s. 3 (2), it becomes impossible to give the construction for which counsel for the appellant has contended, because s. 10, which deals with executors of deceased chemists or persons who carry on a business in bankruptcy or after making an arrangement with creditors, provides that, in each set of premises where the business is carried on, the business, so far as it concerns the retail sale of drugs, must be under the personal control of a registered pharmacist. There you at once find the words "in each set of premises," and in the repealed Act of 1908, s. 3 provided : E

(1) Any person who, being a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist or chemist and druggist, carries on the business of pharmaceutical chemist or chemist and druggist shall, unless in every premises where the business is carried on the business is bona fide conducted by himself or some other duly registered pharmaceutical chemist or chemist and druggist, as the case may be, and unless the name and certificate of qualification F

of the person by whom the business is so conducted in any premises is conspicuously exhibited in the premises, be guilty of an offence . . .

In those cases Parliament has dealt expressly with a business carried on in more than one place and has laid down in that repealed section and in s. 10 of the Act of 1933 what is to be done where a business is carried on at a number of premises, but I cannot find anything in s. 3 (2) which deals with any more than

A by the respondent in calling his shop "Spink's, the Chemists" when he is a chemist and it is his shop.

The point on which the magistrates dismissed the summons was one for which there is a great deal to be said, and, on the whole, I think the decision of the magistrates was right. They came to their decision on the ground that, although the business was called "Spink's, the Chemists," Mr. Spink had given a notice to the public by a placard in the window, which the magistrates, no
B doubt, saw, which indicated to the public that there was not a qualified chemist in charge of the business. People could decide for themselves whether they would risk buying a bottle of fruit salts or a packet of tooth paste from an unqualified person, but it was clearly stated that no dispensing would be carried on. There, again, counsel for the appellant says that, if the word "chemist" is used, as it was over the shop, that in itself is an offence. The
C words of the section are ". . . any title, emblem or description reasonably calculated to suggest . . ." and the magistrates decided :

When you take the word "chemist" over the shop, with the announcement which is contained in the placard, the word "chemist" is not reasonably calculated to suggest to the public that the person possesses some particular qualification which, in fact, he does not.

D I cannot help thinking that that is right. At any rate, it seems to me to be a question of fact because the question whether a thing is reasonably calculated to achieve a certain end must in all cases be one of fact. That conclusion seems to be strengthened by the further provisions of the sub-section that the use of the word "pharmacy" is to be deemed to achieve this result. The Act does not provide that the use of the word "chemist" is to be deemed to achieve that result. If the word "pharmacy" were used, it might be a nice question
E whether or not a notice such as that in the present case would achieve the result intended, because of the precise words of the section, but I cannot find anything which makes the use of the word "chemist," if I may so put it, irrefutable, and the magistrates have found here that it was not reasonably calculated to suggest what the section was aimed at. Therefore, in my opinion, on that ground the magistrates came to a correct decision in point of law on the facts they found, and for these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.
F

ATKINSON, J. : I agree. It seems to me that the first thing to do is to look at the emblem or description which is being attacked and see what that implies. "Spink's, the Chemists," is not a simple use of the word "chemists." If there had been over this shop window merely "chemists," the position might be different, but there was "Spink's, the Chemists," which means, I should
G have thought : "This is a branch of the business carried on by Mr. Spink," and it certainly would imply that Mr. Spink was a qualified person. He is, but the argument is that the description, "Spink's, the Chemists," must be deemed to imply that the person in control of the business is also a registered chemist. I cannot follow the argument. Parliament knew perfectly well how to express a provision of that kind, because s. 3 (2) and (4) of the Act of 1908, with its provisions relating to decessed
H chemists and chemists who sell poison, made it perfectly clear that those provisions related, not merely to the owner of the business, but also to the person in control. The final screw in the coffin of the argument for the appellant is to be found in the latter part of sub-s. (2) where it is provided that the word "pharmacy" shall be deemed to be reasonably calculated to suggest that the owner of the business and the person having control are registered pharmacists. It is all very well to argue that the word "chemist" has to be treated as if it were "pharmacy," but the section does not say so, and, therefore, to my mind, it is impossible to say we are to construe this title,

"Spink's, the Chemists" as, quite apart from the placard in the window, one reasonably calculated to suggest that the person having control of the business was also a registered practitioner.

Sale of Land—Purchaser's lien—Costs of suit—Deposit paid to stakeholder.

The basis of the undoubted right of a purchaser, who has paid a deposit to a vendor, to have a lien on the property for his deposit when the contract goes off otherwise than by the default of the purchaser is that the purchaser is to be regarded as a secured creditor in respect of that deposit. The lien extends to the costs of a suit by the vendor to compel performance of the contract, but where, in accordance with a condition of the contract, the deposit has been paid to a stakeholder, and, consequently, the purchaser could not in an action by the vendor counterclaim for the return of his deposit or for a declaration of lien in respect of that deposit, he is not entitled to a lien for the costs of the action.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER ACTION.

At the time of the action the vendor was ordered to pay two-thirds of the purchasers' taxed costs. The purchaser, who had paid a deposit in conformity with a special condition, claimed to be entitled to a lien on the property in the suit for these costs. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Apr. 25. WYNN-PARRY, J. read the following judgment. I have already ordered that the vendor should pay to the purchaser two-thirds of his taxed costs of this action. Counsel for the purchaser then claimed that the purchaser was entitled to a lien on the property in suit for those costs, and the question which emerges raises, in my view, a point which has not previously come before the courts. In support of his claim to a lien counsel relies on a principle which, he submits, is supported by a number of authorities and is conveniently set out in COOTE ON MORTGAGES, 9th ed., p. 1379, in a passage which, indeed, is a repetition of a similar statement in an earlier edition which was approved by FARWELL, J., in Whitbread & Co., Ltd. v. Watt (1) ([1901] 1 Ch. 913). That statement is as follows :

If a purchaser advance all or any part of the money to the vendor, and the contract is broken off, an implied contract arises, by which the purchaser has a lien on the land ; and if the purchaser properly declines to complete, he has a lien for the deposit and interest on unpaid purchase-money, and for interest on the payments, and also for the costs of a suit by himself or the vendor to compel performance of the contract, and this lien attaches on the deeds. If the purchase goes off through the fault of the purchaser, of course he has no lien for what he has paid.

A It is to be observed that the opening words of that statement postulate the condition : "If a purchaser advance all or any part of the money to the vendor." In the present case it is provided by the contract that the purchaser is to purchase the property in question from the vendor at the price of £28,000, subject to the accompanying conditions of sale, the sum of £2,800 having been paid to Messrs. Willis & Willis as a deposit and in part payment of the purchase money. The deposit of £2,800 was paid by the purchaser to B Messrs. Willis and Willis, and in accordance with the second special condition of sale it was paid to them as stakeholders.

It is manifest in those circumstances that the payment of that sum of £2,800 in accordance with that condition would to that extent discharge the purchaser, but that does not mean that, by his act in paying that sum to Messrs. Willis & Willis, he paid it to the vendor. The purchaser could not have brought any proceedings against the vendor to obtain payment by the vendor C to him of that sum.

It is in the light of those facts that I have to examine the claim put forward by counsel for the purchaser and the applicability to this case of the statement which I have read from COOTE ON MORTGAGES. The basis of the undoubted right of a purchaser who has paid a deposit to a vendor to have a lien for his deposit when the contract goes off otherwise than by the default of the purchaser seems to me to be that the purchaser is, in D respect of that deposit, to be regarded as a secured creditor. That, I think, clearly emerges from the speeches of LORD WESTBURY and LORD CRANWORTH in Rose v. Watson (2). It is to be observed that in that case there was no claim that the lien should extend to the costs of the suit, but in the later authorities to which I have been referred, viz., Middleton v. Magnay (3), Turner v. Marriott (4), Whitbread v. Watt (1), and Kitton v. Hewitt (5), it does E appear that the right of the purchaser, where the sale goes off otherwise than by his default, has been extended to cover his costs of suit and the costs of investigating the title.

In my judgment, all those cases are to be explained by reference to the underlying principle that the right of the purchaser to a lien in such circumstances proceeds on the basis that he is to be regarded as a secured creditor. Until that can be postulated of a purchaser I am unable to see how he has F any right to a lien. It follows, therefore, in my judgment, that in this case, where the purchaser could not by his counterclaim have sued for a return of the deposit and a declaration of lien in respect of that deposit, he is not entitled to a lien for the costs of the action. To hold otherwise would be to introduce a new rule for which the principle which underlies the authorities that have been cited to me and relied on by counsel for the purchaser could not be prayed in aid ; and for which no other basis has been suggested. In my judgment, G therefore, the purchaser is not entitled to any lien for his costs.

Damages—Measure of damages—Breach of contract—Couponed material supplied for manufacture—Failure to deliver manufactured articles—Reduction of turnover—Loss of profit.

A
A manufacturer failed to deliver to the plaintiff garments which he had contracted to make-up out of materials supplied to him by the plaintiff for which the plaintiff had given coupons.

HELD: the damages awarded for the breach of contract might include the loss suffered by the plaintiff through the reduction in the turnover of his business consequent on the loss of the coupons.

[EDITORIAL NOTE. The basis of the whole coupon rationing system is that the vendor of goods to the public must deliver to the manufacturer or wholesaler coupons against the goods which are supplied to him for sale, and in turn receives from his customer coupons in respect of the goods sold by retail. He is then able, by passing on the coupons to his supplier, to obtain further goods for sale. From this it will be seen that the loss of coupons through the default of a supplier is, in effect, a loss of part of the capital employed in the business.]

P. Goodenday for the plaintiff.

C. D. Aarvold for the defendant.

HILBERY, J.: (after holding that the defendant had failed to deliver 27 coats which he should have delivered under the contract): I think the plaintiff is entitled to 27 coats which cannot be replaced. I have taken the measure of damage, in the first place, as the price which the plaintiff could have obtained for each of the types of coat which make up the 27 missing garments, and that comes to a figure of £98 11s. 0d. Then comes the difficulty in regard to the loss of his coupons. What is to be done about that? He has lost the coupons which he had given for the material which those 27 coats represent, and those coupons would have been replaced for him in his business when he, in his turn, had sold the goods. Being deprived of the coupons altogether, he loses the use of material in his business to the extent of the value which those coupons represent. The loss of the coupons diminishes the amount of material which he can employ and turnover in the course of the year. There is, of course, a very definite value attaching to coupons to-day in such a business as the plaintiff's and the loss of coupons must represent a true loss to him. It is a difficult matter to decide, but I have come to the conclusion that £75 ought to be given for that. Therefore, I make the total damages £173 11s. 0d.

Building Societies—Winding up—General meeting—Notice of meeting to be sent to all members—Register of members destroyed—Notice to members by public advertisement—Building Societies Act, 1874 (c. 42). s. 32 (4).

A The trustees of an instrument of dissolution of a building society wished to call a general meeting of the society to obtain the necessary authorisation for a winding up petition to be presented to the court under the Building Societies Act, 1874, s. 32 (4), but they were unable to do so because, under the rules, notice of all meetings had to be sent to all the members at least 7 days before such meetings, and, owing to the fact that the society's register of members had been destroyed by enemy action, this rule could not be complied with:—

B HELD: (i) the Companies Act, 1929, s. 115 (2), did not apply.

(ii) notice, as provided by the rules, must be sent to all members whose names and addresses were known, but the matter could be brought to the notice of those members whose names and addresses were not known by means of public advertisement in appropriate newspapers indicating the purposes of the meeting and calling on the members to attend the meeting after a proper interval of time.

The facts appear in the judgment.

E C. Montgomery White, K.C., and P. B. Morle for the plaintiffs.

Michael J. Albery for the defendant, a shareholder.

VASEY, J.: The questions which now arise for my decision on this summons are two in number. First, I am asked: "Whether the plaintiffs"—who are the trustees of an instrument of dissolution of the Pall Mall Building Society—"can and should cause application to be made to the court under the Companies Act, 1929, s. 115, to direct a meeting to be called and held and conducted in such manner as the court thinks fit." In my judgment, the section in question has no application. Secondly, I am asked:

F Whether the plaintiffs can and should call a general meeting of the society for the purpose of the Building Societies Act, 1874, s. 32 (4), and, if so, how notice of such meeting should be given having regard to the provisions of r. 23 of the society and to the fact that the register of members has been destroyed by enemy action and the names and addresses of approximately 120 members are not known.

G The society was incorporated on Oct. 12, 1932, under the Building Societies Act, 1874. Under that Act certain matters had to be provided for by rule, and r. 23, the relevant rule, is:

Notice of all meetings of the members shall be sent to all members at least 7 days before such meetings.

H In 1940, owing to the outbreak of the war, the society found it impossible to continue to carry on business, and with the necessary consent of members it was decided that it should be dissolved. On Apr. 21, 1940, an instrument of dissolution was made pursuant to s. 32 (3) of the Act of 1874, and in due course the plaintiffs were nominated as trustees for the purposes of the dissolution. By s. 32 of the Act of 1874: "A society under this Act may terminate or be dissolved . . ." Then come four headings not separated by any conjunctive or disjunctive words, but following one after the other in this way:

1. Upon the happening of any event declared by its rules to be the termination of the society. 2. By dissolution in manner prescribed by its rules. 3. By dissolution with the consent of three fourths of the members, holding not less than two thirds of the number of shares in the society, testified by their signatures to the instrument of dissolution.

There follow provisions as to what the instrument should contain. Then heading 4 provides :

By winding up, either voluntarily under the supervision of the court or by the court, if the court shall so order, on the petition by any member authorised by three fourths of the members present at a general meeting of the society specially called for the purpose to present the same on behalf of the society . . .

The first matter that occurred to me was whether, as the society is already in dissolution under the third of the four courses prescribed by means of an instrument of dissolution, it can now present a petition for a winding-up order by the court under the fourth heading. I do not propose to decide that matter, but I understand that text-book writers have expressed the view that it can. My own view at the moment—although the matter is not really relevant—is that a winding-up order can be made in such circumstances as exist in the present case. The difficulty arises from the necessary preliminary to the presentation of the petition for winding the society up, namely, an authorisation given to the member who presents the petition by three fourths of the members present at the general meeting of the society which should have been called for the purpose. As I have already indicated, the problem with which we are faced is how some 120 members can be served within the meaning of the rules, or at all, when their names and addresses are not known.

In my judgment, I have power to say that a meeting of members should be called by the plaintiffs to consider, and, if thought fit, pass, the resolution contemplated by s. 32 (4) of the Act of 1874. I think that that meeting should be called in accordance, so far as possible, with r. 23, which says :

Where the names and addresses of the members are known, the meeting must be convened by notices sent to them, but, as regards the members whose identities and addresses are unknown, it seems to me that the only way is for me to authorise steps to be taken to bring the matter to the notice of those persons by means of public advertisement in the ordinary manner. I think that there should be a notice published in some appropriate newspaper or newspapers in England indicating the purposes of the meeting and calling on the members to attend that meeting after a proper interval of time. It is not always easy to get these notices into the Press at any particular date, and I think that a considerable time, much exceeding the minimum of seven days, should elapse between the publication of the notice and the sending out of the notices to the known shareholders. I will not at the moment say what that interval of time should be, nor what should be the precise form of the notice nor in what newspaper or newspapers it should appear. Those matters must be referred to chambers, and the appropriate order should be sought from the master. I hope that the plaintiffs and the defendant, who is being sued as a representative shareholder, will unite in making such submissions in regard to those matters as they think will enable justice to be done.

When the petition comes before the court, if such a petition is sanctioned and authorised by the meeting, it will be for the judge before whom that petition comes to make sure that the requisite preliminaries have been complied with. There may be a difficulty, because that petition will be dealt with, not in the Chancery Division, but in the Companies Court, and I suppose that in strictness it will be in the power of the judge to say that a meeting, convened as I have indicated, was not a meeting sufficiently authentic to enable the petition to be treated as well-founded. I do not, however, anticipate any difficulty of that kind. Indeed, I am not sure that it would not be proper for me to say that it might be convenient, if at the time I am doing company work, for the petition to be brought before me, as I have already some seisin of the circumstances in which it will have been presented. I cannot direct that a non-existent petition should be heard by me, but I can indicate that I should not regard it as improper for an application to be made to me after the petition is on the file that I should hear and consider the matter. I do not think it would be safe to appoint the defendant to represent the other shareholders. He is here in a quasi representative capacity, but I do not see any point in making anything in the nature of a representation order.

Re A RECEIVING ORDER (IN BANKRUPTCY).

B [CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), March 11, April 15, 1947.]

Bankruptcy—Receiving order—Registration at Land Registry—Re-registration—Discharge of bankruptcy—Re-registration 16 years later—Land Charges Act, 1925 (c. 22), s. 6 (1) (c), 3—Bankruptcy Rules, 1915 r. 181A.

Land Charges—Vacation of entry in register—Receiving order in bankruptcy made in 1927—Discharge of bankruptcy in 1930—Re-registration by Official Receiver in 1946—Land Charges Act, 1925 (c. 22), s. 6 (1) (c), 3, 5.

C In 1927, a receiving order was made against C. and he was adjudicated bankrupt. He was at that time entitled to an absolute reversionary interest in two real properties and he disclosed this interest to his trustee in bankruptcy. By a deed of release and assignment made in 1929, the trustee assigned this interest to C.'s mother in consideration of certain payments. In 1930 C. obtained his discharge, and the registration of the receiving order under the Land Charges Act, 1925, expired in 1932. The properties were assigned to C. by his mother, and, in 1934 and 1942 respectively, he was registered as proprietor of the two properties with an absolute title at the Land Registry. In 1946 C. entered into a contract to sell the properties, but the purchaser repudiated the contract and (after proceedings for specific performance had been begun by C.) wrote to the Official Receiver questioning C.'s right to be registered with an absolute title in view of the receiving order of 1927. On Dec. 13, 1946, after only one day's inquiry and without communicating with C., the Official Receiver applied for the re-registration of the receiving order of 1927 at the Land Registry, although he knew that the asset had been disclosed and that the trustee's file had been destroyed by enemy action:—

F HELD: (i) the Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, r. 181A (which provides that, on the making of a receiving order, the Official Receiver shall give notice thereof to the Chief Land Registrar with a request for it to be registered on the register of writs and orders affecting land), could not justify registration in 1946 of a receiving order made in 1927.

G (ii) since no rules for re-registration of receiving orders had ever been made, although the Land Charges Act, 1925, s. 19 (2), provided that such rules could be made under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, it was doubtful whether the Official Receiver had power to re-register a receiving order, but, assuming that he had this power, he should exercise it with great care and sense of responsibility, especially after the bankrupt had been discharged.

H (iii) the registration of the receiving order should be vacated and, since the Official Receiver had acted without sufficient care, without adequate inquiries, and with undue haste, he must pay C.'s costs.

Cur. adv. vult.

Apr. 15. ROXBURGH, J. read the following judgment. This is an originating motion to vacate the registration of a receiving order in bankruptcy which the respondent, the Official Receiver, has registered under the Land Charges Act, 1925, s. 6. A

A receiving order was made against the applicant on May 10, 1927, and he was adjudicated bankrupt on July 26, 1927. He was at those dates entitled to an absolute reversionary interest in certain properties known as Oaklands Park and Brook Meadows, and this interest was duly disclosed by him to F.S., Salaman, his trustee in bankruptcy. By a deed of release and assignment dated July 24, 1929, and made between Mr. Salaman, of the first part, Mrs. Combe (the applicant's mother), of the second part, and the applicant, of the third part, Mr. Salaman (since deceased), in consideration of certain payments of which he thereby acknowledged receipt, assigned the applicant's said reversionary interest to Mrs. Combe. On June 29, 1930, the applicant obtained his discharge, and the original registration of the receiving order under the Land Charges Act, 1925, expired on May 10, 1932. Mrs. Combe assigned the properties in question to the applicant and he was registered as proprietor of Oaklands Park on Apr. 11, 1934, and of Brook Meadows on June 4, 1942, with an absolute title at the Land Registry. In June, 1946, the applicant entered into a contract to sell these properties to Lord Swaythling, but Lord Swaythling repudiated the contract, and on Aug. 27, 1946, the applicant began proceedings for specific performance. B C

On Dec. 6, 1946, Lord Swaythling's solicitors, Gilbert Samuel & Co., addressed the following letter to the Chief Land Registrar: D

We are acting for Lord Swaythling, who in June, 1946, contracted to purchase the above property [i.e., Oaklands Park and Brook Meadows] from Capt. Harvey A. B. Combe. The matter is now the subject of litigation as our client claims rescission of the contract on the ground that he was induced to sign the contract by a misrepresentation, and Capt. Harvey A. B. Combe is claiming specific performance . . . It appears from a search of the register of title that Capt. H. A. B. Combe secured registration of himself with an absolute title to the Sedlescombe Estate on Apr. 11, 1934. We are unable to understand how Capt. Combe would have been in a position to obtain such registration having regard to the vesting of his interests in the estate in the trustees and/or Official Receiver by reason of his bankruptcy. Inquiries at the Bankruptcy Court have elicited the fact that the interests that came to the trustees and/or Official Receiver have not been disposed of although they may well have been regarded as of no value at the time having regard to the charges secured thereon, but the existence of the charges would not of course affect the title to the equity. We should be much obliged if you would kindly investigate the matter, if possible without referring to Capt. Combe himself, or informing us before you contemplate communicating with him. If it would be of assistance we should be happy to call upon you by appointment. E F

On Dec. 11, 1946, Lord Swaythling's solicitors addressed the following letter to the Official Receiver: G

Dear Sir, We are acting for Lord Swaythling and enclose herewith a copy of a letter which we addressed on the 6th instant to the Chief Land Registrar. . . . The chief Land Registrar in answer to our letter of the 6th instant adopted the attitude that Capt. Harvey Combe had an absolute title, that the Registry could do no wrong, and if the Official Receiver had any claim he would have exercised that claim before now. The Land Registrar also pointed out that if he proved to be wrong in registering the absolute title the persons who had taken interests after the date of registration could be compensated out of the fund under his control. We trust that you will regard this letter as confidential and not communicate with Capt. Combe—at any rate without reference to us. If you decide to contest the registration on the information available then the matter will clearly come to Capt. Combe's knowledge, but if you do not contemplate taking any action then we should appreciate your not bringing the matter to Capt. Combe's attention. H

On Dec. 13, 1946, the day following the receipt of this letter, the Official Receiver applied for re-registration of the receiving order under the Land Charges Act, 1925, on a form which I will scrutinise later, but I will first describe the procedure for obtaining registration and its effect. I will then consider the powers of the Official Receiver in connection with registration, and the circumstances in which he exercised or assumed the power to re-register the receiving order in question. Finally, I will give my reasons for vacating the registration and for making the order as to costs which I feel bound to make.

By the Land Charges Act, 1925, s. 6 (1), (3) and (5) :

A (1) There may be registered in the register of writs and orders . . . (c) any receiving order in bankruptcy made after the commencement of this Act, whether or not it is known to affect land. (3) The registration of a writ or order in the said register ceases to have effect at the expiration of 5 years from the date of registration, but may be renewed from time to time, and, if renewed, shall have effect for 5 years from the date of renewal. (5) The registration of a writ or order affecting land may be vacated pursuant to an order of the court or a judge thereof.

By s. 23 (1) :

B As respects pending actions, writs, orders, deeds of arrangement and land charges (not including local land charges) required to be registered or re-registered after the commencement of this Act, this Act shall not apply thereto, if and so far as they affect registered land, and can be protected under the Land Registration Act, 1925, by lodging or registering a creditor's notice, restriction, caution, inhibition or other notice.

By s. 19 (2)—and this is a very important provision :

C As respects the registration and re-registration . . . (b) of a receiving order in bankruptcy as an order affecting land ; rules may be made under and in the manner provided by the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 132, as if the registration and re-registration were required by that Act.

By the Land Registration Act, 1925, s. 61 (3) and (4) :

D (3) The registrar shall, as soon as practicable after registration of a receiving order in bankruptcy under the Land Charges Act, 1925, enter an inhibition (in this Act called a bankruptcy inhibition) against the title of any proprietor of any registered land or charge which appears to be affected. (4) From and after the entry of a bankruptcy inhibition (but without prejudice to dealings with or in right of interests or charges having priority over the estate or charge of the bankrupt proprietor), no dealing affecting the registered land or charge of the proprietor, other than the registration of the trustee in bankruptcy, shall be entered on the register until the inhibition is vacated as to the whole or part of the land or charge dealt with.

E Section 144 (1) provides : " Subject to the provisions of this Act, the Lord Chancellor may " with certain advice and assistance which I need not particularise " make general rules " for the purposes mentioned in that section.

The Land Registration Rules, 1925, r. 180, provides :

F A bankruptcy inhibition shall be entered in the Proprietorship Register in the following form, " Bankruptcy Inhibition. No disposition or transmission is to be registered until a trustee in bankruptcy is registered," and notice of the entry shall be given to the proprietor.

By r. 181 :

Where . . . (e) the bankruptcy proceedings do not affect or have ceased to affect the statutory powers of the bankrupt under the Act, the registrar shall, as soon as practicable after receiving notice thereof and after making such inquiry and giving such notice (if any) as he shall deem necessary, take such action in the matter as he shall think advisable.

G The Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, r. 181A, provides :

On the making of a receiving order the Official Receiver named therein shall as soon as he is notified of the making of such receiving order or in the case of a stay of advertisement forthwith after such stay has ceased to operate give notice of the same to the Chief Land Registrar with a request that such receiving order may be registered in the register of writs and orders affecting land.

H Form 33A is the form applicable to such a notification. After formal parts it states :

A receiving order was made on the (—) day of (—) against the above-named debtor. The petitioner is (—). I hereby apply for registration thereof in the register of writs and orders affecting land pursuant to the Land Charges Act, 1925, s. 6.

Then it is dated and signed by the " Official Receiver attached to the above-named court," i.e., the court in the title, and it is addressed to the Chief Land Registrar.

Counsel for the applicant has submitted that the Land Charges Act, s. 6 (3), is only available if the application for renewal is made before the expiration of the original registration, but I shall assume, without deciding, that this is not so. The Official Receiver, however, derives his powers as such from the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, and while the Land Charges Act, 1925, contemplates that rules may be made under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, not only with regard to registration, but also with regard to re-registration, it is conceded that no rules of the latter class have ever been made. Rule 181A could not justify registration in 1946 of a receiving order made in 1927. The absence of any rule providing for re-registration is remarkable. It may well be that in certain circumstances the Official Receiver ought to be given an express power of re-registration, but, if so, its use after the discharge of a bankrupt might require restriction, because discharge ought, so far as practicable, to allow the bankrupt to rebuild his reputation, and it is a strong measure automatically to attach to any registered land which he may acquire after his discharge an inhibition in the following form: "No disposition or transmission is to be registered until a trustee in bankruptcy is registered"—an inhibition couched in language singularly inappropriate to the case of a bankrupt already discharged. Moreover, if it is desirable to empower the Official Receiver to take this serious step merely by way of precaution pending inquiry even in cases where there is no suggestion that any asset has been concealed in the bankruptcy, there would seem to be a need for some easier method of vacating the registration in circumstances such as have arisen in the present case than an application to this court, and, admittedly, there is none. In these circumstances the absence of rule suggests absence of power. Again, Mr. Jackson, the examiner who deals with revived cases, has never known a case of re-registration before, and he proceeded to adapt for the purpose of this case a form which is not appropriate to re-registration. This is the form, as he adapted it: "Re Harvey Alexander Combe. Surname, Combe. Christian names, Harvey Alexander. Address and description: Oaklands, Sedlescombe, in the county of Sussex. A receiving order was made on May 10, 1927, against the above-named debtor. The petitioner is M. Dunn, Ltd., whose registered office is situated at . . ." They were the petitioners in 1927, and I suppose technically still are, though the bankrupt has been discharged. "I hereby apply for"—and then "registration" is struck out and "re-registration" is written in its place—"re-registration in the register of writs and orders affecting land pursuant to the Land Charges Act, 1925, s. 6. Dated Dec. 13, 1946." That is signed by "the Official Receiver attached to the above-named court" and it is addressed to the Chief Land Registrar. Accordingly, I am doubtful whether the Official Receiver had power to do what he did, and the general question of re-registration of receiving orders appears to merit consideration and elucidation.

If, however, the Official Receiver has power to re-register receiving orders, it is a power which ought to be exercised with great care and a sense of responsibility, at any rate after the bankrupt has been discharged. How was it exercised in the present case 16 years after discharge? Mr. Jackson received Lord Swaythling's solicitors' letter on Dec. 12, 1946, and he immediately started to search available records. He ascertained from a record book that the asset had been disclosed and from the court file that there was no entry in the trustee's accounts to represent any proceeds of sale of the asset. He then sent a requisition to the records keeper for the trustee's file and was informed that it had been destroyed by enemy action. When he found that the file, which should either confirm or remove his suspicion that the asset had been overlooked or treated as worthless, had been destroyed, it never occurred to him to ask the admittedly honest discharged bankrupt for an explanation or to look for other sources of information. In fact, there were at least two other possible sources, the Official Receiver's file which was in store at Ponders End and a certain book which Mr. Jackson thought of after the re-registration had been effected and which did contain some relevant entries. Instead, he went off to the solicitors who have advised the Official Receiver in this case, and on their advice, after only one day's inquiry, re-registered this ancient receiving order on Dec. 13, 1946. A novel step of this serious character could hardly have been more lightly taken. It appears that Mr. Jackson knew (i) that the reversionary interest had been disclosed by the applicant in his bankruptcy, (ii) that his informants were by no means disinterested, (iii) that Mr. Salaman's papers had been destroyed by enemy action. He had, it is true, one ground for suspicion, in that Mr. Salaman's account which he had found showed nothing which could represent the price of the reversionary interest. This is still unexplained, but he knew that it had been Mr. Salaman's duty to realise the asset for the benefit of the creditors and that he was an experienced trustee, and he knew that the applicant had obtained registration with an absolute title at the Land Registry, and he knew how to get in touch with him to ask for an explanation. Moreover, there was no special reason for urgency seeing that (as he knew) litigation was pending about the sale of the land. He ought, in my judgment, in such circumstances to have made inquiries of the applicant, and to have completed his own investigations, before attempting to re-register this very old receiving order. The haste with which he acted puzzles me. I acquit him without hesitation of any intention to assist Lord Swaythling's solicitors to the detriment of the applicant, but he should, in my judgment, have been on his guard against such a possibility, and he was not. Moreover, he clearly underrated the serious consequences of the unique step which he was taking. It is only fair to him to recall that he told me that he acted on the advice of solicitors. As he stated in evidence that the registration of the receiving order no longer served any useful purpose, I can have no hesitation in ordering it to be vacated. Its presence on the register to-day and the inhibitions at the Land Registry which automatically flow from it cannot but damage the credit of the applicant and violate the spirit of the bankruptcy law. The applicant was discharged some 16 years ago, and the Official Receiver has expressly disclaimed any suggestion that he concealed any assets in his bankruptcy.

The only question of any difficulty is whether I ought to order the Official Receiver to pay the applicant's costs. The Official Receiver, through one of the officers of his department and on legal advice, having or assuming a power which ought always to be exercised with particular care, exercised it without sufficient care, without adequate inquiry, and with undue haste. Moreover, when it became apparent to him or his officer or advisers that the maintenance of the registration was unnecessary for any purpose of his, but was embarrassing the applicant, he gave him no assistance to secure its removal, but, on the contrary, at the outset opposed this motion. On these grounds I must order him to pay the applicant's costs.

Order accordingly.

DAILEY v. DAILEY (otherwise SMITH).

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, J.), Mar. 26, Apr. 2, 1947.]

Divorce—Nullity—Maintenance—Conduct of parties—Matters to be taken into consideration—Refusal of intercourse by wife without contraceptives—Assent of husband—Ignorance of parties of legal position—Age of wife at time of decree—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 190 (1).

The parties went through a ceremony of marriage on Dec. 22, 1926, and on Aug. 16, 1946, the husband's decree nisi of nullity on the grounds of the wife's refusal to consummate the marriage was made absolute. The husband, whose petition was based on the wife's refusal to permit sexual intercourse without the use of contraceptives, had reluctantly agreed to this course for the first 2 years, but afterwards had always desired full intercourse, but the wife persistently refused, and intercourse with the use of contraceptives continued.

The husband had an income of about £1,500 a year, mainly derived from his business, and the wife was able to earn £260 a year as a shorthand typist. In his report on an application by the wife for maintenance, the registrar submitted that the husband should secure to her, for her life dum sola, the nominal sum of £52, less tax, and, in addition, should pay her during joint lives dum sola or till further order, maintenance at the rate of £75 a year, less tax. On a motion to affirm the registrar's order for maintenance:—

HELD: in considering the conduct of the parties, as directed by s. 190 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, it was necessary to have regard to the whole history of the case including the facts that for 19 years the husband had assented to the conditions made by the wife and had taken advantage of such limited intercourse as she would permit; that, the wife, at the age of 43, having devoted 19 years of her life to her husband, found herself, after all, still a single woman, having lost, or, at any rate, gravely impaired, such opportunities as she might otherwise have had of contracting another marriage or of following a career; that, until the decision in Cowen v. Cowen (4) ([1945] 2 All E.R. 197), the conduct of the wife was not known to either party to be a ground for relief, and this was relevant both to the degree of "guilt" on the part of the wife, which it was material to consider, and to the true appreciation of the husband's conduct for so many years. Both parties were unfortunate victims of their ignorance as to their true rights and obligations, and it would be unjust to treat the case as a simple one of a "guilty" wife who by her conduct had forfeited any right to ask for more than a compassionate allowance to save her from utter destitution. The husband should make some substantial provision for her, and the registrar's report would be confirmed.

MOTION by the wife to confirm a registrar's report as to maintenance. The facts appear in the judgment.

R. Law (R. J. A. Temple with him) for the wife.

Laskey for the husband.

Cur. adv. vult.

Apr. 2. WILLMER, J., read the following judgment. In this case the material facts are as follows. The parties went through a ceremony of marriage on Dec. 22, 1926. On Oct. 9, 1945, the husband filed a petition for nullity on the ground of the wife's refusal to consummate the marriage. On Feb. 20, 1946, a decree nisi of nullity was pronounced by BARNARD, J., and this was made absolute on Aug. 16, 1946. The husband's petition, which was undefended, was based on the wife's refusal to permit sexual intercourse without the use of contraceptives. His case was that for the first 2 years he agreed, albeit reluctantly, to the use of contraceptives, but after that time he always desired, and his wife persistently refused, full intercourse. I understand, however, that sexual intercourse with the use of contraceptives continued—the husband unwillingly accepting this as the best that he could get. On Aug. 19, 1946, the wife obtained leave to enter an appearance limited to ancillary relief, and in consequence the present application has come before the court. The matter came before a registrar in the first instance, and he has made a report by which he submits that the husband should secure to the wife, for her life dum sola, the nominal sum of £52, less tax, to be secured as agreed between the parties, or (in default) as decided by a registrar, and that, in addition, the husband should pay during joint lives dum sola, or till further order, maintenance at the rate of £75 per annum, less tax. The registrar finds that the husband, who is a glucose and general produce merchant, has an income of about £1,500 a year, mainly derived from his business. He finds that the wife, who has experience as a shorthand typist, is earning and able to earn £260 a year. The wife is now 43 years of age, and the husband 46. The wife, although contending that the registrar's report errs on the side of leniency to the husband, invites me to confirm the report. The husband, however, alleges that the registrar's report proceeds on an entirely wrong basis, and contends that, in view of the circumstances of the parties, as they exist at present, the wife should receive no more than a nominal sum, and that, in any event, this is not a case for secured maintenance.

A The application is, of course, made under s. 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and it is conceded on behalf of the husband that the court has jurisdiction to make the order proposed by the registrar, including an order for secured maintenance, even in favour of a "guilty" wife. It is contended, however, that to make such an order in favour of the wife in the present case would be a wholly novel departure from the previous practice of the court and irreconcilable with the principles previously applied. B The argument for the husband may be summarised as follows. The wife in this case is a "guilty" wife, in the sense that it was due to her fault that the marriage was never consummated. It is not material to enquire as to the degree of her fault. It is enough that she is a guilty wife, and she can be in no better position than a wife who has committed adultery or has been guilty of any other matrimonial offence. C A "guilty" wife is not entitled as of right to come to the court and ask for maintenance. All she can expect is a compassionate allowance, and such an allowance ought to be no more than will be sufficient to save her from absolute destitution. In the present case there is no question of the wife being destitute since she is a trained shorthand typist, is at present in lucrative employment, and is still of an age when she can look forward to earning her own living for many years to come. In the circumstances the most that should be awarded to the wife is a nominal amount, sufficient to preserve her right to come back to the court hereafter and ask for an increase in the event of her ceasing to be able to earn her own living. D Reliance was placed on Ashcroft v. Ashcroft (1) in which an order for secured maintenance was, indeed, made in favour of a wife proved guilty of adultery, but only on proof that she was unable to earn her own living and was without means of subsistence.

E I was referred in the course of the argument to a number of other cases, but I confess that I have not been able to derive much assistance from them. I should, perhaps, mention two cases in which orders of one sort or another were made in favour of the wife in nullity suits. In Gullan v. Gullan (2) where the husband's income was about £1,050 a year, and the wife's about £40, an order was made for maintenance at the rate of £100 a year of which £50 a year was to be secured for the life of the wife. In this case both parties had alleged incapacity on the part of the other, and a decree was made against both. F In Edwards v. Edwards (3), after a decree of nullity on the ground of the incapacity of the wife due to invincible repugnance, the court made an order for payment of 10s. per week to be limited dum sola and to be reviewed in not more than two years' time. In this case, however, the court was dealing with parties of very limited means. The husband's income was only some £300 a year. The wife had no means, but she was only 31 years of age and was living with her mother. G The facts of these two cases were widely different from those of the present case, and, save that they show that the court has power in nullity cases to make an order of the type asked for, I can extract from them no statement of principle which will guide me in the decision of the present case.

The fact is that the present case is one of a type which has only recently—since the decision of the Court of Appeal in Cowen v. Cowen (4)—come into prominence, and it is not to be expected, therefore, that much guidance can be obtained from past decisions in other types of cases. My duty is to apply the provisions of the Act of 1925 to the new situation which has arisen in regard to cases of this type, and, more particularly, to the special facts of this particular case. The material words of s. 190 of the Act of 1925 are as follows :—

H (1) The court may, if it thinks fit . . . order that the husband shall, to the satisfaction of the court, secure to the wife such gross sum of money or annual sum of money for any term, not exceeding her life, as having regard to her fortune, if any, to the ability of her husband and to the conduct of the parties, the court may deem to be reasonable . . .

Sub-section (2) provides that, in addition to or instead of an order for secured maintenance, the court may, if it thinks fit ... direct the husband to pay to the wife during the joint lives of the husband and wife such monthly or weekly sum for her maintenance and support as the court may think reasonable ...

The court, therefore, has in each case a discretion to do what it thinks reasonable in the circumstances of the particular case, and in exercising that discretion it is enjoined to have regard to these particular circumstances: (1) the fortune of the wife, if any, (2) the ability of the husband, and (3) the conduct of the parties. I proceed, therefore, to examine the facts of this particular case with regard to these three points.

First, the wife has no fortune. She has nothing but her skill as a shorthand typist which enables her in present circumstances to earn £5 a week. She is, however, 43 years old, and her capacity to earn will not go on for ever. When, through age, sickness or infirmity, she ceases to be able to earn her own living, she will have nothing, and, unless an order is made, there will be no provision for her old age. She may or may not re-marry, but, in considering the probability or otherwise of this, her age must be taken into account. Secondly, the husband is earning a substantial income, and, having regard to his age, there is no reason why he should not continue to do so for many years to come. Such capital as he possesses, however, appears to be almost wholly invested in his business, and it must be remembered that any withdrawal of capital from the business to provide secured maintenance for the wife will adversely affect his capacity to maintain his income. Subject to this, however, the husband is clearly in a financial position to make substantial provision for the maintenance of the wife, if required. Thirdly, as to the conduct of the parties, it is, in my judgment, necessary to look at the whole history of the case. For the first 2 years after the ceremony the use of contraceptives was by consent, and the husband clearly had no ground for complaint against the wife's conduct. For the next 9 years of the marriage the wife's conduct was not such as to afford the husband any legal grounds for claiming relief. On the authority of Synge v. Synge (5) he could, if so minded, have left her without being deemed to have been guilty of desertion, but so far as I understand the facts he did not do so. He continued to live with her and to enjoy such intercourse as she would permit on her terms. On Jan. 1, 1938, the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, came into force, and for the first time the husband obtained a legal right to claim relief. Both parties, however, in common with the rest of the world, remained in ignorance of the true effect of s. 7 (1) (a) of the Act of 1937 until after the decision in Cowen v. Cowen (4) in the summer of 1945. Consequently, it was not until October of that year that the husband took any steps to seek relief. For 19 years, therefore, the husband assented to the continuance of the marriage, taking advantage of such limited intercourse as his wife would permit. In the result, the wife, at the age of 43, having devoted 19 years of her life to the husband, finds herself, after all, still a single woman, having lost, or, at any rate, having gravely impaired, such opportunities as she might otherwise have had of contracting another marriage or of following a career. It is true that this result has been brought about by her own conduct, but I think it must be stressed that it was conduct which neither party recognised as conduct affording the husband grounds for relief until late in 1945. When, therefore, I am invited to take into consideration the conduct of the parties, I must say that I see a considerable distinction between the conduct of this wife and that of a wife who commits adultery or any of the well recognised matrimonial offences. I reject the argument that, in considering the conduct of a so-called "guilty" wife, it is not material to consider degrees of guilt. It seems to me vital to pay due regard to the fact that the conduct of the wife was not recognised by either party as affording grounds for relief until late in 1945. This is relevant both to the degree of "guilt" on the part of the wife and to the true appreciation of the husband's conduct in allowing the union to continue for 19 years before seeking relief. Both parties are, to my mind, unfortunate victims of their ignorance as to their true rights and obligations.

In these circumstances it would be, in my judgment, unjust to treat this as a simple case of a "guilty" wife who by her conduct has forfeited any right to ask for more than a compassionate allowance to save her from utter destitution. I think it is a case in which the husband can and should make some substantial provision for the woman whom, for 19 years, he recognised and treated as his wife, and, in particular, I think it is a case in which proper provision should be made for the wife's old age, when she will cease to be able to earn her own living. I have carefully considered the terms of the order proposed by the registrar, and, paying due regard, as I am directed by the statute to do, to the fortune of the wife, the ability of the husband, and the conduct of both parties over the whole history of the case, I am not prepared to dissent from the proposals contained in the report. My order, therefore, will be that the registrar's report is confirmed.

Report confirmed.

ROBINSON AND OTHERS v. MINISTER OF TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING.

C [COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Somervell and Wrottesley, L.JJ.), April 21, 22, 23, 24, May 12, 1947.]

Town and Country Planning—War damage—Re-development of land—Compulsory purchase—Order by Minister—Powers of Minister—Town and Country Planning Act, 1944 (c. 47), s. 1 (1).

D An order, under s. 1 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944, declaring that land in an area of extensive war damage shall be subject to compulsory purchase for dealing with war damage, is made by the Minister of Town and Country Planning as an executive authority, and he is at liberty to base his opinion on whatever he thinks fit, whether obtained in the ordinary course of his executive functions or derived from what is brought out at a public inquiry, if there is one, and the Minister cannot be compelled to disclose the source of his information. The executive act, i.e., the making of the order, is not a judicial or quasi-judicial decision, and cannot be controlled by the courts by reference to the evidence or lack of evidence at the inquiry, if one is held. The words "requisite" and "satisfactorily" in the sub-section clearly indicate that the question whether the Minister is satisfied that it is requisite for the purpose of dealing satisfactorily with extensive war damage that all or some part of the land in question should be laid out afresh and redeveloped as a whole is one of opinion and policy, matters which are peculiarly for the Minister himself to decide, and as to which, assuming always that he acts bona fide, he is the sole judge. No objective test is possible. It is a misconception of the purpose and effect of the order, of the powers of the Minister with regard to the making of the order, and of the relevance of the proposals of the planning authority, to say that the Minister can only be "satisfied" if at the time of the order he has before him evidence sufficient in law to entitle him to be so "satisfied." Different considerations apply in a case where a Minister can be shown to have overstepped the limits of his powers, as, e.g., where the conditions in which they may be exercised are laid down in the statute and he purports to act in a case where those conditions do not exist. Section 1 (1) provides that the Minister must be satisfied that it is requisite that the land should be laid out afresh and redeveloped as a whole, and this need may exist although an existing building is not to be touched or is to be retained with a change of user.

Phoenix Assurance Co., Ltd. v. Minister of Town and Country Planning (2) ([1947] 1 All E.R. 454, not approved).

[EDITORIAL NOTE. In Phoenix Assurance Co., Ltd. v. Minister of Town and Country Planning (2) HENN COLLINS, J., held that the decision of the Minister, when making an order under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944, was open to review by the court on the ground that he could not have been satisfied on reasonable grounds that such an order was requisite for the purposes to which the section refers. In the present case the duty put on the Minister by s. 1 (1) of the Act is stated by the Master of the Rolls to be "one of opinion and policy as to which the Minister, assuming always that he acts bona fide, is the sole judge." In other words, his decision is purely administrative and he can base his opinion on whatever material he thinks fit, whether obtained in the ordinary course of his executive function or derived from the evidence at a public enquiry if there is one. In the court below a distinction was sought to be drawn between such cases as Liversidge v. Anderson (3), where the interpretation of the Defence Regulations was in question, and that of the Housing Acts, the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944, and the New Towns Act, 1946. HENN COLLINS, J., distinguished the two classes of cases on the basis that the Defence Regulations were temporary measures designed to meet the national emergency, while the statutes mentioned were part of the ordinary law, but SOMERVELL, L.J., points out in the present case that Parliament can confer the same unlimited discretion on a Minister for purposes other than war purposes. LORD GREENE, M.R., finds no assistance in the authorities stated. All the members of the court base their decision on the particular wording of s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1944. The Court of Appeal gave the applicants leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

APPEAL by the Minister of Town and Country Planning from an order of HENN COLLINS, J., dated Feb. 20, 1947. The learned judge applied, in favour of the present respondents, Robinson and others, the principles laid down by himself in Phoenix Assurance Co., Ltd. v. Minister of Town and Country Planning (2), viz., that the Minister, before making an order under s. 1 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944, must be satisfied on reasonable grounds that such an order was requisite for the purposes to which the section refers, the matter not being so peculiarly within the administrative capacity of the Minister that the making of the order was purely a matter for his discretion with the result that a court of law could not inquire into the grounds on which he satisfied himself or call his jurisdiction into question. The Minister appealed.

The Attorney-General (Sir Hartley Shawcross, K.C.) and H. L. Parker for the Minister.

J. Scott Henderson, K.C., and J. T. Molony for the applicants (the present respondents).

Cur. adv. vult.

May 12. The following judgments were read.

LORD GREENE, M.R.: This is an appeal by the Minister of Town and Country Planning from an order of HENN COLLINS, J., by which he ordered that the City of Plymouth (City Centre) Declaratory Order, 1946, being an order of the Minister made on the application of the city council of Plymouth as the local planning authority under sub-s. (1) of s. 1 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944 (which I will call "the Act") should be quashed in so far as it affected the freehold properties of the applicants situated in The Crescent in the City of Plymouth.

A Before the aerial bombardments of the city which took place during the late war, The Crescent consisted of a row of eighteen houses, numbered consecutively from east to west, which were approached by a private road running from Athenaeum Street to George Street. Beyond this private road there lay a private garden which was held by trustees for the benefit of the owners of the houses in The Crescent. The houses were, from the point of view of construction, residential in character although at all relevant times they were to a large extent used for professional purposes, mostly by members of the medical profession, or as flats and private hotels as well as for private residential purposes. Of these eighteen houses, six, viz., Nos. 13 to 18 inclusive, were destroyed and one, No. 12, was badly damaged by enemy action. The nine houses or sites of houses owned by the several applicants are numbered 4, 8 to 12 inclusive and 14 to 16 inclusive. The applicants, therefore, between them own five undamaged houses, one damaged house and B the sites of three destroyed houses. The effect of the order of the Minister, of which the applicants complain, is to make all these nine houses or sites of houses, as part of a very large area in the centre of the city, subject to compulsory purchase.

C The provisions of the Act which are relevant to this appeal are of a very special character designed, as they were, to meet an unprecedented situation. At the time when the Act was passed many cities and towns in this country had suffered extensive damage over considerable areas from enemy action. It was obviously impossible, or, at any rate, most undesirable, to leave the rebuilding of these areas to the owners of the properties concerned, since the result of doing so would have been to destroy any possibility of proper and orderly replanning. The existing town planning legislation was clearly inadequate to cope with this state of affairs. The legislature evidently D thought (for the Act so provides) that the task of reconstruction on such an extensive scale should be committed to suitable local planning authorities and that they should be armed with compulsory powers of purchase as being the only satisfactory method of dealing with the situation. There was another circumstance which the legislature obviously had to bear in mind. When the Act was passed the war was not over. The task of formulating and settling a comprehensive scheme for the lay-out of considerable areas might be expected E to take a long time and a long time would be bound to elapse before work could be put in hand. Something clearly had to be done in the meantime in order to ensure that, when the time came to put a scheme into operation, the planning authority should not find that owners of property in the area had taken steps in relation to their property which might make it difficult or impossible to carry out. The situation demanded something in the shape F of what may, perhaps, be called a standstill order which could be made comparatively quickly and would effectively preserve, so to speak, the status quo. The particular machinery provided for this purpose by the Act is the power given to the Minister under s. 1 (1) to make an order declaring an area to be subject to compulsory purchase. Such an order must, under s. 17, be registered as a local land charge, and the effect of it is, of course, that no owner can deal with his land in the area save subject to the rights of compulsory G purchase conferred on the local planning authority. This is the position in which the applicants were placed by the order of which they complain and their object in these proceedings is to remove from their property the threat of compulsory acquisition by the city council of Plymouth.

The Act provides for a variety of other matters with which it is unnecessary to deal. The provision most immediately relevant to the present controversy is contained in s. 1 (1) and is as follows :

H Where the Minister of Town and Country Planning (in this Act referred to as "the Minister") is satisfied that it is requisite, for the purpose of dealing satisfactorily with extensive war damage in the area of a local planning authority, that a part or parts of their area, consisting of land shown to his satisfaction to have sustained war damage or of such land together with other land contiguous or adjacent thereto, should be laid out afresh and redeveloped as a whole, an order declaring all or any of the land in such a part of their area to be land subject to compulsory purchase for dealing with war damage may be made by the Minister if an application in that behalf is made to him by the authority before the expiration of five years from such date as the Minister may by order appoint as being the date when the making of such applications has become practicable. A part of the area of a local planning authority as to which the Minister is satisfied as aforesaid is in this Act referred to as an "area of extensive war damage."

The procedural provisions in connection with the obtaining of an order under the sub-section may, so far as relevant, be summarised as follows: (a) Under sub-s. (4) at least two months before the application is made the authority must publish a notice in a local newspaper; (b) under sub-s. (5) the application must "designate" the land to which the application relates by reference to a map with or without descriptive matter; (c) under sub-s. (6) the application must be accompanied by a statement illustrated by a map, "for indicating the manner in which it is intended that the land in the area of extensive war damage should be laid out as respects its internal arrangement and in relation to the existing or intended lay-out of the surrounding locality, and the manner in which it is intended that such land should be used whether for purposes requiring the carrying out of development or otherwise"; (d) under sub-s. (7) if the Minister is satisfied that these particulars are adequate for enabling the "expediency of the making of an order" to be properly considered, he notifies the authority who must then advertise for objections; (e) under sched. I unless the Minister, apart from an objection (which must be accompanied by a written statement of its grounds), decides to refuse the application or to make an agreed modification to meet the objection, he must "consider the grounds of the objection as set out in the statement" and may call for a further statement. Under para. 4 of the schedule the Minister, "if satisfied that he is sufficiently informed, for the purpose of his deciding as aforesaid (sc. whether or not to make the order applied for), as to the matters to which the objection relates" he may decide to make the order without further investigation. Subject to this, the Minister (para. 5) must give the objector an opportunity of appearing before a person nominated by the Minister and, if the objector avails himself of this, a similar opportunity to the authority. Under para. 6, if it appears to the Minister that the matters to which the objection relates call for investigation by a public inquiry, he must cause such an inquiry to be held, in which case the requirements of para. 5 as to a private hearing need not be complied with; (f) under s. 1 (8), subject to the provisions of sched. I, the Minister may make the order with or without modification, except that he cannot extend the area unless all persons interested consent.

These requirements as to procedure were duly carried out in the following manner. The application was dated Feb. 8, 1946. There was annexed to it a map called a "designation" map (i.e. the map required by sub-s. (5) of s. 1 of the Act to "designate the land to which the application relates") on which the area comprised in the application, namely, 178 acres in the centre of the city, was shown edged and coloured red. For reasons which will be explained when I come to consider the language of sub-s. (1) this map was the only map which was referred to in the order now under challenge. Pursuant to sub-s. (6) the application was accompanied by a statement illustrated by four maps of which two only are before us—one of which shows, among other things, the then existing condition of the area as regards destruction or damage, and the other various purposes for which the buildings, etc., within the area were used before the damage occurred—and a lay-out plan. The statement and the lay-out plan show comprehensive proposals for laying out the area in a novel manner as the shopping, business and civic area of the city with various new streets and open spaces. The plan purports to show standing undamaged buildings by unbroken hatching, damaged buildings by broken hatching, and destroyed buildings by unhatched spaces. The plan shows a substantial number of existing buildings on which no work was proposed, including the houses Nos. 2-12 (inclusive), The Crescent. It also shows a proposed new road of a width (including foot-paths) of between 50 and 60ft. running roughly along the line of the existing private road and taking in part of the private garden and also part of the site of No. 1, The Crescent. Between the houses and the proposed foot-path a crescent-shaped space varying in depth from nil at the two ends to some 20ft. in the middle is shown. I should mention that the houses and sites of destroyed houses in The Crescent with their curtilages and what appear to be garages are situate at the extreme south-west corner of the area.

The applicants and other owners of land within the area sent in their objections, and the Minister caused a public local inquiry to be held by Mr. Warren, an inspector of the Ministry, whose report was duly made to the Minister. In his affidavit, the Minister states that, before deciding to make the order, he personally considered the objections and the report with a transcript of the shorthand notes of the proceedings at the inquiry. One paragraph of his affidavit is as follows :

- A Before deciding to make the said order I personally carefully considered the objections of the applicants and the said report of the said Henry George Warren and the said transcript. I was satisfied that the premises known as Nos. 4, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 14, 15 and 16, The Crescent, Plymouth, had sustained war damage or were contiguous or adjacent to land which had suffered war damage and that it was requisite for the purpose of dealing satisfactorily with extensive war damage that the land included in the order should be laid out afresh and redeveloped as a whole.
- B The order, which is dated Nov. 6, 1946, recites that the Minister was satisfied that an order should be made in respect of the land shown edged and coloured red on the " designation map " and ordered that the said land should be subject to compulsory purchase by the city council for the purposes of s. 1 of the Act.
- C I need not set out the objections originally raised by the applicants since it will be sufficient to state their argument before this court. Their application to quash the order so far as it affected these houses and sites was made under s. 16 of the Act on the ground that the order was not within the powers of the Act and was invalid accordingly. Before I state the grounds on which the applicants attack the validity of the order, I must refer to certain statements in the evidence given at the public inquiry on which their whole case really rests. Mr. James Paton Watson, the city engineer, who was called on behalf of the city council, explained, in his evidence-in-chief, the defects of the pre-war
- D lay-out of the city and the general principles on which the proposed lay-out shown in the lay-out plan had been designed. The statement submitted with the application indicated, he said, the use to which the area would be put. In cross-examination by counsel for the applicants, he made the statements with regard to the council's proposals in relation to The Crescent on which the applicants rely. They are set out in the affidavits of James Foulds Knappe and Alec Edward Sanders sworn on the motion and may be concisely summarised as follows :—The council liked the facades of the surviving buildings and proposed to leave them intact, and with regard to the destroyed buildings the intention was to reinstate as far as possible, but, with regard to interiors, it might be that The Crescent would be reconstructed behind the existing facade since the houses would not remain as dwelling-houses, but would be likely to develop into professional offices, hotels and boarding houses. It was very common
- E practice to take the building depth adjacent to a road frontage. The land was being laid out afresh by bringing the road round the front. The proposal was to offer leases to the existing owners at rents based on the price to be paid by the council to acquire their property.
- F I will now explain as best I can the reasons put forward on behalf of the applicants for saying that the order was invalid. Under sub-s. (1) of s. 1 of the Act, it was said, the Minister's power to make an order only arises when he is " satisfied " that for the purpose stated it is " requisite " that the area comprised in the order " should be laid out afresh and redeveloped as a whole."
- G The purpose stated is that of " dealing satisfactorily with extensive war damage," and the area comprised in the order must consist of land as to which the Minister is satisfied that it has sustained war damage, either without or together with land contiguous or adjacent thereto. On this last-mentioned matter no question arises since the right of the Minister to be so satisfied is not challenged, the applicants'
- H land consisting, as it does, of land which has suffered war damage together with land contiguous or adjacent thereto. But with regard to the other requirements specified in the sub-section it is said that the Minister can only be " satisfied " if at the time of the order he has before him evidence sufficient in law to entitle him to be so " satisfied." Here it is said that there was no such evidence before the Minister, but rather the only evidence brought to his mind so far as the court is informed, sc. the evidence given at the inquiry, is all the other way since, with regard to the surviving houses, they are to remain, while with regard to the destroyed houses, they are to be rebuilt ; that in neither case was the Minister entitled to be satisfied, since, to leave standing houses as they are and to rebuild destroyed houses, does not involve a "layout afresh" or a "redevelopment," even if the intention is to change their user; and that, accordingly, the Minister was not entitled to take the view that The Crescent should be included in the area since he cannot in law have been satisfied that it was requisite to lay it out afresh or redevelop it.

These contentions are, in my opinion, based on certain fundamental misconceptions as to the purpose and effect of an order made under sub-s. (1) of s. 1, as to the powers of the Minister with regard to the making of an order, and as to the relevance of the proposals of the planning authority with regard to fresh layout and redevelopment as revealed in the statement and map which accompany the application or in the evidence given on their behalf at a public inquiry if the Minister decides to order one.

The first thing to notice is that the order of the Minister under sub-s. (1) is in no respect an order approving or confirming any proposals of the local planning authority as to fresh layout or redevelopment. The approval or confirmation of such proposals is not in any sense the issue submitted to him. Whether he approves or disapproves of any such proposals in whole or in part he may still make an order since the only thing of which the sub-section requires him to be satisfied is the requisiteness of laying out afresh and redeveloping as a whole an area of war damaged land (with or without contiguous or adjacent land) for the purpose of dealing satisfactorily with extensive war damage. He may well be satisfied as to this whatever the planning authority may propose as being its actual plans at the time of the application. Under the Act the Minister has effective control of the form which the layout and redevelopment ultimately is to take since at a later stage he can, e.g., refuse to give authority for compulsory purchase (as to which see s. 31) and can withhold money grants under s. 5. But at this stage all he is concerned with is the making of what I have roughly described as a standstill order declaring the land to be subject to compulsory purchase. It is true that by sub-s. (6) of s. 1 the planning authority must indicate the manner in which it intends to lay out the land and the manner in which it is intended that it shall be used, but this indication is not for the purpose of obtaining the approval of those intentions. It can only be for assisting the Minister in coming to the conclusion which sub-s. (1) requires him to come to before making an order, viz., the requisiteness of laying out afresh and redeveloping the land for the purpose of dealing satisfactorily with extensive war damage, or, to quote the language of sub-s. (7) "for enabling the expediency of the making of an order to be properly considered." The fact that a practical proposal is put before him will clearly help him in his deliberations even though it may not be the proposal finally adopted. In the present case the "designation map" referred to in the order illustrates exactly what the order does and what it does not do, since it consists of a map of the relevant portions of the city as it existed before the war with the area subjected to compulsory purchase marked in red, and has no indication whatever of any proposed fresh layout or redevelopment. If the order had purported to sanction any such layout or redevelopment it would clearly have been ultra vires the sub-section.

The extraordinary result to which the argument would lead can be seen from the fact that it was admitted that the intentions of the council as to layout and redevelopment can always be changed. The result of this admittedly would have been that, had they indicated an intention to pull down the surviving houses and build, e.g., municipal offices on the site of The Crescent—an unquestionably fresh layout and redevelopment—they could, the day after obtaining an order, have changed their minds and decided to do what they now are proposing to do, in which case the validity of the order could not have been impugned.

There is another matter worth pointing out. An area may, apparently, be constituted an "area of extensive war damage"—sc. an area as to which the Minister is satisfied that it is requisite that it should be laid out afresh and redeveloped as a whole for the purpose of dealing satisfactorily with extensive war damage—quite independently of the making of the application for an order under sub-s. (1). This appears from, e.g., sub-ss. (2) and (3) of s. 2. Such an area is so constituted by the mere fact of the Minister being, in fact, satisfied as to the matters specified. As in such a case no procedure is laid down in respect to the process of bringing about the state of satisfaction, it is manifest that it may be brought about by, e.g., inquiries made on behalf of and advice given to the Minister from within or without his department. What, according to the argument for the applicants, is to be the position where the Minister has so satisfied himself and an order under sub-s. (1) is subsequently applied for and a public inquiry is directed? Is he to put out of his mind altogether the conclusion that he has already formed and start de novo? That is the answer given by counsel for the applicants, but, in my opinion, it stands self-condemned. Such a requirement would be completely impractical and might result in the position that an area might be an area of "extensive war damage" for the purposes of sub-ss. (2) and (3) of s. 2, but could not become such an area for the purposes of sub-s. (1) of s. 1. I do not mean that it is not competent to the Minister to change his mind as the result of matters ascertained in the course of dealing with the application and objections thereto. Theoretically he could, no doubt, do so, although it is for obvious reasons highly improbable that he would, since it is not to be expected that he would lightly have allowed himself to be satisfied in respect of an area when in his position as Minister he must clearly have been able to procure for himself all relevant material and command all necessary expert advice. The point, however, is not whether theoretically he might change his mind, but whether he would be bound to do so, or rather, whether the court would be bound as a matter of law, as the applicants say, to treat him as not having been satisfied for the purposes of sub-s. (1) unless he was prepared to disclose to the court his reasons for being satisfied, with the consequence that the court would be left to judge whether in those reasons was to be found sufficient evidence to support the order.

I will now turn to the matters with regard to which the Minister must be satisfied before he makes the order. They fall into two classes. First, it must be shown to his satisfaction that a particular state of facts exists, viz., that a part (or parts) of the area of the local planning authority consists of land which has sustained war damage or of such land together with other land contiguous or adjacent thereto. As I have said, no question is raised as to the propriety of the Minister's conclusion on this point, and I need say nothing more about it. The other class of matter is, in my view, one of opinion and policy as to which the Minister, assuming always that he acts bona fide, is the sole judge, viz., he must be satisfied that it is requisite for the purpose of dealing satisfactorily with extensive war damage that all or some part of the land in question should be laid out afresh and redeveloped as a whole. The words "requisite" and "satisfactorily" clearly indicate that the question is one of opinion and policy, matters which are peculiarly for the Minister himself to decide. No objective test is possible. If confirmation of this view is sought, it is to be found, e.g., in the provisions of sched. I under which the Minister, although bound to consider objections, is entitled to make his decision without any private hearing or public inquiry. In making his decision, he may obviously be guided by his own views as to what is "expedient" for the purpose of dealing "satisfactorily" with extensive war damage, assisted, of course, by any advice which he may obtain from his own staff or from outside advisers, but the decision and the principles and policy which lead him to it are such as commend themselves to him. This cannot be affected by the fact that he decides to order a public inquiry. The object of such an inquiry under sched. I can only be to elucidate matters upon which he desires to be better informed. Nothing that is said or done at it can bind his discretion although it may have some bearing on the question of bona fides. In exercising his discretion he cannot be confined to the evidence given at the inquiry. Such matters form only part of the considerations which he is entitled to take into account. He may have and is entitled to have present to his mind his own views as to general policy as well as material acquired in a purely executive capacity, such as reports and opinions obtained from sources within or outside the Ministry.

In the end counsel for the applicants was constrained to admit the right of the Minister to be guided by matters brought to his mind in his executive capacity, even if they are different from and inconsistent with evidence given at the public inquiry, but he put his argument in this way. The matter as to the requisiteness of which for the purpose indicated the Minister is to be satisfied is the necessity of laying out the land afresh and redeveloping it as a whole. On the face of the lay-out plan itself, coupled with the evidence given on behalf of the city council at the inquiry, it appears (so the argument runs) that there is no intention of laying out or redeveloping The Crescent, that, so far as the court is informed, the Minister had no other materials before him, and that on these materials alone it was impossible in law for him to be satisfied as to the stipulated requisiteness. Then it was said that, admitting his right to take into consideration other materials obtained dehors the inquiry, he was only entitled to be guided by them if he had communicated them to the objectors so as to give them an opportunity of dealing with them. If his obligation did not go so far as this, then it was said that when his order was challenged the court was bound to assume that he had no other materials unless he condescended to give evidence to the effect that he did have them and as to what they were. In the result, as no such evidence was given in the present case, the court had no option save to hold the order to be invalid as not having the necessary foundation to give it validity in point of law.

There are, as it appears to me, a variety of grounds on which this argument should be rejected. It imports an objective test into a matter to which such a test is entirely inappropriate, since it leaves it to the court to decide what matters are and what are not sufficient to justify a conclusion as to requisiteness. This is necessarily so, since the question which, according to the argument, the court has to propound to itself will be: Was the evidence before the Minister such as to entitle him to be satisfied on the point of requisiteness?, and this is to substitute a test formulated, in some unexplained manner and according to some unascertainable principle, by the court itself for the opinion of the Minister to which the language of the sub-section commits the decision. Again, the argument is based on the misconception, to which I have already referred, as to the part to be played by the proposed layout which, at the time of the inquiry, is in the mind of the planning authority. Evidence given as to that has, for reasons already explained, which I need not repeat, a purely collateral bearing on the matter as to which the Minister has to decide. Further, the suggestion that in such a case as the present the Minister is bound to fail before the court unless he leads evidence as to the materials which he has before him over and above those used or given in evidence at the inquiry is, in my opinion, quite inadmissible. Let it be granted that the inquiry, if and when ordered, must be conducted on proper principles as being what is loosely called a "quasi-judicial" proceeding—an expression well adapted to mislead unless the context in which it is used is kept closely and accurately in mind—but the fact that an inquiry has been held and certain evidence given at it cannot, in my judgment, be used to force the Minister, directly or indirectly, to reveal matters of fact or opinion which come to his knowledge in his administrative capacity. The quasi-judicial capacity in which he is loosely said to stand in relation to the inquiry is non-existent as regards matters not connected with the inquiry. Such matters concern, and concern only, his administrative capacity and the use that he makes of them in coming to his decision is a matter for him and him alone. I am speaking, of course, of the meaning and effect of this particular statute, but the proposition is in general true that a minister cannot be compelled to disclose to the court material which has come to him in his executive capacity. If this were not so, consequences most detrimental to the public interest would ensue as was pointed out by LORD SHAW in Local Government Board v. Arlidge (1) ([1915] A.C. 137). The argument in the present case is, in effect, that, unless the Minister satisfies the court that he had sufficient material dehors the inquiry to justify his satisfaction, he must inevitably fail, which amounts to saying that he must choose between disclosing at least the general nature of what it might be most detrimental to the public interest to disclose and losing his case.

I have dealt, on this branch of the argument, with what is the point of importance, but it must not be taken from this that I accept the initial proposition that the layout plan coupled with the evidence given at the inquiry did, in truth, negative any present intention on the part of the city council to lay out afresh and redevelop The Crescent. On this matter I need only mention the following considerations. The sub-section deals with the laying out afresh and redevelopment of the area as a whole. These words could not, in my opinion, mean that an existing building which it is not intended to touch would have to be excluded. As the Attorney-General put it in reply, it is not the redevelopment of the whole area but the redevelopment of the area as a whole which is contemplated. An existing building may well be worked into a fresh layout of the area as a whole. Indeed, there are provisions in the Act which contemplate that an undamaged building may be included in an area subjected to an order under sub-s. (1)—see, e.g., the opening words of the proviso to sub-s. (4) which refers to land comprised in an order which “has not sustained war damage.” Again, I cannot accept the proposition submitted by counsel for the applicants that a change of user provided for under a scheme cannot amount to a fresh layout or redevelopment. The concluding words of sub-s. (6) of s. 1 appear to shew that it can. Again, the evidence given on behalf of the council at the inquiry appears to shew the proposal to be to keep only the facade of The Crescent. Lastly, I must not be taken to agree to the proposition that the reconstruction of a destroyed building in its original form cannot form part of a fresh layout and redevelopment as a whole of an area of extensive war damage. I will not take up time in a more detailed discussion of these matters.

A number of authorities were referred to in which the powers and duties of Ministers under statutes dealing in different language with different classes of subject-matter were discussed and observations were made as to their powers and duties when acting in a quasi-judicial capacity. I am basing this judgment on the particular provisions of this statute in their application to this particular subject-matter, and I do not find anything in the decisions cited which either assists or impedes me to such an extent as to make it necessary for me to examine them. As an example of the difference to be found in the subject-matter dealt with in different statutes, I may point out that this case is different from a case where a Minister is given the duty of hearing an appeal from an order such as a closing order made by a local authority. This is not the case of an appeal. It is the case of an original order to be made by the Minister as an executive authority who is at liberty to base his opinion on whatever material he thinks fit, whether obtained in the ordinary course of his executive functions or derived from what is brought out at a public inquiry if there is one. To say that, in coming to his decision, he is in any sense acting in a quasi-judicial capacity is to misunderstand the nature of the process altogether. I am not concerned to dispute that the inquiry itself must be conducted on what may be described as quasi-judicial principles, but this is quite a different thing from saying that any such principles are applicable to the doing of the executive act itself, i.e., the making of the order. The inquiry is only a step in the process which leads to that result, and there is, in my opinion, no justification for saying that the executive decision to make the order can be controlled by the courts by reference to the evidence or lack of evidence at the inquiry which is here relied on. Such a theory treats the executive act as though it were a judicial decision (or, if the phrase is preferred, a quasi-judicial decision) which it most emphatically is not. How can this Minister, who is entrusted by Parliament with the power to make or not to make an executive order according to his judgment and acts bona fide (as he must be assumed to do in the absence of evidence to the contrary), be called on to justify his decision by proving that he had before him materials sufficient to support it? Such justification, if it is to be called for, must be called for by Parliament and not by the courts, and I can see no ground in the language of the Act, in principle or in authority, for thinking otherwise. As I have already indicated earlier in this judgment, the argument on behalf of the applicants necessarily involves in the last resort substituting the opinion of the court for that of the Minister. Different considerations, of course, apply in a case where a Minister can be shown to have overstepped the limits of his statutory powers, as, e.g., where the conditions in which they may be exercised are laid down in the statute and he purports to act in a case where those conditions do not exist. The applicants’ attempt to bring the present case into that category fails, as I have said, on the true construction of the statutory powers conferred.

HENN COLLINS, J., delivered a very short judgment, since, in his opinion, the principle which he had considered to be applicable in the case of another objector, the Phoenix Assurance Co., Ltd., (see Phoenix Assurance Co., Ltd. v.

Minister of Town and Country Planning (2)), also applied to the present case. My reasons for differing from the view taken by the learned judge will, as I think, be sufficiently clear from what I have already said and I hope that I shall not appear disrespectful if I do not subject it to any further examination. The appeal is allowed with costs here and below.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : On Feb. 8, 1946, the council of the city of Plymouth, being the local planning authority (hereinafter referred to as the authority), applied to the Minister of Town and Country Planning for a declaratory order under s. 1 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944, in respect of an area in the centre of the city which had suffered extensive war damage. The application was, in accordance with s. 1 (6), accompanied by a map "indicating the manner in which it is intended that the land in the area" should be laid out. It has also to be accompanied by a map under s. 1 (5) "designating" the area to be covered by reference to a map.

The Minister, under s. 1 (1), can, on application by a local planning authority, make an order covering an area shown to his satisfaction to consist of land which has sustained war damage together with other land contiguous or adjacent thereto, if he is satisfied that it is requisite for the purpose of dealing with extensive war damage in the area that it should be laid out afresh and redeveloped as a whole. The effect of the order is to declare all or any of the land in the area to be land subject to compulsory purchase. If the Minister is satisfied that the particulars submitted are adequate for enabling the expediency of the making of the order to be properly considered there are provisions under s. 1 (7) for publication and notices. Objections can then be submitted and sched. I provides for various procedures which the Minister can adopt when objections are made. It is not necessary to refer to all of them. Under para. 4 of the schedule, if he is satisfied that he already has sufficient information as to the matter to which the objection relates for the purpose of deciding whether to make the order with or without modifications, he can so decide without further investigation. Under para. 5 he can afford the objector an opportunity of being heard by a person appointed by him, the authority making the application being given the opportunity of being heard on the same occasion. Under para. 6, if it appears to the Minister that the matters to which the objection relates are such as to require investigation by public local inquiry "he shall cause such an inquiry to be held." These provisions are on the basis that the Minister may have information, irrespective of any inquiry, which he may regard as sufficient for dealing with the objection. It is only if, in his opinion, that information is or may be insufficient that he causes a public inquiry to be held. It is a means by which he can, if he thinks fit, obtain further information before coming to his decision.

In the present case there was a number of objectors including the applicants in the present proceedings. The Minister decided to have a public local inquiry which was held at the end of April and beginning of May, 1946. On May 27 Mr. Warren, who held the inquiry, reported to the Minister. On Nov. 6, 1946, the Minister made the order covering the area as originally submitted by the authority. On Dec. 5, 1946, the present applicants applied to the High Court for an order "that the declaratory order be quashed so far as it affects the freehold property of the applicants." The applicants are the owners of nine houses in a block known as The Crescent. Three of their properties were destroyed by war damage, one other was damaged, the other five were undamaged. The notice states that the order is not within the provisions of the Act and that the requirements of the Act have not been complied with in that there was no evidence before the Minister on which he could have been satisfied, (c) that any of the applicants' said properties were within an area of extensive war damage within the meaning of the Act, (d) that it was requisite, for the purpose of dealing satisfactorily with war damage in the area embraced by the said declaratory order, or any part thereof, or, alternatively, in the city of Plymouth, that any of the applicants' said properties should be laid out afresh and redeveloped, and (e) that it was requisite for the purpose mentioned in (d) that any of the applicants' said properties should be laid out afresh and redeveloped in conjunction with adjoining lands. Counsel for the applicants did not rely on (a) and (b). The other paragraphs of the notice allege affirmatively that the evidence established that the purpose of the authority was not to lay out the applicants' property afresh but to obtain the benefit of increased land values; that the applicants' property could be excluded without detriment to the laying out afresh and redevelopment; and that the only decision in law open to the Minister was to exclude the applicants' property.

A The relevant facts as to The Crescent are as follows. At present it abuts on a private road on the further side of which is a garden vested in trustees for the use of the owners of the houses in The Crescent. The various premises were, before the war, used partly as consulting rooms for doctors, partly for residential purposes, one wholly as offices and one as a private hotel. Under the authority's intended layout the private road and garden disappear, and The Crescent, which is on the boundary of the area, will abut on a main thoroughfare, on the other side of which will be a public open space. The intention of the authority, as appearing in the map and in the evidence given at the public inquiry, was to reconstruct the demolished houses with the old facade and probably in other respects as before. No. 1 (not owned by any of the applicants) was to be demolished as the proposed new road was to occupy part of the land on which it stood. The undamaged houses were to remain as at present.

B To return to the parts of the notice of motion which I have quoted. The form is one with which the courts are familiar in, e.g., appeals from decisions of the Special or General Commissioners on a Case Stated under the Income Tax Acts or on an appeal to this court from a decision of a county court judge. It would need, to my mind, clear words to entitle an aggrieved person to raise such issues before the court in challenging what is, in my opinion, under the words of the section a purely administrative decision by the Minister. The words relied on are the words in s. 16 which provide that the validity can be challenged on the ground that it is not within the powers of the Act. I think the Act gives the Minister the power to come to his decision as an administrative decision, which, no doubt, he can be called on to justify in Parliament, but which he cannot be called on to justify in a court of law on the ground that there was either insufficient or no evidence on which a reasonable man in the position of the Minister could so decide.

E Before considering the authorities I will refer to other provisions of the Act which seem to me to support this view. The applicants in submitting that there was no evidence, base their case on the documents and map submitted by the authority and the evidence given at the public inquiry. The Minister is not, as it seems to me, confined to this evidence. I have already referred to the provisions of sched. I. It is also clear that the fresh layout as submitted has no finality about it. The authority can alter it, and it in no way binds the Minister who has effective powers of control under s. 2 when an actual compulsory purchase order is asked for and under ss. 19 and 20. The Minister is not confirming an order made by an authority. He has to decide himself under the duties imposed on him by s. 1 of the Minister of Town and Country Planning Act, 1943. It is, as it seems to me, open to the Minister at this stage to take the view that the whole area should be included, although he may not regard the authority's plan for layout as final or necessarily adequate. He might think that The Crescent in this case, adjoining, as it now will, a main thoroughfare, should not be left as it is. It is, therefore, I think, impossible for the applicants to establish that there is no evidence unless the Minister can be compelled to produce his files and the report made to him, and disclose what was in his own mind. This, in my opinion, would be contrary to the provisions of the Act and to authority.

G The Attorney-General referred to and relied on Liversidge v. Anderson (3) and Point of Ayr Collieries, Ltd. v. Lloyd George (4). LORD ATKIN, in his dissenting opinion in Liversidge's case (3) ([1941] 3 All E.R. 353, 354), cites the expressions "is satisfied" or "satisfied . . . that . . . it is necessary or expedient" from defence regulations, other than that being considered, as expressions which made it "plain that unlimited discretion is given to the Secretary of State, assuming as everyone does that he acts in good faith." If reg. 18B which was under consideration had contained these words it is clear that LORD ATKIN would have agreed with the majority, and it is equally clear that the arguments on behalf of the appellant in that case were based on the fact that the regulation did not contain these words or words of similar import, but the words "if the Secretary of State has reasonable cause to believe," words which, as LORD MAUGHAM said (ibid. 345), "in the absence of a context" should prima facie be construed as meaning "if there is, in fact, reasonable cause for believing." He and the other noble and learned Lords took the view that the words were capable of giving the Secretary of State an unlimited discretion and in their context did so. The other case referred to shows that the words "if it appears to the competent authority" give an unlimited discretion although dealing with matters in which the safety of the State was not, at any rate, so directly involved as in the regulation dealt with in Liversidge's case (3).

Counsel for the applicants submitted that the principle laid down in these cases must be restricted to Defence Regulations made under the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, which gave power to make defence regulations for what may be described as war purposes. I do not so construe these authorities. Words in a statute, of course, must be construed in their context. It must, however, be obvious that Parliament can confer the same unlimited discretion on Ministers for purposes other than war purposes. Construing the words in their natural meaning and in the light of the authorities, I think Parliament has done so in this part of this Act.

In Re Bowman (5), SWIFT, J., left open the question whether under the Housing Act, 1930, the Minister's confirmation of a clearance order made by a local authority could be challenged by a person aggrieved on the ground that there was no evidence or material on which the Minister could have been reasonably satisfied. There are, to my mind, important differences between that Act and the present Act, which may result in a different construction on this point. I am not suggesting one way or the other whether they do, but there is nothing in what was said by SWIFT, J., in that case which assists the applicants here. We were also referred to White and Collins v. Minister of Health (6), but in the section being construed in that case there were no words such as "if the Minister is satisfied" or "if it appears to the Minister." The section relied on clearly limited the Minister's jurisdiction to authorise the acquisition of land by excluding certain lands, and it was open to a party to establish before the courts that land of which the Minister had purported to authorise the acquisition was within the excluded category. The case is worth a reference as showing the difference in language when matters are for a decision by the court on evidence and when matters are primarily, at any rate, to be decided by a Minister as a matter of his discretion and policy.

There is a further objection which on the particular facts of this case might logically come first. The argument for the applicants assumes that a unit of ownership cannot be included in the area covered by the order if it is to be left in its present condition, or, if it has been demolished, is to be reconstructed as it was before. I agree with the argument of the Attorney-General that this is to disregard the words "as a whole" in the phrase "should be laid out afresh and redeveloped as a whole." In other words, if the Minister is satisfied that the area as a whole should be laid out afresh, the whole area can be covered by an order although, in the Minister's view at this stage, certain buildings here and there might well be incorporated in the fresh layout in their existing or pre-damage condition. There is obvious convenience in this as the ideas of the Minister or the authority at the time when a s. 1 order is made are not final, and will take a considerable period before they can be acted on and the new layout completed. Circumstances may change and make a different layout desirable and some inconvenience might be caused if isolated units of ownership were omitted and had to be made the subject of further applications under other provisions of the Act. Counsel for the applicants based part of his argument on a submission that the Minister, having ordered a public local inquiry, became in a quasi-judicial position. This does not affect the point which I have already dealt with that the Minister is not confined to the evidence given at that inquiry. Reliance was placed on Errington v. Minister of Health (7). Under the Housing Act in question there the Minister had to hold a public inquiry if objections were not withdrawn. The position was different in this and other respects. The court held that the Minister could not, after the public inquiry had been held, receive ex parte statements from the local authority which were not communicated to the objectors, dealing with the subject-matter of the objection as investigated at the inquiry. I am prepared to assume, without deciding, that that principle would apply to this Act, although there are considerable differences on which an argument that it is inapplicable could be based. There is, however, no evidence or suggestion that the Minister did in this case that which was held to invalidate the order in Errington's case (7). There are other cases, such as Price v. Minister of Health (8), in which documents received by the Minister from the authority some time before the public inquiry did not have to be disclosed to objectors.

A The learned judge delivered his main judgment in Phoenix Assurance Co., Ltd. v. Minister of Town and Country Planning (2), heard before this case. There is no appeal in that case, but the learned judge, in deciding in favour of the applicants in the present case, applied the principles he had laid down in the Phoenix case (2). He held that the words "is satisfied" prima facie mean satisfied on reasonable grounds. No doubt, Parliament always intends that a Minister should act reasonably, but this is a matter on which opinions may differ and the question is whether it is for the Minister or the courts to impose the standard. The learned judge took the view that he was entitled to inquire into the sufficiency of the grounds, and that, taking the evidence to which I have referred as the only evidence before the Minister, there was no evidence that the applicant's property was to be freshly laid out. I have, I think, sufficiently stated my reasons for coming to a different conclusion.

C It would be undesirable and impossible to formulate precisely what evidence and in what circumstances the courts might examine the Minister's decision under this Act or Acts with similar provisions. It has often been said in this class of case that the court will interfere if there is evidence of bad faith in the steps which lead up to the making of an order. LORD DUNEDIN, in dealing with an Act under which the Minister had power to confirm a scheme submitted by a local authority, said that, if one can find that the scheme is inconsistent with the provisions of the Act which authorises the scheme, the scheme will be bad (Minister of Health v. R. (9) ([1931] A.C. 503)). To take, no doubt, an impossible example under the present Act, if an authority submitted an application under s. 1 which shewed on the face of it that the area covered had suffered no or very little war damage and the Minister purported to make an order, it might be said that the application was not in accordance with the provisions of the Act, and, therefore, could not found the Minister's jurisdiction. I have added these observations in case anything I have said might be construed as laying down that in no case can a party succeed in proceedings under s. 16 except where some definite provision of the Act, such as the giving of notices, has not been complied with, or where he takes upon himself the burden of establishing bad faith. For the above reasons I think this appeal should be allowed.

F WROTTESLEY, L.J.: The Minister is entitled to make the order set out in s. 1 (1) in the following circumstances. It can only be made on the application of a local planning authority. It must deal with a part or more than one part of that authority's area. There is no question that both these conditions were fulfilled in this case. There must be shewn that the part under discussion consists of land which has sustained war damage. If other land is included in the part of the area, then it must be shewn that that other land is contiguous or adjacent to the land which has sustained war damage. These conditions also were fulfilled. Finally, the Minister must be satisfied that, for the purpose of dealing satisfactorily with extensive war damage to the authority's area, the part of the area, the subject of the application, should be laid out afresh and redeveloped as a whole. Once the Minister is satisfied as to this, he may make an order declaring the whole of the land in the part of the area subject to compulsory purchase for dealing with war damage, or he may so declare in regard to any part of the land inside the area. In this case he made an order comprising the whole of the area covered by the application.

H It is to be noted that the Minister, before making an order, must be satisfied that the part of the area designated needs to be laid out afresh and developed as a whole, and not that every piece of land inside the area should need this treatment. Even so, speaking for myself, I think that where a crescent of dwelling-houses, with a private road running along the front of it, and a private garden beyond the private road, kept for the use and enjoyment of the householders, is so dealt with that the private road is abolished and a public ring road for industrial traffic substituted for it, the private garden is swept away to make room, partly for the ring road and partly for a public recreation ground, then that very area will have been laid out afresh and redeveloped. And that will be the case even if the existing facade be retained and the demolished houses replaced.

I test the matter in this way. I will suppose that the financial interest of the owners of the houses in The Crescent had lain in the opposite direction that that contended for. Can anyone picture that the town planning authority could claim successfully that The Crescent with its private approach road and its private garden was not laid out afresh, and so redeveloped as a whole, when both private approach road and private garden were swept away and a new thoroughfare at a different level was constructed so as to subtend what is left of the arc of The Crescent after abolishing one of its horns. If I am right in this, the applicants fail in what I may call the raw material of their objection. At the same time, had this not been the case, I agree with the MASTER OF THE ROLLS that the inquiry which the Minister chose to hold was an inquiry, not into the merits or demerits of the town planning authority's plan, but into the objections lodged by the applicants, among others, not to the layout plan, but to the designated area. And the propriety of the Minister's decision to declare this part of the authority's area subject to compulsory purchase is not to be challenged or tested in the courts by reference to what emerged in that inquiry as to the authority's proposed layout or the objects aimed at by the authority in designating the area. The Minister has other sources of information, and is not in any sense tied to that layout. I am far from saying that occasions may not arise where it will be demonstrated to the court that the conditions laid down in the Act under which the Minister may make a declaratory order have not been fulfilled, or even that the Minister has made an order which does not conform with the provisions of the Act. But this is not such an occasion. I agree that the appeal succeeds.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Dictum of LORD GREENE, M.R., at p. 866, applied. SWINDON CORPN. v. PEARCE. [1948] 2 All E.R. 119.

TAYLOR v. BRIGHTON CORPORATION.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Wrottesley, L.J., and Lynskey, J.), May 5, 6, 1947.]

Town and Country Planning—Resolution to prepare scheme—Scheme to include prohibition of use of land for certain purposes without consent of local authority—Validity—Town and Country Planning Act, 1932 (c. 48), ss. 1, 11.

The respondent council passed a resolution to prepare a planning scheme under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932. While the resolution was still in force the appellant proposed to use as a fun fair premises in an area covered by the scheme. The council, as interim development authority, served on the appellant a notice under the Town and Country Planning (Interim Development) Act, 1943, s. 5, that it was their intention to prohibit the use of the premises as a fun fair on the ground, inter alia, that it was intended to provide in the scheme that the use of land for a fun fair should not be commenced without the consent of the council. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that, although the council could provide in a scheme for the absolute prohibition of the use of a site as a fun fair, it was not within their powers to prohibit such use conditionally on their consent being obtained:—

HELD: (i) since the legislative permission given by s. 1 of the Act of 1932 to make a scheme with the general object of controlling development of the land comprised in the area to which the scheme applied was in extremely wide terms and would include the control of user of land by prohibiting a particular user, it would similarly include prohibition of user without consent, because to prohibit use without consent was just as much a manner of controlling development as was an absolute prohibition, and, therefore, on the true construction of the Act, the provision was one that could lawfully be included in the scheme.

(ii) provided a provision which was proposed to be inserted in a scheme was one that could lawfully be inserted therein, the question whether it was necessary or expedient (under s. 11 (1) (a) of the Act of 1932) to insert it was a matter, not for the court, but for the authority who had the ultimate control of the scheme (i.e., the Minister, or, in the last resort, Parliament), and the court could decide only whether the proposal in question could lawfully be inserted in the scheme and not whether it was reasonable.

(iii) the fact that neither the authority who had control of the scheme nor the Minister was bound to insert in the scheme, when it was made, any provision for an appeal against a refusal of permission by the council for use of the land as a fun fair was not sufficient to limit the general language of the Act of 1932.

Decision of the Divisional Court ([1946] 2 All E.R. 492) affirmed.

APPEAL from a judgment of a Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division (LORD GODDARD, C.J., HENN COLLINS and CASSELS, JJ.), dated July 30, 1946, and reported [1946] 2 All E.R. 492, by the appellant on a CASE STATED by Brighton justices on an appeal under the Town and Country Planning (Interim Development) Act, 1943, sched. I, para. 2. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R.

H. A. Hill and D. P. Kerrigan for the appellant.

H. B. Williams for the corporation.

LORD GREENE, M.R.: When the Town and Country Planning (Interim Development) Act, 1943, came into operation, there was in preparation under the necessary resolution a town planning scheme (known as the "Old Borough No. 2 Planning Scheme") for a certain area in Brighton. It was proposed to include in that scheme certain matters provided for in a resolution which the council had passed in Dec., 1944. The resolution was to the effect that the use of land for a fun fair should not be commenced without the consent of the council. The resolution defined what was meant by "fun fair." In 1945 the appellant started a fun fair on certain property, of which he was the lessee, which lay within the area of the proposed scheme, and on Jan. 16, 1946, the council of the county borough, pursuant to the provisions of s. 5 of the Act of 1943, served a notice on the appellant in which they stated that they were satisfied that it was necessary and expedient to do so and that they proposed not less than 28 days from the date of the service of the notice to prohibit the use of the appellant's land for the purpose of a fun fair on certain grounds, of which I need only mention the first, namely:

That it is intended to provide in the last-mentioned scheme [i.e., the old Borough scheme] that the use for a fun fair of land . . . shall not be commenced without the consent of the council.

Under s. 5 (1) of the Act of 1943, the council may, where they are satisfied that it is necessary or expedient so to do:

. . . having regard to the provisions then proposed to be included in the scheme . . . (b) where the development consists of any use of the land or any building thereon, by order prohibit that use . . .

That is what they gave notice they were intending to do. .

One question only arises in this appeal, and it is whether it is competent to the council to include in its scheme a prohibition of this character restricting the use of land within the area as a fun fair without the consent of the council. The question really is whether such a restriction can lawfully be included in a scheme because, if it cannot lawfully be included in a scheme, it cannot fall within the words of s. 5 (1) of the Act of 1943, as being a provision proposed to be included in the scheme. Those words must mean "proposed to be lawfully included in the scheme." Therefore, the question that we have to decide is whether or not this proposal is one which could lawfully be included in the scheme.

The appellant appealed to a court of summary jurisdiction, in accordance with the provisions of sched. I to the Act of 1943. That court decided against his contention and a Case was stated which came before a Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division, consisting of LORD GODDARD, C.J., HENN COLLINS and CASSELS, J.J., who dismissed the appellant's appeal. The question whether or not such a provision can lawfully be included in a planning scheme under the relevant Act, which is the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, depends on the true construction of that Act. It is to be borne in mind that the ultimate sanction to a scheme under that Act falls to be given by the Minister subject to the control by Parliament for which the Act provides, and, provided a scheme comes within the language of the Act, the question whether or not a particular provision should be included in it must depend, under s. 11 (1) (a) of the Act of 1932, on the question whether the appropriate authority considers it to be :

... necessary or expedient for prohibiting or regulating the development of land in the area to which the scheme applies and generally for carrying out any of the objects for which the scheme is made, and in particular for dealing with any of the matters mentioned in sched. II to this Act.

The words "such provisions as are necessary or expedient" must, in my judgment, mean "necessary or expedient in the opinion of the authority who has the ultimate control of the scheme," i.e., the Minister, or, in the last resort, Parliament. The test which is set up by those words "necessary or expedient," in my opinion, is not an objective test in the sense that it is for the court to say whether a provision is necessary or expedient. Provided a provision which is proposed to be inserted in a scheme is one that can lawfully be inserted in that scheme, the question whether it is necessary or expedient to insert it is not a matter for the court. The question, therefore, here is not whether the present proposal is necessary or expedient, but whether it can lawfully be inserted in a scheme at all. It, therefore, becomes necessary to consider what are the limits laid down by Parliament on the extent and scope of a planning scheme under the Act of 1932. The Act starts off with a most comprehensive power. It is as follows. The rubric, which includes only s. 1, is "Scope of Planning Schemes," and s. 1 is as follows :

A scheme may be made under this Act with respect to any land, whether there are or are not buildings thereon, with the general object of controlling the development of the land comprised in the area to which the scheme applies, of securing proper sanitary conditions, amenity and convenience, and of preserving existing buildings or other objects of architectural, historic or artistic interest and places of natural interest or beauty, and generally of protecting existing amenities whether in urban or rural portions of the area.

As was pointed out by LORD GODDARD, C.J., in the Divisional Court, those words are extremely wide. It is a legislative permission to make a scheme with the general object of controlling the development of the land comprised in the area to which the scheme applies. The word "development" is defined by s. 53 of the Act of 1932 as including :

... any building operations or rebuilding operations, and any use of the land or any building thereon for a purpose which is different from the purpose for which the land or building was last being used.

This particular land and building was being used as a garage before it was converted into a fun fair. If the enabling provisions of the Act had finished there, I cannot entertain any doubt that the restriction proposed to be imposed in this case would have fallen within the words "general object of controlling the development of the land." It seems to me that one can control user of land, just as much as by prohibiting a particular user, by saying : "It shall only be used in a certain way in certain conditions," or : "It shall not be used for a particular purpose without the consent of the authority." It seems to me it is a pure matter of English. To prohibit use without consent is a manner of controlling development, just as much as an absolute prohibition.

The next section to which I need refer is s. 10 of the Act of 1932, and I refer to this more or less in parenthesis. Under s. 10 the appellant could, if he had liked to do so, have applied, under what is known as the "interim development order" made by the Minister, for the necessary permission to use his property as a fun fair, and, if permission had been refused by the local authority, he could have appealed to the Minister under s. 10 (5) of the Act of 1932. That he did not do, and his not having done that brought the powers of s. 5 of the Act of 1943 into operation. I need not say anything more about that. Sections 11 and 12 of the Act of 1932 come under the rubric: "Contents and Effect of Schemes." Section 11 (1) lays down certain obligatory provisions which must be obtained in a scheme. It is as follows:

Every scheme shall define the area to which it applies, and specify, in accordance with the provisions of the next succeeding sub-section, the authority or authorities who are to be responsible for enforcing and carrying into effect the provisions of the scheme, and—(a) shall contain such provisions as are necessary or expedient for prohibiting or regulating the development of land . . .

Sub-section (1) (b) provides for certain matters which are not relevant to this appeal. It is, therefore, compulsory for the scheme to contain such provisions as are necessary or expedient for prohibiting or regulating the development of land. Then s. 11 (2) empowers the scheme to provide who shall be the responsible authority, as it is called, for the purposes of the scheme. Section 11 (3) I need not read. In s. 12 (1) come certain provisions which may be inserted in a scheme. It will be observed that they are permissive and not obligatory, and they are, as it seems to me, already covered by the general language of ss. 1 and 11 (1) (a), but the legislature has thought it desirable, as so frequently happens in legislation, to specify expressly certain specific matters to which it desires to call attention. It is as though the section had started with the words: "Without prejudice to the generality of the provisions of ss. 1 and 11 (1), a scheme may provide for the following matters." The provisions contained in s. 12 (1) are "(a) prescribing the space about buildings; (b) limiting the number of buildings"; and then "(d) imposing restrictions upon the manner in which buildings may be used . . ." all of which are obviously covered already by the general words—" (e) prohibiting building operations, or regulating such operations in respect of matters other than those specified in this subsection."

If that had been all that s. 12 (1) provided for, the principal argument for the appellant would have been denied him. Confronted with the difficulty that the general words are, in their ordinary meaning, sufficient to make legitimate the present proposal, he seeks in the Act for a context which will be sufficient to cut them down, and that context he finds principally in s. 12 (1) (c), which says that the scheme may include provisions:

. . . regulating, or enabling the responsible authority to regulate, the size, height, design and external appearance of buildings.

It is pointed out that the legislature there appears to be drawing a distinction between "regulating" and "enabling the responsible authority to regulate," and from that it is said that, except in cases where the Act specifically allows a provision to be inserted in a scheme enabling the responsible authority to regulate, as distinct from regulating, the scheme must lay down once and for all the regulations or restrictions to which the owners of land in the area are to be subjected—in other words, that this means that the scheme must have a final and defined set of regulations from which anyone can see exactly what he may or may not do, and that it is not legitimate to insert in the scheme something which enables the local authority in its discretion at some future date to say whether or not, and to what extent, and where and by whom, a particular regulation shall or shall not be observed. It seems to me impossible to extract from this phrase any such elaborate restriction on the general words of the Act. It is to be observed that the subject-matter with which s. 12 (1) (c) deals is not the particular subject-matter with which we are concerned. The only words relevant to that subject-matter in this sub-section are the words in para. (d):

imposing restrictions upon the manner in which buildings may be used . . .

A restriction saying that a building may not be used for a particular purpose without consent, I should have thought, falls clearly within the words "imposing restrictions." Is it legitimate, according to proper principles of construction, to extract from the phrase, "regulating, or enabling the responsible authority to regulate," some limitation on the prima facie broad general meaning of the words "imposing restrictions"? I do not think that it is. It is said: "What can have been the object of the legislature to put in those words 'or enabling the responsible authority to regulate,' if it was always possible to achieve the same result merely by the word 'regulating'?" It is not always possible to give a satisfactory answer to a question of that kind, but I can see an answer which seems to me to be a satisfactory reason for putting in that distinction. Precisely the same phrase appears in s. 19 (1) of the Act. That is a sub-section dealing with the question of compensation and enabling compensation to be excluded in certain classes of case. One class of case is a provision of the scheme which:

. . . (c) regulates, or empowers the responsible authority to regulate, the size, height, design or external appearance of buildings.

That is merely repeating what is provided for by s. 12 (1) (c). But in s. 19 (1) (h), another case is referred to, namely, a provision of a scheme which:

. . . in the interests of safety regulates or empowers the responsible authority to regulate the height and position of proposed walls, fences or hedges near the corners or bends of roads . . .

There are two observations which arise out of that provision. First, nowhere in the Act is there given, in express terms, a power to insert a provision which empowers the responsible authority to regulate the height and position of walls, fences or hedges unless it is to be found in the general words. A wall might be called a "building," it is true, under s. 12 (1) (c), but a fence, and certainly a hedge, cannot. Therefore, as this paragraph clearly contemplates that a scheme may give power to regulate the height of a hedge, that power is only to be found in the general provisions of the Act to which I have referred. The second point is this, and, I think, it very likely explains why the legislature put in that particular provision relating to empowering the regulation of these matters. When s. 19 (1) (h) and the provisions of s. 12 (1) (c), as to size, height, design and external appearance of buildings, are looked at, they have this common characteristic. They are all matters where each particular case has got to be dealt with according to its own particular circumstances. The height of a building is dependent on its own particular circumstances, its location, its relation to the other buildings near it, the breadth of the road, and so forth. The height of the fence or hedge at the corner of the road is dependent on the measure of visibility at that particular corner and whether or not the corner is a right-angle or a curve, or whatever it may be. Anyhow, both those classes of matters are cases where a particular direction or restriction with regard to a particular matter would be required, and the legislature, as it appears to me, thought it desirable to make it clear beyond possibility of doubt that in that class of case, which is not susceptible of a general provision such as we have here, the local authority should be given that power expressly. Whether that be the true explanation in the mind of Parliament or not, I cannot find in those words a sufficient indication to justify me in cutting down the generality of the governing words, particularly when, as I have said, under s. 19 (1) (h) it is clearly contemplated that there may be power to regulate the height of fences or hedges.

I should refer to one point which comes out in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J., and I do so because with all respect, although agreeing entirely with his conclusions, I do not find it possible to accept this particular reasoning which he gives as his explanation of the insertion of the words of s. 12 (1) (c) "enabling the responsible authority to regulate." He points out that there are special provisions for appeal in that case which are laid down in the sub-section, but, as a matter of fact, that particular procedure does not go as far as LORD GODDARD, C.J., thought, for the reason that it does not apply to all the matters in s. 12 (1) (c), namely, size, height, design and external appearance, but only to two of them, design and external appearance. Therefore, I cannot, with all respect, quite follow the reasoning of LORD GODDARD, C.J., there. I think he, perhaps, failed to have pointed out to him the circumstance that the particular procedure did not apply to the whole of that particular provision.

A There are two other matters to which I must refer on the construction of the Act. One was that it was said that such a provision as this would give rise to certain inconveniences in the matter of compensation. It was pointed out that a person whose land is absolutely restricted can show what injury he has suffered by way of depreciation of his property, but a person on whom a restriction falls, which is capable of being lifted by a consent given by the authority, is in a much more difficult position because it may be extremely difficult to evaluate the depreciation of his property. To a certain extent every restriction, even if it can be lifted under some dispensing power, depreciates—technically, at any rate—the value of property. If you own a dwelling-house, to be told you must not use it as a fun fair without the consent of the local authority is a restriction which—theoretically, at any rate—depreciates its value. If, on the other hand, it is a building that could conveniently be used as a fun fair, the depreciation may be greater. On the other hand, the depreciation in such a case may be very great indeed if an application has been made and refused, and will be nil if the application is, in fact, granted. It is said: “What is the landowner to do and how is he to get his compensation fixed?” I do not feel very much difficulty about that. The precise quantification of the amount of depreciation in value of land is a matter for experts, and they are quite capable in reference to the circumstances of each particular case, I should have thought, to put a figure on it. In any case, if a man wants to use his property as a fun fair, or thinks he would like to do so in the near future, he can easily discover what his position is by applying for permission and seeing whether he gets it or not. At any rate, any inconveniences that may arise are not sufficient to cut down the broad general words of the Act.

D The other matter that is relied on particularly is the absence of any right of appeal against a refusal of permission by the local authority for use of land as a fun fair. It is perfectly true that at the present moment the only right of appeal in the case of the interim period is what I have already mentioned. It is said: “When the scheme comes to be made, there is no obligation under the statute either on the authority or on the Minister to make provision for an appeal from a refusal by the local authority.” That is perfectly true. I think that when LORD GODDARD, C.J., said there was a right of appeal to the Minister against the withholding of the consent, what he was thinking of was rather the probability and virtual certainty, as was conceded by counsel for the appellant, that either the authority will provide a right of appeal in the scheme or the Minister will insist on it, and that may very well be so. But it is pointed out—and, I think, correctly, so far as our attention has been called to the language of the Act—that neither the authority nor the Minister is bound to insert any provision for an appeal, and that has appeared to me the most weighty argument that has been brought forward by the appellant. The scheme of the Act and the policy of the Act, so far as one can see, is to provide at most important points, at any rate, for a right of appeal from decisions of the authority under these Acts. The right of appeal is very jealously guarded and provided for. In this case there is no obligation to do so, but, there again, although that is not unimportant, it is, in my judgment, quite insufficient to enable us to read into the general language of the Act some such limitation as has been suggested by the appellant.

G There are certain other passages in the Act on which counsel for the corporation relied as indicating that in the contemplation of Parliament there could be a power to impose restrictions of this character which could be lifted at the discretion of the local authority. I need not go through them. They do tend to support, I think, the view which I have expressed, but I do not find it necessary to rely on them. My opinion in this case is based on the broad consideration that Parliament has chosen to use language so comprehensive, and comprehensive enough to include a provision of this kind, and has not indicated expressly or impliedly any intention that that language should be cut down in the manner for which the appellant contends. It was said that some restriction ought to be read into the language of the Act prohibiting this particular provision on some principle of what is called reasonableness and that a delegated power such as this must be used reasonably, rather on the same principle as the power to make a bye-law. In my judgment, the analogy of the bye-law, even if it could carry the appellant as far as it is suggested it could carry him, is quite out of place in the present circumstances. We are dealing with a totally different class of subject-matter and one in which the ultimate arbiter is the Minister himself. In my judgment, not only does the argument of unreasonableness break down on the facts, but the attempt is an attempt to introduce it into a subject-matter for which it was never designed. In my opinion, the decision of the Divisional Court was quite right and the appeal must be dismissed with costs. A

WROTTESELEY, L.J.: I agree that the appeal should be dismissed with costs and for the reasons given by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS. As to the last matter, if what is sought to be introduced under the heading of reasonableness is that the use of the power must be reasonable in the opinion of judges of the High Court, I think that argument is not well founded. B

LYNSKEY, J.: I agree.

Gaming and Wagering—Lottery—Forecast of scores of football teams—Prizes for forecast of highest scores, lowest scores, and combinations of high and low scores—Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934 (c. 58), s. 22 (1) (b) (f). E

The appellant conducted a scheme by which he published weekly a list of football teams which were playing on the following Saturday. The names of the opposing teams were not published. On payment of sixpence a competitor received a card on which he entered a combination of three teams which he had selected, or, alternatively, a card on which a combination had been inserted by the appellant. A competitor could change his combinations of teams every week or retain them over a period. Prizes were offered as follows: 40 per cent. of the money available for distribution was paid to competitors whose combination of teams scored more goals than any other combination; 24 per cent. was paid to competitors whose combination scored the second highest number of goals; 16 per cent. went to those whose teams failed to score or scored least; 10 per cent. to those whose combination included the two teams which had scored the greatest number of goals and the team which had scored the lowest number of goals; and 5 per cent. to those whose combination included the team which had scored the greatest number of goals and two teams which had failed to score or had scored fewer goals than any other two teams. F

HELD: the scheme was a lottery and the appellant had been rightly convicted by justices of selling chances in a lottery, contrary to s. 22 (1) (b) of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, and of using premises for purposes connected with the promotion of the lottery, contrary to s. 22 (1) (f) of the Act. Case referred to:

(1) Moore v. Elphick, [1945] 2 All E.R. 155; Digest Supp.

CASE STATED by Exeter justices.

A The appellant was charged on informations preferred by the respondent under s. 22 of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, (i) in connection with a lottery known as "The Victory Skill Pool," with unlawfully selling chances in the said lottery at Exeter in Oct. and Nov., 1946; and (ii) in connection with the said lottery, with unlawfully using certain premises situate at 33, Monks Road, Exeter, for purposes connected with the promotion of the lottery on or about the same dates. Before the justices it was proved or admitted that the appellant was the occupier of premises at 33, Monks Road, Exeter, from which he promoted a scheme called "The Victory Skill Pool." He published weekly a list of 44 professional football teams all of which had engagements to play matches the following Saturday. The names of the opposing teams were not published. The teams were numbered consecutively, the numbers of the teams being changed each week but not on any ascertained principle. On payment of sixpence, a competitor received a card on which he entered a combination of three teams which he had selected, or, alternatively, a card on which a combination had already been inserted by the appellant. A competitor could make as many entries at sixpence each as he wished. Competitors were free to change their selections each week, but the great majority of them retained their combinations unchanged, in some cases from the commencement of the football season and in others up to two months before the date of the offences charged. The money available for distribution in any week was divided into five lots or "dividends." Each entry entitled a competitor to participate in the opportunity to obtain the whole or a share of any one of the five dividends according to the performances of the football teams identified by his combination as applied to the published list that week. The dividends were: (1) 40 per cent. to competitors whose combination of teams scored in the aggregate a greater number of goals than any other combination; (2) 24 per cent. to those whose teams scored the second greatest number of goals; (3) 16 per cent. to those whose teams failed to score or scored least; (4) 10 per cent. to those whose combination included the two teams which had scored the greatest number of goals and the team which had scored the lowest number of goals; and (5) 5 per cent. to those whose combination included the team which had scored the greatest number of goals and two teams which had failed to score at all or had scored a smaller number of goals than any other two teams. The justices were of the opinion that the scheme was a lottery. They convicted the appellant on both charges, fined him £200, and ordered him to pay the costs. He now appeals.

F Casswell, K.C., and P. Malcolm Wright for the respondent, were not called on to argue.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The appellant invited people, who had to pay an entrance fee for so doing, to forecast which of any combination of three football teams would score the highest number of goals in a week, as compared with any other combination of three that might be selected. Speaking for myself, I should say that that alone was a lottery of the clearest description. G It is not forecasting which teams will win. It is forecasting which teams will score the largest number of goals, and a combination of losing teams might score a larger number of goals than a combination of winning teams, because each team in a combination of winning teams might score only one goal whereas three losing teams might each score five goals while their opponents scored seven. I should have thought that that was a complete and absolute lottery in itself, but, even assuming that there was an element of skill in that competition, other prizes are offered. H The combination sent in may get a prize either because the teams failed to score a goal between them or scored least, and so on. The allocation of the prizes distinguishes this case from Moore v. Elphick (1) because there there was only one prize, and, although some of the combinations which might be sent in depended on chance and not on skill, some of the entries sent in for the one prize did depend on skill. Without going through the whole of the elaborate reasons and contentions which were argued and the careful findings of the justices, it seems to me that this is about as clear a lottery as can be found, and, therefore the justices came to a right decision and the appeal fails.

ATKINSON, J.: I agree. The definition of a lottery is that set out in Moore v. Elphick (1), by HUMPHREYS, J. ([1945] 2 All E.R. 156):

The Act has been interpreted in accordance with the obvious meaning of the term as applying only to distributions of money by chance, and nothing but chance, that is, by doing that which is equivalent to drawing lots.

So the real question here, is: Is a substantial part—I will not say only “part,” but a “substantial part”—to be distributed entirely by chance? The first two dividends amount to 64 per cent. of the total sum distributed, and it may be said that the distribution of those dividends depends, at any rate in part, on the skill of the competitor. I say nothing about that, but it is clear that 31 per cent. of the money is distributed simply and solely by chance, and that makes it a lottery. What was said in Moore v. Elphick (1), had no regard to separate distributions. The one prize distributed there depended in part on skill and a great part, maybe, on chance, but still the distribution did not depend solely on chance. That is quite a different case from the one with which we have to deal, where 31 per cent. of the money received was distributed entirely by chance. It is possible that, if the appellant changes the nature of his scheme and only distributes prizes on the basis of the first dividend, he will be able to conduct that competition on a legal basis. I do not know, but it is quite clear that the third, fourth, and fifth dividend money is being distributed purely by chance, and, in my opinion, to that extent this is undoubtedly a lottery. The appellant was doing something illegal, and was properly convicted.

OLIVER, J.: I am of the same opinion. I entirely agree with my Lords' view that there is a difference between forecasting the result of a football match in the sense of prophesying who will win, or forecasting the result of a horse race, in which skill, experience and study play a considerable part, and forecasting how many goals will be scored, not by one, but by a combination of three teams, or by how many yards a horse will win a race. It seems to me that when one enters on the latter task, one gets into the realm of pure chance. Assuming, however, that that view is wrong, what can be said about the last three prizes? It was admitted by counsel for the appellant that they are lotteries, but he argued that they must be considered separately. I fail to understand why. They form part of the scheme as a whole, each part of the scheme offers a prize and commands a definite percentage of the total to be distributed. The classical definition of lottery is “the distribution of prizes by lot or chance,” and I agree that this appeal fails.

PERRINS v. PYE.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard. C.J., Atkinson and Oliver, JJ.), May 2, 1947.]

Juries—Qualification—Householder—Rateable value—Aggregation of properties—Juries Act, 1825 (c. 50), s. 1.

In considering the qualification of a householder for jury service under s. 1 of the Juries Act, 1825, the rateable value taken into account in accordance with the section must be that of the house of which he is the holder. It is not permissible, where the householder also occupies another property, e.g., a shop, to aggregate the value of the two properties.

[AS TO QUALIFICATION OF JURORS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 19, p. 283, para. 583].

CASE STATED by Southport justices.

The respondent preferred a complaint before the justices on the ground that she had been marked as a juror in the electors' lists, whereas she ought not to have been so marked, being a householder rated in respect of premises at Southport the annual value of which was less than £20. She had applied to the registration officer within the time allowed for making a claim to be registered as an elector to have the mark removed, but he had refused to remove it. She applied to the justices under s. 1 (4) (5) of the Juries Act, 1922, and s. 11 (2) of the Elections and Jurors Act, 1945, for a declaration that she ought not to be registered as a juror. Before the justices it was proved

A that the respondent occupied two sets of premises in Southport, a self-contained flat assessed at £19 net annual value and a separate lock-up shop assessed at £48 net annual value.

The justices were of the opinion that the respondent was not qualified for or liable to jury service, not being a householder of premises of not less than £20 net annual value, and that the mark against her name should be removed.

B The registration officer appealed.

Vernon Gattie for the appellant.

Squibb for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This Case raises a point which does not seem hitherto to have been the subject of a decision. The Juries Act, 1825, which

C sets out in s. 1 the qualifications for a common juror, provides that any person who :

... being a householder shall be rated or assessed to the poor rate or to the inhabited house duty in the county of Middlesex on a value of not less than £30 a year, or in any other county on a value of not less than £20, or who shall occupy a house containing not less than 15 windows, shall be qualified and shall be liable to serve on juries

D The respondent, whose name was marked as a juror and put into the jury book, satisfied the justices that she was a householder and was rated and assessed in respect of the house in which she lived at £19, and, as her house was in the borough of Southport, she was occupying a house which was less than the relevant qualification, namely, £20. The registration officer's contention was that, as she occupied also a lock-up shop in Southport which

E was rated at £48, the total assessment to the poor rate in Southport was more than £20.

The question is whether or not, in considering the respondent's qualification, one is entitled to aggregate those two properties. In my opinion, it is clear that one is not. I think the statute, fairly read, refers to a householder who is rated or assessed in respect of the house of which he or she is a householder. My reading of this section is fortified, I think, by the terms of the Juries Act, 1870, which was an Act to "amend the laws relating to the qualifications, summoning, attendance, and remuneration of special and common juries." Section 6, in which is set out the qualification of special jurors, provides :

F

Every man whose name shall be in the jurors book for any county in England or Wales . . . or who shall occupy a private dwelling house rated or assessed to the poor rate or to the inhabited house duty on a value of not less than £100 . . . or who shall occupy premises other than a farm rated or assessed as aforesaid on a value of not less than £100, or a farm rated or assessed as aforesaid on a value of not less than £300, shall be qualified and liable to serve on special juries . . .

G

Therefore, it is clear that special jurors must be in the jurors book as householders occupying premises of the rateable value of £20 or £30, and then, if they occupy any premises in the district of the value of £100, they are qualified as special jurors. That goes to show that, when Parliament means to take into account something more than the house in which the householder lives, it says so in clear terms. In my opinion, the qualification specified in s. 1 of the Juries Act, 1825, must be the rateable value of the house of which the person concerned is the holder and, therefore, the justices came to a right decision in point of law and this appeal fails.

H

ATKINSON, J. : I agree. It seems to me that the meaning of the words in the relevant section is not open to doubt. I think it is "who being a householder as such shall be rated or assessed to the poor rate," etc. If that is right, the appeal must fail.

OLIVER, J. : I agree. I think the only possible way of reading the words "who being a householder shall be rated," is "rated in respect of the house he holds," while the later words make liable a person occupying a house containing not less than fifteen windows.

Appeal be dismissed with costs.

Bastardy—Application for order—Adjournment—Procedure—Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844 (c. 101), s. 4—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (c. 43), s. 16.

Justices—Constitution of bench—Desirability of uneven number of justices.

On Sept. 11, 1946, a summons was issued, based on a complaint by the respondent against the appellant alleging that he was the father of her bastard child. The summons was served on the appellant on Sept. 17, and it came before the justices on Oct. 7, within the 40 days prescribed by s. 4 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844. Six justices sat, there was an equal division of opinion, and the chairman announced that "another court must hear the case." He said nothing about when and where the other court would sit, or how it would be constituted. The case was heard and determined by different justices of the same petty sessional division on Dec. 23.

HELD : (i) it was not necessary, for a court to adjourn a case, that it should use any particular form of words, and, as it was clear that on Oct. 7 the justices intended the case to stand over for another hearing, the hearing on Dec. 23 was an adjournment of the hearing on Oct. 7 and the respondent's application for an order was made within the time limited by s. 4 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844.

(ii) the procedure in bastardy proceedings forms a code of its own unaffected by the general provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, and, therefore, the adjournment of the case was not illegal and without effect because the requirements of s. 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, as to the appointing and stating forthwith of the time and place of the adjourned hearing had not been complied with.

(iii) it is highly desirable that a bench should be constituted of an uneven number of justices so that, in the event of a difference of opinion, the view of the majority shall prevail.

CASE STATED by Flint justices.

On a complaint made by the respondent under the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, and the Affiliation Orders Act, 1914, the justices adjudged the appellant to be the father of the respondent's bastard child born on Feb. 23, 1945, and ordered him to pay the sum of 10s. per week towards the maintenance and education of the child until it attained 16 years of age, together with £5 5s. costs incidental to the birth and £6 8s. costs of obtaining the order. The appellant appealed. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Cartwright Sharp, K.C., and Denis Verne for the appellant.

Arthian Davies for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : On Sept. 11, 1946, a summons was issued, based on a complaint by the respondent against the appellant alleging that he was the father of her bastard child. That summons was served on Sept. 17. By s. 4 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, no bastardy order shall be made unless applied for at petty sessions within 40 days from the service of the summons after the birth of the child. The summons came before the justices on Oct. 7, 1946, within 40 days from the service of the summons. There were six justices and, as sometimes happens where the court is composed of an even number, there was an equal division of opinion. This is only another illustration of how desirable it is that, if it can possibly be avoided, an even number of persons should never sit to adjudicate in any court. That rule is observed in the highest courts of the land. It is a fixed rule of practice in the House of Lords and in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that the tribunal shall consist of an odd number. The House of Lords is always constituted of five members, and the Judicial Committee (although in some Indian appeals it sits with three members) endeavours also to have five members sitting. If it so happens that a member of their Lordships' House falls ill and is unable to appear so that there are only four Lords of Appeal in attendance, their Lordships do not sit till there are five. This is a very good rule for every court to endeavour to observe, so that when the tribunal comes to adjudicate on the matter before them the view of the majority, if there is a difference of opinion, will prevail. The magistrates here being equally divided, the chairman announced that fact, and said that another court must hear the case. He did not say whether the other court should consist of the existing bench and another justice or that they would re-hear the case with an uneven number of justices. It would not have been a satisfactory thing for one justice to have retired and for an uneven number of members then to hear it, nor would it have been very satisfactory if they had merely added another magistrate to their own number. In fact, they took the perfectly proper course of seeing that the case came before different justices of the county of Flint.

The case came before these different justices on Dec. 23, 1946. The delay was caused by observing the convenience of the parties. On that day objection was taken by the appellant that the proceedings were out of time because more than 40 days had elapsed since the date of service of the summons. The answer made on behalf of the respondent was that she had applied for the order within 40 days of the service of the summons and that the hearing before the justices on Dec. 23 was merely an adjournment of her application. It was, however, objected by counsel for the appellant that in fact there was no adjournment, and he further submitted that, if there were an adjournment, it was not in accordance with the law, because the provisions of s. 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, had not been complied with.

This court is of opinion that there clearly was an adjournment. It is not necessary for the purpose of adjourning a case to use any particular form of words. Where it is clear that the court intends a case to stand over from one hearing to another obviously the court are adjourning the case whether they say: "We adjourn it," or whether they say: "The case will go to another day," or use any other words which show that what they mean to do is to adjourn the case. When justices have clearly given no decision, but refer the case to a further court, obviously they are adjourning it, and that is what they did in this case. There can be no doubt in this case that what the justices intended to do on Oct. 7, 1946, was to adjourn the case to a subsequent court having jurisdiction in the matter which would be held on a later date.

It is, however, said that, even if they did intend to adjourn, they did not adjourn in accordance with the law, because s. 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, provides:

Before or during such hearing of any such information or complaint it shall be lawful for any one justice, or for the justices, in their discretion, to adjourn the hearing of the same to a certain time and place to be then appointed and stated in the presence and hearing of the party or parties, or their respective attorneys or agents then present

I desire to reserve my opinion whether an adjournment sine die can ever be granted by justices, in ordinary cases. I can see that it could be argued whether it would be a good adjournment under that section if the justices said: "We are going to adjourn this case to a subsequent court held here" (in the petty sessional court house) "to a date to be fixed of which we will give notice." It is not necessary to decide that in this case, for it is clear that the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, does not apply to bastardy proceedings. It is to be remembered that, only four years before the Act of 1848 became law, the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, was passed, and that Act dealt in a good many sections with bastardy proceedings and for some years was the only code of procedure in that class of matter. By s. 4 it was provided that: "The justices in petty session as aforesaid may adjourn the hearing of the case as often as to them may seem fit . . ." There is nothing in that Act which requires a certain time or place to be mentioned. When the Act of 1848 was passed, it was provided in s. 35:

. . . nor shall anything in this Act extend or be construed to extend to any complaints, orders, or warrants in matters of bastardy made against the putative father of any bastard child, save and except such of the provisions aforesaid as relate to the backing of warrants for compelling the appearance of such putative father or warrants of distress, or to the levying of sums ordered to be paid, or to the imprisonment of a defendant for non payment of the same . . .

That seems to me to say in the clearest possible way that, except in those matters of machinery as to backing of warrants and so forth, the Act of 1848 was not to apply to bastardy proceedings, because, although bastardy proceedings before the justices were summary proceedings and were instituted by complaint and the Act of 1848 undoubtedly dealt with various matters started by complaint, there was already in existence a statute which dealt with bastardy matters. Next, there is an express provision in s. 7 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1873, with regard to adjournment where two justices are not present so that the case cannot be heard at all:

If at the time appointed for the hearing of any case in and by any summons issued under the [Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872] or this Act two justices having jurisdiction to hear the same shall not be present, it shall be lawful for any one justice then present to adjourn the hearing to a certain time and place to be then appointed in the presence of the party or parties or their respective counsel, attorneys or agents then present . . .

So, for that purpose the legislature adopted much the same language as was used in the Act of 1848. It seems to me that there is very good reason for the appointment of a particular day for an adjournment of this sort because, by s. 4 of the Act of 1844, the order has to be applied for within 40 days from the service of the summons. It gives the court power to adjourn an application so as to prevent it being said: "You have not applied within the 40 days." No doubt, the legislature thought, as there was in existence a time limit of 40 days, that it was desirable, when the case had not been heard, to fix a particular time, so that the matter should not go on standing over more or less indefinitely. That section, however, does not apply to this case, because in this case there had been a hearing before the justices. The only other section to which I need refer is s. 54 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, which provides for . . . the levying of sums adjudged to be paid by an order in any matter of bastardy, or by an order which is enforceable as an order of affiliation, and to the imprisonment of a defendant for non-payment of such sums, in like manner as if an order in any such matter or so enforceable were a conviction on information, and shall apply to the proof of the service of any summons, notice, process, or document in any matter of bastardy, and of any handwriting or seal in any such matter, and to an appeal from an order in any matter of bastardy.

Again, I do not see the necessity for that section if bastardy was already a matter dealt with by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. This case may serve the useful purpose of calling the attention of courts of summary jurisdiction to the fact that bastardy stands by itself so far as its code of procedure and so on is concerned, and does not come within the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts of 1848 or 1879 except in respect of the matters wherein those Acts specially apply to bastardy.

Accordingly, it follows, in my opinion, that on Dec. 23, 1946, the justices had power to deal with this case as a matter which had been adjourned from the previous hearing on Oct. 7, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

ATKINSON, J.: I agree. I will only add a word on two points. I am quite satisfied that there was an adjournment. The point has been made that the word "adjourn" was not used. It seems to me that no point can be made on that since the decision in Fussell v. Licensing Committee of the Justices of Somerset (1). In that case LORD GODDARD, C.J., said ([1947] 1 All E.R. 45) :

There is no question that, if, at the hearing of an application for a licence, the justices are equally divided, and for that reason say that they refuse the application because a majority of the justices are not in favour of granting the licence, that amounts to an adjudication refusing the licence, but in the present case I think it is clear that what the justices meant was : " We are not going to give a decision on this case. We are going to adjourn it, so that it may be heard by a larger bench, and then a decision can be given."

It seems to me that exactly the same thing can be said of the present case. It is clear that the justices were not determining the complaint, but that they meant : " We are not going to give a decision because we are equally divided. We are going to adjourn the complaint and let it stand over to some future day so that it may be heard by a different bench and then a decision can be given."

That amounts to an adjournment. Even if it was not an adjournment, I do not see that the position is any different. The application for the order, not having been finally dealt with, remained in existence. It was not merely an application to the justices who were sitting on that day. It was an application to the petty sessional court, and the hearing on Dec. 23 was the hearing of the application which had been made in September and had not previously been finally dealt with. Therefore, it seems to me that the order which was made on Dec. 23, had been applied for within the space of 40 days from the service of the summons, and, on that ground, was a perfectly good order.

OLIVER, J. : I agree. I cannot interpret what the justices did at the first hearing as anything but an adjournment. They expressly did not adjudicate on the matter, but said that it would be adjudicated on by some other court of their own sessions. Any petty sessional court may fairly do that. If that is not an adjournment, I do not know what is. I also entirely agree that s. 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, does not apply to this matter. That is due, not only to the express language of s. 35 of that Act, but also to the fact that the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, had, only four years previously, enacted a whole code of procedure in bastardy matters. It would be most natural for the legislature to say in 1848 : " We need not interfere with that. That is only recent legislation. We will leave it alone excepting with regard to certain matters which can be dealt with under this, the Act of 1848." I agree that the case had never been adjudicated on and this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

HENDON BOROUGH COUNCIL v. STANGER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Atkinson and Oliver, JJ.), April 30, May 1, 1947.]

Town and Country Planning—Town planning scheme—Industrial building—Factory—Premises used for testing concrete—Town and Country Planning Act, 1932 (c. 48), s. 13 (1) (c)—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 151 (1).

The respondent carried on business as a consulting engineer specialising in the testing of materials used in building and engineering construction. One process carried out by him was the making and crushing of concrete blocks to test their properties, for which purpose he used a laboratory concrete mixer, six feet six inches high and three feet wide, and a crushing machine, twelve feet high by four feet square. The respondent employed persons in manual labour to conduct these operations. The premises on which the process was carried out were within an area designated as wholly residential by the local authority in pursuance of a town planning scheme under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932.

Held : although the main object of the process was the testing of materials, it involved the employment of " persons . . . in manual labour . . . for . . . the making of [an] article . . . or the demolition of [an] article " within the Factories Act, 1937, s. 151 (1), and, therefore, the premises were an industrial building and their use as such contravened the provisions of the scheme.

CASE STATED by Hendon (Middlesex) justices.

Under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, s. 13 (1) (c), the appellant borough council served a notice on the respondent that, as the responsible authority under the Hendon Planning Scheme (No. 1), they proposed to prohibit certain premises, "Summerfield House," Barnet Lane, Elstree, from being used as an industrial building within the meaning of the scheme. The respondent preferred a complaint under s. 13 (4) of the Act against the appellants by way of appeal against the notice. The justices allowed the appeal, holding that the building was not used as an industrial building as defined in the scheme, and the borough council appealed. The respondent practised as a consulting engineer specialising in the chemical and physical testing of materials used in building and engineering construction, including concrete. To make the tests samples of concrete were mixed in a machine 6ft. 6ins. high and 3ft wide which was driven by an electric motor. The machine was a laboratory concrete mixer and would be of no use to a builder. The samples of concrete were moulded into cubes which, when set, were placed in a machine and crushed. The crushing machine was 12ft. high by 4ft. square and was operated by an electric motor driving an oil pump. It was a piece of scientific apparatus and a testing machine. The respondent employed persons in manual labour in the processes, and the information obtained from the operations was supplied by him for the purposes of gain. Under the Hendon Planning Scheme (No. 1) "industrial building" meant a building, other than a special industrial building, designed for use as a factory or workshop within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1901 to 1929 (repealed and replaced by the Factories Act, 1937), and included any office or other building within the same site the use of which was incidental to, and such as would ordinarily be incidental to, the use of such factory or workshop, and a building designed for use in connection with the winning of minerals, or as a water pumping station, depository, or store.

H. A. Hill for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : The whole question depends on whether the premises which the respondent occupies are a factory within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937. I daresay that many of the matters carried on by the respondent in his business would not make this building a factory, but the question is whether, when materials are sent to him to test and report whether they are suitable for making concrete, and he, to perform that task, makes blocks of concrete and subjects them to pressure, the result is to make these premises a factory. It is possible that different minds might take different views on that matter, but I feel one ought not to be astute in a case of this sort where we are dealing with town planning matters to find that a building in which, undoubtedly, something is being made by machinery is not an industrial building. The object of the Act is to separate industrial buildings from residential buildings, and when one finds machinery of this kind—not some small machine such as an amateur carpenter might have on his premises to drive a lathe, but big, substantial machines driven by electric motors—operated by employees on the premises, the building has all the appearance, whatever its outside may look like, of an industrial concern, and that is so although the primary purpose for which the respondent made concrete was testing.

By the Factories Act, 1937, s. 151 (1) :

Subject to the provisions of this section, the expression "factory" means any premises in which, or within the close or curtilage or precincts of which, persons are employed in manual labour in any process for or incidental to any of the following purposes, namely :—(a) the making of any article or of part of any article ; or (b) the altering, repairing, ornamenting, finishing, cleaning, or washing, or the breaking up or demolition of any article ; or (c) the adapting for sale of any article ; being premises in which, or within the close or curtilage or precincts of which, the work is carried on by way of trade or for purposes of gain and to or over which the employer of the persons employed therein has the right of access or control : . . .

A Without question the work in the present case was carried on for the purposes of gain. That is not in dispute, nor is it in dispute that persons were employed in manual labour. What were those persons doing ? Some of them, at any rate, were making concrete. I cannot bring myself to say that concrete is not an article. They used a concrete mixer. Most people are familiar with the concrete mixers which one sees from time to time in the streets. No one supposes that the concrete mixer which is on the respondent's premises is as formidable a B piece of machinery as that. It is found to be a laboratory machine, but it is none the less making concrete. The truth of the matter is that builders and contractors want to be told whether the materials they propose to use in a particular building or undertaking are satisfactory for the manufacture of concrete. They send them to the respondent for report, and one way he adopts of finding out whether or not the materials are satisfactory is to make that
C which the materials are designed to make. No doubt, he only makes it in small quantities. In what quantities he makes it we are not told, but I cannot say that he is not making an article. Concrete is an article as much as a brick is an article. If he is making an article, apart from the facts that he is making it by a machine, as he is, and his workmen are employed in manual labour in making that article, it seems to me that the premises come within the definition of a factory. Having made the concrete, the respondent, by another machine
D of considerable size, breaks up the concrete cubes which he has made to see what strain the concrete will bear and thus what its strength is. In my opinion, in doing this he is engaging in a process in which he employs manual labour in "the breaking up or demolition of any article."

In these circumstances, I think the appeal succeeds, and that we are bound to hold that these premises are a factory, and, therefore, an industrial building. It follows that the appellant authority were entitled to serve the notice which
E they did serve. One reason which influences my mind is that the purpose for which these premises are being used is in no sense residential. It is contrary to the atmosphere of residential premises to carry on a trade which involves concrete mixing on the premises. What is the purpose for which the concrete is used does not seem to me to matter. Accordingly, this appeal must be allowed.

F ATKINSON, J. : I agree, although, I must confess, with some hesitation. I think there is great force in the argument of counsel for the respondent that we have to look at the wording of this section very carefully. It is argued that everything is governed by the real purpose of what is going on at the supposed factory. The words are "employed in manual labour in any process for or incidental to any of the following purposes, namely . . ." One cannot
G just stop at the word "process" and say : "Here is a process which is of a manufacturing character." One must see whether the process is for or incidental to a purpose which comes within (a), (b) or (c). Counsel says that the real purpose here is the testing of certain materials, and that the testing involves a process which is not a manufacturing process because, though the respondent manufactures concrete, he does so, not to produce concrete for use as concrete, but merely as incidental to his testing operations, and, therefore, the process is H not within the section. I think there is a good deal of force in that, but I can see no reason why we should give a narrow interpretation to these words. The process complained of is, in fact, making concrete in a particular form, viz., that of briquettes which it is difficult to say are not articles. Therefore, something is manufactured, although it may be wanted not for its own sake, but only for the ultimate purpose of testing. For all that, however, something has been made. Having made it, the respondent proceeds to break it up and demolish it. On the whole, I am satisfied that it is not enough to say that the ultimate purpose of all that is merely testing, so that the process throughout is taken out of the section. It seems to me that it is sufficient to bring the process—and, consequently, the premises—within the section if it be established, as it was here, that the process did involve the making of something and the demolition of something. It would be contrary to the whole spirit of the section if it were to be held that one is entitled to carry on operations of that sort in a residential area. Therefore, I am satisfied that the view expressed by my Lord is the true view.

MOTION for an order of certiorari.

The respondent had applied to a reinstatement committee under the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, 1944, s. 9 (1), to be reinstated in her former employment, but the committee refused the application on the ground that it was made out of time. She appealed to a deputy umpire who allowed the appeal and directed that she be reinstated. The employers against whom that order was made alleged that the respondent was not in their employment when she joined the forces, and applied for certiorari to bring up and quash the order of the deputy umpire. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Paull, K.C., and J. Ramsay Willis for the applicants.

The Attorney-General (Sir Hartley Shawcross, K.C.), and Arthian Davies for the Minister of Labour and National Service.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: In this case, leave was obtained to apply for a writ of certiorari to bring up and quash an order made by a deputy umpire who was appointed under the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, 1944. The points which it was desired to argue in this court were whether or not a woman was employed by the Barnsley Corporation, and, if so, whether she left that employment and entered the employment of the Crown, or whether she remained in the employment of Barnsley Corporation before she was called up for service so that she was entitled, under the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, 1944, to reinstatement in the same position or in a position not less favourable than that which she previously held. The reinstatement committee to whom she applied refused her application on the ground that it was made out of time. She then appealed under s. 10 of the Act to a deputy umpire, who reversed the decision of the reinstatement committee, holding that she had reasonable excuse for not having made the application in time. He decided that she was entitled to the benefit of the Act, and he made an order reinstating her in her employment from a certain date and ordering the corporation to pay her the appropriate wages as from the date from which she had been reinstated.

A There is no question that, if she was entitled to the benefits of the Act, the order made by the deputy umpire could not be attacked on any ground. The whole ground on which the certiorari was moved was that this woman, when she joined the Women's Royal Naval Service, was not an employee of Barnsley Corporation. In making the order, the umpire has, of course, found that she was an employee of the corporation, because, unless he found that fact, he could not have made the order he did.

B The question is whether the umpire was acting within his jurisdiction. If he was, it is a matter of no moment whether or not his decision would commend itself to this court because we are not sitting as a Court of Appeal from him. We are asked to grant a writ of certiorari to bring up his order to be quashed, and certiorari can only be granted for that purpose where the umpire is acting without jurisdiction. The Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, 1944, s. 1 provides :

C (1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, where a person to whom this Act applies whose war service ends after the commencement of this Act makes an application to his former employer to be taken into his employment, the former employer shall, so long as the application remains in force, be under an obligation to take the applicant into his employment . . .

D Therefore, where an application of this sort is made, it must be decided whether the person is one to whom the Act applies, and also who his former employer is. By s. 9 :

E (1) A person who is or claims to be a person to whom this Act applies and claims that he has rights under this Act which are being or have been denied him, may, within the prescribed time, apply to a reinstatement committee for the determination of any question relating to his rights, if any, under this Act, and the committee shall determine that question. (2) Where the committee are satisfied that default has been made by the former employer of the applicant in the discharge of his obligations under this Act, the committee may make either or both of the following orders according as is in their opinion appropriate, having regard to all the circumstances of the case and the nature and extent of the default . . .

Section 10 provides :

F (1) An appeal may, within the prescribed time, be brought from any determination or order of a reinstatement committee, or from the refusal of such a committee to make an order, to the umpire or a deputy umpire, as follows :—(a) at the instance of an organisation of employers of which the employer concerned was a member on the date on which the application was made to the reinstatement committee ; (b) at the instance of [various other persons] . . . In this section, the expression " the employer " includes, in a case where different persons have at different periods been the former employer of the applicant, any person against whom an order was made by the reinstatement committee. (2) On any such appeal, the umpire or deputy umpire may make any determination or order which a reinstatement committee might make under the provisions of this Act or may dismiss the appeal, and his decision shall be final, . . .

G It is, therefore, clear that the deputy umpire had the same powers in this case as a reinstatement committee and had jurisdiction to decide all the questions which the reinstatement committee could decide. It is also clear that his decision is final and no appeal lies from it. It is obvious that in any case which H is brought to the reinstatement committee at least three questions may arise. The first is whether the person applying is a person to whom the Act applies and whether he has any rights under the Act ; the second is whether the person against whom the application is made was that person's employer at the relevant time ; the third is whether default has been made by the former employer of the applicant ; and it would be useless for the committee to decide that question unless they had previously decided that the applicant was a person to whom the Act applied and gave rights and that the person against whom the application was made was the applicant's employer.

It is clearly within the jurisdiction of the reinstatement committee, and, consequently, of the umpire, to decide those matters, for the committee are expressly given jurisdiction by s. 9 and the umpire by s. 10 (2). Many Acts of Parliament in recent years have given the decision of certain matters to tribunals or bodies that are not the King's courts, and it may be said that many statutes have taken away the right of the subject to come to the King's courts and to have the decisions of those tribunals or bodies challenged. This court has to consider whether in the present case the legislature has given the corporation a right to come to the court. A person who is aggrieved by a decision of one of these statutory tribunals can only apply to the court for relief by way of certiorari to bring up the order and quash it if the tribunal has acted outside its jurisdiction. It is now settled law that, if the tribunal is acting within its jurisdiction, absence of evidence does not affect its jurisdiction to deal with a case, nor does a misdirection of the tribunal to itself in considering the evidence, nor does a wrong decision in point of law. A

One of the recent cases which was decided was R. v. Minister of Health, Ex parte Glamorgan County Mental Hospital (1), which was referred to by this court in the still more recent R. v. Furnished Houses Rent Tribunal for Paddington and St. Marylebone (2). In delivering the leading judgment in that case, I quoted the passage in the judgment of GREER, L.J., in R. v. Minister of Health, Ex parte Glamorgan County Mental Hospital (1), where he said ([1938] 4 All E.R. 36): B

Where the proceedings are regular upon their face, and the magistrates had jurisdiction, the superior court will not grant the writ of certiorari on the ground that the court below has misconceived a point of law. When the court below has jurisdiction to decide a matter, it cannot be deemed to exceed or abuse its jurisdiction, merely because it incidentally misconstrues a statute, or admits illegal evidence, or rejects legal evidence, or misdirects itself as to the weight of the evidence, or convicts without evidence. D

The reason is, of course, that, if Parliament has chosen to make the tribunal or body the absolute judges of certain matters, and to give no appeal, this court cannot interfere. We have been referred by counsel for the applicants to R. v. Special Purposes Comrs. of Income Tax (3), where LORD ESHER drew the distinction between two classes of matters (21 Q.B.D. 319): E

When an inferior court or tribunal or body, which has to exercise the power of deciding facts, is first established by Act of Parliament, the legislature has to consider what powers it will give that tribunal or body. It may in effect say that, if a certain state of facts exists and is shown to such tribunal or body before it proceeds to do certain things, it shall have jurisdiction to do such things, but not otherwise. There it is not for them conclusively to decide whether that state of facts exists, and, if they exercise the jurisdiction without its existence, what they do may be questioned, and it will be held that they have acted without jurisdiction. But there is another state of things which may exist. The legislature may intrust the tribunal or body with a jurisdiction, which includes the jurisdiction to determine whether the preliminary state of facts exists as well as the jurisdiction, on finding that it does exist, to proceed further or do something more. When the legislature are establishing such a tribunal or body with limited jurisdiction, they also have to consider, whatever jurisdiction they give them, whether there shall be any appeal from their decision, for otherwise there will be none. In the second of the two cases I have mentioned it is an erroneous application of the formula to say that the tribunal cannot give themselves jurisdiction by wrongly deciding certain facts to exist, because the legislature gave them jurisdiction to determine all the facts, including the existence of the preliminary facts on which the further exercise of their jurisdiction depends, . . . F

In other words, Parliament may entrust the tribunal with the power of deciding whether or not they have jurisdiction, because they decide the preliminary state of facts which alone will give them jurisdiction. G

That, it seems to me, is what the tribunal—the deputy umpire—has done in this case, and it seems to me that he is clearly given the right to do so by the statute. I cannot see that the powers of the reinstatement committee could have been expressed in clearer language than they are by s. 9 (1) of the Act, and, by s. 10 (2), the deputy umpire is placed in the same position as the committee. The deputy umpire decided that the woman in question was a person to whom the Act applied and who had rights under the Act, that Barnsley Corporation were her employers at the relevant time, and that default had been H made by them. It seems to me that he has decided the three things to decide which he has been clothed with jurisdiction by the statute, and that, therefore, the application for certiorari must be refused.

ASKEW v. BOWTELL.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Atkinson and Oliver, JJ.), April 25, 1947.]

Street and Aerial Traffic—Tramway car—Unlawfully endangering safety of passengers—Injury through driver not stopping at compulsory stop—Conductor collecting fares on top of car—No negligence on part of conductor—Stage Carriages Act, 1832 (c. 120), s. 48.

An information was preferred by the respondent, a police officer, before a metropolitan magistrate, charging the appellant, a tramway car conductor, with unlawfully endangering the safety of a passenger through negligence, contrary to s. 48 of the Stage Carriages Act, 1832. The magistrate convicted the appellant and fined him 10s. with 6s. costs. D The appellant appealed to the County of London Sessions, where it was established that on July 20, 1946, while proceeding along Woolwich Church Street, the driver of the tramway car of which the appellant was the conductor slowed down to a pace of a mile an hour on approaching a compulsory stopping place. He passed the stopping place without coming to a standstill and continued at the same pace. When the car reached the stopping place an elderly woman passenger, who wished to alight and believed that the car had come to a standstill, began to get off the platform. While she was in the act of doing so, the driver accelerated and she was thrown into the road. At the time the appellant was collecting fares on the top of the car. He was unaware that any passenger wished to alight and he took no steps to see whether anyone was going to do so. It was contended for the appellant that the conductor of a tramway car was under no duty to see that passengers were descending safely, and that, when engaged in collecting fares, there was no duty on him, in the absence of notice, to do anything to assist passengers in alighting. The appeals committee dismissed the appeal, being of opinion that the appellant by negligence had unlawfully endangered the passenger. The appellant appealed.

HELD : the appellant was entitled to assume that the driver would stop at the compulsory stopping place and that passengers would not get off before the vehicle came to a stop. There was, therefore, no evidence on which he could be found guilty of negligence, and the conviction must be quashed.

H CASE STATED by the County of London Sessions Appeals Committee. The facts appear in the headnote.

Henry Newman for the appellant.

Maxwell Turner for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is a Case Stated by the appeals committee of the County of London Sessions who upheld a conviction by a metropolitan magistrate that the appellant, "being the conductor of a tramcar, through negligence, did unlawfully endanger the safety of a passenger." [His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued :—] The conductor was entitled to assume that the driver would stop at the compulsory stop. He was also entitled to assume that passengers would not get off before the car came to a stop. If passengers do get off before a tramway car comes to a stop—as many, of course, do—they do so at their own risk. If the appellant had been on the platform, no doubt he would have stopped the passenger alighting, but in the course of his duties on the top deck, he was entitled to assume, it being a compulsory stop, that the car would stop. Once it had stopped, there was a duty on him to see that it did not go off again before passengers were safely on or off the car, but it never stopped. I do not think there was any evidence on which either the magistrates or the sessions could find the appellant guilty, and the result is that the conviction is quashed with costs.

ATKINSON, J. : I agree.

OLIVER, J. : I agree. This accident was caused entirely by the negligence of the driver.

Appeal allowed with costs.

*Rates and Rating—Derating—Industrial hereditament—Egg packing station—Adapting for sale—Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928 (c. 44),
s. 3 (1).*

Under a licence granted by the Minister of Food, home-produced eggs were taken to an egg-packing station in bulk, being ungraded and very dirty. They were cleaned, tested for soundness, sorted and graded by machinery according to weight, stamped, and packed in crates for collection by wholesalers to whom they were sold. It was an offence to sell home-produced eggs which had not been graded and stamped.

HELD : these processes were an adaptation for sale in that they made the eggs legally saleable and produced an article different in bulk from the original, and, therefore, the premises were an "industrial hereditament" within the meaning of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, s. 3 (1).

CASE STATED by the Recorder of Middlesbrough.

The ratepayers were the occupiers of a hereditament described in the rating valuation list as an "egg-packing station." Under a licence granted by the Minister of Food pursuant to the Eggs (Control and Prices) (Great Britain) Order, 1942, and subject to the conditions in such licence, they were authorised to buy and sell eggs as licensed packers and to mark home-produced eggs with approved marks. The eggs were bought by the ratepayers and collected and conveyed to the hereditament. They were often mixed and always ungraded and many were dirty. After any necessary washing each egg was inspected by light for defects, any defective egg being rejected. All other eggs were then passed through a grading machine, which sorted, graded and grade-stamped each egg automatically. It was an offence to sell home-produced eggs which had not been graded and stamped. By the terms of their licence, the ratepayers were required to pack all eggs after grading in clean containers. On an appeal by the ratepayers from a decision of the Middlesbrough Assessment Committee, the recorder held that the premises were "an industrial hereditament" within the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, s. 3 (1). The assessment committee appealed.

H. B. Williams for the assessment committee.

Rowe, K.C., and D. H. Robson for the ratepayers.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Special Case stated by the Recorder of Middlesbrough, to whom the ratepayers, Messrs. Richardson & Son, appealed from a decision of Middlesbrough Assessment Committee on the determination of a proposal made by the ratepayers for the amendment of the valuation list for the rating area of the county borough of Middlesbrough in respect of certain premises occupied by the ratepayers as an egg-packing station, on the ground "that the said premises ought to be treated as an industrial hereditament" under the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928. If they were so treated, they would, of course, not be liable to be rated in full. The short point in the case is whether the premises had become a "factory" within s. 149 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (and, therefore, an "industrial hereditament" within s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1928) by reason of the fact that they were used for the adapting for sale of an article by manual labour exercised for the purposes of gain.

The ratepayers carry on an egg-packing station under a licence issued by the Ministry of Food to collect eggs and send them from the station for sale to various wholesalers. The eggs have to be cleaned, they have to be inspected by means of light to see that they are sound, they have to be sorted and graded, and then they are packed in crates which are made on the premises, and sent out. I lay no stress on the fact that the crates are made on the premises, because that is not the primary purpose for which the premises are used, nor do I pay any attention to the fact that certain eggs which are thrown out for various reasons, not because they are rotten, are made into a substance called "Melange" which is sent to confectioners. I base my judgment on the ground that there is here a process of adapting for sale. The eggs have to be cleaned and sorted into various grades. They are marked according to the grade and packed according to the grade. The result of these processes is that the sorted results may be sold, whereas the original bulk could not be sold, because it would be illegal to sell the eggs until these various processes, including the process of grading which was done by machinery, had been carried out.

In a group of cases which went to the House of Lords in 1931, a large number of industrial premises, in which different processes were carried on, were considered. We must see if we can find in the judgments and opinions in the various cases—one dealing with bottled beer, another with seeds, another with rags, another with cables, and so on—a principle enunciated which will govern cases dealing with other articles. The principle that I find laid down most clearly as applicable to the present case is in Kaye v. Burrows (1) which was heard and decided with Hines v. Eastern Counties Farmers' Co-operative Association, Ltd. (2). There rags were sent into a building and cleaned, sorted and baled. SCRUTTON, L.J., in the Court of Appeal, said ([1931] 1 K.B. 508): "The sorted results are sold, where the original bulk could not be sold." That was approved by the House of Lords. They also approved the dissenting judgment of LORD SANDS in Inland Revenue v. Easson Bros. (3), in which he said (1930 S.C. 485):

On the counter emptied out of collecting carts there is a huge amorphous mass of waste paper, rags, etc., mixed with dirt and rubbish, which no paper manufacturer would look at. The workers produce a number of orderly bales in 80 different classes, which the paper-makers readily buy for substantial sums.

In the present case what is brought in is a great mass of eggs collected from farmers all over the district. As I have said, it would be illegal for any consumer to buy the eggs, and it would be illegal for the ratepayers to sell them until they had been graded, sorted, cleaned and marked. In my opinion, Kaye v. Burrows (1) entirely covers this case, and I agree with the recorder that it was a decision which bound him. He came to the right determination in point of law, and this appeal fails.

ATKINSON, J.: I agree. The question is whether the process carried on in this factory was one for adapting any article for sale. When the eggs reached the factory they were unsaleable. When they left it they were saleable. It seems to me that the two tests which clearly govern this case are put in Grove v. Lloyd's British Testing Co., Ltd. (4) ([1931] A.C. 467 where SCRUTTON, L.J., is quoted with approval as saying: "The cables are not adapted for sale, but tested to see if they are fit for sale." LORD HEWART, C.J. is also quoted (ibid): "Their task . . . is not to adapt the cables for sale, but to see that they have been so adapted." That was the test. To put the test the other way round, in Hines v. Eastern Counties Farmers' Co-operative Association, Ltd. (2), SCRUTTON, L.J., is quoted ([1931] A.C. 483) with approval as having said in the Court of Appeal ([1931] 1 K.B. 504):

In my view, there was both alteration of substance and adapting for sale in sorting, making a substantially different article in bulk from that which existed before the processes were applied. In my opinion, you cannot deal with the case by saying there was a seed before the process and the same seed after the process. The process has altered the bulk and made it [i.e., the bulk] legally and commercially saleable. The process being, therefore, a factory process . . .

In Kaye v. Burrows (1), SCRUTTON, L.J. said ([1931] 1 K.B. 508): "The sorted results are sold, where the original bulk could not be sold." This passage was also quoted with approval when the case came before the House of Lords ([1931] A.C. 484). I cannot conceive of anything more applicable to this case than that, and I agree that the appeal fails.

OLIVER, J.: I agree. If what the ratepayers did was not an adaptation for sale, then language has no meaning.

SPRING v. SPRING AND JIGGINS.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Wallington, J.), April 30, May 1, 2, 1947.]

Divorce—Evidence—Admission by wife of adultery with co-respondent—Admissibility against co-respondent.

In a husband's petition for divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery and for damages against the co-respondent, the wife admitted the adultery but unsuccessfully pleaded connivance and conduct conducing the adultery. The co-respondent, by his answer, said nothing about the adultery, but denied that the husband had suffered any damage. The only evidence against the co-respondent on the question of adultery was the sworn evidence of the wife, given in the witness box, that she had committed adultery with him.

HELD: (i) the wife, as a witness, was not in any different position from that of any other witness, and her evidence did not cease to be effective against the co-respondent merely because she was the respondent in the case, and, consequently, the court being satisfied as to the truth of her evidence in respect of the adultery, the evidence established adultery by the co-respondent.

(ii) the wife's evidence did not require corroboration.

(1) Rutherford v. Richardson, [1923] A.C. 1; 92 L.J.P. 1; 128 L.T. 399; 27 Digest 488, 5196.

The co-respondent put in an answer in which he made no reference to the adultery, but denied that the husband had suffered any damage.

A

WALLINGTON, J. [after finding that adultery had been proved against the wife, continued]: That leaves the matter in this position, that the only evidence against the co-respondent on this question of adultery is that of the wife in the witness box. Counsel for the co-respondent has suggested an argument—founded, in the main, on the speech of LORD BIRKENHEAD in Rutherford v. Richardson (1)—that, even though the wife should assert in the witness box on oath as a witness in the case that she has committed adultery and given the circumstances in which the adultery was committed, that is not admissible evidence against the co-respondent. In my judgment, that is a submission to which I ought not to give effect. It seems to me that Rutherford v. Richardson (1) dealt with evidence of admissions, not made by the respondent as a witness in the case, but admissions, often in writing, made in the absence of the co-respondent. Such admissions are hearsay, and, although they can be put in evidence as part of the petitioner's case against the respondent, they clearly cannot be evidence affecting the co-respondent. The case against him must be proved independently of the question whether the respondent has admitted adultery with him.

E

Counsel tells me that this view of the matter is not generally understood, and, in those circumstances, I will shortly express my opinion about it. It is that, if a petitioner's case against the co-respondent consists partly of written or spoken admissions said to have been made by the respondent out of court in circumstances in which the co-respondent cannot be shown to have had any part, those admissions, although they are evidence, if proved, against the respondent, and can be part of the body of evidence on which the petitioner would be entitled to a decree against the respondent, are no evidence against the co-respondent. They cannot be shut out of the case, because they are evidence against the respondent, but, although the court listens to them, if satisfied they were made in circumstances which make them admissible against the respondent, their effect can go no further. There may then be a finding against the respondent that she has committed adultery with the co-respondent, but there can be no finding that the co-respondent has committed adultery with the respondent.

F

G

H

In the present case the wife said in terms more than once, and in circumstances which indicate that she was telling the truth, that she had committed adultery with the co-respondent. In whatever capacity she gave the testimony, whether on her own behalf or on behalf of the co-respondent, she did give it. She could not have committed adultery with the co-respondent unless he had also committed adultery with her, and, as a witness, she was not in any different position from any other witness. In my judgment, her testimony does not cease to be effective against the co-respondent merely because she is the respondent in the case. Suppose a witness says that on a certain date at a certain time in a certain room in a certain house he saw the wife commit adultery with the co-respondent, but does not say that he saw the co-respondent commit adultery with the wife. Suppose that for good reasons the court accepts that testimony as proving that he saw adultery committed by the wife. Can it be doubted that that would prove, if accepted, that the co-respondent had committed adultery with the wife, although he was not mentioned in the witness's testimony? In my view, it cannot be doubted. In this case the wife has said the same thing. She has said that over a long period she was the mistress of and has committed adultery with the co-respondent. Is her testimony to be ineffective because she is the respondent in the case? The position is wholly different from that in cases in which there is the type of confession or admission referred to in Rutherford v. Richardson (1). Here the wife is an oral witness on oath just as any other witness.

Counsel has argued that there ought to be corroboration, but corroboration of what? It can only mean corroboration of the wife's testimony. It cannot corroboration is required:

888

mean that, if she is believed, the court cannot draw the irresistible inference from it that it involves necessarily adultery by the co-respondent with the wife. In my view, corroboration in such circumstances is not called for. If it is called for, there is abundant corroboration in the whole of the circumstances of this case.

Counsel then says that the court will not allow evidence like this, because it would put all men in danger, and they would never be safe from women who say they have committed adultery with this man and that, either for affiliation purposes or other purposes sometimes less meritorious than affiliation purposes. But I do not understand that; it seems to me to have no place in a case of this sort. The co-respondent is not in danger in this case because of his paramour. The wife here has told the truth about her relations with him. This is not a case in which there is any possibility of an untrue statement having been made on this part of it by the wife. The circumstances are clear from the documents, from the husband's testimony, and from all the testimony in the case. There is no question about it.

Nobody can have any doubt that when the wife said she committed adultery with the co-respondent she is quite clearly telling the truth. If she is telling the truth, why should the court be bound to say that, although she is truthful about her adultery with the co-respondent, it cannot hold that necessarily, therefore, the co-respondent must be proved to have committed adultery with her? It seems to me to be illogical; it has no secure basis. She could not commit adultery with him unless he committed adultery with her. I hold, therefore, that the evidence in this case establishes adultery by the co-respondent. [His LORDSHIP then dealt with the question of damages and continued:] The result is I grant to the husband a decree nisi against the wife with costs against the co-respondent and damages.

Decree nisi with costs and damages against the co-respondent.

Re BENETT-STANFORD SETTLEMENT TRUSTS, ATWOOD AND ANOTHER v. BENETT-STANFORD AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Jenkins, J.), May 1, 1947.]

Settlements—Marriage settlement—Children of marriage to attain vested interest at 21—Covenant to settle after-acquired property on original trusts or "as near thereto as circumstances will permit"—Death of only child to attain a vested interest—Child's property left to mother—Whether property brought into settlement after death of child to be held for benefit of child or on ultimate trusts in default of issue attaining vested interest.

By a marriage settlement made in 1893, property was to be held on trust, subject to the interests therein of the husband and wife, for the children of the marriage as the husband and wife should appoint, and, in default of appointment, for all the children of the marriage who should attain 21 or, being daughters, marry under that age, and, if there should be no child who should attain a vested interest, there was an ultimate trust, in default of appointment by the wife, for the wife absolutely if she should survive the husband, or, should she die in the husband's lifetime, for the persons who would be entitled on her intestacy if she had died unmarried. The settlement contained a covenant by the wife to settle after-acquired property on the original trusts of the settlement "or as near thereto as circumstances will permit." The only child who attained a vested interest died a bachelor in 1922, having by his will left everything that he possessed to his mother (the wife). At his death, he was entitled, under another settlement, to an absolute interest in remainder in certain property and, this interest was caught by the after-acquired property clause in the marriage settlement. The question was whether, under the provisions of that clause, this interest should be held on trust, subject to the life interests of the husband and wife, for the son, who had attained a vested interest under the original trusts of the marriage settlement, or whether, since it did not become subject to the after-acquired property clause until after the son's death, it should be held on the ultimate trusts of the settlement:—

HELD: on the true construction of the after-acquired property clause, since the son had already attained a vested interest under the original trusts, the fact that he had died before the property in question was caught by that clause did not prevent it being settled on the original trusts, and, therefore, in the events which had happened, it was to be held, subject to the life interests of the husband and wife therein and in the event of there being no further issue of the marriage, on trust for the wife absolutely.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine the effect of a covenant to settle after-acquired property, contained in a marriage settlement, on a reversionary interest which the wife acquired under the will of her son, the only child of the marriage to attain a vested interest under the trusts of the settlement. The facts appear in the judgment.

E

Hubert A. Rose for the plaintiffs, the trustees of the settlement.
Michael Bowles for the wife.
W. Haydn Hicks for the husband.
R. W. Goff for mortgagees of the reversionary interest.

F

JENKINS, J.: The question raised by this summons concerns the effect of a covenant to settle after-acquired property, contained in a settlement made on the marriage of John Montague Benett-Stanford and Evelyn Benett-Stanford, on a reversionary interest which Evelyn Benett-Stanford acquired absolutely under the will of her son, who was the only child of the marriage to attain a vested interest under the marriage settlement trusts.

G

The parties before the court are the present trustees of the settlement as plaintiffs, Mrs. Benett-Stanford, Mr. Benett-Stanford, and the Phoenix Assurance Co., Ltd., which is interested in the question as a mortgagee of the reversionary interest to which the wife is entitled or claims to be entitled. The marriage settlement, which was dated July 3, 1893, after introductory provisions of the usual character, from which it appears that the property settled was wholly provided by the wife, contained appropriate assignments and so forth of the property which she was settling, the usual trusts for her until the solemnisation of the marriage, provisions for investment and so on, and then, after the solemnisation of the marriage, provision that the property should be held on trust to pay the annual income of the trust fund to the wife during her life for her separate use without power of anticipation and, after her death, to pay the income to the husband, if he survive her, during the residue of his life, and, after the death of the survivor of either of them, a trust of the usual character for the children or remoter issue of the marriage as the spouses should jointly appoint by deed, and, in default of and until and subject to any such appointment, as the survivor should by deed or will or codicil appoint, with a provision to the effect that no child was, otherwise, than by way of advancement, to take a vested interest unless, being a son, he should attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being a daughter, attain that age or marry. Then there was the usual trust:

And in default of and until and subject to any such appointment in trust for all or any of the children or child of the said intended marriage (other than and except such child as hereinafter mentioned and excepted) who, being sons or a son, shall attain the age of 21 years or, being daughters or a daughter, shall attain that age or marry under it and if more than one in equal shares.

There was a provision of the usual character for hotchpot, and an exception from the scope of the trust in default of appointment of any child who, before attaining 21 (to put it shortly) should become entitled, whether in possession or in remainder, to the possession or to the receipt of the rents and profits of the Stanford estates. There was a further provision to the effect (again putting it very shortly) that, if the only child attaining a vested interest under the foregoing trusts was the child who was disqualified under the excepting provision to which I have referred, that child was to take notwithstanding the exception. The next provision to which I need refer relates to the ultimate trust, which was in these terms:

If there shall not be any child of the said intended marriage who shall attain a vested interest under the trusts hereinbefore declared in default of appointment then subject to the trusts and powers hereinbefore contained the trust fund and the income and statutory accumulations (if any) of the income thereof or so much thereof as shall not have become vested or been applied under any of the trusts or powers affecting the same shall after the death of [the husband] and such failure of children as aforesaid be held in trust for such person or persons and purposes as [the wife] shall while not under coverture by deed revocable or irrevocable or shall whether covert or sole by will or codicil appoint And in default of and until and subject to any such appointment upon the trusts following.

The trusts following, which were, I think, the usual ones in a settlement of that date, were for the wife absolutely if she should survive the husband, with a restraint on anticipation of her expectant interest, and an alternative trust, in the event of her dying in the lifetime of the husband, for the persons who would be entitled on her intestacy if she had died possessed thereof intestate and without ever having been married.

That brings me to the after-acquired property clause, to which the question raised by the summons relates. That clause, so far as material, was to this effect:

And it is hereby further agreed and declared that [the wife] hereby covenants with the trustees hereinbefore named that if [the wife] now is or if she shall at any time after the now intended marriage and during the same coverture become entitled in any manner and for any estate or interest to any real or personal property of the value of upwards of £500 at one time and from one and the same source . . . then and in every such case she and all other necessary parties will at the cost of the trust estate . . . convey such real or personal property to the trustees or trustee upon trust to sell . . . and so that a reversionary interest be not sold before it shall fall into possession unless the trustees or trustee shall see special reason for sale And it is hereby agreed and declared that the trustees or trustee shall stand possessed of the money to arise from such sale calling in or conversion and of any part of the said property received in money upon the trusts and with and subject to the powers and provisions hereinbefore declared concerning money forming part of the trust fund or as near thereto as circumstances will permit and so as to form one fund for all purposes with the trust fund.

There was issue of the marriage a daughter, who died in early infancy and, therefore, never attained a vested interest under the settlement. In addition, there was one son, Vere Benett-Stanford, who was born in 1894. He died a bachelor on May 30, 1922, having, by his will dated Dec. 12, 1921, so far as material left everything that he possessed to his mother. His mother, who was also appointed sole executrix by his will, duly proved that will on Aug. 4, 1922, so that she became, under her son's will, absolutely entitled to all of his property. The property to which she so became entitled included an interest in remainder in the Stanford estates in Sussex and elsewhere, which, by virtue of a number of instruments, to which I need not refer in detail, stood limited at the death of the son on trust for Dame Ellen Thomas-Stanford for life—she died on Nov. 11, 1932—and, after her death, subject to a general power of appointment, vested in the second defendant

(the husband), for the second defendant for life and, after his death, subject to a jointure in favour of the first defendant (the wife), to the son in fee simple. In those circumstances, it is not open to doubt that the interest of the son in the Stanford settled estates passed under his will to his mother, the first defendant, and was caught by the after-acquired property clause contained in the settlement.

A The question which I have to decide is the effect of that—the destination of this interest under the after-acquired property clause. The competing views are these. On the one hand, it is said that the effect of the after-acquired property clause was to bring this reversionary interest into the settlement so that, on its being realised, it would be held on trust for the wife (the first defendant) for life, subject to restraint of anticipation, with remainder to the husband, the second defendant, for life, and, after the death of the survivor of them, in trust for the son, who had attained an absolutely vested interest. The other view, which has been argued before me by counsel for the trustees, in their capacity as representing unascertained persons who may have some future interest in the property, is that, as the son was dead at the date when this property became subject to the after-acquired property clause, it would not be right to exclude the ultimate trusts in default of issue from the trusts brought into being by that clause. Counsel for the trustees invited me to hold that, in the events which have happened, the effect of the after-acquired property clause was to make the property so brought in subject to the trusts of the settlement, with some form of variation which would exclude the estate of the deceased son. He invited me to hold that largely, I think, on the strength of the words “or as near thereto as circumstances will permit.” He said that these words showed that it was not necessary slavishly to follow the trusts, and that, in certain events, the trusts could be modified to suit the circumstances as they stood at the date when the after-acquired property came in. With that I respectfully agree, to the extent that, no doubt, the inclusion of the words “or as near thereto as circumstances will permit” would give a certain latitude and might, in certain circumstances—though it is not altogether easy to see how they could arise in a settlement of this character—get over serious difficulties.

D An example of the way in which words of that kind can be called in aid to get over difficulties which otherwise arise out of referential settlements is to be found in Re Shelton's Settled Estates (1), cited to me by counsel for the trustees. But the fact that such words may be called in aid to get trustees or the court out of a difficulty does not, to my mind, make it necessary to hold that they must necessarily have the effect of getting the court into a difficulty; and I ask myself whether the circumstance of a son having attained a vested interest in the fund and then dying was a circumstance which had the result that the after-acquired property did not admit of being settled on precisely the original trusts of the settlement. In my judgment, it was not such a circumstance. I see no reason why this accretion to the trust fund should not have gone on precisely the same trusts as those which applied to the original fund, including the absolute interest taken in default of appointment by the deceased son when he attained 21. I think, therefore, that the effect of this clause was to carry the absolute interest in remainder under the settlement in the after-acquired property to the estate of the son.

G An ingenious argument was presented to me by counsel for the second defendant to the effect that the combined result of the son's will and of the after-acquired property clause was to produce an intestacy, and he referred me to Re Powell (2). In my judgment, there can really be no question of an intestacy here. In Re Powell (2) a testator left property on the trusts of a settlement which he himself had made and under which there was a resulting trust in his favour, and it was held that that was not an effective disposition. In this case there was an effective disposition of the whole of the son's interest in favour of his mother absolutely. If, therefore, the effect of applying to the absolute interest so given the trusts grafted on it by the after-acquired property clause was to bring some residual interest back to the son's estate, that would be a case in which, in my judgment, the principle of Lassence v. Tierney (3) would apply, that is to say, there would be an absolute gift with a trust grafted on it which did not exhaust the whole beneficial interest, with the result that the original absolute gift would remain. I think that an analogous, but not absolutely similar, case is to be found in Re Currie's Settlement (4).

For these reasons, I hold that, on the true construction of the marriage settlement and, in particular, of the covenant to settle after-acquired property, and in the events which have happened, the reversionary interest in question ought to be held subject to the successive life interests of the spouses and, in the event of there being no further issue of the marriage, in trust for the first defendant absolutely, subject to the mortgages mentioned in the summons.

Declaration accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be raised, retained and paid out of the marriage settlement fund.

A claim to a war pension is not to be rejected by a pensions appeal tribunal unless the tribunal is unanimous in rejecting it. In case of disagreement, the claim must go before another tribunal.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 5. DENNING, J. : In this case the tribunal by a majority (the chairman dissenting) decided against the claimant. It was submitted to me that there was no evidence to support the view of the majority, but I hold there was. The point remains whether, to reject a claim, the members of the tribunal must be unanimous or whether a majority vote will suffice. That point was raised, but not decided, by the Court of Session in Re Fourteen Appeals (1). The Pensions Appeal Tribunals Act, 1943, contains no express provision on the matter, and it must be decided on general considerations, having regard to the constitution of the tribunal and the matters which it has to decide.

The rule whereby decisions are reached according to a majority vote is firmly established in all cases where one body alone is competent to reach a decision. The very necessity of coming to a decision compels recourse to a majority vote, for in that way alone can finality be achieved. This sacrifice to necessity involves, however, the introduction of a considerable margin of error. When a decision is not unanimous, but is only reached by a narrow majority, it is almost as likely to be wrong as it is to be right. Its correctness depends more on the quality of the reasoning on either side than on the numbers. It is not satisfactory for the rights of parties to be finally determined by a tribunal of first instance with such a risk of error. The law has, therefore, devised two methods of avoiding or reducing the risk. One method is not to accept a majority vote at all, but to require every decision to be unanimous, and, in default, let the matter be re-heard with different persons sitting on the tribunal. That is the method adopted in trial by jury. Ever since 1367 the law has required that the decision of a jury should be unanimous. If they cannot agree, even if one only dissents, the case must be tried before another jury. The other method is to accept a majority vote as a valid basis of decision, but to give a right of appeal. That is the method adopted in trials by magistrates. They have always been able to decide by a majority vote, but there is by statute a right of appeal to quarter sessions. In recent statutes creating special tribunals the two methods are sometimes found in combination.

A A right of appeal is given from a majority decision without leave, but only by leave from a unanimous decision. In the case of some other tribunals, however, neither method is applicable, and the only conclusion may be that the legislature intended to authorise a decision by majority vote with the risk of error that that entails.

A pensions appeal tribunal, despite its name, is a tribunal of first instance to which is entrusted the final decision of questions of fact. There is an appeal by leave from its decision on a point of law, but none from its decision on a question of fact. It is composed of three members each of whom has special qualifications, and in nearly all cases it is their duty to give the claimant the benefit of any reasonable doubt. If all three are unanimous in rejecting a claim on the facts, their decision can be accepted with confidence. If two are in favour of rejecting the claim and one for allowing it, and that one holds

C his view so strongly as to enter an express dissent, it raises a reasonable doubt as to the validity of the view of the majority, and, while I do not say that the view of the one dissident should prevail (for that would give effect to a minority decision), the possibility of error is so great as to make it unsafe to accept the view of the majority as final. The claimant (who has no possibility of appeal on the facts) should have an opportunity of going before another tribunal. There are a considerable number of pensions appeal tribunals, and, whenever D any difficulty arises in a part-heard case on account of illness or retirement, it is the usual and proper practice for the case to be heard afresh before another tribunal. So also, in the case of disagreement, there is no difficulty in the case going before another tribunal.

My conclusion, therefore, is that a claim to a pension is not to be rejected unless the tribunal is unanimous in rejecting it. In the case of disagreement, the claim must go before another tribunal. I must add a word, however, as E to what unanimity entails, and for this I draw on the practice under the jury system. If the need for unanimity led to many abortive trials, it would detract much from the value of that system, but that is not what happens. The cases in which a jury disagree are very few, owing to the common sense way in which the rule as to unanimity is applied. It does sometimes happen that a jury return and ask if they need be unanimous, or say they cannot agree or that F one or two do not agree with the rest. In such a case the judge directs them that they must be unanimous, but he usually goes on to explain what unanimity means on the lines of the direction of FINLAY, J. in Rex v. Klein (2), on Feb. 9, 1932. He reminds them that it is most important that they should agree if it is possible to do so; that, with a view to agreeing, there must inevitably be some give and take; that, if any member should find himself in a small minority and disposed to differ from the rest, he should consider G the matter carefully, weigh the reasons for and against his view, and remember that he may be wrong; that if, on so doing he can honestly bring himself to concur in the view of the majority, albeit hesitatingly or reluctantly, he should do so; but, if he cannot do so consistently with the oath he has taken, and he cannot bring the others round to his point of view, then it is his duty to differ, and, for want of agreement, there will be no verdict.

I remit this case, therefore, for a fresh hearing before another tribunal. H The claimant will be at liberty to call fresh evidence if he desires so to do.

Case remitted.

Companies—Winding up—Distribution of surplus assets—Clause in memorandum prohibiting transfer of income and property of company to members by way of profit—No provision in memorandum or articles in regard to disposal of surplus assets on winding up—Right of Crown to surplus assets as bona vacantia—Companies Act, 1929 (c. 23), s. 247.

By its memorandum a private company provided that its income and property should be applied solely towards the promotion of its objects and that no portion thereof should be transferred, directly or indirectly, by way of dividend, bonus or otherwise, to members of the company, but there was no provision, in either the memorandum or the articles, how the surplus assets should be applied on a winding up. By the Companies Act, 1929, s. 247, on the voluntary winding up of a company, surplus assets are to be distributed among the members according to their rights and interests in the company unless the articles otherwise provide:—

Held: (i) the provision in the memorandum related to the profits of the company while it was carrying on its business as a going concern.

(ii) if the provision was intended to apply to a winding up, it was inoperative, because it attempted to exclude the express provisions of the Companies Act, 1929, s. 247, without substituting any alternative provision.

(iii) the Crown was not entitled to the surplus assets as being bona vacantia by reason of the provision in the memorandum, because s. 247 must prevail and the surplus assets must be distributed among the members according to their rights and interest.

[As to DISTRIBUTION OF ASSETS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 5, pp. 773, 774.]

ADJOURNED SUMMONS by the liquidator of a private company on a voluntary winding up to determine how the surplus assets should be applied.

The company was incorporated under the Companies Act, 1929, as a private company, on May 27, 1942, one of its objects being to provide for the material requirements of the Merchant Navy. By cl. 4 of the memorandum: "the income and property of the company whencesoever derived shall be applied solely towards the promotion of the objects of the company as set forth in the memorandum and no portion thereof shall be transferred directly or indirectly by way of dividend bonus or otherwise howsoever by way of profit to members of the company." There was, however, no provision, in either the memorandum or the articles, how the surplus assets should be distributed on a winding up.

Hector Hillaby for the liquidator.

Harold Christie, K.C., and J. G. Strangman for representative shareholders.

H. O. Danckwerts for the Attorney-General.

VAISEY, J. recited the facts and continued: It will be observed that the prohibition is against the transfer by way of profit of the income and property of the company to the members of the company and two questions arise: (i) Are these words limited to earned profit, i.e., to the profit earned by the company while a going concern? (ii) If not, whether this purely negative provision is sufficient to exclude the express terms of the Companies Act, 1929, s. 247, which enacts:

Subject to the provisions of this Act as to preferential payments, the property of a company shall, on its winding up, be applied in satisfaction of its liabilities pari passu, and, subject to such application, shall, unless the articles otherwise provide, be distributed among the members according to their rights and interests in the company.

Strangely enough, the section makes no reference to a provision to the contrary in the memorandum of a company, but only to such a provision in its articles. Here, even assuming—which I think is not the right view—that cl. 4 of the memorandum prohibits the payment of surplus assets to the members, it is silent as to what is to be done with them.

It seems to me first, that the provisions in cl. 4 relate solely to the profits of the company while it is carrying on its business as a going concern. Secondly, if it also extends to the profit or enhanced value which the shareholders may get in a winding up, it is inoperative because it attempts to exclude the express provision of the statute without substituting any alternative provision. Counsel for the Attorney-General has argued that this is a case in which the surplus profits ought to go to the Crown as being bona vacantia, because the only other claimants are subject to the prohibitive clause which provides that they are not entitled to any profit. It may well be that such was the intention of those who formed the company at a very critical moment of the war, but, if it was the intention, they should have put in an express provision to deal with the surplus assets in a winding up, e.g., the common form provision which is to be found in the memorandum and articles of a company limited by guarantee and registered pursuant to s. 18 of the Act of 1929, without the word "limited"—in other words, the form, sanctioned by the Board of Trade, which says that on winding up any surplus assets shall be transferred to some organisation having comparable objects. I find nothing of that kind here, and in all the circumstances it seems to me that s. 247 must prevail, with the result that I must declare that the surplus assets of the company, after satisfying costs, ought to be distributed among the members of the company according to their rights and interests in the company. I will give general liberty to apply and I will direct that the costs of the present application shall be taxed as between solicitor and client and paid out of the assets in the hands of the liquidator.

Declaration accordingly.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Birkett, J.), April 21, 22, 23, 1947.]

Landlord and Tenant—Landlord's duty to licensee—Lift—Accident—Tampering by unauthorised person.

Negligence—Landlord—Lift in business premises—Accident to tenant—Liability for unauthorised tampering with lift.

By a lease for one year made on July 15, 1940, the landlords in occupation of certain premises let to the plaintiff's father, partner in a firm of tailors, the third floor of the premises, together with (inter alia) the use, in common with the landlords, of the lift and the staircase. There was no light in the lift or on the staircase. The lift was an automatic electric lift which went from the basement to the other floors to carry passengers, but it was also used to carry bales of cloth to the third floor. The landlords employed a firm of experienced engineers to look after the lift and, under the lease of July 15, 1940, the landlords were not to be liable for any accident to any person using it. On the evening of Nov. 14, 1940, the plaintiff, a partner and foreman manager of the tailoring firm, opened the outer gate of the lift on the ground floor, but the lift cage was not there and he fell into the well of the shaft and received severe injuries. The lift was fitted with safety devices and it should not have been possible for the outer gate to be open, or to be opened, unless the lift cage was on the same floor as the gate. There was no defect in the lift, which was in proper working order at the time, but the fact that the outer gate on the ground floor was open when the lift cage was not there was due, apparently, to some tampering with the lift by unknown persons, a fact of which the landlord was unaware. In an action for damages for negligence, the plaintiff contended that the landlords had a duty to him as a licensee to guard against any danger to the lift by unauthorised persons tampering with it, and that they had a duty to light the lift:—

HELD: (i) the duty of licensors could not be extended to their having to consider and guard against every possible danger of which they were unaware but which might arise from the acts of unauthorised persons, and, on the facts of the case, the landlords had taken all reasonable precautions to see that the lift was safe.

(ii) the absence of a light in the lift did not in any way contribute to the accident because, since the plaintiff had always been accustomed to the lift being in darkness, he was not misled by the fact that there was no light there, and, in the circumstances, the landlords were under no duty to put a light in the lift.

ACTION for damages for negligence.

The plaintiff was partner and foreman manager in a firm of tailors which had its factory on the third floor of a building of which the second defendants were landlords in occupation. By a lease for one year made on July 15, 1940, the landlords had let the third floor to the plaintiff's father, a partner in the firm, together with (inter alia) the use, in common with the landlords and other authorised persons, of the lift and the staircase, but the landlords were not to be liable for any accident to any person using the lift. The landlords employed a firm of experienced engineers, the first defendants, to look after the lift, and it was inspected, cleaned and lubricated by a maintenance engineer every month. If a breakdown should occur between the regular visits of the maintenance engineer, the first defendants would carry out repairs on being notified. The lift was not lighted, but BIRKETT, J., found that there had been no complaint by the plaintiff or his firm on that matter. The lift was an automatic electric lift which went from the basement to the other floors to carry passengers, but it was also used to carry bales of cloth to the third floor. It was fitted with several safety devices, and it should not have been possible for the outer gate to be open or for anyone to open the outer gate, unless the lift was on the same floor as the gate. On the evening of Nov. 14, 1940, the plaintiff, on entering the building, opened the outer gate of the lift on the ground floor, but the lift cage was not there and, it being dark at the time, he fell into the well of the shaft and received severe injuries. He brought an action for damages for negligence against the first defendants for their failure to maintain the lift in reasonable safety and proper order, and against the second defendants for their failure to take proper steps by warning, guarding, lighting or otherwise, to protect him against the danger arising from defects in the lift. After reviewing the evidence and examining the lift, BIRKETT, J., found that there was no defect in the lift and that it was in proper working order, but that, apparently, there had been some tampering with the lift by persons unknown, whereby the lift was loaded without any person being in it, the outer gate being kept open and a finger inserted where the beak of the gate lock was accustomed to go, and the lift was then sent up to the appropriate floor while the outer gate on the lower floor was still open. BIRKETT, J., held, accordingly, that there was no case against the first defendants. The report deals with the case against the second defendants.

Glyn-Jones, K.C., and J. Platts Mills for the plaintiff.

Berryman, K.C., and R. Marven Everett for the first defendants, J. & E. Hall, Ltd.

Sandlands, K.C., and C. G. Armstrong Cowan for the second defendants, Newstead House Estates, Ltd.

[BIRKETT, J., after outlining the facts and reviewing the evidence, gave judgment for the first defendants and continued]: I now turn to the second defendants, the landlords. It is conceded by counsel for the plaintiff that the position here is that of licensor and licensee, and, therefore, there is no duty on me to enter into any detail in deciding that matter which is usually first decided in cases of this kind. In the cases to which I have been referred the duty of licensor and licensee is put quite clearly. The landlords had a duty not to expose the plaintiff to a trap, and they had a duty to warn him of dangers of which they knew. If, in fact, there was no defect in the lift apparatus, as I find there was no defect, then there was no danger (at any rate, from that source) of which they had a duty to give warning. They had no knowledge of any defect, and I find, in fact, that there was no defect, but counsel for the plaintiff says that that is not quite the limit of their duty, and he referred me to Ellis v. Fulham Borough Council (1). In that case the local authority provided in a public park a paddling-pool for children to paddle in, and loads of sand were put at the side of the pool to give the appearance of the seaside. The local authority themselves fixed a notice to a board near the pool stating: "Owing to the risk of cut feet, persons must not take into the paddling-pool any bottles, tins or other sharp materials." They also provided park-keepers who, under instructions, raked the pool every morning to see if any of these dangerous substances were there, but the rake used would not go into the sand but only over the surface, so that anything embedded in the sand would not be disclosed by the rake. The surface rake would not find it, reveal it, or move it. The plaintiff, a little boy who paddled in this pool, had his foot cut with a piece of glass that was, in fact, embedded in the sand, and another little boy a short time before had cut his foot in the same pool to the knowledge of the park-keeper looking after it. In the result, it was held that, on the assumption that the plaintiff was only a licensee, nevertheless the local authority were liable, as they knew that there was a possible danger to children paddling in the pool from articles in the pool and took measures to remove such articles, but such measures were inadequate. GREER, L.J., in dealing with this particular point, used these words ([1937] 3 All E.R. 458):

The position, I think, is that to which I referred in Purkis v. Walthamstow Borough Council (2): if it knew of the danger to which the children would be exposed by using this paddling-pool (a description which is taken from the notice that it put at the side of the pool) what was its obligation? Its obligation was surely to see that the danger, which it recognised existed, should be provided against, either by sufficiently removing all risk to which the children were likely to be subjected when they paddled in the pool, or by seeing that the children did not paddle in the pool at all.

The important words are "the danger, which it recognised existed." Counsel for the plaintiff used that case to support the proposition: "It is not enough that there was no defect in the apparatus of the lift. There was a potential danger—a possible danger—that somehow, in some unascertained way, between two visits of the inspecting engineer, the safety devices might become defective, and thereupon a lift purporting to have a safety device, which was, in fact, no safety device, becomes a trap of the deadliest kind, and that is a position you must guard against." It seems to me, however, to be extending the duty of a licensor some considerable way if he has to consider all the possible ways in which unauthorised people might bring his best endeavours to nought, and I do not know that there is any evidence in this case which would entitle me to hold that there was a real danger against which the landlords had a duty to guard. Indeed, there was a paragraph in the agreement which provided for that very situation—that, if something untoward occurred between two visits and the information had been given, the contractors would put the matter right, free of charge, if it were a matter of a small part being out of order, otherwise they would charge the appropriate, fair price. Ellis v. Fulham Borough Council (1) which was relied on by counsel for the plaintiff on this point, was a case where the local authority acknowledged and recognised the danger and themselves put a notice up to guard against it, but their precautions were inadequate. I cannot think that the reasoning of that case can be applied to this.

In Haseldine v. Daw & Son, Ltd. (3), which concerned a lift in a block of flats, SCOTT, L.J., used these words ([1941] 3 All E.R. 168), speaking there of an invitor and invitee :

The invitor is bound to take that kind of care which a reasonably prudent man in his place would take, neither more nor less. The landlord of a block of flats, as occupier of the lifts, does not profess as such to be either an electrical or (as in this case) a hydraulic engineer. Having no technical skill, he cannot rely on his own judgment, and the duty of care towards his invitees requires him to obtain and follow good technical advice. If he did not, he would indeed be guilty of negligence. To hold him responsible for the misdeeds of his independent contractor would be to make him insure the safety of his lift. That duty can only arise out of contract, as in the case of an employer's duty towards his employed, which, in certain cases, may make him responsible for the structural fitness of the premises where they are to work.

GODDARD, L.J., said (ibid., 180, 181) :

Accordingly, as, vis-a-vis [the landlord], the plaintiff was merely a licensee, the only duty which the former owed was not to expose him to, or to warn him of, a danger, of which he [the licensor], was aware . . . all the authorities are consistent on the point that the duty owed to a licensee is only to give warning of dangers of which the occupier actually knows. However, the judge has held that, as [the landlord] undertook the conveyance of the plaintiff in a moving vehicle, he owed him a higher duty. That he owed him a duty to exercise care in the actual working of the lift none will deny, but did he owe a duty to a licensee to exercise care to see that a lift which he believed to be safe and had no reason to think was in any way a source of danger was in fact safe ? I cannot think so.

GODDARD, L.J. then said (ibid., 181, 182) :

. . . even assuming that the plaintiff is to be regarded as an invitee, I think that his claim . . . must fail. Towards an invitee the occupier has the duty of taking care that the premises are reasonably safe. I need not quote the classic passage from the judgment of WILLES, J., in Indermaur v. Dames (4), but he there points out that whether or not reasonable care has been taken is to be determined as a matter of fact. It seems to me that, by employing a first-class firm of lift engineers to make periodical inspections of the lift, adjust it and furnish reports upon it [the landlord] did all that a reasonable man could do towards seeing that the lift was safe, especially when it is remembered that he also had the advantage of quarterly inspections by the insurance company's engineer. However, it is said that, if the engineers were negligent, it cannot be said that the occupier has discharged his duty. With this I cannot agree. An occupier or any other person may have, either by contract or by law, such a degree of duty imposed upon him that he cannot discharge it by employing a contractor to do work for him, but, where the duty is to take care that the premises are safe, I cannot see how it can be discharged better than by the employment of competent contractors. Indeed, one may well ask how otherwise could the duty be discharged ?

In the present case the landlords admittedly employed a firm of engineers of the highest standing. Some criticism was levelled against them, but I need only say that, so far as I can see, these contractors carried out their duty efficiently and well, and, in all the circumstances, promptly. I can see no evidence that reasonable precautions for making this lift safe were not adopted by the landlords. I think, on the evidence in that respect, the landlords did all that they could reasonably be expected to do. That being so, so far as the lift is concerned, I find that there was no defect, and, therefore, on that part of the case as against the landlords, the plaintiff fails.

Counsel for the plaintiff had a further point which, at first sight, is impressive. On the view—and certainly it is the only view which can now be taken, so far as the evidence is concerned—that the gate, on the night of Nov. 14, was open (and not closed as the plaintiff says), so that it could be slid back, it is clear that that could only have been done by tampering or by interference—by the insertion of a finger and the use of a piece of wood. Now counsel for the plaintiff said : “ There should have been a light in the lift. The light would have made everything safe, because it would have shown with certainty, assuming it were burning, that the lift was there. Therefore, the landlords were negligent, inasmuch as they failed to put a light in the lift." He says that the pleadings are wide enough to cover that matter. Counsel for the landlords said that there was no duty on the landlords to provide lights, and it is common ground that for a very long time there had been no light on the staircase or in the lift. It was a state of affairs with which the plaintiff was fully familiar. He did not expect any light. Counsel for the landlords referred me to Huggett v. Miers (5), in which there are many passages in the judgments of SIR GORELL BARNES, P., and FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., which support the view that there was no duty towards the plaintiff imposed on the landlords to light the staircase, and, consequently, the action was not maintainable. In that case the defendant was the owner of a building, the different floors of which were let by him as separate offices to different tenants, the staircase by which access to them was obtained, not being let, but remaining in the legal possession of the defendant. The agreements for the letting of the offices respectively contained no provision with regard to the lighting of the staircase. The tenants had gas lights on the landings outside the entrances to their respective offices which lights were supplied with gas from their own meters. The practice was that each tenant, on leaving his office for the night, turned off his own light, but it did not appear that there was any agreement between the defendant and the tenants that they should light the staircase. The plaintiff, who was in the employ of one of the tenants, on coming down the staircase from his employer's offices at 8.15 one evening in March when, all the lights having been put out, the staircase was in darkness, failed to find his way out through the street door into the street, and, going further down the stairs towards the basement, fell through a door opening on a flagged courtyard at some distance above the level of the flagstones. This door was used for hoisting goods into and out of the building. In an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant in respect of injuries resulting from the fall, it was held that there was no duty towards the plaintiff imposed on the defendant to light the staircase, and, consequently, the action was not maintainable.

The only other case to which I need refer is Lucy v. Bawden (6), where ATKIN, J., said ([1914] 2 K.B. 325) :

On principle it is difficult to see how an obligation could be imposed upon a landlord larger than the obligation to avoid traps. It is plain that he is, in the absence of express or implied agreement, not liable at all for the consequence of letting a house in a state of even dangerous disrepair. If he lets a loft approached by a ladder, a cellar approached by steep steps, or invites access to his premises over a plank, there seems no reason why the person accepting an invitation to use the ladder, the steps, or the plank, should, if injured by no hidden danger, be at liberty to complain that the access was not of a different and safer character. I can see no difference between the use of an unlighted staircase—Huggett v. Miers (5)—and the use of an unfenced staircase.

The submission made by counsel for the landlords was that, in the circumstances of this case, they were under no duty to put a light in the lift, and I accept that contention and that submission. I should like to add that, if I were wrong about this and there had been a duty on the landlords to light, then I think they took all reasonable steps to comply with it. Evidence was given here by Mrs. Haynes, the estate manager of Messrs. Waite & Waite (who were the landlords' agents for managing the property), and she said that there never had been any complaints about the light, but in August, 1940, there had been some correspondence between Messrs. Waite & Waite and the landlords about the system of lighting and wiring which had been in existence during the previous landlords' occupation. The suggestion was made that, as the wiring was in poor condition, there had better be new wiring for the electric light. That was on Aug. 6, 1940, although it was towards the end of June, 1940, only, that the landlords took over these premises. The wiring referred to in that letter was completed in September, 1940, but on Sept. 13, 1940, there was very considerable damage done to the windows by blast, through an air-raid bomb having fallen in the near vicinity, and, although the wiring was completed in September, 1940, the stage had not yet been reached when the actual lighting could be put in. Then the correspondence deals with the question of the black-out and there were negotiations about the black-out precautions necessary for the lighting. That was put in hand in October, but was not completed at the time of the accident. Finally, some difficulty about the meter was raised with the Marylebone County Council, and this difficulty was not overcome until the motor was installed on Nov. 28, a fortnight after this unfortunate accident. I think it is fairly clear from the evidence of Mrs. Haynes that the landlords, the second defendants, were anxious and willing to do all that they reasonably could. Finally, I have come to the conclusion that the absence of a light in this lift did not in any way contribute to this accident. The plaintiff had been accustomed to the lift being in darkness, and to the staircase, basement and ground floor being in darkness, and was not misled at all by the fact that there was no light. His case was, not that there was danger because of some unauthorised interference, and, therefore, it was necessary to put a light in, so that he might know whether the lift was there and if the gate was open or not, but was: "You allowed me to meet with this accident, not because there was no light, but because I was enabled to open the gate. I stepped in without any fear because I relied on the fact that, when I opened the gate, the lift would be there, otherwise I could not open the gate." In all the circumstances, I think the case fails against the landlords, and there must be judgment for both defendants.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Simon, Lord Wright, Lord Simonds, Lord du Parcq and Lord Normand), February 10, 11, 13, 14, 17, 18, May 16, 1947.]

Local Government—Alteration of area—Extension of county borough to include part of county area—Financial adjustments—Increased burden on county ratepayers—Method of assessing compensation—Arbitrator's duty—Interest on amount payable—Local Government Act, 1933 (c. 51), s. 152 (1) (b), sched. V, r. 1—Newport Extension Act, 1934 (c. lvii), s. 58.

By the Newport Extension Act, 1934, the boundary between the borough of Newport and the administrative county of Monmouth was altered by transferring to the former a piece of adjoining territory formerly included within the area of the latter. This necessitated certain adjustments between the two authorities, which, so far as not agreed, were to be determined by an arbitrator. One of the matters not agreed was that mentioned in s. 152 (1) (b) of the Local Government Act, 1933, viz., provision for payment to the county council of such sum as seemed equitable in accordance with the rules contained in sched. V to the Act of 1933 in respect of any increase of burden which would properly be thrown on the ratepayers of that council in meeting the cost incurred in discharge of any of its functions. Rule 1 provides: "Regard shall be had to—(a) the difference between the burden on the ratepayers which will properly be incurred by the local authority in meeting the cost of executing any of their functions and the burden on the ratepayers which would properly have been incurred by the local authority in meeting such cost had no alteration of boundaries or other change taken place; (b) the length of time during which the increase of burden may be expected to continue: Provided that no alteration of income in consequence of an apportionment under the regulations made under s. 108 (1) (b) of the Local Government Act, 1929, shall be taken into account." The question for determination in the first appeal was: whether the cost incurred by the county council in the discharge of its functions was to be arrived at by taking into account the whole amount of the General Exchequer Grant to the unreduced county as it existed immediately before the transfer (as the borough council contended), or by taking the proportion of such General Exchequer Grant as bore the same relation to the whole as the rateable value of the reduced county bore to the rateable value of the unreduced county in the year preceding the change (as the county council contended), or such other proportion as the arbitrator, having regard to all the circumstances of the case and in his discretion, thought equitable. The question in the second appeal was whether the arbitrator had power to award interest on any sum awarded to the county council in respect of the whole or part of the period between the appointed day on which the transfer was to take effect and the date of his award:—

A HELD: (i) (LORD WRIGHT and LORD SIMONDS dissenting): the arbitrator's duty was to fix such sum as seemed to him equitable having regard to the circumstances and the considerations indicated in the rules, but disregarding any alteration of income due to an apportionment referred to in the proviso to r. 1.

B (ii) as regards the adjustment for increase of burden the arbitrator's mandate in s. 152 (1) (b) of the Act of 1933 did not extend to authorise him to measure and award what it would be equitable to add for delay in payment, nor was he authorised to add interest for delay in respect of other items in the claim.

NEWPORT BOROUGH COUNCIL v. MONMOUTHSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL

F On the occasion of the alteration of areas brought about by the Newport Extension Act, 1934, which detached certain areas from the county of Monmouth and transferred them to the county borough of Newport, an adjustment was made by an arbitrator between the borough council and the county council. On this adjustment provision had to be made, pursuant to the Local Government Act, 1933, s. 152 (1) (b), for the increase of burden thrown on the ratepayers of the county. Schedule V to the Act contains rules for determining the sum to be paid in respect of this increased burden. Rule 1 provides: "Regard shall be had to—(a) the difference between the burden on the ratepayers which will properly be incurred by the local authority in meeting the cost of executing any of their functions and the burden on the ratepayers which would properly have been incurred by the local authority in meeting such cost had no alteration of boundaries or other change taken place; (b) the length of time during which the increase of burden may be expected to continue: Provided that no alteration of income in consequence of an apportionment under the regulations made under the Local Government Act, 1929, s. 108 (1) (b), shall be taken into account (1)." Rule 1 (a), in effect, directs the arbitrator to have regard to the difference between the burden

(1) By Local Government Act, 1929, s. 108: "(1) The Minister [of Health] may make regulations . . . (b) as to the manner in which the amounts of any grants payable under this Part of this Act [Exchequer Grants and other financial provisions] are to be adjusted if and so far as any adjustment is required in consequence of any . . . alterations of boundaries . . ."

as it "will be" and the burden as it "would have been." The expenditure in the unreduced area was £745,942; percentages of the total rate income of the unreduced county referable to the added area and the reduced area respectively were 4.432 per cent. and 95.568 per cent.; and the saving in expenditure amounted to £8,385. If the whole of the expenditure of £745,942 had fallen to be borne by the ratepayers, the result would have been as follows:—the "would have been" burden on the ratepayers in the area which subsequently became the "reduced area"—95.568 per cent. of £745,942; the "will be" burden on the same ratepayers—£745,942, less £8,385; and the difference would have represented the increase of burden due to the alteration in area. The difficulty arose owing to the fact that the county council had a source of income from the General Exchequer Grant which had to be taken into account before the burden on the ratepayers could be ascertained, and the proviso to r. 1 required that, in arriving at the burden, this grant was to be treated in an artificial way. It was common ground that, in ascertaining the increase of burden, a deduction from the expenditure, the cost of which would otherwise fall on the ratepayers, must be made in respect of the General Exchequer Grant. The dispute related to the manner in which these principles were to be applied in view of the terms of the proviso to r. 1. The method adopted by the county council was to ascertain, for the "would have been" burden, (i) the proportion (£15,767) of the Exchequer Grant (£355,774) referable to the added area, and (ii) the proportion (£17,293) of the rate leviable on the same area. These two sums (making together £33,060), were deducted from the total expenditure of £745,942. The resulting figure of £712,882 gave the portion of the total pre-alteration expenditure referable to the reduced area. The problem then was to find what the burden on the ratepayers in that area would have been. This was ascertained by attributing to that area its proportion of the Exchequer Grant (viz., £355,744, less the £15,767, or £339,977) and deducting that from the £712,882, the resulting figure, £372,905, being the "would have been" burden on the ratepayers. The figure of £339,977 being the proportion of the Exchequer Grant referable to what became the reduced area was the crucial matter in the county council's method of calculation which was based on the view that the burden that "would have been" and the burden that "will be" thrown on the ratepayers in the reduced area could only be ascertained by attributing to that area its due proportion of the Exchequer Grant which operated to relieve the ratepayers in that area. In their calculation of the "will be" burden they deducted the same figure of £339,977 from the expenditure of the reduced area (viz., £745,942, less the saving of £8,385) leaving £397,580 as the "will be" burden on the ratepayers in that area. The difference between that figure and £372,905, the figure of the "would have been" burden, was £24,675, and this was the annual increase of burden. The county borough proceeded on a different principle. Nowhere in its calculations did it arrive at a figure for the proportion of the General Exchequer Grant referable to the reduced area. It interpreted the proviso as forbidding the ascertainment of such a figure which, it said, would be equivalent to treating the amount of the grant as having been altered in consequence of the alteration of boundaries. The "income" referred to in the proviso was, it was argued, income of the county council, and the effect of the proviso was to require the whole of the pre-alteration grant to be treated as still the income of the county council, notwithstanding the alteration of areas. On this basis the amount of the grant available to relieve the burden on the ratepayers in the reduced area would be the whole of the pre-alteration grant, viz., £355,744. Accordingly, in dealing with the figures they proceeded as follows:—To arrive at the "would have been" burden they treated the whole of the grant, viz., £355,744 as referable to the unreduced area and deducted it from the £745,942, leaving £390,198 as the burden on the ratepayers for the unreduced area. They then deducted £17,293, viz., 4.432 per cent. of the rate-borne portion of the £745,942 (i.e., £745,942, less £355,744) and arrived at the same figure of £372,905 as the county council. The county council, however, made this deduction in two slices and the difference in method stood out when the "will be" calculation of the county borough was examined. They started by taking the figure of reduced expenditure for the reduced area, viz., £745,942, less £8,385, giving £737,557 in the same way as the county council. They then deducted the £355,744, leaving £381,813 as the "will be" burden on the ratepayers in the reduced area. Deducting £372,905 from this £381,813, they arrived at the figure of £8,908 as the increase of burden. The fact that they deducted the whole of the pre-alteration grant reflected their argument that after the alteration the whole grant must be treated as referable to the reduced area, not, as in the argument of the county council, 95.568 per cent. of it.

A The arbitrator stated a Special Case in which he raised the following questions:—

(i) was the proper deduction in respect of General Exchequer Grant to be arrived at by taking the whole amount of the General Exchequer Grant to the unreduced county as it existed immediately before the transfer (as the borough council contended), or by taking that proportion of such General Exchequer Grant as bore the same relation to the whole as the rateable value of the reduced county bore to the rateable value of the unreduced county in the year preceding the change (as the county council contended), or such other proportion as the arbitrator, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, thought in his discretion equitable? (ii) whether, he, the arbitrator, had power to award interest on any sum or sums he might award to the county council in respect of the period between the appointed day when the alteration took effect and the date of his award.

C ATKINSON, J., and the Court of Appeal held that the county council's contention on the first question raised was correct and that the arbitrator had no power to award interest. The borough council appealed on the first question and the county council on the second question.

D The House took time for consideration.

May 16. The following opinions were delivered.

VISCOUNT SIMON: My Lords, this is an appeal from the Court of Appeal (LORD GREENE, M.R., MORTON and TUCKER, L.J.J.) which agreed (though on different grounds) with the conclusion of ATKINSON, J., in favour of the county council.

E The Newport Extension Act, 1934, altered the boundary between the Borough of Newport and the administrative County of Monmouthshire by transferring to the former a piece of adjoining territory formerly included within the area of the latter. The day appointed for the transfer was Apr. 1, 1935. This alteration of boundary called for certain adjustments between the borough council and the county council which, so far as not agreed, were by virtue of s. 58 of the Newport Extension Act, and of s. 151 (3) of the Local Government Act, 1933, to be determined by the award of a single arbitrator. One of the matters not agreed was that mentioned in s. 152 (1) (b) of the Local Government Act, 1933, which runs as follows:

G Provision shall, unless otherwise agreed, be made for the payment to a local authority [which includes a council of a county] of such sum as seems equitable, in accordance with the rules contained in the Fifth Schedule to this Act, in respect of any increase of burden which, as a consequence of any alteration of boundaries . . . will properly be thrown on the ratepayers of the area of that local authority in meeting the cost incurred by that local authority in the discharge of any of their functions.

By sched. V of the Act it is provided:

RULES FOR DETERMINING SUM TO BE PAID IN RESPECT OF INCREASE OF BURDEN ON RATEPAYERS—

H 1. Regard shall be had to—(a) the difference between the burden on the ratepayers which will properly be incurred by the local authority in meeting the cost of executing any of their functions and the burden on the ratepayers which would properly have been incurred by the local authority in meeting such cost had no alteration of boundaries or other change taken place; (b) the length of time during which the increase of burden may be expected to continue: Provided that no alteration of income in consequence of an apportionment under the regulations made under para. (b) of sub-s. (1) of s. 108 of the Local Government Act, 1929, shall be taken into account.

2. The sum payable to a local authority in respect of the increase of burden shall not exceed, or, if payable by instalments or by way of annuity, the capitalised value of the instalments or annuity shall not exceed, the average annual increase of burden multiplied—(a) so far as that increase of burden is attributable to the cost of maintenance of roads, by twenty-one; and (b) in other cases, by fifteen.

3. Any sum payable in respect of the cost of the maintenance of county roads shall, unless otherwise agreed, be payable by way of annuity.

The question to be decided is raised in a Consultative Case stated by the arbitrator, Mr. Craig Henderson, K.C. As some discussion arose on the language in which the question was phrased, it was, at the suggestion of the House and with the agreement of the parties, reformulated as follows:

When a borough (like Newport) takes in a portion of the adjoining administrative county (like Monmouthshire) and an arbitrator is appointed (owing to absence of agreement) to fix the amount properly payable by Newport thus enlarged to the reduced county in respect of the increase of burden thrown by the transfer on the ratepayers of the reduced county in meeting the cost incurred by the latter in the discharge of any of its functions, is the proper deduction in respect of General Exchequer Grant to be arrived at by taking the whole amount of the General Exchequer Grant to the unreduced county as it existed immediately before the transfer (as the borough council contends), or by taking that proportion of such General Exchequer Grant as bears the same relation to the whole as the rateable value of the reduced county bore to the rateable value of the unreduced county in the year preceding the change (as the county council contends), or such other proportion as the arbitrator, having regard to all the other circumstances of the case, thinks in his discretion equitable?

In view of the fact that there has been much arithmetical addition and subtraction, based on precise figures, in the argument presented to this House—and indeed in the judgments which we have to review—I wish in the first place to emphasise that the arbitrator's task under the statute is to fix "such sum as seems equitable," and while he is not to "take into account" a certain "alteration of income" referred to in the proviso, his duty in other respects is not necessarily to be governed by exact calculations so much as to exercise a broad judgment under the rule that "regard shall be had" to the matters mentioned. He is to arrive at what he judges to be an equitable figure, and this primary consideration—applied within the statutory limits negative and positive—controls any arithmetical conclusion which he does not deem to be fair and reasonable.

With this preliminary observation, I address myself to the problem to be solved. What is called for is a comparison of two burdens on a body of ratepayers, each burden being estimated to arise in the future, one on the assumption that the alteration of boundary has taken place, and the other on the assumption that it has not. The contrast has been neatly described as between the "will be" burden and the "would have been" burden. The ratepayers in question are in both cases the ratepayers of what may be called the "reduced" county, i.e., of so much of the county as is left after the transferred area is, actually or notionally, taken away from it. This is agreed to be the meaning of "the ratepayers" in para. 1 (a) of the schedule; it is implied in the agreed question; and it is necessarily so if we are to compare like with like. By the burden on these ratepayers is, of course, meant the net burden, i.e., that part of the expenditure for general county purposes in the area of the "reduced" county which is left to be borne by them after taking credit for grants from central funds. Such grants take two forms, some being equivalent to a portion of approved expenditure for specific purposes, such as police, while the so-called "block-grant"—in statutory language the "General Exchequer Grant"—under the Local Government Act, 1929, does not depend on local expenditure, but is derived from an apportionment to each county or county borough out of a total sum annually provided by Parliament called the General Exchequer Contribution. This contribution is fixed for a period of years, and is then revised for a subsequent period. The apportionment (subject to the provision of an amount mentioned in s. 88 (1) (a) of the Act of 1929) is in proportion to the "weighted population" of the several areas, i.e., its amount is affected by such considerations as the rateable value per head of population, the number of children in the area under five years of age, the extent of unemployment in the area, and the mileage of roads to be maintained. We are not concerned in the present case with the first form of grant, which has been suitably dealt with, but solely with the relief provided by General Exchequer Grant.

The best estimate available of the burden on the relevant ratepayers if there had been no alteration of boundaries does not appear to be a very difficult matter to arrive at, though, as the burden lies in the future, precision is impossible. Taking the unreduced county, the general county expenditure was partly met by the block grant and the balance is the burden borne by the ratepayers of the whole county. Since we are seeking to arrive at the burden on the ratepayers in the reduced area, it is necessary to take a part of this total which is proportionate to the reduction in rateable value. This gives a figure of annual burden to which the proper multiplier can be applied. Using the figures in the Case, the general county expenditure in the unreduced county for the year 1934-35 was £745,942; the income of the county authority derived from the block grant was £355,744; the burden on the ratepayers of the county was, therefore, £390,198. Of this sum £17,293 would fall on ratepayers in the area which is the subject of transfer, and £372,905 will, therefore, be a proper figure to take as the annual burden on the ratepayers of the reduced area if there had in fact been no alteration of boundaries.

Turning now to the estimate of the burden that will be incurred by the ratepayers in this area after the alteration of boundary takes place, the calculation, so far as it is a matter of arithmetic, must be based on similar elements. As the size of the county is reduced, the general county expenses will be diminished, but not necessarily diminished in proportion to the loss of area or of rateable value. In fact, the Case states that by reason of the reduction of area the general county expenses were reduced by £8,385 so that the "will be" expenditure to be met from rates and grant combined may be taken to be £737,557. The whole question of difficulty is to decide what is a proper figure of General Exchequer Grant to be subtracted from this last figure in order to estimate the "will be" burden on the relevant ratepayers. It is argued for the borough council that the proper figure to deduct from this reduced expenditure is the whole amount of the General Exchequer Grant to the unreduced county as it existed at the moment of transfer, viz., £355,744. It is pointed out that the grant is the income of the county. It does not belong to any set of ratepayers but to the county authority itself. And the contention is that, at the date when the boundary is altered, and the area of the county thus reduced, the whole sum must still be treated as the income of the reduced county and that the total operates to reduce the burden which would otherwise fall on the ratepayers of the reduced area.

There are, however, two considerations which lead me to the conclusion that this argument should be rejected. First, these estimates are as to the future, and it is not the fact that after the change of boundary the county authority will continue to receive in the future the same grant as before. At any rate, it would be the purest coincidence if the same total continued to be paid. Upon the alteration of boundary taking place, regulations made under s. 108 of the Act of 1929 require an adjustment to be made in the grant previously payable to the county, having regard to the "weighted population" of the reduced area. This was done and the new figure was £344,487. The proviso to r. 1 of sched. V prohibits the arbitrator from taking the alteration from £355,744 to £344,487 into account, i.e., his calculations are to be made without making use of the latter figure, but that is no sufficient reason for saying that he is required to attribute to the reduced county in the future a figure of income which it will never receive at all. The resulting position, as it seems to me, is that the arbitrator is left to determine, from the facts and figures known to him to which he must or may have regard, what is the equitable deduction to make on the score of grant relief from the assumed expenses of the reduced county. How that task should be discharged I will discuss a little later.

The second consideration is this. If the provisions of the statute require in every case the application of the arithmetical formula suggested by the borough council, there will be instances in which the result will be far from equitable, and may even become absurd. It would seem extraordinary if the position was that the greater the loss of area to the county the greater the advantage to its remaining ratepayers would be from an undiminished figure representing grant to the whole county before it suffered any diminution of area at all—a figure, moreover, that is greater than the deduction for grant in relief of such ratepayers in the "would have been" calculation. Consider the situation if the size of a county is reduced to a half, or less than a half, of its original area by reason of the lost area being absorbed into an adjoining borough. The result of such an operation would be that the expenditure of the county would be very greatly reduced. If, nevertheless, against this reduced expenditure the statute requires to be set the whole amount of the grant awarded to the county before it was divided, the result might well be that the ratepayers would have to find nothing at all. I cannot think that such a result could be the intention of the words used by Parliament and this confirms my conclusion that the arbitrator, instead of being tied down by a rigid formula, has to make the deduction which is equitable in the circumstances. For myself, I should not be prepared to say that the right deduction to be made from the expenses of the reduced county is necessarily the proportion of the previous grant which corresponds to the reduction in rateable value. I do not think that the arbitrator would be exceeding his discretion if he was influenced in suitable cases by comparisons of population or of area. The whole thing is an estimate of what will happen in the future, and an estimate, moreover, of annual increase of burden to which the statutory multiplier is applied. But inasmuch as the previous grant which was income in the hands of the unreduced county had to be used in proportionate relief of ratepayers, it seems to me that the arbitrator would be well justified in treating such portion of the previous grant as corresponds to the reduction in rateable value as the appropriate set off against the expenditure of the reduced county. This is not to say that the grant belonged to the ratepayers: it did not. The grant is the income of the county council, but this income has to be used to reduce in due proportion the figure of the rate in the pound which the ratepayers are called on to pay.

For these reasons, I think the borough council's contention fails and the appeal should be dismissed, though I would propose to answer the question by saying that the arbitrator's duty is to fix such sum as seems to him equitable having regard to the circumstances and the considerations indicated in the rules but disregarding the figure of reapportionment referred to in the proviso. Subject to the exercise of this discretion, he would be justified in reaching the conclusion approved by the Court of Appeal. I move that this appeal be dismissed.

LORD WRIGHT: My Lords, this appeal raises a question on the construction of a few words in ss. 151 and 152 and sched. V to the Local Government Act, 1933. Those provisions (inter alia) define the mandate given to an arbitrator appointed to decide the differences which have arisen between the corporation of the County Borough of Newport and the county council of the County of Monmouth. The arbitrator Mr. Craig Henderson, K.C., was appointed under s. 151 above mentioned, to make an adjustment (inter alia) between the two councils of the financial relations between them in accordance with the section and with particular reference to the terms of s. 152 which requires that provision should be made for the payment to a local authority of such sum as seems ... equitable, in accordance with the rules contained in the Fifth Schedule to this Act, in respect of any increase of burden which, as a consequence of any alteration of boundaries or other change in relation to which the adjustment takes place, will properly be thrown on the ratepayers of the area of that local authority in meeting the cost incurred by that local authority in the discharge of any of their functions.

Schedule V which contains "Rules for determining sum to be paid in respect of increase of burden on ratepayers" for the guidance of the arbitrator prescribes that (1) regard shall be had to (a) the difference between the burden on the ratepayers which will properly be incurred by the local authority in meeting the cost of executing any of their functions and the burden on the ratepayers which would properly have been incurred by the local authority in meeting such cost had no alteration of boundaries or other change taken place; (b) the length of time during which the increase of burden may be expected to continue. It then goes on to set out the proviso in respect of which primarily the arbitrator has stated the Consultative Case now brought on appeal before your Lordships. The proviso is in these terms:

Provided that no alteration of income in consequence of an apportionment under the regulations made under para. (b) of sub-s. (1) of s. 108 of the Local Government Act, 1929, shall be taken into account.

The first question which the arbitrator referred to the decision of the court is :

Whether the contentions of the county council or the contentions of the borough council which he sets out are correct in law upon a true interpretation of the proviso . . . and, if neither of the said contentions be correct in law, what is the true meaning and effect of that proviso ?

To clarify the issue, it was agreed during the course of argument between the parties that one aspect of the questions sought to be raised in the Consultative

A Case might be formulated thus :

When a borough (like Newport) takes in a portion of the adjoining administrative county (like Monmouthshire) and an arbitrator is appointed (owing to absence of agreement) to fix the amount properly payable by Newport thus enlarged to the reduced county in respect of the increase of burden thrown by the transfer on the ratepayers of the reduced county in meeting the cost incurred by the latter in the discharge of any of its functions, is the proper deduction in respect of General Exchequer Grant to be arrived at by taking the whole amount of the General Exchequer Grant to the unreduced county as it existed immediately before the transfer (as the borough council contends), or by taking that proportion of such General Exchequer Grant as bears the same relation to the whole as the rateable value of the reduced county bore to the rateable value of the unreduced county in the year preceding the change (as the county council contends), or such other proportion as the arbitrator, having regard to all the other circumstances of the case, thinks in his discretion equitable.

C In effect, the substantial question is: What is the true construction of the proviso ? A second and separate question proposed in the Consultative Case, viz., whether the arbitrator has power to order interest, forms the subject of the second appeal between the same parties, now before your Lordships.

D By the Newport Extension Act, 1934, which came into operation on Apr. 1, 1935, (which is referred to later as "the appointed day") the boundary of the County Borough of Newport was altered so as to include in addition to the then existing borough a certain parish and parts of two other parishes. These "added areas" had been a part of the Administrative County of Monmouth. The financial adjustments required to be made related to the addition of these added areas to the borough council and their subtraction from the county council. The county council put in a claim against the borough council which embodied the financial adjustment which the county council contended should be made to compensate the county council for the loss it had suffered by the transfer to the borough council of the added areas. The detailed claim amounted to £532,443 of which £510,066 represented what was claimed to be the increased burden thrown on the ratepayers of the county council, based on an annual increase of burden totalling £28,397, of which £24,675 was in respect of general county purposes and £3,722 in respect of special county purposes. There was also a claim for interest.

F The General Exchequer Grant to each county is apportioned by the Minister of Health out of the total sum voted by Parliament for the whole country in accordance with regulations made by the Minister under para. (b) of sub-s. (1) of s. 108 of the Local Government Act, 1929, which empowers the Minister to make regulations as to the manner in which grants payable under the Act are to be adjusted "if and so far as any such adjustment is required in consequence of any alterations . . . of boundaries taking effect on or after the appointed day."

G This General Exchequer Grant is to be periodically revised, first for a period of three years, then for a period of four years, and on any subsequent revision for a period of five years, in each case starting from the appointed day of each period. The county apportionment, as it is called, is determined by the Minister who is required to decide "in proportion to the weighted population," according to his discretion under the regulations but he must have regard to not merely the number of ratepayers, but also to the special requirements under the Act of certain sections of the people called the weighted population because of these special requirements. The General Grant was distinguished from the Special Grants made in respect of particular services. These Special Grants have been treated separately for purposes of this dispute. It is the General Exchequer Grant which is in question here in the Case Stated. That grant is for general county purposes, such as highways, public assistance and so forth.

H For the financial year 1935-36 which followed the alteration of boundaries, the income received by the county council from the General Exchequer Grant was reduced by the Minister from £355,744 which was the income received in the financial year 1934-35 before the alteration of boundaries, to £344,487 which was to be the grant for the remainder of the fixed grant period. As in other years the grant went into the county fund and was used for general county purposes. The General Exchequer Grant, being thus available for general county purposes, went pro tanto to reduce the rate falling on the ratepayers individually. This effect is shown in the statement circulated to each ratepayer on the back of his demand note. Thus, in the specimen exhibited the total rate imposed is 12s. 3d. in the pound of which sum 4s. is met out of the Exchequer Grants leaving a rate in the pound of 8s. 3d. payable by the ratepayer. An alteration in the amount of the grant will accordingly alter the burden on the ratepayer. But the proviso enacts that any alteration of income made in consequence of change in boundaries as between local authorities under s. 108 of the Act of 1929, which is quoted above, is to be disregarded by the arbitrator in determining the difference in burden on the ratepayers consequent on the alteration of boundaries. The view that to disregard the Exchequer Grant was inconsistent with the arbitrator's duty to make an equitable adjustment has perhaps led the Court of Appeal to attempt to overcome what seems to them to be a want of equity and to interpret the words of the proviso as still capable of receiving effect. The court has held that the alteration of the General Exchequer Grant or Block Grant is to be apportioned on the basis of the ratepaying population in the reduced county as compared with the unreduced county. It is agreed (at least for purposes of this comparison and as an illustration) that 4.432 per cent. of the ratepayers in the unreduced county area were transferred from the county council and added to the borough council. The Court of Appeal held that the arbitrator should take this item into account in making his adjustment of the change in burdens consequential on the alteration of the boundaries. This might seem at first sight equitable. But it would in my opinion be directly in defiance of what appear to be the plain words of the proviso. I think it would also be inconsistent with the general scheme of the legislation and the true position. The problem which the arbitrator has to settle is to determine the difference in the burden on the ratepayers. He must ascertain that by way of an estimate of the future burden in the relevant period and on knowledge of the previous circumstances and his instructed forecast of the future course of events, always remembering that he is limited to the difference due to alteration of boundaries. This, however, is subject to what the proviso says is to be disregarded, namely, a particular alteration of the Block or General Exchequer Grant. What then is the reason for what may seem an arbitrary limitation, arbitrary because the burden on the ratepayers may be increased by a change in the General Exchequer Grant coming to the county and thus in fact increasing the burden on them individually? It is I think possible to suggest several reasons for what may seem anomalous. The General Exchequer or Block Grant comes to the county as an undifferentiated sum, based upon the decision of the Minister and not analysed by him so as to show to the county the component parts which he envisaged in arriving at his decision. It is in fact the result of the Government policy; the exact amount of the Block Grant assigned to the county will not generally depend on the number of ratepayers, because the ratepayers form only a portion of the population, the majority of whom are not ratepayers. And further the amount of the grant will naturally depend on the services which the Government desire to provide for, in particular the number of the population which come within the description of "weighted," that is, members of the population requiring special expenditure for the special benefit or services which Parliament has determined should be provided under its general policy. For these and similar reasons a counting of the ratepayers would be fallacious, and its result inequitable. The arbitrator could not know whether an alteration in the grant was due to an alteration in the boundaries or was for other reasons. These and other like considerations lead me to reject the view of the Court of Appeal that the Block Grant should be adjusted on a comparison of ratepaying population before and after the alteration of boundaries. Post hoc is not necessarily the same as propter hoc.

If effect is given to the words of the proviso and the alteration in the General Grant is ignored altogether the result will be in accordance with the proviso which will receive effect and the result will also in my opinion be logical. What the arbitrator has to decide is the difference in the burdens consequent on the alteration of boundaries; as he cannot tell whether the alteration of the General Exchequer Grant is due to that alteration, he cannot in any case bring that item in, because it is unknown on what considerations of policy or otherwise the change is based. Furthermore as a mere matter of construction I should construe "burden on the ratepayers" as meaning rateborne burden limited to so much of that burden falling on the ratepayers as is incurred in executing their functions. So far as that cost is borne by the Exchequer Grant it is not incurred by the ratepayers and may well be left out of account. All that the arbitrator has to decide is the difference in burden. If the arbitrator leaves the General Exchequer Grant out of his computation on both sides of the account, he will show the difference in the rateborne burden consequent on the alteration of the boundaries. In determining this difference the amount of the General Exchequer Grant will thus be seen to be irrelevant to the comparison.

I accordingly think that the question put by the arbitrator should be answered in favour of the borough council. I agree substantially with the contentions of the borough council. I have not dealt with any question of figures, though I have found the figures put in helpful in deciding the question of principle. My conclusion is that as it is only the difference which the arbitrator is required to estimate that figure will be found by ignoring altogether the alteration in the General Exchequer Grant or perhaps more conveniently by putting the grant as a figure on each side of the annual account. The result may appear arbitrary because it disregards an item of account which may affect the total expenditure of the county council, but it does not affect directly the annual difference of the rateborne burden. This is, in my opinion, as I have said, the figure which the arbitrator has to find. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider any further alternative. For myself, I should allow the appeal.

LORD SIMONDS: My Lords, it will, I think, in the end be found that the question in dispute between the parties to this appeal turns on a short point of construction but it is necessary to state the surrounding circumstances which have given rise to it.

By the Newport Extension Act, 1934, which came into operation on Apr. 1, 1935, the boundary of the County Borough of Newport was altered so as to include in the then existing borough certain parishes or parts of parishes which were before the alteration part of the Administrative County of Monmouth. I will refer to the area so included as "the added area." When it is important to distinguish between the county's area after and before the alteration I will refer to it as the "reduced" or the "unreduced" county as the case may be. Section 58 of this Act provided as follows:

(1) Where in consequence of this Act any adjustment of any property income debts liabilities or expenses or of any financial relations is required an adjustment shall be made between the councils or other authorities affected under and in accordance with ss. 151 and 152 of the Act of 1933 [meaning the Local Government Act, 1933] as if this Act were an order made under pt. VI of the Act of 1933.

The material parts of s. 151 and s. 152 of the Local Government Act, 1933, and sched. V thereto are as follows:

151.—(1) Any public bodies affected by any alteration of areas or authorities made by an order under this Part of this Act may from time to time make agreements for the purpose of adjusting any property, income, debts, liabilities and expenses (so far as affected by the alteration) of, and any financial relations between, the parties to the agreement.

(3) In default of an agreement as to any matter requiring adjustment, such adjustment shall be referred to the arbitration of a single arbitrator agreed upon by the parties, or in default of agreement appointed by the Minister, and the award of the arbitrator may provide for any matter for which an agreement might have provided.

152.—(1) On an adjustment under the last preceding section the following provisions shall have effect . . . (b) Provision shall, unless otherwise agreed, be made for the payment to a local authority of such sum as seems equitable, in accordance with the rules contained in the Fifth Schedule to this Act, in respect of any increase of burden which, as a consequence of any alteration of boundaries or other change in relation to which the adjustment takes place, will properly be thrown on the ratepayers of the area of that local authority in meeting the cost incurred by that local authority in the discharge of any of their functions.

Sched. V provides :

RULES FOR DETERMINING SUM TO BE PAID IN RESPECT OF INCREASE OF BURDEN ON RATEPAYERS—

1.—Regard shall be had to—(a) the difference between the burden on the ratepayers which will properly be incurred by the local authority in meeting the cost of executing any of their functions and the burden on the ratepayers which would properly have been incurred by the local authority in meeting such cost had no alteration of boundaries or other change taken place; (b) the length of time during which the increase of burden may be expected to continue: Provided that no alteration of income in consequence of an apportionment under the regulations made under para. (b) of sub-s. (1) of s. 108 of the Local Government Act, 1929, shall be taken into account.

2.—The sum payable to a local authority in respect of the increase of burden shall not exceed, or, if payable by instalments or by way of annuity, the capitalised value of the instalments or annuity shall not exceed, the average annual increase of burden multiplied—(a) so far as that increase of burden is attributable to the cost of maintenance of roads, by twenty-one; and (b) in other cases, by fifteen.

3.—Any sum payable in respect of the cost of the maintenance of county roads shall, unless otherwise agreed, be payable by way of annuity.

Thus, it became necessary for the county council and the borough council to make agreements for the purpose of the prescribed adjustments, or, failing agreement, to have the matter referred to arbitration. They reached a large measure of agreement but upon two matters of pecuniary importance they failed to do so. These matters were accordingly referred to Mr. W. Craig Henderson, K.C., as arbitrator and he at the request of the parties stated a Case for the decision of the court.

Before I state the questions raised by the Special Case, I must recall certain relevant facts. In the financial year 1934-1935 the county council received an income by way of General Exchequer Grant of £355,744. This grant, which originated in the Local Government Act, 1929, is made out of moneys provided by Parliament as an annual contribution towards local government expenses in counties and county boroughs. This contribution, which is called "the General Exchequer Contribution" is made subject to periodical revisions at the end of fixed periods which are called "fixed grant periods." The same Act provides for apportionment of the General Exchequer Contribution among the several counties and county boroughs in the manner therein specified and for the setting aside out of the county apportionment of every county (other than the county of London) of certain sums as therein mentioned and for the residue being paid to the council of the county. This residuary sum is the "General Exchequer Grant." It is the income of the county council and applicable by it for general county purposes. I think it unnecessary to say anything more about it, except that the amount of the grant is in no way determined by the rateable value of the county. I have said that the county council in the year 1934-1935 thus received a grant of £355,744, and, since the grant is a contribution towards local government expenses, it follows that by that amount the burden which would otherwise fall upon the ratepayers was pro tanto reduced. This reduction can be arithmetically distributed as to £15,767 to the ratepayers in the added areas and as to £339,977 to those in the reduced county. I mention (but, observing the proviso to r. 1 to sched. V, mention only to forget it) that, consequent on the alteration of boundaries, this general Exchequer Grant was apportioned by the Minister of Health under the regulations made under para. (b) of sub-s. (1) of s. 108 of the Local Government Act, 1929, and that by this apportionment the income received by the county council from the General Exchequer Grant was reduced to £344,487 during the remainder of the current fixed grant period.

Having stated the income of the county council from the General Exchequer Grant, and reminded myself that I must forget its alteration, I can now state the first matter in dispute between the parties. It is simply whether in calculating the increase of burden which as a consequence of the alteration of boundaries will fall upon the ratepayers in the reduced county, (which is conveniently called the "will be burden" as distinguished from the "would have been" burden, i.e., the burden that would have been theirs if there had been no alteration) the sum to be deducted in respect of the income received by the county council by way of General Exchequer Grant should be £355,744 or £339,977. The rival contentions of the borough council and the county council are stated in the Case and the arbitrator by reference to them thus poses the first question for the decision of the court :

Whether . . . the contentions of the county council or the contentions of the borough council . . . are correct in law upon a true interpretation of the proviso to para. (1) of sched. V to the Local Government Act, 1933, and if neither of the said contentions be right in law, what is the true meaning and effect of that proviso ?

At the risk of repetition it is worth while restating the question in the terms which counsel for the parties agreed after some argument in this House. They were as follows :

When a borough (like Newport) takes in a portion of the adjoining administrative county (like Monmouthshire) and an arbitrator is appointed (owing to absence of agreement) to fix the amount properly payable by Newport thus enlarged to the reduced county in respect of the increase of burden thrown by the transfer on the ratepayers of the reduced county in meeting the cost incurred by the latter in the discharge of any of its functions, is the proper deduction in respect of General Exchequer Grant to be arrived at by taking the whole amount of the General Exchequer Grant to the unreduced county as it existed immediately before the transfer (as the borough council contends), or by taking that proportion of such General Exchequer Grant as bears the same relation to the whole as the rateable value of the reduced county bore to the rateable value of the unreduced county in the year preceding the change (as the county council contends), or such other proportion as the arbitrator, having regard to all the other circumstances of the case, in his discretion thinks equitable ?

My Lords, I cannot see any justification for the county council's contention. The task of the arbitrator appears to me a simple one. To ascertain the difference between the "would have been" and "will be" burdens he must first find what those burdens respectively are. The "would-have-been" burden presents no difficulty. Three factors enter into the calculation, (a) the expenditure by the local authority ; (b) the income of the local authority, and (c) the balancing figure which represents the amount which the ratepayers have to find, or, in other words, the "burden on the ratepayers." This last figure has itself to be divided between the ratepayers in the added area and those in the reduced county. For it is only the burden on these latter ratepayers that has to be considered. Concrete form can be given to this calculation by reference to the figures used in the case. Thus the "would have been" expenditure is assumed to be £745,942 : the income, i.e., the General Exchequer Grant, is assumed to be £355,744 : the burden upon all the ratepayers would be the difference between those figures, i.e., £390,198. But of this sum £17,293 would be borne by the ratepayers of the added area, so that the "burden upon the ratepayers" to be considered by the arbitrator will be £372,905.

Next, the arbitrator must find the "will be" burden. The same factors come into the calculation. First, the expenditure by the local authority. Here it will probably appear that the reduction of the county area will effect some saving. Thus in this case it is estimated that there will be a saving of £8,385. The "will be" expenditure is therefore reduced from £745,942 to £737,557. Then the income of the reduced county is to be ascertained. Here there is no room for speculation. That income (so far as it is derived from General Exchequer Grant) will remain the same during the remainder of the current fixed grant period unless it is altered. But it is just at this point that the county council as it appears to me, fall into error. The income being the income of the county and of no one else, they yet treat it as if it were the income of the ratepayers and as if it were distributable between the added area and the reduced county according to rateable value. Thus such expressions as the amount of grant "referable to the added area" were commonly used by counsel for the county council and are to be found in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R. I find no authority for this in the language of the rule. I repeat that, to ascertain the "will be" burden, the arbitrator must find the income of the reduced county and there is no reason why he should ignore a fact which he knows, viz., that the income will be £355,744 until it is altered and substitute a figure, which is itself based on a fundamental fallacy, viz., that any part of it was ever referable to any part of the county area. It was not and is not. The whole of it is the income of the county. Having thus found the "will be" expenditure (£737,557) and the "will be" income (£355,744) of the reduced county, the arbitrator will deduct the one from the other and find the "will be" burden to be £381,813, i.e., greater by £8,908 than the "would have been" burden.

My Lords, I hope that I have not over-simplified what appears to me a very simple case. But as soon as it is appreciated that the General Exchequer Grant is not the less the income of the county because the ratepayers are by that fact spared a call upon their pockets which is necessarily proportionate to the rateable value of their hereditaments, and that it will remain the income of the county notwithstanding that there may be an alteration of boundary unless and until it is altered, and that no actual or possible alteration of income in consequence of an apportionment by the Minister is to be taken into account, that is really the end of the elaborate case made by the county council.

There is, however, one aspect of the case upon which I must say something more. The income of the reduced county, so far as it consists of General Exchequer Grant, may be altered during the current fixed grant period by an apportionment made by the Minister. This alteration must be ignored. But, it is said, this is not the only possible alteration of such income, for in the next fixed grant period a second alteration may be made. Indeed, we know that it was. Ought not this possibility to be taken into account by the arbitrator in fixing his equitable sum? My Lords, the short answer is that it should not, because the only thing which the arbitrator has to consider is an increase of burden due to an alteration of boundaries. The apportionment by the Minister to which the proviso relates is directly due to that fact. That is why it had to be specifically mentioned if it was to be excluded from consideration. But the alteration made in the next fixed grant period (which would itself be an alteration of the sum apportioned by the Minister) might be due to a number of factors other than the alteration of boundaries, that factor having already been provided for by the Minister's apportionment. Therefore, such subsequent alteration is not a matter for the arbitrator to consider.

This appeal should, therefore, in my opinion, be allowed and the first question posed by the arbitrator answered by saying that the contentions of the borough council are correct in law upon a true interpretation of the proviso in question.

LORD DU PARCQ (read by LORD NORMAND): My Lords, without restating the question which has been propounded for your Lordships' consideration, I will at once address myself to it. If there were no General Exchequer Grant it would be easy to see how the burden on the ratepayers of the reduced county was likely to be affected by the alteration of boundaries. I will use the figures which have been adopted hypothetically by both sides. Before the severance the total expenditure of the unreduced county was £745,942. If there had been no grant, the burden on those of the ratepayers who are now left within the reduced county would have been £712,882. In future the estimated expenditure of the county will be less than £745,942, but less only by £8,385—i.e., it will be reduced to £737,557. This would leave an additional burden of £24,675 to be borne by the ratepayers of the reduced county by reason of the alteration of boundaries. The same result is, of course, arrived at by deducting the estimated saving of £8,385 from the sum of £33,060 which represents the rates lost to the reduced county by reason of the amputation which it has suffered. We know, however, that the total burden on the ratepayers of the unreduced county was alleviated by the grant and that the total burden on the ratepayers of the reduced county will be lightened by a revised grant. How do these facts affect the calculation which the arbitrator is called upon to make? The grant is, of course, part of the income of the county, but its relevance to the present inquiry is that it reduces the burden on the ratepayers. The General Exchequer Grant is so apportioned as to compensate ratepayers for abnormally heavy burdens which have been put upon them because of circumstances which exist in the areas in which they are rated, because e.g., of an unusually high degree of unemployment or exceptionally heavy liabilities for road upkeep. Thus the grant apportioned to a particular area is proportionate to the needs of that area, and when it is revised it will (on the assumption that the amount of the Exchequer contribution is unaltered) go up or down according as those needs become greater or less. When there is an alteration of boundaries there is a new apportionment of the grant as between the areas affected by the change. When the county of Monmouth was reduced and the borough of Newport was enlarged, the new claims of the reduced county and the enlarged borough to the compensation which the grant affords obviously were based on new sets of facts and figures. The Minister, surveying the altered scene, had to make a new adjustment. He might (and, as we know, did) come to the conclusion that, in order

A to do justice between the two sets of ratepayers, the sum to be allotted to the reduced county must be less in total amount than that previously allotted to the unreduced county. To that extent the income of the county will be reduced.

The legislature has thought it prudent to warn the arbitrator that when he weighs in the scales the "would have been" and the "will be" burdens, he must not take into account any alteration made in the grant in consequence of the Minister's new apportionment, whether by way of increase or decrease.
B The reason for this warning is plain. If the arbitrator sought to compensate the ratepayers for a reduction in the grant, he would be giving back to them what the Minister has, in justice, taken away. If he regarded them as profiting by an increase in the grant, and so weighed the increase in the scales against them, he would be depriving them of what the Minister has thought it right to give them.

C So far, there is no dispute between the parties. The controversy begins when the borough council say that the arbitrator must assume that the grant to the reduced county will be the same in amount as the grant which was made to the unreduced county. They would read the negative provision that "no alteration of income in consequence of an apportionment . . . shall be taken into account" as if it were equivalent to a positive provision that the arbitrator must make his calculations on the footing that the amount allotted to the reduced county
D will remain the same as that which was allotted to the unreduced county.

My Lords, I do not read the proviso as giving any such direction to the arbitrator, nor do I find anything in the Act which compels him to make the assumption which the borough council would have him make. If he were compelled to assume that there had been no change in the amount of the grant to the county, he would be upsetting the Minister's adjustment of the balance just as surely as if he did what the proviso in terms forbids him to do. A simple
E illustration will, I think, show this. Let it be assumed that a particularly necessitous area has been severed from a county, with the result that in the reduced county there is a relatively low number of unemployed persons in proportion to the population, whereas in the unreduced county the proportion of unemployment was high. Assume further that in all other respects the county was equally grant-worthy (I borrow a word that was coined, I think, by one

F of the learned counsel) before and after the severance. The result would be that the reduced county must receive a relatively lower grant than the unreduced county received. It would be manifestly wrong to say that the ratepayers of the reduced county had suffered by the change. They are getting what their present needs entitle them to get just as they got in the past what their previous needs entitled them to get. There is no addition to their burden by reason of the reduction in the grant: it is reduced in order that the burden

G upon them may, so far as is possible, remain unchanged. If however the arbitrator is forced to make the false assumption that the ratepayers will continue to get the benefit of the higher grant which the unreduced county received, he will be compelled to do them an injustice, because he will be assuming that the "will be" burden is to be reduced to an extent to which it will certainly not be reduced, and will thus be weighing the scales unfairly against them. Since the arbitrator's duty is to arrive at a sum which "seems equitable," it
H cannot have been the intention of Parliament that he should be compelled to do an injustice which, be it observed, it would not be the business of the Minister to remedy.

Before coming to a final conclusion on this matter, I had the advantage of reading the opinion which LORD NORMAND is about to deliver. I have found it illuminating, and I agree with his view that the arbitrator would act fairly if he left the grant out of his calculation altogether. It is used as a means of redressing inequalities, and, if properly adjusted, will redress them, and do no more than redress them, however much it may be altered in consequence of an alteration of boundaries. The method adopted by the Court of Appeal reaches the same result, as LORD NORMAND points out, by treating a proportion of the unaltered grant as referable to the ratepayers of the reduced county. I agree that this is not a strictly accurate way of stating the position. The inaccuracy is however a matter of language rather than of substance. The borough council's method of calculation, on the other hand, seems to me to be fundamentally unsound, and to be incompatible with the manifest intention of the legislature. It follows, in my opinion, that the arbitrator must be precluded from adopting it. It is not necessary, however, that he should adopt any particular arithmetical formula, provided that he founds his estimate on correct principles, and I concur in the motion proposed by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack.

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, I agree that the appeal should be disposed of as proposed by the noble and learned Viscount on the Woolsack. Since the facts and the statutory provision have been sufficiently stated I will not take up time by repeating them.

The first question is: What is the nature of the arbitrator's duty under the statute? This question was not raised in the courts below and it is unfortunate that we do not have their opinions upon it. I think, however, that the answer is clear beyond reasonable doubt, and that the arbitrator's duty under ss. 151 and 152 (1) (b) and the rules in sched. V of the Local Government Act, 1933, is to award to the county which is suffering the severance the payment from the annexing borough of such a sum as he in his discretion thinks equitable having regard to all the circumstances including the increase of burden which will be thrown on the ratepayers of the reduced county as a consequence of the alteration of boundaries. I refer to the expression "such sum as seems equitable" in s. 152 (1) (b) and to the expression "regard shall be had to" in r. 1 of sched. V, both of which seem to me to be free of ambiguity. It is clear too that the cost of executing the reduced county's functions after the alteration of boundaries and the length of time during which the increase of burden may be expected to continue (r. 1 (b)) are at best matters of approximate estimate, and that the average increase of annual burden (r. 2), which appears to mean normal annual increase of burden, is to some extent a matter of speculation. What is required of the arbitrator, therefore, is the fair exercise of a wise discretion rather than arithmetical calculations.

It is, nevertheless, necessary that the arbitrator should know what are the factors to which he must have regard under r. 1 of sched. V, though the effect, if any, which he may decide to give to them is subject to his discretion. The borough council maintain that the arbitrator, in assessing the increase of burden which will be thrown on the ratepayers of the reduced county as the result of the change of boundaries, must take account of the General Exchequer Grant and must assume that during all the years after severance, to which he is directed by r. 2 to have regard, the county will continue to receive the same sum as General Exchequer Grant as that which it received immediately before the severance. The county council, on the other hand, maintain that the Exchequer Grant should be altogether ignored, or (what comes arithmetically to the same thing) that the arbitrator should assume that the county will receive after the date of severance only such proportion of the pre-severance General Exchequer Grant as the rateable value of the reduced county bears to the rateable value of the county before severance. I must, however, here interpose the criticism that the assumption that the county after severance will receive a proportion of the pre-severance General Exchequer Grant does violence to the true nature of such a grant. For it is a grant to the county council and part of its income and is in no sense apportionable between different parts of the county.

If, for the purpose of assessing "the increase of burden" under s. 152 (1) (b) and the rules of sched. V, it were necessary to know what the reduced county's General Exchequer Grant will be after severance there would be no difficulty. The figure has been adjusted under the provisions of s. 152 (1) (a) and the regulations therein mentioned and it would only be necessary to use the adjusted figure. But the proviso to r. 1 of sched. V expressly forbids the arbitrator to take into account any alteration of the county council's income in consequence of an apportionment made under the regulations mentioned in s. 152 (1) (a). When the case was before the Court of Appeal it seems to have been thought that the proviso imposed an artificial prohibition on the arbitrator, but the parties are now agreed, I think rightly, that the proviso merely warns the arbitrator off ground which is not properly within his sphere. It is an express admonition that the adjustment of General Exchequer Grant which is made at severance is irrelevant, and it is not the capricious exclusion from consideration of a relevant factor. The adjustment is irrelevant because it is not related to the "increased burden" nor to the loss of rateable value

A in the severed area, and in so far as the arbitrator might take account of it in assessing the compensation to the county for "the increased burden" he would to that extent be nullifying the effect of the adjustment. The prohibition in the proviso ought not, in my opinion, to be extended by implication beyond the limits expressed in it, nor should it be construed as implying a positive direction to take account of the pre-severance income of the county council, including the General Exchequer Grant, as if it were to be received

B unaltered in amount after the severance. The relevance or irrelevance to the arbitrator's task of the pre-severance General Exchequer Grant must depend on other statutory provisions and particularly on the terms of r. 1 (a) of sched. V. But in construing that rule it is proper and necessary to bear in mind the terms of the proviso. The first thing that the arbitrator must do under the rule is to find what the burden of the ratepayers in the reduced county will be, but he must in doing so not take into account the Exchequer Grant which

C will be paid to the county after severance. The question then arises on what grounds of logic is it permitted to take into account an Exchequer Grant which the county will not receive in the relevant period? To put the point less abstractly, how can the arbitrator, in having regard to what will be, take account of a grant which he knows will not be received? The statute might compel the arbitrator to an illogical inclusion of what he knows to be unreal and fictitious in a calculation which aims at being real, or as real as anything

D in the future can be said to be real. But I do not find in the rule nor elsewhere in the statute any warrant for this departure from logic which the borough council demands. It is not only illogical to include in a calculation of what will be something that will not be, but it is also irrational to assume that a county which has suffered severance of territory will retain the whole of its pre-severance General Exchequer Grant, with the consequence that, if the

E severed area is sufficiently large and however high its rateable value may be in comparison with the rateable value of the rest of the county, the General Exchequer Grant to be received by the county council will exceed the expenditure of the reduced county, and the reduced county ratepayers will find that their burden has been extinguished. I therefore reject the contention for the borough council that the arbitrator must calculate the burden which

F will be borne by the ratepayers on the assumption that the pre-severance General Exchequer Grant will continue to be received after severance. In the calculation of the burden which would have been borne by the ratepayers, if there had been no alteration of boundaries it is again necessary, since like must be compared with like, that an arbitrator should not assume the continuance of the pre-severance General Exchequer Grant. In my opinion the arbitrator's mandate requires him to perform the very simple operation of

G finding the difference between the burden of the ratepayers in the reduced area in the post-severance period and the burden which they would have borne in the same period if there had been no severance, and in doing so not to assume any figure, neither the real figure, nor a fictitious figure, for post-severance General Exchequer Grant. LORD GREENE, M.R., has shown in his judgment ([1946] 2 All E.R. 317), one simple way in which this can be done, and he arrived at the same result as that at which he finally arrived by assuming

H that after severance the county council would receive a reduced proportion of the pre-severance General Exchequer Grant. But it may be repeated here that the arbitrator is not to allow himself to become the victim of arithmetic. He has been given a broad and rather a blunt axe with instructions to exercise a wise and fair discretion in using it, and he must do his best with the clumsy instrument which the legislature has put into his hands.

There was some discussion whether the arbitrator could legitimately have regard to the fact that about two years after severance a new fixed grant period would begin and a new General Exchequer Grant would be assigned to the county. I think that this point is not included in the question agreed to by the parties. In my opinion, however, it would be erroneous to take this later adjustment of General Exchequer Grant into account. Any new adjustment after the adjustment made at severance is not related even remotely to "the increase of burden" caused by the severance and any such later adjustment would be based upon considerations which had emerged after the adjustment made at severance.

Appeal dismissed.

MONMOUTHSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL v. NEWPORT BOROUGH COUNCIL

VISCOUNT SIMON : My Lords, the Newport Extension Act, 1934, transferred to the borough of Newport an area previously forming part of the administrative county of Monmouthshire and the appointed day on which the transfer took effect was Apr. 1, 1935. In view of this alteration of boundaries an adjustment of "property income debts liabilities or expenses or of any financial relations" (s. 58 of the Act) was required, and since these included matters on which the two local authorities did not agree, an arbitrator was appointed to make an award. It is not disputed that a proper adjustment will require the award of a net amount to be paid by the borough to the county. This appeal concerns the second and third questions raised in the Consultative Case stated for the opinion of the court by the arbitrator. Of these two questions the first is :

Whether I have power to award interest on any sum or sums I may award to the county council—(a) in respect of the period between the appointed day and the date of my award, or (b) in respect of any, and if so what, part of that period.

A further question is formulated which only arises if the first question is answered in the affirmative.

The way in which the question arises is best seen by examining the county council's summary of its claim, which was delivered in Nov. 1938. The claim amounted, in round figures, to a sum of £539,000 gross, against which is set off about £7,000 admittedly due on certain items of adjustment to the borough, thus leaving a net sum of £532,000 as an annual figure claimed by the county council. The main head of claim was for adjustment in respect of increase of burden (the proper calculation of which is the subject of the previous appeal), but there are also two smaller heads in respect of continuing liabilities and of capital liabilities. To the total of £532,000 the county council claim that the arbitrator should add interest on this sum at 4 per cent. per annum from the appointed day to date of payment. The argument for the county council is that, whereas the figure fixed by the arbitrator in place of the £532,000 claimed would be the proper figure to take if payment was made on the appointed day, this amount becomes inadequate if payment is made long afterwards, unless the arbitrator has a discretion to add a further sum to compensate for the interval during which the county council has had to wait for payment. The county council admits (as the question implies) that the arbitrator is not bound to add this compensation, for the delay, or some part of it, may be due to the claimant's fault, but they urge that the arbitrator has this discretion, and points to the fact that the largest item to be quantified is such "as seems equitable."

Like the Court of Appeal, I cannot accept this view. As regards the adjustment for increase of burden, s. 152 (1) (b) of the Local Government Act, 1933, provides that on such an adjustment :

Provision shall, unless otherwise agreed, be made for the payment to a local authority of such sum as seems equitable, in accordance with the rules contained in the Fifth Schedule to this Act, in respect of any increase of burden which, as a consequence of any alteration of boundaries or other change in relation to which the adjustment takes place, will properly be thrown on the ratepayers of the reduced area which is now the county. The equitable sum to be fixed in order to reach the adjustment in respect of increase of burden on ratepayers is, therefore, to be arrived at by considering what increase of burden may be brought about "as a consequence of any alteration of boundaries or other change in relation to which the adjustment takes place." The alteration of boundaries takes place on the appointed day. To arrive at this figure (which involves the difficult task of estimating the difference between what will be the result of the change of boundaries to ratepayers in the reduced area and what would have been in the future the financial situation in that area if there had been no change), the arbitrator must fix what he regards as equitable in view of the change which takes place on the appointed day. His mandate does not extend to authorise him to measure and award what it would be equitable to add for delay in payment. That is quite another matter. If the county has any grievance on that score, any remedy (if one exists) must be found elsewhere than in the arbitrator's award. This view of the matter seems clearly to emerge

A from an examination of the statutory terms of reference. As regards items in the claim other than that of adjustment in respect of increase of burden, the arbitrator, in my opinion, is not authorised to add a rate of interest for delay. It may be that in some instances the county would by another process get a further amount because the settlement prescribed by the arbitrator is not in fact carried out till long after the appointed day, but this relief would not in any case be provided in the arbitrator's award. For example, if before the boundaries were altered

B the two authorities shared expenses or profits of a joint enterprise in a certain proportion and if the arbitrator awarded that this proportion should be varied as at the appointed day, I should suppose that the authority which from the appointed day to the date of putting the award into force had borne too much would be entitled to have this rectified in taking the final account. But the rectification would be arrived at, not by calculating a rate of interest, but by

C applying the adjustment decided in the arbitrator's award as from the appointed day.

It is argued for the county council that sub-s. (3) of s. 151 of the Local Government Act, 1933, which section is also imported into s. 58 of the Newport Extension Act as a guide for the carrying out of the adjustment, authorises the arbitrator, when the adjustment is not agreed, to "provide for any matter for which an agreement might have provided." Local bodies, when agreeing an adjusting

D figure, must not infrequently conceded to the receiving party an amount for interest in view of delay in payment : see e.g., the agreed adjustment in Bullington R.D.C. v. Oxford Corpn. (1) ; Southport Corpn. v. Lancashire County Council (2). Hence, it is suggested, the arbitrator has equally wide powers. But when the local bodies agree that interest should be paid, this is apart from the powers contained in s. 151, and the arbitrator's authority extends only to matters which, if agreed, might be settled under the statute.

E There is, as it appears to me, a shorter road by which to reach the conclusion that the arbitrator cannot add interest in the way proposed by the county council in its summary of claim. The figure of claim in that summary, or any figure substituted by the arbitrator for it, is (at any rate for the most part) a figure of annual loss. So far as increase of burden is concerned, it is certainly a figure for the year. What the arbitrator would award as due to the county would not be this figure itself but this figure to be paid by way of annuity,

F or the capitalised value of the annuity, subject to the ceiling prescribed by r. 2. It would therefore be plainly wrong to add to this annual figure interest at 4 per cent. and to direct an annuity to be paid on this higher basis or the capitalised value of such annuity, for the suggested addition of interest is only in respect of a period of delay in payment at the beginning. Once the arbitrator has fixed the sum, whether as an annuity for so many years or as a figure of capital,

G the county can sue for it, and, if payment was delayed after the due amount had been ascertained, interest might be added under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. In neither event does the element of loss falling on the council by reason of delay in payment arise as a consequence of the alteration of boundaries. I move that this appeal be dismissed.

H LORD WRIGHT : My Lords, the subject of the second appeal to which the parties are the same two councils as in the first appeal was included in the same Special Case and heard before the courts below and before your Lordships immediately after the principal matters dealt with. It raises the question whether the arbitrator has power to award interest in addition to whatever capital sum he awards.

There was very great delay in the proceedings between the parties. The Newport Extension Act was passed in 1934. Under it the appointed day was Apr. 1, 1935, when the Act came into force. The claim of the county council was not delivered until Nov., 1938. It was not until June 7, 1943, that the arbitrator was appointed by the agreement of that date between the parties. The Special Case was dated Oct. 11, 1945. The judgment of the learned judge was delivered on Dec. 19, 1945, and of the Court of Appeal on June 5, 1946. Your Lordships have been engaged in hearing this appeal in Feb., 1947. The sum claimed was very large. If interest were given for a sum less than the amount claimed, it still would be a very large sum, which LORD GREENE, M.R., when giving the judgment of the court, said would be more than a quarter of a million pounds. It is not suggested that responsibility for this delay rests on either party. It would certainly be a great hardship if when the award is finally made the weight of a very heavy claim for interest should be added to the principal sum. In addition it has been questioned if to raise any such sum would be within the powers of the borough. But however that may be and however grave such consequences could be, they could not furnish a ground against the allowance of interest if to allow interest were within the arbitrator's competence, and he thought it proper so to do. Both courts below have decided against the claim for interest. A

The question was stated by the arbitrator in the following alternatives as a question of law : B

(2) Whether I have power to order interest to be paid on any sum I may award to the county council for any (and if so at what rate) interest to the date of my award.

(3) If I have power to award interest whether that interest is to be taken into account for the purpose of para. (2) of sched. V to the Local Government Act, 1933. C

The issue whether he has power to award interest can only be determined by examining the language used by the legislature with reference to the matter. I agree with both courts below and with (as I understand) all your Lordships that the authority or mandate given to the arbitrator by the legislature does not expressly or by implication include this power. The arbitrator's power is defined by s. 58 of the Newport Extension Act, 1934, and s. 151 (3) and sched. V of the Local Government Act, 1933, the terms of which are fully before your Lordships. There is no express mention of interest in these enactments. They provide for a financial adjustment which may be settled by agreement, but, in default of an agreement as to any matter requiring adjustment, it is provided that such adjustment shall be referred to the arbitration of a single arbitrator and the award of the arbitrator may provide for any matter for which an agreement might have provided. But the governing section defining the scope of the financial adjustment is s. 152 of the Act of 1933. This, as appears from the language of the section already quoted in this opinion, is to adjust the amount of the increase of burden which in consequence of the alteration of boundaries will properly be thrown on the ratepayers of the area of the local authority in meeting the cost incurred by that local authority in the discharge of their functions. This limitation is made even clearer by sched. V and particularly by r. 2 of the schedule which provides that the sum payable by the local authority in respect of the increase of burden shall not exceed the average annual increase of burden or its capitalised value if payable by instalments. D E

In my opinion, this precise definition of the mandate thus given to the arbitrator excludes the idea of a power to award interest in addition to his determination of the increase of burden. The English common law as to interest has very recently been discussed by your Lordships in Riches v. Westminster Bank (3). In that case this House discussed the provisions of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, s. 3, which enlarged the powers of "any court of record for the recovery of any debt or damages" so as to include in the sum for which judgment is given interest and repealed ss. 28 and 29 of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833. The mere language of the new Act makes it clear that it cannot apply to an award under the provisions of the Local Government Act here in question. There is here no question of debt or damages, nor is the decision that of a court of record. The judgment of this House in Swift v. Board of Trade (4), which was cited in this appeal was a different case. It dealt with the power of a statutory arbitrator to allow interest on the compensation for goods requisitioned in wartime under the Defence of the Realm Regulations. Such a power was negated by this House. Much of what was said by their Lordships in that case does not apply to a case like the present, in particular because the Act of 1934 just mentioned had not F G H then been enacted. But LORD SUMNER ([1925] A.C. 323) stated the principle to be that unless the regulation itself authorises the allowance of interest none can be given. He pointed out that there was no debt due and no wrong done, there was nothing to which to attach an allowance of interest. He concluded :

To give interest is really to give additional compensation for being the victim of war legislation, and this subject of compensation is not within the regulation.

A Mutatis mutandis, the principle so stated applies to the present case. Indeed the reasons here for denying the discretion of the statutory arbitrator to award interest are stronger than those indicated by LORD SUMNER. Even though the county council was not the victim of wartime legislation it and the borough council were both subjected to the provisions of ss. 151 and 152 and to the statutory arbitration, with its inevitable delay in determining the proper sum of compensation. It may be enough to say here that no express power is given to the arbitrator to award interest. But the matter is to my mind concluded by the form of the mandate to which I have adverted. On the footing that interest was outside the scope of the arbitrator's authority that defect could not be cured by the agreement of the parties which in a case like this could not enlarge the statutory jurisdiction.

C To meet these objections it has been strenuously contended that loss of interest which was unavoidable under the circumstances was an integral and essential element in the equitable estimate of the increase of burden consequent on the alteration of boundaries and as such had to be taken into account, like any other element of cost. But it cannot be correctly regarded as part of the increase of cost to the county council in executing its functions. It is indeed outside that subject of computation. Interest is collateral, because it is in essence a special payment to compensate the creditor for being deprived of the use of the money during the delay between the due date and the eventual payment. It is the appointed day which the arbitrator must regard, as the due date for fixing the compensation. The delay in payment is subsequent and incidental. But the fundamental objection is that the arbitrator's mandate does not extend to the award of interest. That legal limitation excludes the equitable considerations, at the best uncertain and open to conflicting equities, which the county council seeks to introduce.

E I have not been helped by any of the other cases cited. The issue should, in my opinion, be decided on the basis of the particular instruments to which I have referred. I should answer the question (2) in the negative. Question (3) does not arise since it presupposes an affirmative answer to (2). Of course, the question as to interest from the date of the award is a different matter. It is naturally not raised in the case. I should dismiss the appeal.

F LORD SIMONDS : My Lords, the relevant facts have been sufficiently stated in the other appeal between these parties. Here the short question stated by the arbitrator is, in his own words :

Whether I have power to award interest on any sum or sums I may award to the county council—(a) in respect of the period between the appointed day and the date of my award, or (b) in respect of any, and if so what, part of that period.

G A further question arises if the question is answered in the affirmative. It does not arise in the view which your Lordships take.

H It is necessary to distinguish that part of the sum to be awarded which arises from an adjustment in respect of increase of burden from that part which arises from an adjustment of other "property, income, debts, liabilities and expenses (so far as affected by the alteration) of, and any financial relations between, the parties to the agreement." I quote the language of s. 151 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1933. It is in regard to the former part only (which forms by far the larger portion of the claim) that the specific directions contained in s. 152 (1) (b) of the Act and in sched. V to the Act apply. It appears to me that the answer to this question must rest on the true construction of the relevant sections. I find that so clear that I do not think it necessary to refer to the adventitious fact (if it be a fact) that the borough council has no statutory power to raise by way of loan the very large sum which might be awarded by way of interest.

As a matter of construction, there must be found in the section a power express or implied given to the arbitrator to award interest. Upon this part of the case I would respectfully adopt the language of LORD GREENE, M.R. ([1946] 2 All E.R. 322, 323). I agree with him in thinking that the decision of this House in Swift & Co. v. The Board of Trade (4), is conclusive. No express power is to be found in the section and there is nothing from which such a power can or ought to be implied. It was urged that, so far as the awarded sum consisted of an adjustment in respect of an increase of burden, it was the duty of the arbitrator to ascertain under s. 152 (1) (b) "such sum as seems equitable, etc." and that he could not satisfactorily perform that duty unless he could award interest for delay in payment after the appointed day, when ex hypothesi, the burden was increased. But this argument ignores that what the arbitrator has to do is to find the equitable sum as at the appointed day. Having done so, he has accomplished his task. He has neither the right nor the duty then to consider whether there has been delay and, if so, whose fault that delay was, and upon that footing to award interest. Then it was contended, and this argument extended, I think, to the whole of the awarded sum, that the arbitrator could award whatever the parties could agree, and that the parties could in the adjustment of their "financial relations" agree to the payment of interest on a capital sum. I will assume that the first part of this contention is correct, that, what the parties could agree, the arbitrator could award. But the "financial relations" to be adjusted are the relations existing before and at the appointed day: see per LORD DAVEY in Caterham U.D.C. v. Godstone R.D.C. (5) ([1904] A.C. 174). An agreement for payment of interest after the appointed day is not an adjustment of financial relations as at that day. If it is competent for a local authority to agree to pay such interest (a question which I do not think it necessary to decide) the power to do so does not arise under the sections in question but extraneously. And if it does not arise under the sections, then the arbitrator has no power to award interest on any sum which he may award to the county council. This appeal must, in my opinion, be dismissed.

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, I have been asked by LORD DU PARCQ to state on his behalf that he has had an opportunity of reading in print the speech which was delivered by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack and that he agrees with it and has nothing to add. My Lords, I also agree with it, and I have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Simon, Lord Wright, Lord Simonds, Lord Uthwatt, Lord Normand), March 13, 17, 18, May 16, 1947.]

Rates and Rating—Valuation list—Revaluation—Validity of large-scale revaluation—Proposals by county valuation committee to increase large proportion of assessments in area—Systematic examination of all assessments with a view to revaluation—Rating and Valuation Act, 1925 (c. 90), s. 37 (1).

In Dec., 1940, the respondent county valuation committee, being of opinion that the general level of existing assessments in its rating area was too low, made proposals to increase the assessments of between 40 and 50 houses, and in Nov., 1941, these proposals were approved by the assessment committee. Between Dec., 1941, and Dec., 1942, the valuation committee made proposals relating to 577 hereditaments, the assessments in respect of which, with few exceptions, were increased by the assessment committee. In addition to these proposals, 618 further hereditaments were inspected on behalf of the valuation committee, and systematic inspection was continuing of all hereditaments. One of the proposals allowed by the assessment committee was that the gross value of a hereditament belonging to the appellant should be increased from £14 to £20 and the rateable value from £8 to £12. In making this and all other proposals, the valuation committee were purporting to act under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 37, which provides "(1) Any person (including the county valuation committee and any local authority) who is aggrieved by the incorrectness or unfairness of any matter in the valuation list for the time being in force, or by the inclusion therein or omission therefrom of any matter . . . or otherwise with respect to the list, may make in manner provided by this section a proposal for the amendment of the list . . ."

HELD: the proposal to increase the appellant's assessment was within the plain meaning of s. 37, and, although it might well be that the legislature did not contemplate the making of wholesale proposals as a normal operation of the section, it was impossible to find anything in the Act which rendered such proposals illegal.

Per LORD UTHWATT: A proposal for an amendment of a specific entry is not altered in character by reason that it forms part of a series of cases calling for alterations in value due to an identical or general cause, and, however numerous the amendments, the valuation list retains its character as the current valuation list.

APPEAL by the ratepayer from a decision of the Court of Appeal, reported at [1946] 1 All E.R. 4, reversing a decision of the Divisional Court, reported at [1945] 2 All E.R. 78.

The matter came before the Divisional Court on a Special Case stated by Norfolk Quarter Sessions by consent of the parties. The Divisional Court held that the county valuation committee had no power to use the provisions for amendment of the valuation list in the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 37, to bring into existence a new valuation list, but the Court of Appeal held that, even assuming that the county valuation committee was, in fact, engaged in an operation resulting in the alteration of all the assessments in their area, that operation, if carried out within the powers conferred by s. 37, was lawful. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD SIMONDS.

Beney, K.C., and Dare for the appellant.

Simes, K.C., and H.B. Williams for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

May 16. The following opinions were delivered.

VISCOUNT SIMON: My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in print the opinion which has been prepared in this appeal by LORD SIMONDS. He has covered the whole ground, and I agree with his reasoning and conclusions. In these circumstances I need do no more than move that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD WRIGHT: My Lords, I also concur.

LORD SIMONDS: My Lords, the question for your Lordships' decision is whether the North West Norfolk Assessment Committee (whom I will call "the first respondent") were correct in allowing a proposal by the county valuation committee for the county of Norfolk (whom I will call "the second respondent") dated Aug. 17, 1942, to amend the current valuation list for the parish of Heacham in the Docking rural rating area in the county of Norfolk by raising the gross value of a certain hereditament belonging to and occupied by the appellant from £14 to £20 and the rateable value from £8 to £12. This question, which the Court of Appeal has answered in the affirmative, reversing the decision of the King's Bench Division, came before the court on a Special Case stated for its opinion under the provisions of the Quarter Sessions Act, 1849, s. 11, commonly known as Baines's Act. It appears from the preamble to the Special Case that the dispute thus arose. The second respondent having made the proposal to which I have already referred, the appellant objected to it in writing on Dec. 8, 1942. His notice of objection is annexed to the Special Case, but the grounds of objection are not there stated. On Dec. 18, 1942, the first respondent heard the proposal and objection and determined to raise the value of the appellant's hereditament in accordance with the proposal. The appellant on Jan. 5, 1943, gave due notice of appeal against this determination to the court of quarter sessions of the county of Norfolk. I think it convenient at this stage to state the grounds of appeal as they were there set out. They were:

(1) Since the passing of the Rating and Valuation (Postponement of Valuations) Act, 1940, there has been a re-valuation of the greater part of Heacham and proposals numbering 407 have been made which have been heard and determined by the assessment committee and further valuations are in progress with a view to further proposals being made. Although these are individually called proposals the result is in fact a revaluation of the whole or greater part of the parish revising the basis for the area and as such it is bad in law and ultra vires.

(2) The gross value as determined by the said assessment committee is not in accordance with the definition of gross value contained in the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 68.

The first of these grounds has persisted and is, in substance, the question that your Lordships now have to consider. The second of them has disappeared.

Notice of appeal having thus been given, the Special Case was stated by consent of the parties and by order of COHEN, J., pursuant to the provisions of Baines's Act. Its terms were settled by agreement between the parties and their advisers. I take the following facts from the Special Case. The parish of Heacham and the parishes of Snettisham, Dersingham and Ingoldisthorpe are part of the rating area consisting of 29 parishes for which the Docking Rural District Council (which I will call "the rating authority") is the rating authority. The first respondent is the assessment committee for an area which includes this rating area and the second respondent is the county valuation committee for the county of Norfolk established pursuant to the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 18, to which I shall refer as "the Act of 1925." Section 19 of the Act of 1925 had provided that a new valuation list should be made for every rating area, so as to come into force on Apr. 1, 1928, or on Apr. 1, 1929, and a second new valuation list should be made so as to come into force for every such area on Apr. 1, 1932, 1933 or 1934, and that thereafter new valuation lists should be made from time to time so that the interval between the dates on which one valuation list and the next succeeding valuation list respectively came into force should be a period of 5 years. But by the Rating and Valuation (Postponement of Valuations) Act, 1938, s. 1, the third new valuation list was directed to be made so as to come into force on Apr. 1, 1941: and by the Rating and Valuation (Postponement of Valuations) Act, 1940, s. 1 (3), the making of the third new valuation list was further indefinitely postponed by the substitution in the Act of 1938 of a reference to Apr. 1, in the "prescribed year" for the reference to Apr. 1, 1941. By reason of these provisions the second new valuation list for the Docking rural rating area, which came into force on Apr. 1, 1934, was the valuation list in force at all material times.

The total number of hereditaments in the said rating area is 6,410 of which number the four parishes specifically referred to contain respectively:—Heacham parish, 980; Snettisham parish, 669; Dersingham parish, 591; Ingoldisthorpe parish, 137—2,377. Each of the said parishes appears in a separate division of the valuation list in accordance with s. 21 (2) of the Act of 1925. On Aug. 26, 1940, the rating authority made proposals to increase the assessments of certain houses in the parish of Ingoldisthorpe. In or about the month of Dec., 1940, the second respondent, being of opinion that the general level of the existing assessments in the said rating area was too low, made proposals to increase the assessments of 22 houses in Ingoldisthorpe, 17 in Heacham and 5 in Dersingham, in respect of which houses and 5 others in Ingoldisthorpe the rating authority had already made proposals to increase the assessments but at lower figures. The first respondent on Nov. 14, 1941, approved the proposals of the second respondent. Between Dec., 1941, and Dec., 1942, the second respondent made proposals relating to 577 hereditaments (including that which is the subject of this appeal) which were situated in the respective parishes as follows:—Heacham, 409; Snettisham, 82; Dersingham, 33; Ingoldisthorpe, 53—577. The assessments of all these hereditaments, with the exception of eight, two of which stand adjourned, were increased by the first respondent. In addition to making the proposals referred to above the acting county valuation officer on behalf of the second respondent prior to Dec., 1942, inspected 618 further hereditaments in the said parishes, as follows:—Heacham, 87; Snettisham, 172; Dersingham, 359—618. No proposals in respect of these hereditaments had been made pending the result of this appeal except that on Mar. 8, 1944, eight further proposals were made by the second respondent to increase the gross and rateable values of certain hereditaments in the parish of Heacham. The said proposals were approved by the first respondent on Mar. 31, 1944. On July 20, 1942, the following minute was entered by the Docking Rural District Council in their minute books:

Proposals by county valuation officer.—A further list of proposals made by the county valuation officer acting on behalf of the Norfolk County Council was before the rating committee. Arising from this matter the Heacham parish representative stated there was considerable concern in the parish regarding what appeared to be the omission or delay by the acting county valuation officer in submitting proposals regarding the larger properties and it is recommended that Mr. Chapman be requested to give his observations on this matter.

The said Chapman was the acting county valuation officer.

On Sept. 11, 1942, the said acting county valuation officer wrote to the Docking Rural District Council a letter in which he stated:

There are a small number of larger properties which have not yet been dealt with by me as I have not had time to do so, but I have endeavoured throughout to value all properties without regard to size. Any properties which have been omitted will be revalued in the near future and proposals made if necessary.

In Dec., 1942, the acting county valuation officer on behalf of the second-named respondents was actively continuing a systematic inspection and revaluation of all the hereditaments in the said rating area with a view to the making of further proposals so as to raise the general level of the existing assessments in the said rating area.

The Special Case then sets out the contentions of the parties, that of the appellant being in effect the contention which had already appeared in the notice of appeal to quarter sessions and that of the respondents being in effect that the second respondent had no power or duty to prepare a new valuation list and were not in fact doing so but were acting in exercise of their statutory duty under s. 18 of the Act of 1925 to take such steps as they thought fit for promoting uniformity in the principles and practice of valuation and of their statutory powers under s. 37 of the same Act to make proposals for the amendment of the valuation list. The contention of the appellant found favour with the Divisional Court, consisting of LEWIS, OLIVER and BIRKETT, JJ., whose unanimous judgment was delivered by BIRKETT, J. It was their opinion that the true view of the matters in controversy was that because a new valuation list, due in 1939 in the ordinary course of events, could not be brought into being and such a list was thought to be most desirable, the methods employed were designed to bring about the same end; that what could only be done under s. 19 of the Act of 1925 was sought to be done under s. 37 of that Act; that that was not a proper method of dealing with the position and had no sanction in law; and that, accordingly, the proposal against which the appellant appealed was not a valid and legal proposal. The Court of Appeal were unanimous in reversing this decision, holding that what was done by the respondents was authorised by the plain language of s. 37 of the Act of 1925 and that the present appellant's argument involved a rewriting of that section for which there was no justification.

My Lords, in my opinion, the view of the Court of Appeal is to be preferred. The MASTER OF THE ROLLS has dealt exhaustively and, as I think, conclusively with the construction of the Act of 1925, but your Lordships were pressed by counsel for the appellant with a decision of this House in Camberwell Assessment Committee v. Ellis (1), with which the MASTER OF THE ROLLS did not explicitly deal. That was a case which was decided upon another Act of Parliament, the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, ss. 46 and 47 of which contain provisions bearing some resemblance to those of s. 37 of the Act of 1925. Upon those sections it was determined by this House that to justify an alteration of the quinquennial valuation of a hereditament in the metropolis (which was made under that Act) by a supplemental or provisional valuation it must be shown that the cause of the alteration in its annual value was one directly affecting that particular hereditament and that it was not enough merely to show that since the last quinquennial valuation there had been throughout the metropolis a general rise in the annual value of the class of property to which the particular hereditament belonged. My Lords, that is a binding authority upon the meaning of those sections, but, if I may say so with the greatest respect to the learned judges of the King's Bench Division, I get little assistance from it in the construction of the relevant sections, and in particular s. 37, of the Act of 1925. I do not doubt that that is why the learned MASTER OF THE ROLLS did not deal with it.

The Act of 1925, which does not extend to the administrative county of London, appears to me to be unambiguous in its terms so far as relates to the present question. It is a comprehensive Act, as its title indicates :

An Act to simplify and amend the law with respect to the making and collection of rates by the consolidation of rates and otherwise, to promote uniformity in the valuation of property for the purpose of rates, to amend the law with respect to the valuation of machinery and certain other classes of properties, and for other purposes incidental to or connected with the matters aforesaid.

In the construction of an Act with such an avowed purpose the judicial interpretation of similar, but in some respects markedly different, language in an analogous statute can have relatively little weight with your Lordships. I examine very briefly the Act of 1925. Part I of the Act establishes the rating authorities in every rating area and provides for the making and levying of rates and for the issue of precepts. About this part of the Act I need say no more. Part II of the Act deals with "Valuation." First it establishes "assessment areas" and an "assessment committee" for each area. Then by s. 18 it provides for the establishment in every county of a committee of the county council to be called "the county valuation committee," whose duty it is to take such steps as they think fit (inter alia) "for promoting uniformity in the principles and practice of valuation" and whose right it is either alone or in conjunction with any rating authority, assessment committee or other county valuation committee to appear as a party to any objection or appeal under that part of the Act. Section 19, to which I have referred at an earlier stage of this opinion, provides for the making of valuation lists, and for their duration. Section 25 and the following sections contain elaborate provisions for the preparation of such lists. I think it necessary only to note that under s. 26 any person including the county valuation committee and any local authority :

... aggrieved by the incorrectness or unfairness of any matter in the draft list, or by the insertion therein or omission therefrom of any matter ... or otherwise with respect to the list ...

may lodge an objection in the manner prescribed. Section 27 provides for consideration of objections by the assessment committee and for their revision of the draft list, s. 28 for its final approval, and s. 31 and the following sections for appeals to quarter sessions. The list having now been settled and being in force for the statutory period, next comes the section which is all important to this case. Section 37 (1) provides :

Any person (including the county valuation committee and any local authority) who is aggrieved by the incorrectness or unfairness of any matter in the valuation list for the time being in force, or by the inclusion therein or omission therefrom of any matter ... or otherwise with respect to the list, may make in manner provided by this section a proposal for the amendment of the list ...

The question is whether the "proposal" made by the second respondent in this case was such a proposal as the section authorised. Two things are immediately apparent—first, that the language of the section could not be wider, and, second, that it is an exact repetition of s. 26. It is clear beyond all controversy that whatever might be a matter of "objection" under the earlier section may be a matter of "proposal" under the later one. If this is so, it could only be a compelling context which would justify some limitation being imposed upon the natural meaning of the words in question. I can find no such context. Whether the proposal stands alone or is one of many, whether the factors which affect the value of a particular hereditament affect the value of other hereditaments in a greater or less degree or not at all, appear to me to be considerations wholly irrelevant to the issue. The only question is whether the proposal falls within the plain meaning of s. 37. I agree with the MASTER OF THE ROLLS that it is only by re-writing the section that it could be excluded. Nor, as I think, is there any force in the argument that, if "proposals" are on a sufficiently large scale, the result may be substantially the same as would follow from a new valuation list and that such a result is intended to be effected only by the procedure under s. 19 of the Act of 1925. It may well be that the legislature did not contemplate wholesale proposals just as it did not contemplate the postponement of quinquennial valuations, but I agree with the Court of Appeal that it is impossible to find anything in the Act which renders such proposals illegal.

My Lords, I have already indicated that in my opinion the Camberwell (1) case, which was decided under the Act of 1869, does not assist your Lordships in the construction of the Act of 1925 and I do not think it necessary or useful to examine the manifold differences between the two Acts. But I should perhaps refer to R. v. Horsham and Worthing Assessment Committee (2). That was a case decided under the Act of 1925, in which a county valuation committee notified a borough rating authority in the county that in the opinion of the committee the quinquennial valuation list for the borough, which had recently come into force, was not in accordance with the Act of 1925 in the matter of gross values. After due consideration the rating authority made many thousands of proposals for the amendment of the valuation list and a large number of objections fell to be decided by the assessment committee. It was sought to quash their decision overruling an objection to one such proposal upon a number of grounds, including (a) that no such proposal for the amendment of a valuation list could lawfully be made under s. 37 of the Act of 1925, and (b) that s. 37 did not empower the rating authority to make a general revaluation of their district to take effect during the currency of a quinquennial valuation list. These are in effect the grounds upon which the appeal now before the House is supported. The Divisional Court upheld the decision of the assessment committee and in the course of his judgment LORD HEWART, C.J., distinguished the Camberwell (1) case, emphasising that the court was dealing with a different statute and different circumstances. In the same case SINGLETON, J., observing on the duties imposed upon the county valuation committee, said that, if it became necessary for them to lodge proposals in order to promote uniformity, they would clearly be within their rights whether it was one proposal or many thousands of proposals. So far I entirely agree with this decision. But I observe that in a later passage SINGLETON, J., says that, if something was done which was in fact the making of a new list, it might well be said to be contrary to the spirit of the Act, and in particular to s. 19. I have some doubt what is intended by this observation. I cannot assent to it, if it means that any limitation is to be imposed upon the power of the county valuation committee to make as many proposals as it thinks desirable. On the contrary I think that, so long as any particular proposal is (to use the words of TUCKER, L.J.) "within the four corners of s. 37," it is a lawful proposal which may lawfully be entertained, although similar proposals may be so numerous that few entries on the current valuation list will remain unaltered. The contrary view is, I think, expressed by STABLE, J., in Murphy Radio Ltd. v. Welwyn Garden City Rating Authority (3), and I agree with the MASTER OF THE ROLLS that the passage which he cites from the judgment of that learned judge cannot be supported. Since the passages that I have quoted from the last two cases cited appear to reflect and to be founded on certain observations made in this House in the Camberwell case, I would conclude by repeating that that decision rested, as their Lordships in that case were careful to emphasise, upon the statute and the attendant facts there under consideration and cannot be taken as a guide in the construction of s. 37 of the Act of 1925. I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD UTHWATT: My Lords, the specific contentions of the appellant are two in number. His first contention is that it is not permissible for the county valuation committee, or, indeed, anyone else, to use the machinery provided by the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 37, to produce in substance a new valuation list. His second contention is linked with the first contention and is that s. 37 cannot be invoked where those seeking to alter an existing assessment rely on a general change in values happening since the making of the current valuation list as distinct (to use the language of the appellant's printed case) "from a specific change in or affecting or some addition to the hereditaments in question." The agreed Case is not in all respects clear, and it may be doubted whether the facts there stated permit the raising of the second contention in the precise form in which it was put, but the respondents were content that any obscurities in the Case should be resolved in favour of the appellant and took the stand that s. 37 could be used whenever the value attributed to the hereditament in the valuation list was incorrect, the multitude of cases and the cause of error being in their submission immaterial.

The contentions of the appellant obviously find their origin in the decision of this House in Camberwell Assessment Committee v. Ellis (1). The matter there in issue was the proper function of a supplemental list made under the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, s. 46. The decision relates only to the proper construction of that section read in light of the Act as a whole. The observations made in that case as to the respective areas of the quinquennial valuation lists, supplemental lists, and provisional lists referred to in that Act are based only upon the construction of the Act and particularly upon the reference to "cause" contained in s. 47. In the Act of 1925 there is no reference to "cause" and, in my opinion, nothing in Camberwell Assessment Committee v. Ellis (1) affords any guide to the proper construction of the Act here under consideration.

Section 37 of the Act of 1925 is perfectly general in its terms. Verbally it contains nothing upon which the appellant can rest his contentions and nothing which negatives the broad proposition submitted by the respondents. A consideration of the Act as a whole may, however, compel the conclusion that as a matter of construction a gloss should be put upon the section having the effect of limiting its apparently universal application, or it may compel the conclusion that resort to the machinery of the section is an abuse and not a legitimate use, if incorrectness in the subsisting valuations is widespread or is due to some general cause. The relevant portions of the Act must therefore be examined. The scheme of the Act is that a new valuation list must be made for every rating area at five-yearly intervals and each such valuation list (subject to the provisions of the Act including the provisions relating to alterations and additions) is to remain in force until superseded by a new valuation list (s. 19). Section 37 is directed to the making of amendments to the current valuation list. Where pursuant to the section a new value is attributed to a hereditament, the matter is carried through by an alteration of or addition to the valuation list (see s. 37 (9)). The additions and alterations so made are not pendants to the valuation list but part of it. Amendments as to value, however numerous, do not result in a new valuation list, but only to new values in the current list. It is to the valuation list so added to or altered that statutory force is given. The procedure to be followed on the making of a new valuation list is set out in s. 25 et seq. For present purposes it is sufficient to point out that the classes of persons who may make proposals under s. 37 for the amendment of the valuation list are the same as the classes of persons who on the making of a new valuation list may under s. 26 make objections to the draft valuation list, and that the matters falling for consideration on a proposal under s. 37 are described in the same language as the matters falling for consideration on an objection under s. 26. Textually (subject to one necessary alteration) the relevant language of s. 26 is repeated in s. 37. It is clear that all matters relating to value are open under s. 26, and a limited construction can, therefore, be attributed to s. 37 only on the ground that an amendment of an existing entry, and not the making of an original entry, is under consideration. The value attributed to any hereditament in the valuation list as for the time being in force is conclusive evidence of the value for every rate (s. 20). Rate is defined by s. 68 to include general rates, special rates and sums raised by precepts. All rating areas in the county are, therefore, interested in the value attributed to any particular hereditament in any rating area and disparity between the standards of values for the time being in force in different areas is of serious moment.

Section 18 contains a matter of particular importance for the purpose in hand. Provision is there made for the setting up of county valuation committees which are to include representatives of each assessment area in the county. The functions of these committees are set out in sub-s. (2). It is to be their duty to take such steps as they think fit for promoting uniformity in the principles and practice of valuation and assisting rating authorities and assessment committees in the performance of their functions under pt. II of the Act. A committee as such is not pecuniarily interested in the proceeds of any rate, but is included both in s. 37 (which relates to the revision of the valuation list) and in s. 26 (which relates to the draft valuation list) among the persons who may be aggrieved by any matter in the draft list or the valuation list. There is thus afforded to a committee, as well during the life of the valuation list as at its birth, the opportunity of carrying out its statutory duty of promoting uniformity in the practice of valuation in the county.

That, so far as is here relevant, is the general scheme of the Act. I can see nothing in it upon which to found a conclusion that as a matter of construction a limitation should be put upon the general language of s. 37 or that resort to machinery provided by that section would be an abuse if all the hereditaments in a particular rating area were involved and the cause of incorrectness perfectly general. On the question of construction the identity of the language used in s. 37 with that used in s. 26 precludes any such limitation as that contended for by the appellant. A proposal for an amendment of a specific entry is not altered in character by reason that it forms part of a series of cases calling for alterations in value due to an identical or general cause, and, however numerous the amendments, the valuation list retains its character as the current valuation list.

On the other point, nothing turns on the circumstance that in this case it is the county valuation committee that has made the proposal under review, but the circumstance that under the section the county valuation committee is given the right to make proposals for the amendment of the list to my mind concludes this part of the case against the appellant. Acceptance of the appellant's contention involves the conclusion that the committee is restricted during the quinquennium to confining its attention to matters of minor import. Surely the contrary is the case. The obvious inference is that its right to make proposals was intended to march with the due performance of its statutory duty. The more general the inaccuracy of the subsisting valuations in a particular rating area—whether it be due to original incorrectness in the valuation list or to causes operating since its making—and the more general the cause, the more appropriate indeed would appear to be intervention by the committee.

I cannot, therefore, see that the Act, in its general intentment, precludes resort being made to s. 37 where incorrectness is widespread and the cause of the incorrectness is general. Alterations on a wholesale scale may not have been in direct contemplation as a normal operation of the section, but it is impossible to say that such alterations are foreign to the purpose it serves. I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD NORMAND : My Lords, I find myself in complete agreement with the judgment which has been delivered by LORD SIMONDS, to which I can add nothing.

Appeal dismissed.

APPLICATION for certiorari to quash a decision of the Recorder of Leicester, allowing an appeal against an order of the Leicester justices adjudging one Dennis Draper to be the putative father of the applicant's child.

E. Ling Mallison for the applicant. The respondent did not appear.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: In this case counsel moves for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash an order of the Recorder of Leicester who allowed an appeal by one, Dennis Draper, against an order in bastardy made against him by the justices of the city of Leicester. On the hearing of the appeal before the recorder Draper gave evidence which the recorder believed, but later it turned out that it was wholly untrue and Draper was convicted at Birmingham Assizes of perjury and sentenced to 21 months imprisonment, which he is now serving. It is clear that he committed perjury with regard to a most material fact. The only question on which this court requires to be satisfied was whether or not certiorari is the remedy. It is a remedy of a peculiar character and there is a great deal of authority as to when it will and when it will not lie.

The leading case for the present purpose appears to be R. v. Gillyard (1), decided in 1848, where, it is interesting to observe, the Attorney-General himself obtained a rule to quash a conviction of a man on the ground that the proceedings were fraudulent in that a charge had been made by the prosecutor which he knew to be untrue and had made to exculpate himself. The court held that where a decision of an inferior court resulting in a conviction had been obtained by fraud certiorari was a remedy which was open to the subject who had been convicted, and the rule was made absolute and the conviction quashed. That seems to have been followed in other cases: see R. v. Alleyne (2), and in Colonial Bank of Australasia v. Willan (3), the Judicial Committee obviously admitted the principle that, if the court was satisfied that there had been fraud in the proceedings, the remedy of certiorari would lie.

In this case there can be no doubt there was the grossest fraud on the part of Draper. It is not necessary to consider whether certiorari would lie if the perjury had been committed by a respondent to an appeal, though I am inclined to think it would. In these circumstances I think the order for certiorari must go, and the order of the recorder in the bastardy proceedings must be quashed, with costs.

SINGLETON, J.: I agree. In the words of ERLE, J. in R. v. Gillyard (1), (12 Q.B. 530):

This court has authority to correct all irregularities in the proceedings of inferior tribunals, which in this case have been resorted to for the purpose of fraud. In quashing this conviction, we are exercising the most salutary jurisdiction which this court can exercise.

So, in the present case the order of the inferior court was obtained by fraud and perjury. So far as I know, this procedure is the only one which can be adopted to put right the wrong which has been done.

OLIVER, J.: I agree.

Order accordingly.
